

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY
AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN
BOOKSTACKS

NOTICE: Return or renew all Library Materials! The Minimum Fee for each Lost Book is $50.00.

The person charging this material is responsible for its return to the library from which it was withdrawn on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.
To renew call Telephone Center, 333-8400

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

BUILDING USE ONLY
DEC 17 1988
DEC 17 1988

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2021 with funding from University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign

304

The Nation

VOLUME VI.

October 2nd, 1909, to March 26th, 1910.

LONDON: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

ma

052
N
v.6

The Nation

LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
1910

LONDON:
PRINTED BY THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED
WHITEFRIARS HOUSE, E.C.

October 2nd, 1900; to March 26th, 1910

LONDON: 14, NEWSPAPER STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

The Nation

INDEX.

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS.

	PAGE		PAGE
A De-Balfourised House of Commons. By		Free Trade, The Vindication of ...	594
H. W. M. ...	232	From Armed Truce to Arrangement ...	560
A Futile Controversy ...	835	Fruits of Victory, The ...	388
A Half-Way House to Freedom ...	318
A Letter to a Business-Man on the English Revolution now Pending, from the Threat of the House of Lords to reject the Budget. By H. W. V. Temperley ...	149, 185, 233, 269	German Armaments, The Purpose of ...	731
Allies, The ...	558	Germany, The Shaping of ...	959
American Politics, The Confusion of ...	992	Gladstone's Legacy of Democracy ...	520
Anglo-German Peace, The Grounds of ...	111	Good Parliament, The ...	445
Another "Psychological Moment." By H. W. M. ...	358	Great Days of 1832, The ...	357
Appeal to the Crown, The ...	868
Appeal to the Moderate Man, The ...	556	History of a Crime, The. Chapter I. ...	316
A Sentimental Journey ...	184	How it Strikes a Contemporary. By C. F. G. Masterman ...	597
A Sham Passion and a Real Dilemma ...	183
Asquith Resolutions, The Consequence of the ...	989	Indian Police, The Character of the ...	595
A Step to Anglo-German Peace ...	487	Indian Press Law, The Perils of the ...	762
A Survey of the Constituencies. By One Who Has Been Round Them ...	599	Inevitable Duke, The ...	559
		In the Kingdom of the Blind. By H. W. M. ...	393
Bagdad, The Significance of ...	523	Ireland's Interest in the Budget ...	871
Budget Complete, The ...	229	Issues Before the People, The ...	353
Budget and the Growth of Trade, The ...	146	"It Never Can Happen Again" ...	352
Budget, The House of Lords' ...	446
Budget, The Issues of the. By the Chancellor of the Exchequer ...	180	King and the New Parliament, The ...	728
Budget, The Offence of the ...	109	King, the Lords, and the Budget, The ...	36
		King, The Position of the ...	4
Can Protection Cure Unemployment? ...	390
Censorship, The New ...	447	Labor Exchanges, The Value of ...	730
Central Issue, The ...	629	Land for the Asking ...	266
China in Motion ...	872	Liberal Leaders, The Duty of the ...	956
Church Congress, The ...	38	Liberal Party and the Whips, The. By A Radical Member ...	905
Coming Coup d'état , The ...	264	Light on the Anglo-German Problem ...	267
Coming Storm, The ...	182	Logic of Lord Revelstoke, The ...	391
Concentration ...	444	Lords' Attack on the Commons, The ...	901
Congo, The Change in the ...	231	Lords, The Window-Dressing of the ...	990
Crisis and a Way Out, The ...	832
Crisis and How to Meet it, The ...	228	"Making the Foreigner Pay" ...	230
Crown and the Constitution, The ...	796	Massing of the Grand Army, The ...	484
		Members and their Mandate. By a Parliamentary Correspondent ...	765
Destruction of the Block Veto, The ...	389	Misplaced Magnanimity ...	108
Dominant Issue at Last, The ...	696	Money Power, The Limits of ...	697
		Motor Roads and the Public ...	7
Egyptian Terrorist, An ...	836
England, The Strength of ...	665	New Indian Constitution, The ...	319
Europe and the Elections ...	667	New Tory Demagogy, The ...	666
European Democracy, The Threat to ...	900	Noblesse Oblige—New Style ...	524
		North Against South ...	664
Ferrer, The Case of ...	145
Finland, The Case of ...	355	Old Cause and the New, The ...	628
Fleet, The Re-Organiser of the ...	700	One Issue for Liberalism, The ...	957
		One Thing Needful, The ...	760
		Opposition, The Game of the ...	593
		Our Ancient Ally ...	320

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Party Leadership, A New Style of. By H. W. M.	960	Tactics of the Situation, The	265
Party of Property, A	800	Tammany Again	40
Plucked from the Pit. By H. W. M.	873	"Tariff Reform," The Humbug of	597
Position Cleared, The	869	"The Sham Inevitable"	5
Press, The Independence of the	148	Through Reaction to Revolution	144
Price of Mr. Balfour, The	629	To Restore the Constitution	988
Problem of Latin America, The	632	Trade Unionism and the Law	522
Progressive Party, The Future of the	903	Turkey, British Policy in	698
Prussian Bureaucracy, The Battle of the	799	Two Policies, The	521
Public Law of Europe, The	991
Redress Before Supply	485	Use of the Majority, The	729
"Reforming" the Lords	798
Retort of the Commons, The	317	"Veto First!"	797
Scaring Capital Abroad	488	"Veto" or "Reform"?	761
Single Issue, The Advantage of a	833
Social Policy of Liberalism, The	354	What is the Function of the British Army?	902
Some Problems of Marriage...	870	What we are Fighting For	592
South Africa, Parties in	763	Where is Imperial Preference?	631
Spain, The Chances of	6	Who Started the Class War?	633
Spanish Peril, The	110	Women's Charter, The	958
Suffragist Deadlock: A Suggestion, The	37	Women's Suffrage, The Next Step in	765

LIFE AND LETTERS.

	PAGE		PAGE
A Decivilised Class	395	Decay of Melodrama, The	877
A Home-Made Religion. By Mark Rutherford	566	Declaration of the Poll, The	705
Almost an Immortal...	271	"Decent Church, The"	703
American Ambassadors	113	Dialogues of the Dead	234
A Modern King	526	Dump-Shop, The	634
An American Leader	323
"A Nation Once Again"	564	Element of Calm, The	670
A Parting. By John Galsworthy	326	Essential Self, The	493
A Problem of Police	238
A Revolution of the Rich	359	Factor of Race, The	10
Aristocracy in History	525	Fear of Socialism, The	186
Army of Innocence, The	396	Ferment, The	841
Art of Spending, The	563	Finder, The. By W. H. Davies	842
Art of Vanishing, The	908	Foreign Poetry and English Readers	153
A Saint Among Bishops	907
Attorney of the Terror, The	235	Game of Death, The	273
A Warning to Just Men	450
Barbarians of our Time	272	Hellenism, The "Idea" of	150
Basis of the Wage, The. By Charles Inge	640	Hypocrisy of the Peers, The	449
Battle of the Schools in France, The	702
Beaten Path, The	601	In a Little Town. Translated by Constance Garnett	363
Bee in Winter, The	736	Institutions and Inspiration	42
Best of Three Worlds, The	360
Bird-Play, The	770	Jest of Pilate, The	269
Body and Soul	995	King's English	839
Bread and Games	803
Broken Slumber	362	"La Vérité Vraie"	734
Carlyle the Poet	768	Life in Old Crete	671
Charity of the Middle Ages, The	325
Charm of Old Music, The	361	Madman's Story, The. By G. K. Chesterton	427
Chateaubriand	115	Man and Dramatist	237
Choice, The. By John Galsworthy	737	Methods of Justice	324
"Chopin Villa"	840	Milking. By Edward Thomas	192
City Garden, The	190	Money in Politics	9
City of Sunshine, A	964	Moral of the Hoardings, The	562
Climate on the Stage...	963	Motive Force of War, The	490
Color Sense in Trout, The	12	Mystery and Illusion. By Francis Grierson.	11
Compensations of Stupidity, The	804
Confessions of a Juror	805	Nature the Radical	672
Co-Partnership in Nature. By J. A. H.	117	New Pressure and the Old Thrills, The	43
Coulisses of the Supernatural, The	187

LIFE AND LETTERS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Ode on a Distant Prospect of Fleet Street. By		Sign of Allah, The. By Halide Salih	878
Ephemeris	494	"Sing all the World"	527
On Great Families	450	"Society" and the Budget	490
On a Nativity Picture	528	Sovranty of "Society," The	874
On Pan-cakes and Pan-Pipes	735	"Suggestion" in Electioneering	701
On Playing Cards	565
On Proverbs	909	Ten Years After	322
Our "Educated" Classes	669	"The Religions Life"	993
"Our Fathers Have Told Us"	635	The Workers. By John Galsworthy	529
Our Lost Romance	600	"Toadstools"	154
		"Tommy" of Old, The	114
Photography of the Wild	45	Two Englands, The	837
Place Like Home, The	452	Two People in One	962
Politician's Soul, The	766
Power of Deception, The	492	Underworld of Time, The	767
Robin, The	603	Village, The Problem of the	801
Roman Parallel, The	637	Virgin Soil	905
Sacred Rage of the People, The	151	Water-Cities	733
Sceptic in Art, The	394	What to Teach Children. By Leo Tolstoy	427
School of the Zoo, The	638	"Where Cruel Rage"	875
Sea in Music, The	602	Wild Greenhouses	996
Shakespeare's Double	41	With Horn and Hound	189

CONTEMPORARIES.

	PAGE
A French Chamberlain. By R. E. D.	117

ART, MUSIC, THE DRAMA, ETC.

ART.

	PAGE
Painting's Poor Relation	239
A Pastel Portraitist	567
Academy Winter Exhibition, The	605

MUSIC.

Strauss and His "Elektra." By Ernest Newman	843
Hope for Provincial Opera	911

THE DRAMA.

American Seriousness and English Humor. By William Archer	14
A Delightful Comedy. By William Archer	48
"One of God's Dandies." By William Archer	119
Bohemia and Bathos. By William Archer	193
Church and Stage. By H. W. M.	274
Lord Gorell's Amendment. By H. Granville Barker	328

	PAGE
Potted Beethoven. By William Archer	397
Better than Sardou. By William Archer	455
"The Blue Bird" and "Blanco Posnet." By William Archer	496
At a Music-Hall. By William Archer	530
Crude Woman, The. By William Archer	706
From Grim to Gay. By William Archer	738
Mr. Frohman's Repertory Theatre. By William Archer	771
Penology and Pyrotechny. By William Archer	844
Triple Bill, The. By William Archer	880
A Section and a Slice. By William Archer	910
"Elektra" as a Play, The. By H. W. M.	999

PICTURES OF TRAVEL.

An Impression of Friesland. By K. E. T. W.	12
A Death at Nohart. By Mrs. E. M. Cobden Sickert	46

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

	PAGE		PAGE
Report on Small Holdings, The. By M.P. ...	47	Money-Power at War, The. By Graham Wallas	453
Indian Decentralisation Report, The. By Sir William Wedderburn ...	192	Psychology of "Conversion," The. By Sidney Low	568
Lord No Zoo. By the Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell	327	"Gentles, Let us Rest!" By John Galsworthy	965, 967

COMMUNICATIONS.

	PAGE		PAGE
Government by Bureaucracy. By E. Belfort Bax	121	Troubles of a Socialist Elector, The. By Sadly
New Censorship, The. By Sydney Brooks	155	Perplexed ...	607
Ultramontaniam of Lord Hugh Cecil, The. By a Nationalist Churchman ...	156	Law of Electoral Corruption, The. By S. D. S. ...	674
Character of the Indian Police, The. By Frederic Mackarness ...	365, 398	Labor Party and Three-Corner Contests, The. By G. H. Perris ...	740
Difficulties of a Liberal Government in Ireland, The. By A. M. Sullivan...	535	Merits of the Fisher Régime, The. By Arnold White ...	806
Australia and the Rejection of the Budget. By C. H. Chomley ...	570	Planning of Greater Paris, The. By Henry R. Aldridge ...	912
		British Sport: How it is changing. By Sportsman	1000

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

	PAGE		PAGE
Young Turkey as a Military Power. By Our Balkan Correspondent ...	119	How German Workers Live. By Ed. Bernstein	569
Pull Towards the Left in Germany, The. By Ed. Bernstein ...	241	"Insurgent" Movement in the United States. By Henry George, Junr. ...	606
Electoral Policy of German Social Democracy, The. By Ed. Bernstein ...	456	What Canada is Thinking. By Scotus ...	673
Dawn of Constitutional Government in China, The. By S. ...	532	A Sham Reform. By Ed. Bernstein ...	772
		French Administrative Scandals, The. By R. E. D.	967

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

	PAGE		PAGE
Citizen Rights and Citizen Duties (Rosalind Travers); Women's Suffrage and the Liberal Party (H. M. Swanwick, Henry W. Nevinson, Evelyn Sharp, Emily Ashton, F. Melian Stowell, and Harold Lake); Dante's System of Morals (P. H. W.); "The Religious Policy of the French Republic" (André de Bavier); Professional Consumers (Harold Wright); The Government and the House of Lords (Joseph Martin) ...	15	The People's Suffrage Federation (Emily Hobhouse); The Period of the Dissolution (A Liberal M.P.); The House of Lords as a Senate (Herbert John Doree); Suffragists and Suffragettes (J. Rankine Finlayson); The Government and the Suffragettes ("How it Strikes a Contemporary"); The Psychology of the Militant Suffrage Movement (Mrs. A. Amy Brooke); The Death of Ferrer (Mrs. Cobden Sickert); "Revaluations" (A. W. Benn); The Church Congress and Socialism (Rev. John A. Grant); Compulsory Purchase in Ireland (Edward Grier, B.L.); Elections on Sunday (Albert Raphael); "Smith" (Boyle Lawrence); A Request for Information (A. Thirion); An Experiment in Rural Housing (Legal) ...	121
Motor Roads and the Public (Dr. A. Shadwell and a County Justice); Women's Suffrage and the Liberal Party (St. John G. Ervine, a Steady Opponent, E. M. White, and John R. Tomlinson); Recollections of Francis Newman (the Hon. Lionel A. Tollemache); The Lords and the Budget (S. S.); Fiscal Conundrums (Scotia); Oriental Languages (C.); The Business of Marriage (Ellen Duncan) ...	49	The Late Mr. Hofmeyr (Georgiana M. Solomon); The Grounds of Anglo-German Peace (John H.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Skrine); The Budget and Women's Suffrage (Holford Knight); Agrarian Policy in Hungary (St. Bernoit); The Anti-Budget Petition (Budget); The Tactics with the Lords (Alfred Dennis); The Death of Ferrer (Rev. R. L. Gale and C. S.); "Government by Bureaucracy" (H. G. Wood and Alfred Marks); How Habeas Corpus Passed the Lords (Cantab); The World Went Very Well Then (Militant); Lord Curzon's Economics (Tripos); The Government and the Country (Lex); The Budget and Snobbery (C. E. Maurice)	157	Grimshaw Haywood, James Morton and John Grubb); The Ultimate Basis of Authority (John Massie, M.P.); Lord Rosebery's Speech (D. M. Stevenson); Dramatic Authors on the Censorship (Arthur Pinero, &c.); The Purpose of Mr. Balfour's Romanes Lecture (Donald B. Somervell); Rattling into Barbarism (Penguin); In Praise of Dumping (W. H. M.); Charles Kingsley and Women's Suffrage (C. E. Maurice); Undergraduate Opinion in Oxford (H. F. D.); The Poetry Recital Society (The Director); Pragmatism (L. Crook and E. C. Childs); Bacon on Protection (A. J. Butler)	400
Gladstone and Money Bills (Rev. J. Frome Wilkinson); The Indian Deportations (Frederic Mackarness, M.P.); Liberal Women and the Suffrage (Fred C. Conybeare, F.B.A., Catherine Ryle, and M. A.); The Denial of Supplies (Law); Government and Bureaucracy (A. I. Tillyard, G. Montagu Harris); Reaction and Revolution (R. Henderson Smith); Agrarian Law in Hungary (Jos. Sachse)	195	Where the Foreigner Does Not Pay the Tax (Edward Porritt); Making the Foreigner Pay (Rowland Hunt, M.P., Arthur Aronson, Sir F. Cardew, George M. Cotton, and Charles E. Parker); Stanley and Joseph Thomson (Lady Stanley); "On the Forgotten Road" (Henry Baerlein); A Decivilised Class (R. Somerville and D. C. S.); The Logic of Lord Revelstoke (H. Peters Bone); The Ultimate Basis of Authority (Liberal Voter)	457
Tariff Reform in the United States (G. G. Greenwood, M.P.); Taxing the Foreigner (Veritas Vincit); Wanted, Details (Derision); Wanted, a Free Trade Campaign (Toga); A Prophecy (Joshua Brookes); The House of Lords and the General Election (Arnold Lupton, M.P.); Radical versus Unionist Land Reform (J. Ellis Barker); Liberal Women and the Franchise (Mackenzie Bell, Kate Chandler, and A Liberal Journalist)	241	The Character of the Indian Police (Frederic Mackarness, M.P.); The Premier and the Franchise (H. N. Brailsford); The Ultimate Basis of Authority (John Massie, M.P., Bernard Houghton, and T. Wilson); Making the Foreigner Pay (A. Grimshaw Haywood); Sheridan (Walter Sichel and The Reviewer of Mr. Sichel's "Sheridan")	497
"Making the Foreigner Pay" (A. Grimshaw Haywood, E. C., Morris Joseph, and Manufacturer); Liberal Women and the Suffrage (A Liberal Voter, Mary D. Horne, Frank E. Marshall, and G. S.); Elections on Sundays (H. P. Douglas); "Educational Finance" (C.-T.); The Automatic Fixing of Irish Rents (Edward Greer, B.L.); Mr. Ellis Barker (G. K. Chesterton); General Bingham (H. W. H.)	275	The Judgment on Admission to the Sacrament (Dean of Ripon); Scaring Capital Abroad (A Mugwump); Home Rule on Woman Suffrage (D. W.); Heredity and Great Families (G.); Can Protection Cure Unemployment? (H. and E. W. D.); Making the Foreigner Pay (Rowland Hunt, M.P., and Edward Taylor); The Campaign of the Peers (H. J. M.)	535
The Lord Advocate and Mr. Balfour (A Liberal Member); The Ultimate Basis of Authority (John Massie, M.P.); "Making the Foreigner Pay" (C. F. Cazenove); The Political Position of Women Graduates (L. Garrett Anderson, M.D., B.S.); "Land for the Asking" (County Councillor, Builder, and W. J. Johnston); High Albania (M. E. Durham); John Milton (W. Grinton Berry); Charles Kingsley and Women's Suffrage (C. E. Maurice); Pragmatism (L. Crook); Mr. "Ellis Barker" With Us (J. A. S.); Woman Suffrage and Forceful Feeding (Ennis Richmond); Women and the Laws (Alberta Russell)	330	Irish Liberals and the Government (W. J. Johnston); The Creation of the Peers ("Lex"); Balzac on Free Trade (S. D. S.); Forceful Feeding (J. A. Salter and R. Nash); The Falsity of the Plebiscite (J. L. Baldi); Making the Foreigner Pay (S. R.); "The Blue Bird" (M. B. L.); Food Taxes, Widows, and Pensioners (A. W. Findlay)	571
How to Deal with the Lords (Arthur Chamberlain); Making the Foreigner Pay (Rowland Hunt, M.P., and Inquirer); The Crisis and Women's Suffrage (Brougham Villiers); House of Commons Candidates (I. L. P.); The Second Appeal to Esau (Professor G. M. Minchin); Stanley, Emin, and Livingstone (A. Werner); Pragmatism (A. E. Y., and James Elroy Flecker); The Ultimate Basis of Authority (Bernard Houghton and M.A.); More Economics (Tripos); Charles Kingsley and Women's Suffrage (G. A. Seeböhm)	366	The Deeper Crisis (H. Bagenal); The Time for Practical Christianity (Rev. F. G. Montagu Powell); Shooting a Tame Stag (G. G. Greenwood, M.P.); Psychology of Conversion (Maurice B. Wright, M.D.); England and Germany (Dr. J. Holland Rose); The Art of Spending (Rev. Clement F. Rogers); The Indians in the Transvaal (L. W. Ritch); Ulster Liberal Unionism (S. Shannon Millin and A Nonconformist Liberal); A Case of "Malice" (H. N. Brailsford)	608
The Government and Women's Suffrage (Margaret Llewelyn Davies and Mary R. Macarthur); Making the Foreigner Pay (Manufacturer, A.		Liberals in Ireland (A. M. Sullivan); The Archbishops and the Election (J. Fletcher-Little); Richard Cobden on Women's Suffrage (Mrs. Cobden Unwin); The Psychology of Conversion (Harold Begbie, Professor Caldecott, C. F., C. Lyall Cottle, and Rev. James Evans); "What we are Fighting For" ("A Mother of Sons"); The Indian Police (F. C. C.); London Library Subject-Index (A Member of the London Library Committee); The Manners of the Peers (Stanley Wightman); What it Comes to (A. A. Jack);

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Children's Care Committees (B. L. Hutchins); The Administration of the Licensing Laws of England and Wales (Hugh Edwards)	640	Essence of Religion (A. I. Tillyard); The Secrecy of the Ballot (J. Sowerbutts); The Repertory Theatre (William Poel); The Need for Liberal Propaganda (A. de Natorp)	808
The Law of the Surplus (Andrew Carnegie); The Character of the Indian Police (Sir William Wedderburn); The Psychology of Conversion (Adela Constance Smith, V. P., and Dr. Maurice B. Wright); Etonian Manners (Mrs. L. Barbara Hammond and J. S. Boothroyd); Magyar Perse- cution of a Roumanian Poet (R. W. Seton- Watson); Protection and the Price of Wheat (Tariff Reformer); Light Dues at Constantinople (George A. Saldji)	675	A Forgotten Analogy (Sir Francis A. Channing, M.P.); The Next Step in Women's Suffrage (E. S. Hooper, Winifred Holiday, "Suffragist," W. R. Snow, and Clementina Black); The Liberal Press in Scotland (Scottish Liberal); The late Mr. Pete Curran (Joseph Clayton); The Secrecy of the Ballot (K. E. T. Wilkinson and William T. Lee)	846
The County Elections (A Liberal Candidate, A. C., Liberal, and Alfred Rowntree); The Referendum and the Constitutional Crisis (F. Bentham Stevens); The Need for Liberal Propaganda (A West Country Liberal); Electoral Reform (William Poel); Some Electioneering Tricks (P. M. Rea); Wellington and Waterloo (Major John Hall)	707	The Lords and a Referendum (G. Lowes Dickin- son); The Refusal of Supplies (Brougham Villiers); "The Two Englands" (André de Bavier and J. F. W.); Reform or Veto? (F. N. Evans); The King's English (Thos. Hughes); Government in Greece (P. M. Ure); "What's in a Name?" (J. K.); The Liberal Press in Scotland (H.); The Study of Free Trade (A West Country Liberal)	880
The County Elections (Sir Francis Channing, M.P., J. R. Tomlinson, and Mary Florence Coventry); Tariff Reform and the Electors (Sir Edward Evans); The Lords and Finance (F. J. H. D.); The Crisis and the Referendum (W. H. Silk); "The Decent Church" (G. M. V. Hickey); Electoral Reform (Liberalis); The Popularity of the Budget (An Onlooker); One Man, One Vote (Justitia); A Free Trade Fighting Fund (Hon. Treasurers, Free Trade Union)	740	Why Should There be a Second General Election? (An Old Liberal); The Lords and a Referendum (E. Melland and R. C. Phillimore); Strauss and his Elektra (G. Bernard Shaw and Ernest New- man); The Liberal Party and the Estimates (G. H. Perris); A Policy of Thorough (Joseph E. Southall); The Budget and the Whisky Duties (Bon-Accord); The King's English (H. V. R.); The Crisis: A Suggestion (D. K. Auchterlonie); The Meaning of the Scottish Elections (A Liberal)	913
The "Mitigation" of the Veto (Historicus); The Secrecy of the Ballot (J. R.); The Gladstone League (The Hon. Treasurers); The Recent Elec- tions and the Small Holdings Act (A Country Liberal); The Meaning of the Scottish Elections (English Liberal); The County Elections (H. Shaen Solly); A Forecast (Joshua Brookes); Red Rubber (Henry Cotton); Religion Without Enthusiasm (E. K. S.); "At the Door" (Frances F. Housman); The Essence of Religion (E.); Gladstone's Singing Voice (R. W. J.); Scottish Liberal Journalism (Anti-Monopolist)	774	The "Elektra" of Strauss and Hoffmanstahl (G. Bernard Shaw); The Provincial Opera ("Edin- burgh" and "Edinensis"); Why Should There be a Second General Election? (Wm. Braith- waite); The New Indian Press Act (Sir William Wedderburn); The Liberal Party and the Whips (Liberal); The Foreign Office and the Congo (E. D. Morel); Policy and Armaments (J. Marshall Sturge); The Crusade against Con- sumption (Frank E. Marshall)	969
The Joke of the Election (Yorick); Some Lessons of the Election (An Old Hand); The Elections and the Small Holdings Act (Marjory Pease, D. M. Stevenson, and "Villager"); The Mean- ing of the Scottish Elections (John McCulloch); The Next Step in Women's Suffrage (Rosalind Travers and H. M. Swanwick); Gladstone's Singing Voice (Sir Edward Russell and the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell); The Liberal Press in Scotland (D. M. Wilson and William Harvie); How Votes Were Won (M.); The		Strauss and his "Elektra" (Ernest Newman, A. E. Keeton, One Who Wishes he Could Believe in It, and Dorothea Hollins); "The Ring" at Edinburgh (The Writer of the Article); Liberal Leadership (John M. Hogge); Lords and Com- mons (Festina Lente); Ireland and the Budget (Robert Lynd); The Women's Charter (W. A. Jolly); Inscriptions in Westminster Abbey (S. J. Hutchinson); The Battle of the Schools in France (Henri Barral); Women's Suffrage (L. Thompson)	1000

DIARY OF THE WEEK.

1, 33, 105, 141, 177, 225, 261, 313, 349, 385, 441,
481, 517, 553, 589, 625, 661, 693, 725, 757, 793,
829, 865, 897, 953, 985.

THE WEEK IN THE CITY. BY "LUCELLUM"
AND "JANUS."

28, 68, 136, 172, 218, 256, 292, 344, 380, 420, 476,
512, 584, 620, 656, 688, 720, 750, 788, 824, 860,
892, 928, 980, 1016.

THE WORLD OF BOOKS.

20, 54, 127, 162, 200, 246, 279, 371, 406, 462, 539,
613, 646, 679, 711, 744, 778, 813, 850, 885, 972.

POETRY.

	PAGE		PAGE
A Master Speaks. By Rosalind Travers ...	461	Our Younger Poets :—
the Door. By R. L. G. ...	710	II. Frederick Niven. Three poems: North
Combatants, The. By G. M. Hart ...	812	Devon—Her Servants Look on the Little Complaint of the Wandering Jew, The. By the		Mother from Between the Tapestries—To the
Rev. R. L. Gales ...	1006	Mystery ...	645
Dread Nought. By Guy Kendall ...	161	Prince Adam. By Padraic Colum ...	538
Four Poems. By H.E. the Chinese Minister, Lord		Reflets dans L'Eau. By Edith Moggridge ...	405
Li Chin-Fong ...	917	Re-Incarnation, The. By Frederick Niven ...	198
From the Golden Book. By James Stephens ...	678	Requiescat. By Charlotte M. Mew ...	278
Fulness of Time, The. By James Stephens ...	971	Simplicity. By F. S. Flint ...	126
In Memoriam, A. I. G. By T. ...	538	Some Old Chinese Songs. Rendered into English
John-John. By Thomas MacDonagh ...	884	by David Wilson ...	848
New Year Verses. By C. H. Herford ...	575	Suburb, The. By Thomas Burke ...	777
Nora Criona. By James Stephens ...	19	The Revolutionist: or, Lines to a Statesman. By
Old Susan. By Walter de la Mare ...	743	G. K. Chesterton ...	501
Our Younger Poets :—		Three Yew Trees, The. By Frederic Niven ...	53
I. William H. Davies. Three poems: Angry—		To the Dying in the Cause of Science. By Hab-
The Kingfisher—Man ...	612	berton Lulham ...	245
		To Them that Darken Counsel. By Guy Kendall	370
		Welsh Sea, The. By James Elroy Flecker ...	334

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

	PAGE		PAGE
Aberdeen Doctors, The. By Dr. Macmillan ...	582	Ancient English Carols. By Edith Rickert ...	527
A Beau Sabreur—Maurice de Saxe, Marshal of		Ann Veronica. By H. G. Wells ...	167
France: His Loves, His Laurels, and His Times,		Antoinette Bourignon: Quietist. By Alex. R.
1696-1750. By W. R. H. Trowbridge ...	378	Macewen, D.D., Professor of Church History in
Abraham Lincoln. By George Craven Putnam	748	New College, Edinburgh ...	747
Abroad for the Bible Society. By J. H. Ritson	980	An Introduction to the Study of Philosophy. By
A Century of Empire. By Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert		Alice Oldham ...	822
Maxwell, F.R.S. ...	301	A Project of Empire. By J. Shield Nicholson ...	577
A Confession. By Maxim Gorky ...	977	A Queen at Bay. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne ...	1014
A Crucial Experiment. By A. C. Farquharson ...	684	Art in Great Britain and Ireland ...	216
Advertisements of the "Spectator," The. By		A Simple Savage. By G. B. Burgin ...	510
Lawrence Lewis ...	129	A Song of the English. By Rudyard Kipling.
"After Death—What?" By Cesare Lombroso ...	188	With 30 illustrations in color and many designs
A German Staff Officer in India. By Count Hans		by W. Heath Robinson ...	685
von Koenigsmarck ...	649	A Sword in Ambush. By Lilius Campbell
Agony Column, The. By C. A. Dawson Scott ...	546	Davidson ...	170
A Great Bishop of One Hundred Years Ago: Being		A Three-Foot Stool. By Peter Wright ...	26
a Sketch of the Life of Samuel Horsley, LL.D.,		A Tramp's Schooling. By the Rev. A. N. Cooper	254
formerly Bishop of St. David's, Rochester, St.		A Transformed Colony. By T. J. Alldridge, I.S.O.	888
Asaph, and Dean of Westminster. By Heneage		Austrian Court in the Nineteenth Century, The.
Horsley Jebb, M.A. ...	542	By the Right Hon. Sir Horace Rumbold, Bart.,
A Hind Let Loose. By C. E. Montague ...	924	G.C.B., G.C.M.G. ...	782
A History of English Poetry. By W. J. Courthope,		Autobiography of Sir Henry Marton Stanley, The.
C.B. Volume VI. "The Romantic Movement		Edited by his Wife ...	337
in English Poetry: Effects of the French		A Year Out of Life. By Mary E. Waller ...	1014
Revolution ...	852
A History of Malta during the Period of the French		Ballad of the Mad Bird, The. By Edward Storer	973
and British Occupations, 1798-1815. By		Ball and the Cross, The. By Gilbert K. Chesterton	889
William Hardman. Edited by Dr. Holland		Basutos: The Mountaineers and Their Country,
Rose ...	654	The. By Sir Godfrey Lagden ...	818
A Hundred Verses from Old Japan. Translated		Beasts and Men. By Carl Hagenbeck ...	638
by William N. Porter ...	973	Beatrice the Sixteenth. By Irene Clyde ...	510
A Literary History of the English People from the		Bella Donna. By Robert Hitchens ...	288
Renaissance to the Civil War. By J. J.		Birth of Modern Italy, The. Posthumous Papers
Jusserand. Vol. III. [Canon Jessopp.] ...	412	of Jessie White Mario ...	210
A Memoir of W. E. H. Lecky. By his Wife ...	202	Black Sheep. By Stanley Portal Hyatt ...	749
American Egypt: A Record of Travel in Yucatan,		Blaise Pascal: A Study in Religious Psychology.
The. By Channing Arnold and F. J. Tabor Frost	254	By Humfrey R. Jordan ...	649
A Military Consul in Turkey. By Captain A. E.		Blindness of Dr. Grey, The. By Canon Sheehan,
Townshend ...	510	D.D. ...	472
Among the Danes. By Miss F. M. Butlin ...	290

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Bologna: Its History, Antiquities, and Art. By Edith E. Coulson James	578	Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum. The Latin Text with an English Rendering, Notes, and an Historical Introduction. By Francis Griffin Stokes. [Herbert Paul.]	128
Book of Friendship. By Arthur Ransome ...	601	Escaped Nun, The. By Margaret Moulton ...	994
Books for Girls	436	Essays on Some Bible Questions of the Day by Members of the University of Cambridge. Edited by H. B. Swete, D.D.	375
Books of the Open Air	432	Ethic of Jesus According to the Synoptic Gospels, The. By the Rev. James Stalker, D.D. ...	306
Bosnia and Herzegovina. By Maude M. Holbach	510	Eton. By Christopher Stone	786
Bourbon Restoration, The. By Major John R. Hall	682	Europe's Optical Illusion. By Norman Angell...	491
British Hunting. Edited by A. W. Coaten ...	715	Everyman's Library. Vols. 400 to 449... ..	977
British Mountain Climbs. By George D. Abraham	420	Exultations of Ezra Pound... ..	973
Bussy-Rabutin: Sa Vie, ses Œuvres, et ses Amies. Par E. Gérard-Gailly	714	Face of China, The. By E. G. Kemp	247
Byron: The Last Phase. By Richard Edgecumbe	206	Faces in the Mist. By John A. Stewart... ..	508
By the Waters of Egypt. By Norma Lorimer ...	686	Fairy Tales. Various	429
Cambridge History of English Literature, The. Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., and A. R. Waller, M.A. Volume IV. "Prose and Poetry": Sir Thomas North to Michael Drayton	781	" " " [Evelyn Sharp.]	430
Cambridge Modern History, The. Volume VI. The Eighteenth Century	647	Faith and its Psychology. By W. R. Inge ...	250
Camel and the Needle's Eye, The. By Arthur Ponsonby, M.P.	466	Faith and Modern Thought, The. By William Temple	922
Carlyle. Masters of Literature Series	768	Fighting the Slave-Hunters in Central Africa. By Alfred J. Swann	1009
Cathedrals and Churches of Belgium, The. By T. Francis Bumpus	654	Fiona Macleod, The Works of	962
Ceres' Runaway and Other Essays. By Mrs. Meynell	26	Florentine Frame, The. By Elizabeth Robins...	376
Charles Dickens and His Friends. By W. Teignmouth Shore	302	Food of Love, The. By F. Frankfort Moore ...	508
Chateaubriand and His Court of Women. By Francis Gribble	115	For Charles the Rover. By May Wynne	685
Chats on Old Silver. By E. L. Lowes	686	Francis Atterbury. By H. C. Beeching	503
Children's Book-shelf, The	438	French Cathedrals. By Elizabeth Robins Pennell	248
China. By Mortimer Menpes and Sir H. A. Blake	247	French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century, The. By Haldane Macfall	567
Christianity at the Cross-roads. By George Tyrrell	280	French Procession: A Pageant of Great Writers, The. By Madame Mary Duclaux	208
Christianity is Christ. By Dr. W. H. Griffith Thomas	786	French Revolution, 1789-1793, The. By P. A. Kropotkin	576
Christians at Mecca. By Augustus Ralli... ..	582	French Vignettes. By M. Betham-Edwards ...	218
Color of Rome, The. By Olive Muriel Potter ...	164	From Sketch Book and Diary. By Lady Butler...	720
Column of Dust, The. By Evelyn Underhill ...	132	Gambetta: Life and Letters. By P. B. Gheusi. Authorised translation by Violette M. Montagu	886
Concerning the Three Principles of the Divine Essence. By Jacob Böhme. With an Introduction by Dr. Paul Deussen. [W. R. Inge.]...	1007	Garibaldi and the Thousand. By G. M. Trevelyan	21
Confessions to My Wife. By Harriett M. Capes...	170	Gateway, The. By Harold Begbie... ..	684
Conquest of the Isthmus, The. By Hugh C. Weir	786	George Sand: Some Aspects of Her Life and Writings. A Course of Lectures by M. René Doumic. Translated by Alys Hallard	1016
Correspondence of Priscilla, Countess of Westmorland, 1813-1870, The	780	Gilbert White and Selborne. By Henry C. Shelley	472
Cottage Homes of England, The. By Stewart Dick	548	Giovanni Boccaccio: A Biographical Study. By Edward Hutton	373
Court of a Saint, The. By Winifred Knox ...	654	Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: a Narrative in Contemporary Letters. By Frank A. Mumby. With an Introduction by Robert S. Rait, M.A.	889
Crete, the Forerunner of Greece. By Mr. and Mrs. Hawes... ..	671	Glimpse, The. By Arnold Bennett	133
Crisis of Liberalism: New Issues of Democracy, The. By J. A. Hobson	614	God of Love, The. By J. Huntly McCarthy ...	251
Cults of the Greek States, The. Volume V. By Lewis Richard Farnell, D.Litt. [A. M. Fairbairn.]	577	Golden Ass, The. By H. E. Butler	767
Cumner's Son. By Gilbert Parker... ..	1012	Great and Greater Britain. By J. Ellis Barker	165
Cut Off from the World. By Frank T. Bullen...	508	Great Possessions. By Mrs. Wilfrid Ward ...	170
Danes in Lancashire, The. By S. W. Partington	822	Grieg and His Music. By H. T. Finck	129
Dauphines of France, The. By Frank Hamel ...	582	Growth of the English House, The. By J. Alfred Gotch	786
Days of the Directoire, The. By Alfred Allinson	720	Handel. By R. A. Streatfeild	715
Diverting Adventures of Maurin, The. By Jean Aicard	288	Heart of the Antarctic: Being the Story of the British Antarctic Expedition, 1907-1909, The. By E. H. Shackleton, C.V.O. With an Introduction by H. R. Mill, D.Sc., and an account of the First Journey to the South Magnetic Pole by J. W. Edgeworth David, F.R.S.	280
Drama of Saint Helena, The. By Paul Fremeaux	928	Henry Fielding. A Memoir including newly discovered letters and records, with illustrations from contemporary journals. By G. M. Godden	647
Dublin Book of Irish Verse, The. By John Cooke	564	Her Mother's Daughter. By Katharine Tynan ...	251
Early Church History. By Henry Melvill Gwatkin	338	High Albania. By M. E. Durham	272
Edmund Garrett: A Memoir. By E. T. Cook ...	166	Higher Life in Art, The. By John La Farge ...	976
Egypt. By Pierre Loti. Translated by W. P. Baines	656
Enchanted Island, The. By Alfred Noyes	334
England, and other Poems. By Laurence Binyon	616

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Highways and Byways in Middlesex. By Walter Jerrold	418	Light Come, Light Go: Gambling—Gamesters—Wager—The Turf. By Ralph Nevill	650
Hindrances to Good Citizenship. By James Bryce	492	Life in an English Village. By Miss Davies ...	801
Hints for Lovers. By Arnold Haultain	980	Life of an Enclosed Nun, The. By a Mother Superior	994
Historical Essays. By Dr. James Ford Rhodes ...	784	Life of John Dee: An Elizabethan Crystal Gazer. By Charlotte Fell Smith	170
Histoire de France: Tome Huitième. Le Règne de Louis XV. Par H. Carré, Professeur à l'Université de Poitiers	745	Life of Mrs. Norton, The. By Jane Gray Perkins	337
Hobbes's Leviathan. Reprinted from the edition of 1651. With an Essay by the late W. G. Pogson Smith	918	Life of Principal Rainy, The. By Patrick Carnegie-Simpson, M.A.	468
Hogarth's London. By H. B. Wheatley	748	Life of Sir Philip Sidney. By Percy Addleshaw	493
Homer and the Iliad. By F. M. Stawell. [Gilbert Murray.]	55	Life of William Thomson, Baron Kelvin of Largs, The. By Silvanus P. Thompson	815
Home Life in Ireland. By Robert Lynd... ..	250	Life of W. J. Fox, The. By the late Richard Garnett. Concluded by Edward Garnett ...	1007
How to Save Greek, and Other Paradoxes of Oxford Reform. By T. C. Snow, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College	745	Litany Lane. By Margaret Baillie Saunders ...	685
Human Cobweb, The. By B. L. Putnam Weale...	856	Literary Profession in the Elizabethan Age, The. By Dr. Phœbe Sheavyn	686
Hygiene of School Life, The. By Ralph H. Crowley, M.D., M.R.C.P.	1010	London in the Nineteenth Century. By Sir Walter Besant and Others	686
Idea of a Free Church, The. By Henry Sturt ...	779	London Town: Past and Present. By W. W. Hutchings	418
Impressions of Provence. By Percy Allen ...	980	Lords and the Constitution, The. By Professor J. H. Morgan	978
Incomparable Siddons, The. By Mrs. Alfred Parsons	378	Louis XVIII. By Mary F. Sandars	820
Indian Speeches, 1907-1909. By Viscount Morley. [Sir W. Wedderburn]	463	Love Intrigues of Royal Courts. By Thornton Hall	688
In the Days of the Georges. By W. B. Boulton	57	Lovers on the Green. By May Crommelin ...	926
In the Grip of the Nyika. By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. Paterson, D.S.O.	505	Lord Kelvin's Early Home	656
In Three Legations. By Madame Charles de Bunsen	414	Lyra Evangelistica. By Arthur Shearly Cripps	973
Introduction to the New Testament. By Theodor Zahn, Professor of New Testament Exegesis, Erlangen University. Translated from the Third German Edition	818	Madame de Maintenon: Her Life and Times. By C. C. Dyson... ..	418
Intruding Angel, The. By Charles Marriott ...	544	Madame, Mother of the Regent. By Arvède Barine. Translated by Madame Charles Bigot	510
Irish Ways. By Jane Barlow	688	Manet and the French Impressionists. By Theodore Duret	976
Isle of Man. By W. Ralph Hall Caine	686	Maniac, The. A Realistic Study of Madness from the Maniac's Point of View. Anonymous ...	651
Italian Hours. By Henry James	304	Man Shakespeare, The. By Frank Harris ...	237
Italy To-day. By Bolton King and Thomas Okey	210	Maria Edgeworth and her Circle in the Days of Buonaparte and Bourbon. By Constance Hill. With numerous illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits...	308
It Never Can Happen Again. By William De Morgan	414	Marie Antoinette. By H. Belloc	299
Jenny Peters. By C. H. Dudley Ward	288	Marriage Ventures of Marie Louise, The. By Max Billard	975
Johann Sebastian Bach. By Sir C. Hubert H. Parry. [E. N.]	541	Mary. By Björnstjerne Björnson	472
John Milton. By W. Grinton Berry	290	Master Musicians. By Cuthbert Hadden ...	1014
Journal of John Wesley, The. Edited by Nehemiah Curnock	504	Masques and Phases. By Robert Ross	510
King's Signet, The. By Maurice Gerard	170	Meaning of Truth, The. By Professor James ...	269
Kirk Life and Kirk Folk. By James Wotherspoon	418	Medici, The. By Colonel G. F. Young, C.B. ...	451
Labor in Portuguese West Africa. By William A. Cadbury. [Henry W. Nevinson.]	816	Medieval Hospitals of England, The. By Rotha Mary Clay	325
Lady Hester Stanhope. By Mrs. Charles Roundell	582	Melba: A Biography. By Agnes Murphy ...	418
Last Poems. By George Meredith. [G. M. Trevelyan.]	163	Memorials of His Time. By Henry Cockburn. New Edition	543
Last Years of the Protectorate, 1656-58, The. By C. H. Firth. [G. M. Trevelyan.]	372	Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral. By Archdeacon Sinclair	308
Lately Discovered Fragments of Menander, The. Edited with English version, revised text, and critical and explanatory notes. By "Unus Multorum"	683	Memorials of Old Yorkshire. Edited by T. M. Fallow, M.A., F.S.A.	1009
Letters from the Peninsula, 1808-1812. By Lieut.-General Sir William Warre. Edited by Dr. Edmond Warre	548	Memories of Fifty Years. By Lady St. Helier (Mary Jeune)	248
Life and Scenes of Bishop Challoner, 1691-1781, The. By Dr. Edwin Burton	378	Memoirs of the Duchess de Dino, 1831-1835, The	252
Life and Times of Hildebrand—Gregory VII., The. By the Right Rev. A. H. Mathew, D.D.	1008	Men and Manners of Old Florence. By Dr. Guido Biagi	512
Life and Times of Martin Blake, B.D., The. By the Rev. J. F. Chanter	822	Michelangelo. By Gerald S. Davies	64
Life and Letters of Wolfe. By Beccles Willson...	114	Mimma Bella. By Eugene Lee-Hamilton ...	974
		Mind of the Artist, The. By Mrs. Laurence Binyon	786
		Mocassin Ranch, The. By Hamlin Garland ...	214
		Modernism: The Jowett Lectures, 1908. By Paul Sabatier	167
		Modes and Manners of the Nineteenth Century, as represented in the Pictures and Engravings of the Time (1790-1878). Translated by M. Edwards. With an introduction by Miss Grace Rhys	284

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Mountainy Singer, The. By Seosamh Mac-Cathmhaoil	974	Return of Louis XVIII., The. By Gilbert Stenger. Translated by Mrs. Rudolph Stawill	681
Music: Its Laws and Evolution. By Jules Combarien	782	Revaluations: Historical and Ideal. By Alfred W. Benn	56
Mr. Pope: His Life and Times. By George Paston	300	Rhythm of Modern Music, The. By C. F. Abdy Williams	820
My Lady of the South. By Randall Parrish ...	685	Rise of Louis Napoleon, The. By F. A. Simpson	540
My Thirty Years in India. By Sir Edmund Cox	618	Robert Emmet. By Stephen Gwynn	342
My Recollections. By the Countess of Cardigan and Lancastre	23	Romance of Symbolism and Its Relation to Church Ornament and Architecture. By Sidney Heath	58
My Summer in London. By James Milne ...	254	Romantic Movement in English Poetry, The. By Arthur Symons	131
Napoleon's Brothers. By A. Hilliard Atteridge...	57	Rome. By Edward Hutton... ..	718
National Gallery Lewis Bequest, The. By M. W. Brockwell	548	Rose and Vine. By Rachel Annand Taylor ...	334
Nature Photography for Beginners. By E. J. Bedford	858	Rose of Dauphiny. By Philip L. Stevenson ...	170
New Poems. By Richard Le Gallienne... ..	973	Royal Lovers. By Helene Vacaresco	251
New Poems. By William Watson... ..	204	Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, The. With 20 Illustrations in color by Edmund Dulac	685
No. 19. By Edgar Jepson... ..	926	Sailing Ships and Their Story. By E. Keble Chatterton	24
Northern Lights. By Sir Gilbert Parker... ..	214	Saint Teresa of Spain. By Miss Helen Colvill ...	254
Northward Trek, The. By Stanley Portal Hyatt	716	Samuel Foote: A Biography. By Percy Fitzgerald	854
Old Egyptian Faith, The. By Professor Naville...	822	Sailor Knots. By W. W. Jacobs	288
Old Testament in the Light of the Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, The. By J. Evans Thomas, B.D.	548	Science for Young Students	434
One Day and Another. By E. V. Lucas... ..	134	Scientific Papers of Sir William Huggins, K.C.B., O.M., &c., The. Edited by Sir William and Lady Huggins	335
On the Forgotten Road. By Henry Baerlein ...	397	Search Party, The. By George A. Birmingham...	288
Open Country. By Maurice Hewlett	24	Serpent and the Cross, The. By Stephen Andrew	251
Orders and Unity. By the Bishop of Birmingham	887	Seven that were hanged, The. By Leonid Andreieff	66
Orpheus: A General History of Religions. By Salomon Reinach	851	Shakespeare Folios and Quartos: A Study in the Bibliography of Shakespeare's Plays, 1594-1685, The. By A. W. Pollard	546
Other People's Houses. By E. B. Dewing ...	819	Shelley, the Man and the Poet. By A. Clutton-Brock	375
Oxford: Its Buildings and Gardens. By Ralph A. Durand	1014	Sheridan: From New and Original Material, including a Manuscript Diary by Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire. By Walter Sichel ...	407
Pascal. By Viscount St. Cyres	649	Sikhim and Bhutan, Twenty-one Years on the North-East Frontier: 1887-1908. By J. Claude White, C.I.E.	617
Philanthropists, The. By Ruth Young	973	Sinking Ship, The. By Eva Lathbury	251
Philosophy and Religion. By Hastings Rashdall, D.C.L.	682	Sir Randal Cremer: His Life and Work. By Howard Evans	26
Pick of the Publishing Season, The Autumn ...	75	Sir Robert Perks, Bart., M.P. By Denis Crane	361
Pilgrimage, The. By Yone Noguchi	713	Sir Wilfrid Lawson. A Memoir. Edited by the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell	340
Plays, Acting, and Music: A Book of Theory. By Arthur Symons	680	Six Greek Sculptors. By Professor E. A. Gardner	1016
Poems Written in Early Youth; Poems from "Modern Love" (First Edition); and Scattered Poems. By George Meredith	814	Skene Papers: Memories of Sir Walter Scott, The. By James Skene. Edited by Basil Thomson ...	918
Prince of Destiny, The. By Sarath Kumar Ghosh	251	Songs and Fantasies. By L. folliott	973
Principles of Religious Development: A Psychological and Philosophical Study, The. By George Galloway	408	Songs of Memory and Hope. By Henry Newbolt	334
Problem of Human Life as Viewed by the Great Thinkers, from Plato to the Present Time, The. By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by W. S. Hough and W. R. Boyce-Gibson. [L. T. Hobhouse.]...	374	Soul of a Turk, The. By Victoria de Bunsen ...	282
Psalms of the Sisters. By Mrs. Rhys Davids ...	670	Soul of St. Paul, The. By A. L. Lilley	131
Rachel et son Temps. Par A. de Faucigny-Lucinge	920	South Country, The. By Edward Thomas ...	452
Random Recollections of a Commercial Traveller, The	26	Sovranty of Society, The. By H. E. M. Stutfield	874
Rebirth. By Rathmell Wilson	251	Spirit of Spain, The. By Miguel de Unamuno [R. B. Cunninghame Graham.]	410
Reformation in Scotland, The. By D. Hay Fleming, LL.D.	974	Stone Ezel, The. By C. L. Antrobus	926
Religion and the Modern World. Edited by Sir Donald Macalister	712	Stories of the French Artists. By P. M. Turner and C. H. Collins Baker	824
Reminiscences of a K.C. By Thomas Edward Crispe	470	Study of Religion in the Italian Universities, The. By L. H. Jordan and Professor Labanca ...	22
Reminiscences of Carl Schurz, The... ..	323	Subject-Index of the London Library, St. James's Square. By C. T. Hagberg Wright, LL.D. [Thomas Seecombe.]	614
Reminiscences of Charlotte, Lady Wake, The. By Lucy Wake	212	Such and Such Things. By Mark Allerton ...	858
Rest and Unrest. By Edward Thomas	854	Susan Warner ("Elizabeth Wetherell"). By Anna B. Warner	820
Retrospections of an Active Life. By John Bigelow, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of France, 1865-67. 3 vols.	919	Suse o' Bushy. By W. A. Allan	685
		Tales from Tasso. By G. Grinnell-Milne ...	822
		Temple Dictionary of the Bible, The. Edited by the Rev. W. Ewing, M.A., and the Rev. J. E. H. Thomson, D.D.	1014

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Ten Great and Good Men. By Dr. H. Montagu Butler	418	Upper Hand, The. By Mrs. Frederick Dawson ...	508
They Also Serve. By Christopher Stone ...	926	Villa Rubein. By John Galsworthy	376
They and I. By Jerome K. Jerome ...	170	Warriors of Old Japan, and Other Stories. By Yei Theodora Ozaki	713
Through Persia from the Gulf to the Caspian. By F. B. Bradley-Birt. [Edward G. Browne.] ...	60	Wedges. By C. W. Wheeler	420
Time and Clocks: A Description of Ancient and Modern Methods of Measuring Time. By H. H. Cunynghame, M.A., C.B., M.I.E.E. ...	506	When the Devil Drives. By Florence Warden ...	1012
Time's Laughingstocks, and Other Verses. By Thomas Hardy	502	William Lefroy, Dean of Norwich, The Life of. By Herbert Leeds	378
Trader, The. By Cecil Ross Johnson ...	580	William Makepeace Thackeray. By Lewis Melville	817
Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Sven Heden	464	Wine in the Cup, The. By Eleanor Wyndham ...	685
Travels in the Upper Egyptian Desert. By Arthur E. P. Weigall	416	Work and Play of a Government Inspector, The. By Herbert Preston-Thomas	548
Tremendous Trifles. By G. K. Chesterton ...	134	World's Great Pictures, The	290
Tribunal of the Terror, The. By G. Lenotre ...	236	Wrack. By Maurice Drake	1012
Tropical Tales. By Dolf Wyllarde ...	580	Yet Again. By Max Beerbohm	166
True Story of Jack Cade, The. By Joseph Clayton	684	Short Notices, Reprints, and Magazines ... 28,
Tumult. By Wilkinson Sherrer	1012	172, 256, 290, 292, 420, 474, 512,
Turkey in Transition. By G. F. Abbott ...	654	548, 584, 618, 620, 654, 656, 824, 891, 980
Two Empires: The Church and the World, The. By Bishop Westcott	688	Pick of the Publishing Season, The. Autumn ...	73
Tyrol and Its People. By Clive Holland ...	420	" " " Spring ...	933
Uncounted Cost, The. By Mary Gaunt ...	749	Literary Supplements	297, 425
Unlucky Mark, The. By F. E. Penny ...	783

AUTHORS' INDEX.

	PAGE		PAGE
Aldridge, Henry R. The Planning of Greater Paris	912	George, Henry, jun. The "Insurgent" Movement in the United States... ..	606
Archer, William. The Drama ... 14, 48, 119, 193, 397, 455, 496, 530, 706, 738, 771, 844, 880, 910		Graham, R. B. Cunninghame. La Maureria ...	410
Barker, H. Granville. Lord Gorell's Amendment	328	Grierson, Francis. Mystery and Illusion... ..	11
Bax, E. Belfort. Government by Bureaucracy ...	121	Herford, C. H. New Year Verses... ..	575
Bernstein, Dr. Ed. The Pull Towards the Left in Germany	241	Hobhouse, L. T. Idealism and Life	374
The Electoral Policy of German Social Democracy	456	Hobson, J. A. Co-Partnership in Nature... ..	117
How German Workers Live	569	Hort, G. M. The Combatants	812
A Sham Reform... ..	772	Inge, Charles. The Basis of the Wage... ..	640
Brooks, Sydney. The New Censorship ...	155	Inge, Professor W. R. Jacob Böhme	1007
Browne, Edward G. A Traveller in Persia ...	60	Jessopp, Canon Augustus. A French View of Shakespeare	412
Burke, Thomas. The Suburb	777	Kendall, Guy. Dread Nought	161
Chesterton, G. K. The Madman's Story ...	427	To Them that Darken Counsel... ..	370
The Revolutionist; or, Lines to a Statesman	501	Li Chin-Fong, Lord. Four Poems... ..	917
Chomley, C. H. Australia and the Rejection of the Budget	570	Low, Sidney. The Psychology of "Conversion"...	568
Colum, Padraic. Prince Adam	538	Lulham, Habberton. To One Dying in the Cause of Science	245
Davies, W. H. The Finder... ..	842	MacDonagh, Thomas. John-John	884
Angry; The Kingfisher; Man... ..	612	Mare, Walter de la. Old Susan	743
Fairbairn, Rev. A. M. The Cult of the Greek States	577	Mackarness, Frederic. The Character of the Indian Police	365, 398
Flecker, James Elroy. The Welsh Sea ...	334	Masterman, C. F. G., M.P. How It Strikes a Contemporary	597
Flint, F. S. Simplicity	126	Mew, Charlotte M. Requiescat	278
Gales, Rev. R. L. The Complaint of the Wandering Jew	1006	Moggridge, Edith. Reflets dans L'Eau ...	405
At the Door	710	Murray, Gilbert. The Greek Epics	55
Galsworthy, John. A Parting	326	Nevinson, Henry W. San Thomé Slavery ...	816
The Workers	529	Newman, Ernest. Strauss and his "Elektra"...	843
The Choice	737	Niven, Frederick. Three Yew Trees	53
"Gentles, Let us Rest!"	965, 997	The Re-Incarnation	198
Garnett, Mrs. Constance. In a Little Town	363

AUTHORS' INDEX (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Niven, Frederick. North Devon; Her Servants Look on the Little Mother from between the Tapestries; To the Mystery	645	Trevelyan, G. M. Meredith's Last Poems ...	163
Paul, Herbert. The Christian Renaissance ...	128	Professor Firth's Continuation of Gardiner ...	372
Perris, G. H. The Labor Party and Three-Corner Contests	740	Tolstoy, Leo. What to Teach Children ...	427
Russell, Right Hon. G. W. E. Lord No Zoo ...	327	Wallas, Graham. The Money-Power at War ...	453
Rutherford, Mark. A Home-made Religion ...	566	Wedderburn, Sir Wm. The Indian Decentralisa- tion Report	192
Salih, Madame Halide. The Sign of Allah ...	878	Lord Morley's Indian Speeches	463
Seccombe, Thomas. A Master Bibliographer ...	614	White Arnold. The Merits of the Fisher Régime	806
Sharp, Miss Evelyn. The Fairy Queen's Mark...	430	Wilson, David. (Rendered into English by.)
Sickert, Mrs. E. M. Cobden. A Death at Nohant	46	Some Old Chinese Songs... ..	848
Stephens, James. Nora Criona	19	H. W. M. A De-Balfourised House of Commons	232
From the Golden Book... ..	678	Another "Psychological Moment"	358
The Fulness of Time	971	In the Kingdom of the Blind	393
Sullivan, A. M. The Difficulties of a Liberal Government in Ireland	535	Plucked from the Pit	873
Temperley, H. W. V. A Letter to a Business Man on the English Revolution now pending, from the Threat of the House of Lords to Reject the Budget	149, 185, 233, 269	A New Style of Party Leadership	960
Thomas, Edward. Milking	192	The Drama: Church and Stage... ..	274
Travers, Rosalind. A Master Speaks	461	The Drama: "Elektra" as a Play	999
		K. E. T. W. An Impression of Friesland ...	12
		R. E. D. A French Chamberlain	117
		French Administrative Scandals	967
		S. D. S. The Law of Electoral Corruption ...	674
		S. The Dawn of Constitutional Government in China	532
		E. N. Sir Hubert Parry on Bach... ..	541
		T. In Memoriam A. I. G.... ..	538
		Ephemeris. Ode on a Distant Prospect of Fleet Street	494

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 1.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	1	Professional Consumers. By
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS :—		Harold Wright ...	19
The Position of the King ...	4	The Government and the
"The Sham Inevitable" ...	5	House of Lords. By Joseph
The Chances of Spain ...	6	Martin ...	19
Motor Roads and the Public ...	7	POETRY :—
LIFE AND LETTERS :—		Nora Criona. By James
Money in Politics ...	9	Stephens ...	19
The Factor of Race ...	10	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	20
Mystery and Illusion. By		Books to be Read ...	20
Francis Grierson ...	11	REVIEWS :—
The Color Sense in Trout ...	12	Garibaldi and the Thousand ...	21
PICTURES OF TRAVEL :—		Religion in Italy ...	22
An Impression of Friesland.		The "Haut Monde" of the
By K. E. T. W. ...	13	'Forties ...	23
THE DRAMA :—		Sailing Ships and their Story	24
American Seriousness and		Difficult Country ...	24
English Humor. By William		BOOKS IN BRIEF :—
Archer ...	14	Ceres' Runaway and Other
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR :—		Essays ...	26
Citizen Rights and Citizen		A Three foot Stool ...	26
Duties. By Rosalind Travers	15	The Journal of an Expedition
Women's Suffrage and the		across Venezuela and
Liberal Party. By H. M.		Colombia, 1906-1907 ...	26
Swanwick, Henry W. Nevins-		Random Recollections of a son. Evelyn Sharp. Emily		Commercial Traveller ...	26
Ashton. F. Melian Stowell,		Sir Randal Cremer: His Life and Harold Lake ...	16	and Work ...	26
Dante's System of Morals. By		Three Living Lions ...	28
P. H. W. ...	18	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
"The Religious Policy of the		Lucellum ...	28 French Republic." By André
de Bavier ...	18

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

It has hitherto been the general opinion among politicians and business men that the City on its financial side was opposed to the rejection of the Budget by the House of Lords. It now appears that a powerful group of City men, headed by the firm of N. M. Rothschild, are prepared to urge an action which must, if taken, lead at once to grave financial consequences. Messrs. Rothschild, Gibbs, Schroeder, Stern, and a few other firms have thrown their offices open to those who wish to sign a petition "urging the House of Lords to take such action as will ensure an opportunity being afforded to the nation to express their wishes on such far-reaching changes before they are passed into law."

ALTHOUGH Mr. Balfour has fulminated against the Budget in the country with great propriety, his attitude in the House has been far from agreeable to the fighting members of his party. Early in the struggle he disclaimed all effective opposition on the increased taxation of large incomes, and even on land taxes his "Socialistic" reasoning has been rather embarrassing. On Wednesday he severed himself from his front bench on Mr. George's new clause allowing estate duties on land to be paid in kind, the land thus received to be utilised for public purposes. He supported the clause on the express ground that "it would afford a cheap and easy way of obtaining land for public purposes," the chief of these purposes being the breaking up of big estates for the establishment of numbers of small holders.

THE rising temperature in politics was well indicated by the reception accorded by the Opposition in the House and the Press to Mr. Lloyd George's proposal last Monday that the share of the new land taxes designed for the uses of local government should be pooled in a central fund for subsequent apportionment upon a principle hereafter to be agreed upon. This course, dictated by obvious considerations of caution and present expediency, was denounced as a breach of pledge and as a policy of corruption. Yet Mr. George prefaced his proposal by a quite satisfactory explanation. Even if the taxes get legal assent by November, very little will be available for distribution in this financial year. As Mr. Balfour himself admitted, an equitable principle of distribution among local authorities is difficult to reach, and to incorporate at this late hour in the Budget Bill a scheme of allocation would involve Parliament in a long and extremely embarrassing discussion at a time when everyone desires to emerge from the forest of financial proposals.

ON Tuesday Mr. Lloyd George secured the passage of his clause substituting a tax on mining royalties and other mining rents of one shilling in the pound for the tax on undeveloped minerals which was originally proposed. The new tax was hotly debated, Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. Balfour disputing at length the economics of the proposal. To Mr. Bonar Law it was a tax on coal, raising the price of raw material and punishing the consumer. Mr. Balfour developed an argument different from and opposed to this, contending that it was primarily an attack on the property of mineowners. The case of owners working their own mines was discussed at length, and the opponents refused to treat royalties as surplus, insisting upon the view that it was an ordinary cost of production. The Attorney-General made an important concession on behalf of the Government, exempting from the tax common brick clay, sand, chalk, limestone, and gravel.

THE application of the increment duty to mining royalties is best described in the illustrative language of Mr. George: "They valued all the minerals in the country. They invited the owner to declare whether he had minerals, and what value he placed upon them. Let it be assumed that he valued them at £12,500; that would be divided by 12½, the number of years' purchase, giving £1,000 a year as the annual value. Let it be assumed that the owner of the mineral property leased it, and that there was a royalty of 6d. and a dead-rent of £2,000. The first year he simply drew his dead-rent, the royalties not reaching £2,000. Accordingly, £1,000 was deducted from the £2,000, and the increment in that year was arrived at, upon which the Government charged a duty of one-fifth. The next year the royalties ran up to £3,000, and £1,000 was deducted. There was an increment of £2,000, of which the Government took one-fifth. The Government charged one-fifth upon the difference between the annual equivalent of the original site value and the rents of the royalties in any given year."

THE Committee stage of the Development Bill this week threw new light upon the Road Board, which is to be set up mainly for facilitating motor traffic. While it is to subsidise existing local authorities for the improvement of present roads and for the construction of short loop roads, its main business appears to be the making of national roads of considerable length linking up centres of population. While motor traffic is chiefly in view, these roads are to be for general use, and the proposed abolition of a speed limit upon them is left open. The opposition in the Committee was chiefly directed to an attempt to ear-mark as much as possible of the expenditure as subsidies for local highway authorities, thus limiting the direct central activity of the Board. The compulsory power of purchasing strips of land a quarter of a mile broad, so as to secure any "unearned increment" along the lines of the new roads, was not to be of general application, but was only to be used where such profit appeared probable.

* * *

Six women, imprisoned in the Birmingham jail in connection with the recent disturbances at the Bingley Hall meeting, have been subjected to special medical treatment for self-starvation, i.e., have had food forced down their throats. It was the painful duty of Mr. Masterman, in the presumably unavoidable absence of Mr. Gladstone, to defend the necessity of this extreme action of the prison authorities. It was, he urged, an absolute obligation of the authorities to prevent suicide by starvation and to have recourse to the method generally applied in similar cases. Unless all prisoners are to be allowed to secure liberation by a sufficiently prolonged refusal to eat, it is difficult to see what alternative lies before the authorities, though the full logic of this reply is somewhat impaired by the fact that hunger-strikers among the suffragists have previously won such release. Though the sort of violence committed by these prisoners differed materially from the merely or mainly obstructive conduct which has led to most of the imprisonments, the denunciation of the latest prison "atrocities" disregards all distinctions in the nature of offences. Whatever act is done, there lies no responsibility in the doer, the sole responsibility is shifted on to the Government who have refused to grant the franchise, or even to receive deputations.

* * *

Now, whatever view we hold of the justice or discretion of Mr. Asquith or Mr. Gladstone in their handling of this issue, it is manifestly impossible to acquit the perpetrators of these acts of violence of a measure of personal responsibility, except by imputing to them insanity. The conscious, intentional performance of a violent act is not morally, as it cannot be legally, condoned by any consideration of such remote provocation. Though we have always contended that the acts for which most suffragists have suffered imprisonment are rightly classed as "political," and should have secured such preferential treatment as is commonly accorded to this class of crime, the offences of these Birmingham women cannot easily be brought under this category, without opening the door to the gravest abuses. The mere fact that their action was impelled by no selfish motive, but was committed out of self-devotion to a cause, can hardly be urged as a reason why the ordinary course of treatment which would certainly be meted out to any man in a like case should be abandoned. If, as is contended by the officers of their League, such compulsory feeding is illegal, the Courts will deal with the charge, for we understand that legal action is to be taken against the prison authorities. We fear, from the temper of the women's champions in the Press, that there is no recognition among them of the fact that in a conflict of physical force the justice of their cause disappears and the weaker sex goes under.

Few Englishmen probably understand or appreciate the importance of the complicated Irish Land Bill which occupied two sittings of the Lords this week. In an able speech Lord Crewe explained the breakdown of the finance of the 1893 Act, the necessity of a more generous finance, and of a limited application of the principle of compulsory purchase, the new policy to be administered by a reconstitution of the Congested Districts Board fortified by a considerable element of popular representation. Although the proposal in all its branches was raked by hostile criticism, particularly directed against the compulsory clauses and the popular representation, which, it was urged, placed the Administration in the hands of the Land Leaguers, the Lords passed the second reading, reserving their mutilations for a later stage.

* * *

THE signs are multiplying that if only this country adopts a wise moderation the Navy Estimates will come down in a very few years. The excuse for English Navy scares is German construction, but the movement in Germany against any further extension of the German Navy is becoming formidable. On Saturday the "Berliner Tageblatt" declared that a revision downward of the Navy Law was inevitable, that the battle fleet was too heavy a burden, and that mines and small craft were quite adequate for coast defence. The launch the same day of the first of the 1908 "Dreadnoughts" and the announcement of the fact that the contracts of two of the 1909 programme have not yet been allocated demonstrate the complete baselessness of the scare about the acceleration of German construction. On the top of this comes the news that the Austrian "Dreadnoughts," which were a partial excuse for the building of the contingent ships, are to be postponed because there is no money for them. Everything that is happening abroad justifies a hopeful view of the future if only this country pursues a sane, prudent, and non-provocatory naval policy.

* * *

HERR VON BETHMANN-HOLLWEG, the new Chancellor, is on a round of visits to Germany's allies. He has already been to Vienna, and is soon to go to Rome. At Vienna he seems to have had the pleasantest experiences, and no doubt when he is an older hand at diplomacy he will know how to turn a compliment without dropping full length into the fulsome. The relations between Germany and Austria are just now, after each has so recently proved her good-will to the other, as intimate and warm as they ever have been, but Italy is still restless and far from satisfied with the Bosnian episode. The new Chancellor promises to make the maintenance of the Triple Alliance the foundation of his policy, but he has still to show that he can handle Italy as skilfully as did Prince Bülow, who by temperament and association was sympathetic to the Italians. The most interesting thing said by Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg at Vienna was a hint that Germany might prove more ready in the future to discuss the limitation of naval armaments, and the general impression to be gathered is that, while Prince Bülow left no concrete problem behind to worry the diplomatists, his departure has rather eased the international situation, and left the field more open to reason and moderation.

* * *

AFTER three-and-half inglorious years of office, the Coalition Government in Hungary has gone finally to pieces, leaving a good deal of wreckage behind. It came into power after a prolonged and unsuccessful campaign against the King-Emperor, pledged to carry universal suffrage and to leave its demands for the Magyarising of the Hungarian Army to the judgment of an universal suffrage Parliament. It has not introduced universal suffrage, though it brought in a bastard Franchise Bill for the entrenching of Magyar authority, which proved too strong meat even for its own followers. The Coalition Government spent most of its time wavering upon the non-Magyar nationalities, tightening the yoke upon agricultural laborers and harrying the trade unions. It has broken up partly because of personal wranglings between the motley groups of its supporters, and partly because the largest section of the Independence group insisted upon a more presentable Universal Suffrage Bill and upon the establishment of an independent Hungarian State bank. M. Kossuth is trying to form an Independence Cabinet; but, though the Independence party has an absolute majority in the Chamber, it is not united, and, on the other hand, the King-Emperor is not likely to concede the Nationalist demands which form the chief elements in its programme.

* * *

THE Defence Bill has gone through the Danish Parliament, and the bitterest issue in Danish politics will rest for some years. It has been an important domestic and an important International question, for Denmark holds the gates of the Baltic, and the gates of the Baltic concern England and Germany. Ever since the war with Prussia, the Conservatives have agitated for an elaborate system of land defence, with its point directed against Germany. Socialists and advanced Radicals urged that Denmark should trust in her neutrality, and not waste vast sums on unnecessary and probably useless fortifications, while moderate men have recalled what happened 100 years ago, and pointed out the danger of Copenhagen being seized by a British fleet and made a base of operations against Germany. The extreme Conservative programme was rejected at the General Election this year, and the scheme which has now been carried is a compromise which purports to be loyal to Denmark's neutrality, and is not devised to subserve either German or English desires or ambitions. It provides for the erection of new forts for the defence of Copenhagen against attack from the sea, the maintenance of existing defences against attack by land, and the increase of the garrison in Zealand, the island upon which Copenhagen stands.

* * *

THE Greek Military League is not letting the grass grow under its feet; it is making quite certain that the Parliament shall vote the reforms it demands. Demonstrations of public opinion have been arranged throughout the country, and on Monday every shop in Athens shut. Practically the whole population gathered in the Champs de Mars to vote resolutions condemning the traditional corrupt politics, and calling upon the King, the Government, and Parliament to take in hand the work of national reconstruction. A deputation waited upon the King, who replied that "the Chamber, which is composed of patriots, will appreciate the justice of your demands," and nobody doubts that when the same orders are issued in every big city, even the most confirmed of corrupt deputies will see the wisdom of obedience, and M. Mavromichalis, though his immediate following is a trifling minority, will have no difficulty in getting the League's reforms through Parliament. How much that will mean in the way of a national renaissance is another question.

* * *

THE transition stage in the Nationalist Government in Persia is over. The Shah has at length been cleared out of the country: the Zill-es-Sultan has been sent back to Europe, leaving a handsome if involuntary contribution behind; and the Sipahdar has become Premier now that the Nasr-ul-Mulk has definitely failed to take office. Last, but not least, the new Russian Minister, M. Pokliewski-Koziell, has reached Teheran. His predecessor, M. Hartwig, was avowedly anti-English and anti-Constitutional. M. Pokliewski-Koziell is credited with the best of intentions. He is reported to have instructions to discuss forthwith the withdrawal of the Russian troops. It is to be hoped that the report is true. So long as the Russian forces are in Persia the forward party in Russia has strong temptation to aggression, there can be no real confidence in this country in Russian policy, and Persia's independence is in permanent danger. The withdrawal of the Russian forces is a pressing necessity, and the Nationalist Government is now so firmly in the saddle, and has given such solid proof of its quality that the last shred of excuse for keeping Russian soldiers in Persia has gone.

* * *

IN our great self-governing Colonies no organisation has done more to increase the protective duties on imports from Great Britain than the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Practically all the whittling down of the British Preference in the Canadian tariff since 1904 has been at the instance of members of the Association, acting sometimes as individuals, oftener as an organisation. Yet at the annual meeting at Hamilton, in September, the Commercial Intelligence Committee of the Association reported that "early in the year your Committee were pleased to assist in a small way the efforts of the National Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations of the United Kingdom, who are working hard in the cause of Imperialism, and endeavoring to hasten the adoption of a preferential tariff by the Mother Country." Tariff Reformers in England can hardly fail to take satisfaction in this official connection with the C.M.A. when they recall that it was in "Industrial Canada"—the organ of the Association—that there appeared in August, 1908, the dastardly attack on Yorkshire woollens, which when exposed in the "Yorkshire Post," kept the trade in the West Riding in commotion for nearly two months, and resulted in an active interchange of correspondence between the Colonial Office and Ottawa.

* * *

THE powerful case presented by Lord Morley in the House of Lords on Monday would justify an ampler contribution to a School of Oriental Languages than the £12,750 a year recommended by the Committee upon whose Report immediate action is to be taken. As Lord Redesdale pointed out, we have been laggards in a matter of grave educational and commercial importance. Schools of Oriental Languages have long existed in Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg, whereas the British Empire, three-quarters of whose population is Asiatic, has hitherto done virtually nothing. It is impossible for us to understand the people of India and their needs unless those sent to govern them know their languages, as few do effectively. Even for purposes of commerce we have been heavy losers by our linguistic deficiency, and compare unfavorably with German foresight.

[The next issue of THE NATION will be a Special Announcement Number and will contain a supplement dealing with the Books to be published during the season.]

Politics and Affairs.

THE POSITION OF THE KING.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON has done good service by telling the country with much plainness that if the House of Lords decides, as is generally expected, to throw out the Budget, not only the British Constitution but the Monarchy will suffer disturbance, and may undergo change. This has been so constantly our own contention that we may be permitted to affirm it afresh. As things stand, the Monarchy has remained practically stable for a hundred years. Both the Lords and the Commons have undergone larger modifications than the Throne. The line of our "temperate King" goes tranquilly on, resigned to the loss of the veto, ceasing to interfere directly in party politics, and content with the simple right to tender counsel, or to indicate private preferences, or to express informal objections to new lines of policy or seeming infringements of the Royal dignity. The Monarch knows that he has to deal for the most part with the representatives of two parties, Tories and Liberals. He is personally acquainted with both types of statesmen, and knows them well, before he accepts them as Constitutional advisers. The present Sovereign, in particular, owes something to Liberalism, and Liberalism owes something to him. All through Gladstone's later career, the King remained his attached friend, and many will remember the touching act of personal respect which he paid to Mrs. Gladstone on the day of her husband's funeral. The late Prime Minister enjoyed an equally cordial relationship with the Sovereign, and it has been extended to his successor. The King looks to recurring changes of policy, and knows that they are not likely to affect the stability of his throne. A Republican propaganda has ceased to exist, even among Socialists, for no occasion for it arises. The Court may be criticised, but not politically.

This is a happy position. It is now to be violently disturbed, at the instance of the party which used to make "Crown and Constitution" a kind of "standing head-line" in its electoral appeals. The Lords are to be put above the Monarchy, and to be given a veto not only over the whole range of democratic legislation, a veto exercised with insolent and egoistic excess at the expense of the last three Liberal Administrations, but over finance, that is to say, over a transaction which, for hundreds of years, has lain strictly between the Crown and the representatives of the people. This is a revolutionary seizure of power, which, three centuries ago, would have been answered by an appeal to arms.

The King is almost as much concerned in resenting such action as the House of Commons itself. For it destroys the party system, and makes the House of Lords the chief, though the indirect, instrument in the continual discredit of the Liberal forces, and the defeat of their political and social aims. The Liberal Party now has fair warning that any Government which it may succeed in bringing into being is damned before its birth. This knowledge must react on the electorate. They will either lapse into Toryism, or will call for a new party on a frankly revolutionary basis. The old conditions were—equality of opportunity for Toryism and Liberalism, and an impartial Monarch to see fair play. They will have ceased to exist the moment the Lords throw out the Budget, or interpose a dilatory resolution between the taxpayers and the sole taxing authority. The King will have lost one of the supports of his throne. The Constitutional balance will have been clumsily upset. England will practically be in the hands of an oligarchy, hoping to maintain its power by occasional plébiscites, chosen on the advice of the leaders of the Tory party.

Naturally, therefore, the question will be asked on all hands—"What will the King do?" For our part, we are convinced that the Radical Party will be moved to say, with great cheerfulness, "Let him do nothing. We will see this thing through. We are out to crush the power of the Lords, and whether it takes ten months or ten years we shall succeed." But the King may hold a very different view of the position. He will have to take into account the fact that a distribution of powers highly favorable to a constitutional form of Monarchy will have been changed for one most unfavorable to it. And he will obviously ask himself what the democracy will think, and how their attitude to the Monarchy will be affected if he passively consents to the crippling of the powers of the representative assembly which all through the annals of his house has been the organ of Constitutional progress as well as the real support of the throne. He may, indeed, have good reason to resent the action which will have forced such considerations upon him. But can he remain passive? And is it conceivable that the Prime Minister can renew the old relationship between Liberalism and the Crown without a formal request for powers to make it operative?

No such course is, we imagine, possible. Quite in the early stages of the controversy with the peers the Prime Minister—following the lead deliberately assigned him by his three predecessors—intimated that no future Liberal Government could take office without being assured in advance of ability to make the will of the Commons prevail against a recalcitrant House of Lords. Such a request must become far more urgent should the House of Lords dare to interfere with the financial power. In that case, we do not know what part of the Constitution would remain intact, or what ties would not be dissolved. No truly "conservative" forces would remain. The Liberals would be disarmed. The Tories would be engaged in pressing forward to Protection by way of a Constitutional revolution. The aim of the Crown would necessarily be, if possible, to restore the balance, and this it could only do by assenting to measures for curbing the pretensions of the peers. This aim could be effected by new creations—or by the promise of new creations—numerous enough to carry an anti-veto Bill through all its stages. Such a pledge might be asked for before a General Election, and become operative after, so that if the Liberals succeeded, it would be a necessary condition of their resumption of power. But could it be refused? Could the King take the responsibility of siding with a privileged order, acting against democracy at the bidding of one party in the State? The impasse is obvious.

To this pass the provocation of the peers has almost brought us—a pass which will have been reached through the straining of the implicit powers and understandings of the Constitution, crowned by a definite plunge into Revolution. We can see the immediate and entirely undeserved embarrassment that this brings upon the Sovereign. We can see the beginning; but who can see the end? The British nation is unusually devoid of that broad layer of conservative institutions which the great Revolution gave to France, and when the Constitutional party tells our masses plainly and simply that there is no Constitution, that their fortunes are disposable by the Rutlands and Westminsters, and that in their interest the House of Commons can be turned inside out like an old dish-clout, far-reaching powers and ambitions may arise to give effect to such a situation. The Liberal party waits on the issue and what may come of it; firm, fearless, united to the last man, but knowing well what its implications may be.

“THE SHAM INEVITABLE.”

WHEN a weak man yields to a strong passion against his better judgment, he commonly persuades himself that he so acts because he “must.” In politics this emotional fatalism dignifies itself by the high-sounding title of “the inevitable.” Ten years ago, when the war-fever was working at its height, all reasoning about the justice of the war was stopped by this doctrine of the inevitable. The same note is now loudly sounded in press and on platform. Most persons, Liberals or Tories alike, seem to have persuaded themselves that the Lords will refuse to pass the Budget, and that a grave constitutional conflict accompanied by a General Election at an early date is certain. A month ago this was not the generally prevalent view. How is it that what then appeared to reflecting persons as a mere possibility should to-day be accepted as a moral certainty? No new unforeseen event has occurred. Whatever “grievances” are contained in the Budget were there then. No intelligible forecast of intention has been offered by any Unionist leader. It is even admitted that some considerable concessions have been made within the last few weeks. The only fresh factor is this subjective one—the force of this superstitious feeling that we have passed the period when arguments count, and are slipping down a fatalistic slope. “The Times,” with a characteristic parade of quasi-scientific formulæ, restates this doctrine of the inevitable, telling us how “In the social, as in the bodily organism, the most important processes go on in the regions to which consciousness does not often reach.”

Now, we fully admit that it may be good tactics for the “plungers” on either side to bounce the “wobblers” by pretending that an act is predetermined which in point of fact is not. The false conviction thus generated may even turn the scale when the act of choice is on the point of being made. The sensational delight of a shallow-minded public in contemplating an interesting crisis always plays into the hands of wreckers. But sane men will not give undue weight to this manipulation of public opinion. We still believe that the Lords will, before they act, weigh the consequences of their action. How will these consequences appear to them? Even supposing, as can hardly be the case, that they would utterly ignore the public inconveniences attending a rejection of the Budget, and would be guided entirely by what they held to be their own interests, it is difficult to conceive any plausible setting of those interests that is favorable to rejection. Their leaders and admirers do not claim that the Lords have a right themselves to determine how the King’s revenue shall be raised. Their claim is that they have a right to insist upon a direct popular endorsement of the mandate which the Government asserts it has received from the electorate. It is urged that, acting in this spirit, they will not formally reject, but will pass a dilatory resolution asking the Government to secure the express sanction of the electorate for their finance. But the fatuity of this course is self-evident. Even were the Government willing to admit this right of the Lords to force a referendum, no power on earth could confine the mind of the electorate to this single issue. It is true that the Lords can force a General Election, either by rejecting the Budget or by persisting in a refusal to pass it within such limits as the Government chooses to set upon the current session of Parliament. But the notion that the appeal will or can be confined to the Budget, or even to the wider issue of the claim of the Lords to force a referendum in finance, is ridiculous. The Government will go to the people for a mandate to destroy the legislative veto of the House of Lords, and they will go fortified by the most telling illustration of the abuse of that veto that could possibly be devised. That we should fight the next election upon the right to make the will of the people operative through their representatives was always the intention of the Government. But sober-minded Liberals entertained some doubt about the force of an attack, illustrated by the rejection of Education or Licensing Bills, the popular enthusiasm for which was not very evident. The electorate has grown accustomed to strong language against the Lords for exercising the constitutional right they undoubtedly possess to destroy or mutilate ordinary legislation. But here, quite unexpectedly, the enemy plays into our hands by an insolent attempt to undo the history of three centuries, extending the area of their legicidal conduct to the region of finance.

If the Lords force a dissolution, there can be no question but that the broad constitutional issue will swallow up all others. The idea that the country will take “Socialism or Tariff Reform” instead can only occur to blind fanatics inexperienced in methods of election. Though Mr. Balfour put out this fighting policy, we do not believe that he and Lord Lansdowne will persuade themselves of its present efficacy as an alternative appeal to that made by the Government upon the constitutional situation. These able leaders must be aware that the Budget is popular, and that an outcry against the Lords for rejecting the Budget would almost certainly bring back the Government. They have said nothing to support the plain demand of Mr. Chamberlain and of other fiery spirits in the country, and we still hold that their strongest influence will be exerted in favor of passing the Budget. The real risk, of course, lies in the insubordination of the individual peer. If the liquor interest and the more fanatical landowners who believe, in most cases quite erroneously, that the Budget injures their property, can muster as many as seventy votes in the House of Lords, they could probably force a rejection by outvoting the little band of Liberal Peers and the handful of Moderates who might divide with them in favor of the Bill. If such an event seemed likely to occur, Lord Lansdowne could only stop the catastrophe by the heroic step of supporting the Government—a step which is quite incredible.

That there are some peers prepared to risk everything on a rejection of the Budget we make no doubt. But that these are sufficiently numerous to effect their purpose we gravely doubt. Yet we admit that the difficulty of the psychological diagnosis is such that we may be mistaken. "Quem deus vult perdere, prius dementat." Perhaps there may be enough Dukes and Earls able to persuade themselves that the Socialist bogey which quite evidently frightens those who have great possessions, must equally alarm the majority of the electorate whose possessions are little or nil. Every class has its own delusions, and this may be a delusion appropriate to Dukes.

THE CHANCES OF SPAIN.

So far General Marina has been justified of his Fabian strategy. After the miserable defeat of General Pintos at the foot of Mount Gurugu, hardly two miles outside Melilla, he allowed two months to pass in preparations and Spanish delays. Then suddenly, at the beginning of last week, instead of pressing his advance southward from Melilla on both sides of the salt lagoon of the Mar Chica, as everyone expected, he sent a division due west across the peninsula to the other coast, occupied strong positions, including the village with the Budget name of Taxdirt, and cleared the whole country northward up to Cape Tres Forcas, though he had appeared to neglect it entirely before.

Having thus secured his rear and right flank by occupying the whole of the northern peninsula, which is only about seven miles across from Melilla, he proceeded to carry out his original plan of striking at the Moor strongholds to the south. Without attempting an assault on the difficult glens and heights of Mount Gurugu, which rises in the centre of the peninsula, he advanced one force from his strongly established posts on the eastern skirts of the mountain, and another force from the camp at Zoco el Arbaa, on the south-eastern extremity of the Mar Chica, with orders to converge upon Nador and Zeluan. The movement was carried out with success and small loss. Though the Moors had considerable entrenchments before Nador, they divided their forces, thinking that Zeluan might be the first point attacked. In consequence, on Saturday a week ago, the considerable town of Nador was seized, looted, burnt, and reduced to ruins. Last Monday the Kazbah or walled stronghold of Zeluan, about seven miles further down the plain, was also seized. On Wednesday Mount Gurugu itself was occupied without resistance, and the Spanish flag now flies from its summit, which is about the height of Snowden.

We may notice in passing how futile have been the provisions of the first Hague Conference in regard to the conduct of war by land. Private property has been looted, villages have been destroyed, and towns burnt just as though the regulations of the Conference had never been drawn up. But now that the Moorish strongholds have been taken, the question is, What will happen next? In Melilla it was usually supposed that the occupation of Zeluan would end the "punitive expedition," and recent utterances of Spain's Foreign Minister and her Ambassador in Paris support that view. On the other hand, a strong party urges the permanent occupation of the whole Guelaia peninsula, including the short coastline eastward up to the frontier of French influence on the Algerian side, at Cape del Agua. "Are we to allow the Riffs simply to return to their old haunts and old hostility?" they say. "Are we to leave our mining concessions and two little railways exposed to Moslem fanaticism? And shall we have nothing to show the Spanish people for the £4,000,000 which it has cost them to take vengeance on the assassins of the four Spanish navvies killed on the line?"

It is against such purposes that the Maghzen last week issued a protest to all the Powers which have representatives at Tangier. For Mulai Hafid perceived that Spain now had at least 40,000 troops acting in his own country, and about 10,000 or 15,000 ready to cross at any moment. Would Spain send half the strength of her peace army to Morocco just to punish the turbulent Riffs for an everyday affair like killing four men? Small as his knowledge of Europe may be, the Sultan thought it unlikely. And so the Maghzen delivered their protest to the Powers, pointing out the violation of the Moroccan frontier by large armies, and the absurdity of Spanish claims to railway and mining concessions granted by El Roghi, a rebel Pretender and outlaw, who had now gone to his deserts, whether hewn in pieces or devoured of lions before the royal concubines. To this humble and natural protest, the Powers, following the lead of France, seem to have replied that, in spite of all Algeciras vows for the protection and integrity of Morocco, this was no affair of theirs, and Spain and Morocco must settle it up between themselves.

The process of settling up should now begin, and for Spain it will be difficult. The Sultan has formally disclaimed all responsibility in the war, financial and other. The fiction of representing Spain's action as a measure of police to assist the Sultan in maintaining order in his unruly dominions has collapsed, and the hope of getting some sort of compensation or indemnity in money vanishes at the same time. Which line will Spain now choose? To retain possession of the whole peninsula, on which Melilla stands, would mean continuous hostility and probable war, not only with the Sultan, but with all the untamed neighboring tribes, except the few "friendly" or traitor tribes who are always ready to sell their birthright for what it will fetch. It would mean the maintenance of a large force of men and guns in the country—at least 20,000 men to begin with—and expenses that Spain could ill afford, for all supplies have to be provided by sea. Finally, it would almost inevitably mean disputes and jealousies with the Powers before long, no matter how polite M. Pichon may appear for the moment. Just behind the mountains south-east of the Mar Chica runs the new frontier that France has acquired. The mountains bound the view from Melilla; they are not forty miles away. It is quite certain that France will not want a Spanish frontier marching with hers when she takes her next step towards the "rectification" of her African Empire. Besides, there is always Germany and her trade to be considered, and the German fleet could starve out the Spanish garrison in a fortnight. Thus there is plenty of room for international trouble, and, in any quarrel that might arise, Spain would have the disadvantage of being a transgressor against the Algeciras compact, though we admit that disadvantage is small in these days of shattered treaties.

That line of choice is bad, but what is the alternative? Having killed a certain number of Moors, destroyed their villages, burnt their towns, and taken a proportion of the rifles, out of which the Spanish officials have made a fine smuggler profit in the past, Spain might allow the Moors to return to their old way of life under nominal guarantees. She might occupy a few new outposts, extremely difficult to maintain, because they would always be commanded from Mount Gurugu, unless she occupied the whole mountain range itself. She would then have to withdraw her garrison within her former frontiers, that nowhere extend much more than two miles from the old walls of the Melilla citadel. How, then, would she satisfy or silence the crowd of titled speculators and other capitalists—Dukes, Counts, Marquises, King's friends, French investors, and the inevitable Scot—who have put money, or induced other people to put money, into those famous concessions from the deceased outlaw, and have looked to those imagined iron and lead mines and to those partly finished railway tracks as the golden blessings of old age? The speculative gang is small but very powerful. It includes almost all the "floating capitalists" in Spain, and they are equally favored by the young King and the ancient Church. For who else could guide the rich so well in their heavy task of finding investments both profitable and secure? Such investments, we mean, as are needed to maintain yachts, motors, racehorses, and other forms of sport fit for a king, or to increase the lands, buildings, plate, embroideries, and other properties essential for religion.

The dilemma is obviously difficult to solve. The saying that the worst part of Spain is the Spanish Government has been so long true that progress may only be possible by revolution. Short of revolution, we can but hope that the present Ministry will have the strength to defy capitalists and Clericals alike. Reactionary though the Premier, Señor Maura, is, he has a reputation for personal honesty, and some of his recent actions seem to show that he recognises the volcanic temper which long misgovernment in Church and State has aroused in the best and most industrious classes of the Spanish people. He has abolished the shameful privilege by which the wealthy could shirk military service on payment of £60. He has ordered that married reservists should not be sent into the fighting line—an order that may in future increase the marriage-rate and population of the country. He has this week restored the constitutional guarantees to all Spain, except Barcelona and Gerona. He has promised the assembly of the Cortes within a fortnight. He has promised concessions on the Censorship, and we cannot suppose he will retain in prison Señor Roméo, the eloquent director of the "Correspondencia," though his attacks on General Marina's conduct of the war were needlessly exaggerated. Finally, he has transformed the summary courts-martial at Barcelona into a Military Tribunal, with right of appeal in capital cases. Señor Ferrer, the founder of the Modern or Lay Schools, remains in gaol, but his innocence of complicity in the Barcelona riots is so well established, and such strong influence has been exerted on his behalf by many of the intellectual leaders of Europe, that we cannot suppose any further harm will happen to him.

These signs prove that the Government has been frightened, but they are favorable to gradual improvement. Since the loss of Cuba and the Philippines, Spain has grown in wealth and concentration. For the first time her Budget is strong and her exchange steady. If she refrains from extravagant adventures for the sake of a few French and Spanish concessionaires, she is likely now to enter upon a period of quiet internal development and intellectual progress. But the report of the Fiscal, or Attorney-General, Señor Ugarte, on the causes of the Barcelona disturbances shows how thin is the crust on which the Government and Society move. He may pour scorn on the rising as the work of bandits and thieves, Anarchist teachers, and the Union of Workmen's Solidarity. But bandits and thieves do not limit themselves to burning a few churches and monasteries, after giving the inmates full warning, and workmen do not accept anarchy and fling themselves into rebellion without deep causes. Among those causes are the unpopularity of the Royal Family, and the corrupt system of Government that makes elections a farce. But deeper than all lies the hatred of a Church, which is supposed to direct the Royal Family on one side, to favor the capitalist adventurers on another, and, besides, to suppress the intellectual and natural forces of the whole people under the gloom of supernatural terrors.

MOTOR ROADS AND THE PUBLIC.

THE atmosphere is so thick with sensational events and speculations that there is danger lest the Government proposal of a Road Board, with its important implications, should escape the full attention of the public. As a portion of the Development policy organically related to Mr. George's scheme of constructive finance, an enlargement and a reformation of the highway system of the country upon a national plan are of extreme importance. That our highways, constructed mostly in the remote past for narrowly local purposes, and for modes of traffic now grown obsolete, need a development which lies in part outside the range of local administration, there can be no doubt. Indeed, it seems tolerably certain that our entire transport methods, rail, canal, and road, must be brought under close national control in the early future. But it is not evident that, in its incipient stage, this work of improving our roads should be so far severed from the related schemes of economic development named in the first part of the Development Bill as to demand an independent organisation. While we agree that it is desirable that a new authority, independent of the Local Government Board, should be empowered to construct and maintain new national roads, and to subsidise local authorities for the improvement of existing roads, we hold that this authority should be the body of Commissioners to whom the rest of the development policy is entrusted. Though the special problems of road improvement may justify the appointment of a Road Board, that Board should remain under the control of the Commissioners, and should exercise no powers, administrative or financial, not expressly derived from them.

If the work of the proposed Road Board were simply confined, as in the first announcement of the scheme seemed possible, to the repairs and minor alterations of existing roads or to the making of short loop roads, the point might appear unimportant. But Mr. George explained this week to the Committee that it was designed to construct considerable lengths of new road connecting widely distant towns, and clauses granting these powers have been adopted by the Committee. Indeed, from the firm manner in which the Government representatives resisted the attempts of members to give priority to operations through the existing local authorities, it was made evident that a considerable scheme of new national high roads is contemplated. Now, in our judgment it will be a fatal error to entrust this valuable work to a body consisting mainly of unsalaried amateurs, and endowed with powers not only to flout and override existing highway authorities, but to disregard the other schemes of development carried on by the Commission which administers the first part of the Act. We cannot conceive how it is possible to spend public money usefully upon new roads without direct co-operation with the body responsible for the light railways and the other agricultural improvements.

There is only one possible explanation of the independence assigned to this autocratic Road Board, viz., that it was designed for the exclusive benefit of the new motor traffic. Indeed, in the original draft of the Bill this purpose was avowed. The whole of this expenditure on roads was ear-marked "for facilitating motor traffic." Though in the more recent explanations this predominant purpose has been modified, we are still told that the roads are to be "in the main for rapid transit," which means motor transit. Now, though it is quite reasonable to expect that motors, both for pleasure and for industry, are destined to play a large and an increasing part in the future, and that our road authorities must make proper provision for their convenience and safety, it is startling to be told that a new road authority is to be set up for the purpose of securing preference for them by spending public money to build roads especially adapted to their needs, and by subsidising existing road authorities to favor motor traffic. Though it may have been the intention of the Government in proposing this scheme to keep a just balance between the interests of the motor traffic and that of horse traffic and pedestrians, it is natural that the wording of the Bill should arouse suspicions. These suspicions were confirmed by the financial provisions for the new roads. Their exclusively motor character was, indeed, expressly defended upon the ground that the revenue to be expended on this was to be derived from taxes upon motors and motor oil. Now, upon this argument, we have two criticisms to offer. The first is of a general character. This ear-marking of special taxes for special expenditure appears to us radically bad finance. It will form a dangerous precedent for future taxation. The true justification for these taxes is surely found in the general need of revenue, not in the fact that some expenditure on motor roads might be incurred. The doctrine that a tax must be expended in some specific benefit to the particular payers of the tax is entirely indefensible. A result of this evil suggestion is that motorists are already speaking of the new roads as "their roads," and are claiming the right to nominate members of the Road Board to administer "their" fund. But it is entirely untrue that the expenditure is confined to the proceeds of motor taxes. Most of the public money which it is proposed to spend upon the new roads comes out of the general revenue. Mr. George made this quite clear this week when he told the Committee that the expenditure on the new roads could not come out of revenue, but was capital expenditure to be defrayed by loans from the Treasury. No less than £200,000 a year is authorised to be spent in paying interest upon this loan, and the millions this represents are to be advanced by the general body of taxpayers. We suggest that it is not too late for the Government to reconsider the entire structure of this Road Board. The Board should be subordinate to the Development Commission. Not only should all preferential stress upon the motor use of the roads be removed from the Bill, but adequate guarantees for the protection of the public against abuses of motor traffic should be inserted. It is not enough that the question of a speed limit for the new roads should remain open. If this Road Board is established and empowered to finance roads for "rapid transit," express provisions should be inserted for the protection of the public against excess of speed. The enforcement of a general ten miles limit in towns and villages, which the Local Government Board refuses to impose, should be made obligatory by statute upon the new Board wherever it grants subsidies or builds new roads, and other regulations of the Motor Act for the public safety, which at present lie in abeyance, should be inserted in a schedule of the new Bill. The present condition of our main roads is intolerable, and a Bill enabling motors to travel with greater speed and security, which at the same time fails to make strict provision against the perils of the road involved by this mode of transport has no claim to be considered as conducing to the true "development" of England.

Life and Letters.

MONEY IN POLITICS.

A SOMEWHAT piquant article on "Money and Brains in Politics" appears in the October number of the "Fortnightly Review." Its author, Mr. A. A. Baumann, is greatly exercised over "the mental inferiority of the Conservative Party in the House of Commons." He believes that three-fourths of the educated intelligence of the nation is Conservative, and, as anyone with such a belief might well be, he is troubled by the disparity between the assumed intellectual wealth of his party outside Parliament and the brutal fact of its poverty inside it. He explains this disparity by picturing the Conservative Party as the slave of money. The candidates it puts forward are mere animated cheque-books. No one who has not a private income of at least £500 a year can hope to receive the endorsement of the local Conservative Association. Not only are the "upper regions" of the Tory Party possessed by the idea that politics are a career or diversion reserved for the men of means and birth, but the local managers and agents measure a candidate's suitability by the amount of his income and by his willingness to spend it on the constituency. "It's your money we want!" is the welcome hurled at the head of the panting genius who, in the name of three-fourths of the educated intelligence of the nation, offers himself as a prospective M.P. Few geniuses can help being disconcerted by this simple greeting. They bury their political ambitions forthwith and make way for the crude dispensers of subscriptions. "The absurdity of the matter," says Mr. Baumann, "lies in the small number of electors who can touch the subscriptions of the most lavish member or candidate. At the outside, not more than a hundred or two of the electors can ever 'see the color of his money.'" But, in spite of this disheartening drawback, the Conservatives, as a party, still pin their faith to gold, and prefer the wealthy dullard to the penniless man of parts. Mr. Baumann does not, apparently, object to their making the fullest use of their money-power. Indeed, he sketches a glorious plan by which, on the basis of an annual subscription of a shilling for every £50 of income, the Conservatives might raise a central political fund of a million sterling, "change the whole aspect of politics," and bring money and brains together in an irresistible alliance. His complaint is that, as things are now, the Conservatives use their wealth in a wholly unbusinesslike fashion, and help to perpetuate a method of winning constituencies which, though within the letter of the law, is, in reality, "a pitiful, sneaking, half-hearted corruption."

It is quite possible that within the next few years the whole question of the use of money in politics may come up for legislation. It is a question with many aspects to it, some of which are happily as yet of potential rather than actual urgency in Great Britain. The direct participation of companies and corporations in politics has not yet, for instance, reached in England anything like the American scale. There are any number of "interests" represented in the House of Commons, and whenever any legislation is proposed that affects them they make themselves publicly heard, as it is right they should. They get up and argue their side of the case without concealment. Whatever is done is done openly; and though the House of Commons, and especially the Committees that sit upon private Bills, are constantly engaged in deciding matters that vitally concern great trades and interests, there is practically no attempt to influence their decisions in an illegitimate way. It is rare, again, for a statutory company, or for a joint-stock company of any kind, to contribute from its funds to the campaign chests of political parties. The practice is not absolutely unknown, but it is frowned upon both by public opinion and the general sense of the commercial community. Nor does the temptation to resort to it exist in England one half so abundantly as in an expanding, half-developed country like the United States. The "criminal rich" may make millions by taking a hand in American politics where his English brother would have to content himself with hundreds. Moreover, the Federal system of government puts a premium on the political activities of trusts and corporations. With fifty odd different governing authorities to placate, to defend itself against, and whose regulations it is bound to observe, an American insurance company or bank or railway is more or less forced to make politics a branch of its business. We should have the same phenomenon in England if every County Council were free to frame its own banking, insurance, and railway laws and regulations, and to expel from its area any company that refused to comply with them. Great Britain, again, escapes an immense source of political corruption by remaining a Free Trade country. Protection gives to political power a money and money-making value. It makes it financially worth while for the big corporations and interests to capture parties and "invest" in members of Parliament. The game is so profitable that their abstention from it can never be more than temporary. If we in Great Britain were to revert to Protection we should infallibly duplicate the experience of America. As it is, our form of government, the comparative lack of opportunity present in an old and fully-exploited country, the uniformity of our laws, the almost complete absence of officials who are elected to their posts for short terms and by popular vote, and our Free Trade policy, protect us from the more aggravated results of the illicit influence of industry upon politics.

There are, however, some disquieting symptoms to be noted in other directions. The one on which Mr. Baumann touches—the raids organised upon a candidate by the philanthropic, sporting, and religious societies in the constituency—is by no means the most serious of them. A candidate who has the sense to announce that he will subscribe to no cause or society in his constituency, and who puts his refusal on the clear ground of taste and principle, not only suffers no electoral damage, but stamps himself at once on the popular mind as a man of judgment and character. Of all spectacles, that of a man trying to curry favor with the electors by indiscriminate disbursements is the most futile and pitiful to be seen in politics. But it is not in any vital sense dangerous to the general purity of public life. The secrecy with which party funds are accumulated and distributed is, in our judgment, a considerably greater menace. It gives an excessive influence to a few rich subscribers, and enables them to nominate a candidate from motives that may be concealed from the mass of voters; and it also warps the initiative of the House of Commons and opens up the possibility that a highly undesirable form of pressure may at a crisis be applied to individual members. When an increasing number of politicians depend upon funds secretly collected and secretly administered for meeting their election expenses, there is always a liability to abuse. Another unpleasant feature of modern politics is the growth of large, wealthy, and irresponsible leagues for pushing this cause or that. These organisations raise immense sums of money for which they render no account. They support candidates at elections with canvassers, speakers, posters, leaflets, and so on. They do for a candidate what he is absolutely unable to do for himself on such a scale. But no return of the moneys they spend is included among the statement of expenses that every candidate is required by law to furnish; and in this way the purpose of the Corrupt Practices Act is frustrated. Nobody questions that the absorption or abolition of the old rotten boroughs, the expansion of the suffrage, the spread of education, the growth of class-consciousness, and of self-respect among the working-classes, and the generally high standard of character among Parliamentary candidates have pretty well stamped out the grosser forms of corruption at English elections. Where politics in this country suffer most from the power of wealth is, indeed, more on the social than on the strictly political side. They are contaminated more than anything else by the vicious hunt for titles. The spectacle of wealth buying what honors it pleases, of shrewd donations to a properly patronised charity being rewarded with a peerage, of baronetcies purchased by a cheque to the party funds, of all the wretched huckstering and intrigue that graduate the scale of English precedence, is one that works with a subtle and degrading perniciousness. Politics do not, and indeed cannot, escape the taint; and the type of man who enters public life as the easiest road to a title is almost as common in England as it was in Ireland before the Union.

THE FACTOR OF RACE.

In history nations rise and fall partly by accidents, but mainly by virtue of more or less traceable causes. The individual genius of your Napoleon or Julius Caesar, your Watt or Stephenson, your Dante or Shakespeare, baffles analysis in the last resort; although before you have probed the hero so far, you have nearly always found not only that he owed a large debt to his surroundings, but that he was born of a family otherwise remarkable. That a country like ancient Macedon should have been ruled in succession by two such extraordinary men as Philip and Alexander must, if you like, remain an "accident" when all is said; but we are bound first to say, that in no other time and with no other kingdom could what either of them did have been done so well, and also that the fact of the one genius being the other's son must be deemed anything but "accidental." Admitting, however, a large accidental (that is, unanalysable) factor in history, and allowing as liberally for it as we will, what are the traceable causes that are left? Two seem to stand behind all the rest, originating and dominating them: the factors of geography and race.

Fifty years ago, during what for Englishmen may be called the Buckle period of thought, it was the geographical factor on which the stress was laid. Thus it was geographically natural that the essentially Mediterranean empire of Rome should have been won and held from the vantage-ground of Italy, which bisects the Mediterranean, and that Rome's chief rival should have been Carthage, which bisects the same sea on the African side. It was geographically natural that the importance of England—linked especially with her carrying trade—should only develop after the discovery of America. And so on: whether you were thinking in continents or in nations, whether you inquired why Africa was so savage or Europe so civilised, whether you canvassed the past of Ireland or the future of Constantinople, Geography was at your side with a whole bunch of keys. And Geography deserved to be, not only because her claims were real, but because her status was that of a real science. The other factor, race, was not exactly ignored, but its science, Ethnology, was still a toddling child, repeating like a parrot, in contexts where they were untrue and misleading, the phrases which she had heard her elder sister, Comparative Philology, let fall.

Ethnology is still somewhat immature perhaps, but the insistence with which the problems and effects of race claim our attention has increased enormously. This has been due partly to a greatly diminished estimate of the extent to which race itself is the product of situation and climate. We no longer believe, if we ever did, that supposing England were colonised with negroes, they would in process of time get white skins, straight, non-woolly hair, or European skulls. It is true that the physiognomy of persons of European descent in the United States is coming to develop certain traits, which recall that of the Red Indian and which do not seem explicable by any blood relationship to him. But these are minor effects, and while admitting that climate may modify race in ways not yet appreciated, it remains true that when you ask of a people—the English, the French, the Germans, or what you will—the great question, Why they are what they are, an important part of the answer, and perhaps the most important, must be, that they are what they are because of the stocks to which they belong, because of the ancestors from which they are descended.

It is clear that if the race of a nation changes fundamentally, the nation cannot really be the same. Suppose the French birth-rate, for instance, to remain as low as it is, or lower, and suppose an immigration of millions of negroes from French West Africa who, without often intermarrying with the French, should reproduce their own race in France at their present rate of fertility. In two centuries or so the French population would consist, like that of Jamaica to-day, of a small white minority and a large negro majority. Could such a population, except by a travesty of language, be called the French nation—as if it were really the great entity that we know by that name in history? Assuredly not. Yet where are we to draw the line? Nature does not always supply a color-test to draw it with. And some of the racial changes that are going on inside the modern nations to-day may be in their sum not less rapid or less fundamental than that in our fancy illustration. Regarding the probable effect of certain of them we remain almost absolutely in the dark, though we cannot doubt it must be great; regarding others we can, by the aid of statistics, make conjectures, whose optimism unfortunately seems apt to vary inversely with their plausibility.

Think, for instance, of what is meant by the cross-breeding consequent on the coming of railways and cities. For nearly a thousand years the people of England, dwelling in its villages and little towns, consisted mainly of families who lived in the same neighborhoods all that time. Among the masses any considerable migration must have been extremely rare. The different representative districts of England had their distinct physical types almost as markedly as their distinct dialects. All that is changing irretrievably, and in the cities now (and even, thanks to railways, upon the countryside itself) Somerset and Norfolk, Cumberland and Kent, are brayed up together in one mortar with all other English ingredients, and with Irish, Welsh, Scottish, and foreign thrown in. A century hence at most will see a single mongrel type, speaking a single mongrel dialect, diffused throughout Great Britain. It is the same on the Continent; France, for instance, the bedrocks of whose population till recently have been pretty much the same since Julius Caesar's time—even France, for all her rural stability, is undergoing, though in a less degree, the same change. Is it for good or evil? We can only guess. The old common view, that the more you mixed European races the better was the result, was based largely on wrong facts supplied by false ethnology; to-day a pessimistic view, though not established, seems more justified.

Then there is the change in family stocks, which Professor Karl Pearson is so fond of illustrating to us with uncomfortable statistics. Only the lowest social classes multiply freely; the births among artisans barely increase their numbers; in the industrious middle classes more die than are born; the most comfortable families die quite rapidly out. The stocks at the top of society are perishing; they are being replenished from the stocks at the bottom. But figures seem conclusive as to the tendency not merely for genius but for any kind of superior competence to be hereditary, to run in stocks; and after even the limited openness of the career to talent which has prevailed in England for a century, who can doubt that on the whole the stocks in which superior competence runs are those now in the upper, the middle, or the artisan classes—the very stocks which are dying out? Here, again, our conjectures end in pessimism—a pessimism less conjectural in its foundations.

The two tendencies which we have noticed, and others which might be grouped with them seem likely in a short time to alter the race factor in our nationality quite incalculably. A similar alteration in the geographical factor would be less overlooked. If you took the entire English nation and transplanted it to Uganda or to Greenland, the new thing which came into existence would not be mistaken for England. Yet a thorough change in the race factor must be almost equally fundamental. And let no one rejoin that both or either of these factors—country and race—are merely "material" and by the side of such factors as national tradition or religion do not matter. It is because they are not merely material that they are basic. This again is perceived most easily of the geographical factor. Earth that gives the milk the spirit gives, says Meredith; the hills and plains and rivers, the suns and skies and seas, which take such a part in our spiritual life, could not do so surely if they were mere dead things, if theirs, too, were not spiritual existences. But is not this profoundly true of the facts of race also? Probably a majority of the people living in the world at this moment have for, or include in, their religion some form of ancestor-worship. It is the oldest civilised cult. Is there any mystery so venerable yet so vivid, so tremendous yet so near to the daily pulse of life, as this mystery of the transmission of the human torch from generation to generation, the inheriting by descendants from ancestors not simply of the fact of life, but of the qualities of life, of character? The emotion of patriotism as it appears in its higher forms—freed from the sordid or superficial aims, the cheap indulgences in national pride or spite, which dishonor it in its lower manifestations—proceeds largely from a consciousness of this mystery. It is not possible for an Englishman whose patriotism has the true quality to be aware of the changes that are being wrought to-day in the fibre of the English people, without feeling sometimes as if the very ground on which he stood were slipping away from under him.

MYSTERY AND ILLUSION.

THE things that can be divined and explained away are not mysteries but secrets, the things which come with the newspaper in the morning and pass with the tea-cup in the evening. What passes beyond the wit of the most experienced, and attains the realm of perennial magic, is the inexplicable. This is why genius is always a wonder and a mystery. Secrets can be manufactured, guessed at, fathomed; reputations may, for a time, be bolstered up on the sensations created by revealed or half-revealed secrets; but there is as much difference between secrets and mysteries as there is between talent and genius.

The publican and the postman can talk of a secret with some degree of intelligence; they cannot intelligently discuss a mystery. And in this the poet is not much better off than the publican; the poet knows that secrets are finite sensations, and mysteries infinite realities. And the poet stops there. Secrets cease to interest once we have understood. Approach a mystery and it recedes into higher regions. It is always on the wing. Newton revealed a secret of Nature and made it plain, but he did not touch the mystery behind the secret. The mysteries of Nature and human nature are alike perennial. Look anywhere in the world of art and you will find plenty of revelations, revealed facts, but not one of them touches so much as the hem of the real personality. Chatterton's literary forgery was a secret revealed, but not a revelation of his genius. There are illusions which pertain to secrets, and when the secret is out the illusion is gone for ever.

Of the three magical things known to man—genius, personal beauty, and spiritual serenity—perhaps the last is the most potent and the most personal in its influence. Other virtues and qualities may change, suddenly or by degrees. Beauty may fade in a night, genius has its moods of action and reaction, activity and indifference, but a serene spirit carries its own light, is a sort of magical beacon on the shores of the ever-present now. I have met with two kinds of serenity: one, the gift of heredity; the other, the gift of prolonged tribulation. There is a third, the result of inborn goodness, strengthened and brightened by the going and coming of a thousand illusions, those phantoms that elude the sentinels at the threshold of reason. They glide into our lives without noise or warning, inhabit the secret corners of the mind for months or years, and then glide away as silently as they came.

There are illusions which refuse to be discarded as we discard an old garment; they pass from us in their own time, like coffins laden with the souvenirs of the past, leaving us stricken and wondering on the brink of inscrutable mystery, dumb amidst the chimeras and unsolved enigmas of the universe.

It is through the gate of illusion that most of us obtain the fairest glimpses of the Eden of serenity. Illusions are the fret-work of the house of life, the belfry of sounds and symbols, but from the altar within the incense rises that purifies and renders acceptable the sacrifice of so many years and so many sorrows. Some illusions rule like invisible tyrants, and when they depart, others arrive in new guises, in the form of friends, to remain as flatterers, and leave with mysterious abruptness. Others arrive in the guise of visions and dreams, with vistas that have no end, with multitudinous forms, like the mirage that is always just beyond.

It is the law, for dreams must precede realities. They accompany every temperament, from the most humble to the most exalted.

The woods and fields are among the few places where the mind is serene and free from illusive deceptions. The woods, hills, stars, streams, and plains are impersonal. A tree does not disappoint us when its leaves begin to fall, nor a flower when it begins to wither and fade. We know them as realities that change their appearance at fixed periods; they belong to the poetic in Nature, and their souvenirs are connecting links that stretch from month to month and from year to year. It is when we enter the world of man that chimeras and illusions seem disturbing, menacing, afflicting, and deadly. Here, and here only, do things and people disturb and deceive. Delusions are fixed deceptions, but illusions are related to time, season, circumstance, health, social modes, and intellectual moods, antipathy or sympathy. While to the uncultured mind everything deludes, to the philosopher and poet everything is illusive in the sense that realities lie far hidden under the shifting lights and shadows of sight and sentiment, and only those who are possessed of the inner conception of truth can sift the gold from the glittering chaff. Through what seas must we wade before we wander back towards the mountain that separates two desolations!

The ambitious and fretful are harassed by that bitter cry: "To-morrow and to-morrow and to-morrow"; for the poet knew the illusions of to-morrow would be the same in kind if not in degree, the same in substance if not in appearance, as those of to-day. The madding dream would go on, but the scenes would shift—the same drama with fresh incidents, the same theme with new subjects. It has to be conceded that to the ignorant and superstitious everything tricks and deludes; to them people and things are all so many mechanical deceptions, and genius itself is a device, the secret of which may be discovered and appropriated.

Happiness depends on being able to sift the things that glimmer and deceive from the things that are simple, real, and fixed. The habit of pessimism is assumed when we allow middle age to arrive and find us still under the domination of illusions springing from negative ideals, impossible ambitions, vain and impotent enthusiasms. The wise are those who know exactly the worth and duration of ephemeral joys and so prepare in advance for every onslaught of disillusionment. The pessimist takes the trivial and fleeting things of life as if they were intended to remain as perpetual realities instead of passing incidents, and he is apt to draw from reason and experience a stoical serenity which is often more sad than joyful and consoling. Goethe was more serene than Marcus Aurelius; Emerson more secure than Seneca; while anger and philosophical agitation prevented Carlyle from entering the precincts of perpetual magic. Indeed, this magic is more a state of being than a feeling of superiority; it implies a superior existence more than superior knowledge. It is not the will that acts, but life itself.

Just as the most dangerous illusions are those which give no hint of their chimerical nature, the serenity attained by a constant exercise of the will is the most wavering and insecure. In the manifold garden of life illusions are the butterflies and weeds, and serenity the flower that blooms the latest and lasts the longest.

FRANCIS GRIERSON.

THE COLOR SENSE IN TROUT.

A VERY pretty problem has been stated in "The Scotsman." One correspondent, fishing with a cast of three flies, had caught trout very rapidly on the middle fly, while the end fly and the upper dropper were ignored. The middle fly was a "black spider." Thinking that it might be even more attractive at the end of his cast, he put it there, and found cause for astonishment. The trout rose no more. The lure that had been so successful as a dropper was a failure as the tail fly. Thereupon another angler gave evidence. He had been using a cast of two flies: a teal-and-red at the end, and a woodcock-and-green dangling. "Two out of three fish were caught on the woodcock-and-green. Then I thought of changing the position of the flies, and did this. Result: woodcock-and-green same as before. What can we make of this?" There has been no answer. Evidently the problem is regarded as insoluble. Perhaps this unwonted agnosticism is attributable to the Editor of "The Scotsman," who either headed the correspondence "Color Sense in Fishes" or allowed it to retain that heading. It is not only the trout's sense of color that is in question. His sense of the behavior of insects also is involved. Flies that are in any respect like a lure with woodcock wings are flies that float inertly and never go against wind or stream. The insect represented by a "black spider" is of quite another habit. He runs about, with remarkable activity, on the surface of the water, and heeds neither stream nor storm. You shall see him, thus superior to the forces which control ordinary insects, if you look into any clean brook. Here we have a ready clue to the mystery with which the first correspondent posed the Editor and the public. A black spider at the end of a cast is not in the proper place. It will dip below the surface, acting as the real insect apparently never does; and it will have but a languid movement at the best. On the other hand, as a dropper, dangling when the rod and the line are drawn inwards, it will at moments have a motion very like that of the living creature. Naturally, therefore, the black spider should always be used as a dropper.

The testimony of the other angler is one of many evidences that the color sense of trout is exacting. It is at least as remarkable as the testimonies, intended to lead to the opposite conclusion, of Mr. Herbert Spencer and Sir Herbert Maxwell. Carrying into sport his scientific unwillingness to accept "received beliefs" unquestioningly, Mr. Spencer, it appears, made a bet with a farmer who had been saying that only those flies would be successful which in size and shape and color were appropriate to the water and to the time of the year. The farmer would fish with flies of that kind, bought at a tackle-shop; he, Mr. Spencer, would fish with flies busked by himself from feathers found in the farmer's poultry-yard. Well, it was a drawn match, the farmer and the philosopher catching trout to the same number; but that proves nothing at all. Mr. Spencer does not say that he made flies bigger than real insects, or smaller; and one may be pretty sure that he did his best to have them shapely. Rather slyly, he leaves us to infer that the colors must have been ridiculous; but in that regard we take leave to adopt his habit of scepticism. Domestic cocks and hens and ducks and drakes present a very wide choice of hues. They would afford material for quite presentable March Browns, black hackles, red hackles, and duns of many shades. Realising this, and remembering that there are nearly always duns in or on any water at any time of the season, and that the wingless red hackle or black hackle is often a wonderful lure, one inclines to think that Mr. Spencer must have been smiling inwardly as he tampered with the faith of that simple farmer. The evidence proffered by Sir Herbert Maxwell is not very much more weighty. It is to the effect that, being in doubt as to whether fish had any acute sense of color, he had some Mayflies dyed blue and some others dyed scarlet, and that he made a heavy basket by means of these seemingly outrageous lures. What of that? The real Mayfly is not invariably of a pale yellow delicately tinged with green. It has a great variety of hues. On some parts of the Wey this summer it was a sooty black. Can one wonder, then, that the trout, in regard to the Mayfly, are not always particular to a shade? That insect has some quality which puts the fish into a state of rash excitement almost indistinguishable from madness. Their habits at that time are not reasonably to be taken as indicating the nature and the state of their senses at ordinary times.

At these times it becomes manifest, after sufficient experience, not only that the coloring of a lure is important, but also that it is as much so even as shape or size. At this stage of our discourse it is necessary to discriminate. Ordinary times are not all times of the same kind. An angler who was out upon a water practically every day for a whole season made an important discovery. It was that, whilst trout are almost always in a rising humor for a few weeks at the beginning of the season and for a few weeks at the end, there is a long period, from about the middle of April through the summer, during which they cannot be expected to rise freely, except at and after nightfall, on more than one in twenty days. There cannot be any wonder, then, that most anglers, those who have a day on the water only now and then, and not always the day they would prefer, are habitually in a state of puzzlement over the phenomena of the sport. The chances are very much against their being out on a day when the fish are "really rising." It is certainly true that on the indifferent days it is not easy to discover that the trout have a preference for any pattern among the flies used. They sometimes seem to take one lure without more reluctance than they take another. This fact, however, is susceptible of more than one interpretation. The ordinary understanding of it is that the trout generally are not feeding; that only one here and there can be tempted or irritated; and that this exceptional fish takes any lure that comes over him, without minute regard to its appearance. That does not exhaust the possibilities of the case. As spring ripens and summer approaches, the patterns provided by Nature become more and more diverse. There are flies of only a few kinds on the water early in the season. After that there are flies of many kinds; the colors of the kinds are marvellously diverse; and usually, although there are several kinds on the water at the same time, it is only one kind that the trout want. It may even be, through some failure or delay of Nature, that the kind they want is not on the water. They are on the watch for it; but it has not come. Thus, in and about the high noon of the year the angler is much less likely than at other times to be using the exactly opportune fly. If he were, some even of the days which he finds indifferent would wear another complexion. As it is, luck occasionally leads him to put on the right fly, which, as has been mentioned, is sometimes a fly for which the fish are in vain looking to Nature; and then there is no doubt at all as to whether the trout can see correctly. That fly, and that alone, is what the fish are wanting. On the "really good day," the one in about twenty days, proof that trout have an exacting sense of color ceases to be circumstantial and becomes direct. You see the rises at some particular fly, which is abundant on the water; you catch a specimen and find a lure to match it; and, other things being equal, the weight of your basket will be in proportionate accord with the likeness of the lure to the living model.

Pictures of Trabel.

AN IMPRESSION OF FRIESLAND.

THE note of Friesland is a pleasant monotony. Apart from a few patches of uncultivated heath and woodland, the country is never false to itself. Experience only deepens and does not alter the first agreeable impression. The basis of the picture is a flat, vivid greenness, hedgeless and treeless, divided like a chessboard by ditches and waterways, and peopled only by colonies of cows. Add to this a dozen windmills, with their fantastic air of activity, some scattered homesteads of the Frisian farmer, with house, barn, and cowshed all combined under one enormous pyramid of thatch or tile, and in the far distance a long line of trees bordering a road, and the church tower and green-embowered roofs that mark a village. The scene is washed by the pure, bright Northern air, and over-arched by the incomparable dome of sky and cloud that only the low countries can show. Go where you will in the province, that is Friesland.

Through this country you may travel for days by little untidy steamboats, piled with miscellaneous merchandise, in which four deck stools constitute the first-class deck, and the skipper is indistinguishable from the stoker. Now and again the boat is casually bumped against a bank, and a barrel rolled off in the middle of the greenness, or you call at a village, where the brightly painted houses are reflected in the water, and pass beneath the picturesque drawbridge that carries the high road. Towards the end of the day, when friendly relations have been established between the saloon deck and the crew, you may see the English passenger entrusted with the steering unsupervised, while the captain and the stoker are rolling the cabin-boy up in a tarpaulin. The Dutch are a singularly placid race. The cabin-boy, at one of our stoppages, cast off from the bows when only half the cargo had been landed, and three men had to hold on hard to the rail while the process was being completed. The boy said the equivalent of "Dear me!" and walked aft, his hands in his pockets, entirely unconcerned. Nobody upbraided him. Again, our boat, carelessly handled (not by the amateur steersman), cannoned heavily into a barge outside a lock, and apparently the only emotion of the bargee was one of thankfulness that we had not cut him down. Such an opportunity for an exchange of sarcasms would hardly have been lost in England.

So the day passes. You take up and set down a succession of peasants, the men light-haired and blue-eyed, bandying pleasantries with the crew, the women in dress of sober black, their heads encircled by the close-fitting Frisian "capsel" of gleaming gold, overlaid with lace, and with, too often, a modern black bonnet set incongruously atop. All day long the waterways are full of traffic; far more than the roads they are the highways of the country. Great barges are passing to and fro, their brown sails extended to the wind and blocking half the fairway, steamers large and small, and rowboats piled high with hay, or laden with the farmer's milk-cans.

In fine, warm weather there is no pleasanter—and certainly no lazier—way of seeing Friesland. The only strenuousness comes at the end of the day, when, after dinner, with the aid of a Dutch Bradshaw and a local broadsheet, which disagree with one another, you strive to construct your programme for the morrow; for the little steamboats are entirely un-co-ordinated, they would scorn to sail at the same hour on two consecutive days of the week, and Bradshaw gives you nothing but a departure time, and abbreviates to the verge of unintelligibility. It is an undertaking comparable to that of planning a tour through an English countryside by the carrier's carts that radiate from country towns.

It is not the least advantage of this method of journeying that it brings you into the cities by their most attractive entrance. Compared with railway travel it is like going into a house by the drive instead of the ash-pit. One will not easily forget the view under the friendly evening light of the long waterways lined with barges, the picturesque waterside houses, and at the end of the vista the spires of a sixteenth century water gate. Your hotel must be very bad and the town very dull, if you take against it after such an introduction as this. But the towns never are, to my thinking, uninteresting. Whether there are any show-buildings to see or not, there are always canals through the streets, always a gaily decorated Stadthuis of the early renaissance, and, towering above the secular buildings, a huge church, impressively plain, of old red brick.

The smallest and one of the most interesting of the towns is Hindeloopen. It has a Stadthuis and a burgo-master, so I suppose it must be a town, otherwise one would call it a village. Once it had prosperity and an oversea trade, and in those happier days there was a peculiar Hindelooper costume, and the houses were famous for old carved oak, Delft tiles, and painted wood. Now the costume is abandoned, and since old furniture has become fashionable the household treasures of the town have been dispersed through Holland. Relics, however, still remain; if you go, as you certainly should, to the "Bonds Hotel" in search of tea, you will find in your host a diligent collector of the local antiquities. He takes you round his rooms furnished in the old-fashioned way, and filled with curiosities, ironing-boards, sledges, china, dresses, old prints, photographs of the historic occasion when the Queen stopped for seven minutes at the station, and he and his friends dressed up in the old costumes for her edification. All these things he descants on with a wealth of knowledge and an obstinate refusal to be hurried. He would scorn to talk to you in anything but English, which he uses with fluency and imagination. Taking you into the more elaborately furnished room, he says: "If you com to stay here, and you like me very much, den I shall say to you will you sit here in de efening; but if you do not like me, den when you ask me for a sitting-room, I shall say" (shrugging his shoulders) "I am sorry I haf not one." You should certainly see his collection, but do not imagine that you can do so in less than half-an-hour, for the force is not invented that can hurry the proprietor's exposition.

A week is, perhaps, hardly enough to entitle one to generalise on the Frisian character. With the children curiosity seems to overmaster every other characteristic. If you turn round suddenly in your walk through a street, you will find yourself followed by a wide-mouthed crowd of them, solemnly studying you, and whenever you take out a camera your foreground is instantly peopled with the infant inhabitants of the town. But they are not so terrible as they seem. If they have begun to learn English at school, they like to display it. "I spik Engleesh," they say, or, "It is vairy dear," if they see you looking into a shop. In Harlingen, however, where a maritime population has perhaps corrupted manners, the formula was, "Haf you a matchbox for me?"

It was in Harlingen that I saw an entertaining little marriage ceremony. There had been a great wedding, and the town and the shipping were decorated with flags. As I was strolling through the town I saw a little procession of a dozen children or so, the boys carrying the national flag and wearing streamers of orange, the girls with wreaths of flowers on their heads. Singing a song the words of which I could not catch, they marched along attracting apparently no sort of attention, and presently stopped before a house door still singing. The door opened, and a man, frock-coated, white-tied, and button-holed, with best man written large all over him, appeared and distributed some gift to the little serenaders. I could not see what it was, but I think it was in a form not easily divisible, for as I turned the corner the company was engaged in something very like dissension in the street.

Among the men and women there is the same curiosity, but with it a great desire to be of service. If you ask one of them the way he insists on going with you to show you. He takes you to the door, rings the bell, and sees that you go in. More than that, if he meets you afterwards in the street, he directs you once more to make sure. He regards it as a sort of reflection on the service he has done you that, having gone in, you should afterwards come out again. One annoying habit he has, of which it is impossible to break him; the moment he hears you speak, "Ah," he says, "I perceive you are an American."

K. E. T. W.

The Drama.

AMERICAN SERIOUSNESS AND ENGLISH HUMOR.

MR. WILLIAM VAUGHN MOODY is one of the most original and remarkable of living American poets. His parable of the age of mechanism, entitled "The Brute," and his anti-Imperialist "Ode in Time of Hesitation," are very noble pieces of work; somewhat in the vein, respectively, of Mr. Kipling and Mr. William Watson, but with a note which is all the poet's own. Moreover, he has written a play, "The Faith Healer," which, though not quite successfully worked out, contains some scenes of extraordinary power and impressiveness. I sincerely regret, then, that I cannot bring myself to relish "The Great Divide," a play which took the American critics by storm, and seems to have been received with general favor by my colleagues on this side of the water. I saw it two years ago in New York, in the flush of its first success, when it was being hailed on all hands as the long-looked-for "great American play." Distrusting my first unfavorable impression, I went to see it again, with no better result. And now I have seen it a third time, at the Adelphi, and still it touches no responsive chord in my hardened bosom. Not that I actively dislike the play—there is nothing to dislike about it. The trouble simply is that, with the best will in the world, I cannot find it moving or even interesting. It is difficult to account for a negative sensation, or lack of sensation; but a brief analysis may help to elucidate the case.

Philip Jordan, of Milford Corner, Massachusetts, has come out to Southern Arizona to retrieve the fortunes of his family, and his sister, Ruth, has accompanied him as housekeeper. Stress is laid in the first act on her New England upbringing, as well as on the fascination which the wild nature and untrammelled life of Arizona exert upon her spirit. A young doctor who has known her from childhood is in love with her; but she is quite heart-whole and laughs off his suit. It is indicated that in her secret soul she finds him too civilised and tame, dreaming rather of some rugged, "unfinished," primitive mate, of a piece with the titanic nature which has laid its spell on her. There comes a night when, owing to a combination of untoward circumstances, she has to be left alone at her brother's ranch. In a highly effective melodramatic scene, the house is invaded by three drunken and brutal desperadoes, two Americans and a half-caste Mexican, or "greaser." They propose to cast dice for the possession of their prey; but she appeals to one of them, who seems to be of milder mood, to save her from the other two, promising that if he does she will marry him. Stephen Ghent—that is his name—is more or less moved and sobered by her appeal. He buys off the "greaser" with a chain of nuggets, and he fights a duel with the other ruffian, whom he apparently leaves dying on the field of battle. Then, in a very high-minded way, he places a loaded revolver within Ruth's reach, thus giving her a chance to get out of her promise by shooting either herself or him. She resists both temptations, and, having bound up a wound he received in the duel, rides away with him into the moonlit night.

As a series of thrilling incidents this act is undoubtedly effective. But here, unfortunately, the thrilling incidents come to an end, and the remaining acts are devoted entirely to discussions, recriminations, and agonies of soul, which all move, with dreary deliberation, towards a clearly foreseen event. The truth is, I think, that Mr. Moody has failed to provide any adequate obstacle between his hero and heroine. He has been at such pains from the first to make his happy ending seem possible that he has made it seem inevitable and tediously delayed. Long before the end of the first act, it is manifest that Stephen Ghent is precisely the rough diamond for whom Ruth is waiting, and that the author's task must henceforth be simply to postpone her recognition of the fact. In most of the plays—and they are legion—which deal with substantially the same theme, the lady has some rooted social prejudice to overcome before she can fall into the arms of her uncouth, but noble-hearted, husband. But Mr. Moody has been careful to assure us in advance that Ruth is quite above such prejudices. He has been careful to show that she is perfectly free to bestow her heart wherever she pleases. What, then, is to prevent her from discovering, as soon as the first shock of the midnight adventure is over, that Stephen Ghent is the very man for whom she has been vaguely yearning?

Mr. Moody has evidently foreseen this criticism, and has made an endeavor to meet it. The second act takes place several months later, at Stephen Ghent's house in the neighborhood of a very rich mining claim which is rapidly making him a millionaire. He is an entirely reformed character, a little lacking in outward polish of manner, but tenderly devoted to his exceedingly gloomy and unresponsive wife. Why is she so gloomy and unresponsive? Well, it is a disagreeable story. It appears that when they rode away together in the moonlight, they went straight to San Jacinto, and were there duly married. Then they set off across the great desert, camping out at nights. It was a journey quite suited to Ruth's hankings after a free, wild life; and Stephen treated her with a "beautiful, rude chivalry" which was rapidly softening her heart towards him. In short, there was every danger that the play might have had to go without a second and third act; when, fortunately, Stephen Ghent got drunk one night, invaded her tent, and behaved with a conspicuous absence of chivalry, which opened a new and seemingly impassable gulf between them. Now, I am far from saying that this is an unnatural incident dragged into the story merely to lengthen it out. But I do say that the problem it presents to us is unpleasant without being interesting. Stephen's lapse is a most unhappy one, certainly; but as the two are manifestly made for each other, and as there is clearly no danger of any further breach in his rude chivalry, the question how long Ruth can postpone the inevitable forgiveness and reconciliation leaves me exceedingly cold. Nor do her methods of eking out her grievance greatly commend themselves to me. A remark made by the "greaser" in the first act rankles in her mind. When Stephen offered the half-breed money to relinquish his claim to Ruth, he replied that "a dirt-eating Majadé would have paid more for his squaw"—and this she cannot forget. She does forget that, after all, Stephen risked his life to protect her from the other ruffian, and that he even showed improbable magnanimity in offering her a means of escape from her bargain with him. But the chain of nuggets given to the greaser seems to her a symbol of degrading enslavement, and she devotes herself to weaving baskets and selling them (as her brother puts it) in "a public caravanseraí," in order to buy back the chain, and fling it, metaphorically, in her husband's face. Then she goes to her home in Massachusetts, and gives birth to a child, which she detests. So she glooms and sulks for several months, until Stephen, having followed her eastward, finds an opportunity of talking things over with her, which, of course, brings about the desired reconciliation. We gather that her long recalcitrancy was the fault of the Pilgrim Fathers, whose spirit, being strong within her, made her feel that both she and Stephen must "cleanse themselves by suffering and sacrifice." But Stephen, she now sees, has chosen the better part; for he "has taken all the good in their life and grown strong, while she has taken all the evil and grown weak, weak unto death." This, it appears, is the thought and the language of New England. In Old England we put it more briefly, and say that it's wise to make the best of things. A sound maxim, but scarcely worth elaborating in three acts.

It is impossible, I fear, to acquit Mr. Moody's heroine of a sort of moral pretentiousness. The author, no doubt, is partly conscious of it; but he allows it to expatiate and agonise at tedious length. In the second act, when someone asks Ruth how long she has known her husband, she replies, "For all my life and aeons before!" I am not indisposed to believe that this is the way young ladies talk in Milford Corners, Massachusetts; but to all appearance the author intends the remark to appeal to our sympathies and not our sense of humor. For my part, I cannot take it seriously. After the first act, in which her adventure was certainly a nerve-shattering one, I cannot take Miss Ruth Jordan seriously at all. There are, in fact, two plays in "The Great Divide." The one is the story of a romantic marriage, of a type not uncommon, it would seem, in semi-barbarous society. The other is a problem play turning on the unattractive question whether a single act of brutality on the part of a drunken husband ought to be held so unpardonable as to break up a union which otherwise promises to be quite satisfactory. This is a point on which I do not feel it an imperative duty to make up my mind. There is no moral principle involved. We have all to get over a certain amount of ugly experience, of grotesque accident, in life; and whether two lives should or should not be irretrievably ruined by such an accident is simply a question of the amount of ugliness which a given temperament can, or can not, digest and dismiss.

American experience, however, has shown that popular audiences are much impressed by the combined picturesqueness and moral earnestness of "The Great Divide"; and that experience may possibly repeat itself here. Mr. Henry Miller gives a ruggedly impressive rendering of Stephen, and Miss Wynne Matthison is both forcible and pathetic as Ruth. The mounting is very complete, the scene of the second act, on a tableland overlooking a great canyon in the Sierras, being unusually effective.

If you want two hours of honest, irresistible fun, never degenerating into mere buffoonery, go and see Mr. Anstey's "Brass Bottle" at the Vaudeville. Mr. Anstey is a master of fantastic embarrassments, and this is, perhaps, his happiest invention in that line. The idea of transporting into modern life a genie from the Arabian Nights seems simple and even obvious; but though many people have nearly hit on it before (in pantomime if nowhere else) it has been reserved for Mr. Anstey to seize it and develop it to the full. Unpretending as his play is, it is full of real ingenuity. Especially remarkable is the way in which he escapes the danger of a flat and commonplace last act by the happy invention of making Pringle the only member of the group (except Ventimore himself) from whose memory the strange events of the past twenty-four hours have not been expunged. By this means Mr. Anstey secures a last act, after the genie is safe in his bottle again, which is quite as entertaining as any of the scenes in which his power is so inopportunistically displayed. The piece is capitally acted by Mr. Alfred Bishop, Mr. Holman Clark, Mr. Rudge Harding, and Mr. Laurence Gros-smith. It amply deserves the immediate success which it seems to have achieved.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters to the Editor.

CITIZEN RIGHTS AND CITIZEN DUTIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me to call attention to a point in the discussion upon women's suffrage which does not seem to have been touched yet in your columns?

Advocates of the movement generally assume that the majority of women are as fully qualified as men by the practice of citizen duties for the exercise of complete citizen rights. We assume that most women, like most men, are "active citizens"—that is, self-supporting or economically independent—and careful to exercise all such powers of citizenship as they possess. But is this the case? And does not this question affect the expediency, though not the abstract justice, of the extension of the franchise to women?

The practical bearing of the matter will be cleared if I may quote the words of a friend from Finland on the subject. Your readers will remember that, in this small, but progressive, country, women's suffrage in its fullest sense has been tried for nearly three years, and has proved an unqualified success.

We were speaking of the Suffragist movement in England, and after I had been—no doubt—extremely eloquent, my friend said quietly: "Yes, but are the majority of your women quite serious about it?"

"I know," she continued, "that a minority of Englishwomen desire the suffrage ardently, and work for it by all means, fair or unfair, in their power. But can you show me that the majority are really prepared for this inevitable future extension of the franchise, or are preparing themselves for it in any adequate way?"

"How far do you think the women of England are fulfilling those citizen duties which are the forerunners of the rights of citizenship? We hold here that the first of these duties is to be self-supporting or economically independent; and the second is, to use all available means (municipal or philanthropic if others are forbidden) to forward the welfare of other citizens.

"Of course, the women of your laboring classes are self-supporting, and you have many splendid examples of citizen work among the women of your middle and upper classes. But can you tell me that self-support, or economic independence, combined with public service, is the ideal of your proletariat or your bourgeoisie? Does not the working woman look forward to keeping a little servant, and living idly, or 'like a lady,' as she would say? Do not your daughters of the bourgeoisie usually regard marriage as a happy escape from a self-supporting life? Do the women of your leisured classes generally enter the professions unless they are obliged? Do not some of your women merely pass from the guardianship of their parents into the guardianship of their husbands, being practically minors all their lives? Can you call such women independent citizens, demanding and deserving citizen rights?"

"To be sure, the property basis of your suffrage would hinder some such dependent women from being enfranchised. Others of them would obtain their vote by arrangement; but the holding of a £10 lodger qualification will not make a responsible citizen when the whole previous life-training has been towards irresponsibility and indifference. . . . No; until I hear of a very general and widespread movement for the practice of citizen duties, all this talk of citizen rights will not convince me that your Englishwomen seriously want the vote, and are prepared to use it when it comes."

Now these are the necessarily hard strictures of a little country, whose ideal is work and progress, upon a large and incoherent society with many ideals, the most popular of which is, I fear, wealth and leisure. It also seems to me that my Finnish friend was going near to that world-old fallacy that the suffrage is a kind of reward for good citizenship, intelligence, and so on, not the elementary protection and right of every dweller in a State whose taxes he pays, and to whose laws he is subject. But I think she has indicated a point on which the feminist movement in England is weak. So far as I know, the Women's Local Government Society is the only organisation for encouraging women to undertake public service; and there is no body, I believe, which makes propaganda for the development of active citizenship among women of the more leisured classes, that is, which keeps before them the duty and benefit of self-support or economic independence.

The great majority of our English electorate are workers; can we wonder if they are in no hurry to extend the franchise to a class, many of whom are still not unwilling to lead idle and dependent lives?

The useful careers of those numbers of women who are already active and responsible citizens prove sufficiently that it is not incapacity which hinders their sisters from following them, but that lethargy of a nation not quickly hospitable to ideas, and obsessed with material ease. Also, it is much simpler to clamor, or acquiesce in the clamor, for certain rights than to prove that the granting of them is not only just, but expedient, natural, obvious, by the fullest performance of all duties that have any relation to these rights.

The situation is naturally easier to resolve in Finland (and perhaps in all Scandinavia) where women of the leisured classes work for their living like others, as a matter of course, and where marriage does not mean the end of a woman's business or professional career. (Here we tend to regard marriage as a profession in so far as it eliminates others; yet the care of the home and the future race is too often entered upon without training or forethought as a piece of unskilled labor.) But different though circumstances are, it is worth while for the advocates of women's suffrage here to cast a glance at the history of the movement in Finland, and the causes which made its success there a foregone conclusion.

Nearly fifteen years ago, before the great strike and the new Constitution, before the era of active Russian tyranny even, the women of Finland stood, socially and economically, not very far from where they stand now. The vast majority of them in all classes were self-supporting or independent, they had access to many trades and professions, and they were noticeable for the ready fulfilment of all such social and philanthropic tasks as came within their reach, then as now. There was a strong suffrage movement, but the women did not confine themselves to this: they shared in all efforts for the general extension of the franchise and reform of the representative system. Presently the political situation became acute, and, for the seven years and more during which the Constitution was suspended, the women of Finland did yeoman service for their country, making propaganda, educating the people, and risking all dangers in the cause of freedom. They made no bargains with the party of progress, nor did they threaten to withdraw their support because women's suffrage was not one of the foremost items in the programme: they worked quietly and solidly and magnificently for the common cause. Therefore, when the great strike came, when, by a marvellous combination of good luck, swiftness, and daring, Finland won back her liberty, full electoral rights were most frankly and unanimously granted to those who had proved so well that they understood what citizenship meant.

"To get the vote is a small affair," said a woman Member of Parliament to me, "but to learn to use it is something more. We wish, now and then, that our electorate had had a little more time to prepare for the full responsibilities thrust upon it. Ten years, in which we had been free to teach the duties of citizenship in every school and market-place to the new generation, would scarcely have been too much. We envy you, who have ample time and ease, and full access to the people, so that you can make every man and woman feel their responsibility towards the State—if you will. The voter is born, certainly, but the intelligent voter is made. Educate, educate, educate—that is the first and last word of public service."—Yours, &c.,

ROSALIND TRAVERS.

Tortington House, Arundel, Sussex,
September 23rd, 1909.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE AND THE LIBERAL PARTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think many constitutional Suffragists will feel disappointment and indignation at the line that you have seen fit to adopt of late towards the question of women's enfranchisement. This line is so well illustrated by the article in your issue of the 25th that I shall be grateful if you will allow a constitutional Suffragist of some twenty years' standing to explain how, in our view, you and those who hold with you (and they are, we regretfully recognise, not an "honorable minority") are increasing disorder by ignoring all except disorderly work and by misrepresenting the facts of the situation.

Your article begins by asking "the general body of women Suffragists to pause and consider before they give their leaders full authority to pursue the tactics of violence which, &c. . ." Such language is, I say, a most unworthy slight on the general body of women Suffragists who do not need to be adjured to pause and consider before they adopt a policy which they have never advocated, and who resent keenly having foisted upon them "leaders" whom they have never chosen.

That you yourself were awakened to this great question by the action of the W.S.P.U. is apparent by the fact that you actually allude to the agitation for the vote as a "five-year-old agitation." Sir, the society of which I have the honor to be hon. secretary was founded in 1867, and has never ceased work, and it was from that society that Mrs. Pankhurst seceded, sickened by hope deferred. We hold hundreds of meetings in the year, and several of our members have addressed as many as 50,000 people within twelve months. We can pack the largest halls everywhere, and we are only one of some 160 societies within the National Union. But our propaganda is ignored by a Press which, with the honorable exceptions of the "Manchester Guardian" and the "Daily News," is only interested in sensationalism, and by a Government which finds it convenient to class all women Suffragists as "disorderly."

You say that the election of 1906 yielded us a majority of votes in the House. This is a well-known fact, in spite of the constantly repeated statement that the Government had no mandate. Women were so foolish as to suppose that these men would redeem their pledge. If they were, as you say, "careless and unthinking," the fault and the provocation lie with them. Women were neither careless nor unthinking in their righteous claim, and they do right to resent being treated with irresponsible levity. We "trusted" the members: we are still being asked to "trust" them.

As for your statement that these pledges were for some kind of Suffrage Bill "on democratic lines," you will find it difficult to substantiate this. It is impossible to know what is in a man's heart when he makes a promise to a woman, but the terms we asked and to which the "favorable" M.P.'s pledged themselves were the "same terms as men." There was no mention of "democratic lines." * * *

I am afraid of being too long, but I would like to ask you, sir, to consider whether there are not more than the militants who are going on wrong courses "because they do not know how to draw back." The militants, having committed themselves to the fatal policy of letting wrong breed wrong, will probably not recede. But is this a policy that you—a great Liberal journal—that a Government, responsible to the nation (a nation of women as well as men) can pursue? Is it a policy at all? Are you seriously going to maintain that a Prime Minister should, in your own words, allow himself to be "frightened, harassed, bored, and exasperated" by "wild girls excited by a vehement propaganda" organised by a small and absolutely autocratic body, with large sums of money at its disposal, to the pitch of utterly ignoring the enormous body of sane, hard-working, honest women who desire their enfranchisement and who, by every lawful means in their power, are endeavoring to make their claim heard through the hubbub which the Press is making about the militants?

You say our friends can "only leave it to women to put themselves right with the world." What have we—all the millions of women outside the W.S.P.U.—done to put ourselves wrong? What monstrous pre-judgment is this? If you refuse to help us in this great struggle for freedom, you will have ranged yourselves with those forces of reaction, which are the strongest of the forces of disorder. Men have the power, the vote, the Press, the position, the money, the law, and the judges—all, all is theirs—and you propose that they should leave us to fight alone our bitter battle to its bitter end. O! for a Liberal once more—a real one!—Yours, &c.,

H. M. SWANWICK,

Hon. Sec. North of England Society for Women's Suffrage.
85, Deansgate Arcade, Manchester.
September 25th, 1909.

[We had thought that the main purport of our article was open to no misconception. We are well aware of the long decades of laborious spade-work done by the older Women's Suffrage societies, and of the large following which the less sensational methods have attained. The object of our article was to appeal to this orderly organisation of suffragists to bring their fullest influence to bear upon the militants so as to prevent the wreckage of their cause. It may be that they have no such influence as we suggest, or that they have already fully employed it and failed, but in any such event we cannot understand why our well-meant appeal to them should arouse such bitter expostulations. As to the other point in Mrs. Swanwick's letter, she completely misrepresents what we said and meant. We did not say that the Government or the Prime Minister "should" allow themselves to be so exasperated by militant methods as to ignore the justice of the issue or the reasonable claims of the main body of suffragists. We merely registered our judgment upon the question of the practical efficacy of these frantic tactics, maintaining that in point of fact such methods would generate an obstinate refusal in the general body of Liberals or Tories. We do not approve this effect; on the contrary, we deplore it, but we recognise it as belonging to human nature in politics.—ED., NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Like yourself, I am always opposed to the use of violence, until there is no chance for freedom left except rebellion against tyranny.

But before you condemn the violence of women who are demanding the political rights usual in this country, you might remember the extreme provocation under which they have acted. Two generations of women tried the most reasonable and conciliatory means; they made little progress, and in 1894 and the following years their cause was distinctly set back. Members of the present movement began by asking perfectly fair and reasonable questions—often in writing; but their questions remained unread or unanswered, and if they repeated them, they were flung out of the meeting. Since then they have been exposed to every kind of individual and organised outrage at the hands of Liberal stewards and mobs. I need not repeat what shame, violence, and bodily injury they have suffered, and yet hardly a man among their most savage assailants has been arrested by the police or sentenced by a magistrate. If, as you insist, they are to be condemned for the violence of the last two or three weeks, let us have some condemnation of the violence on the other side as well. It has run for two or three years.

You say that the election of 1906 yielded a majority of votes—"for the most part a careless and unthinking majority"—for some kind of a Suffrage Bill, and you ask where is that majority now? I do not suppose the suffragists care very much where a careless and unthinking majority is, but I imagine that the members of it joined the other gentlemen of the House of Commons in the laughter which greeted Mr. Masterman's description of the compulsory feeding of suffragists in gaol, and was renewed at Mr. Keir Hardie's protest against that horrible outrage.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

4, Downside Crescent, Hampstead, N.W.

September 30th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you, of your courtesy, allow me to point out that when you call the woman suffrage movement "a five-year-old agitation for securing the Parliamentary vote to some women," you are concisely stating the case for militant action? For upwards of forty years women, whose very names were a guarantee of what you call a "capacity to act with discretion in public life," I mean such women as Mrs. Fawcett, Mrs. Wolstenholme Elmy, Miss Emily Davies, and many others, carried on just such a peaceable, reasonable, seemly agitation for the enfranchisement of women as you now call upon the militant suffragists to adopt in place of their more forcible tactics. But of all this half-a-century of work, not a word in your article of this week's issue! And if this eminently praiseworthy campaign of last century had not been reinforced by the five-year-old agitation that you deplore, it is safe to say that there would not have been a word of any kind about woman suffrage in your paper to-day.

Further, if it is true, as you say, that the members who pledged themselves in favor of woman suffrage at the last General Election constituted a "careless and unthinking majority," then you bring a serious charge against a body of gentlemen, the majority of them Liberal gentlemen, who under the existing constitution of this country are supposed to have in their honorable keeping the care of the women's interests. If their alleged support of our movement was as false as you infer it to have been, then your indictment of it presents us with another argument for the woman's vote, since these gentlemen evidently regard promisers made to voteless women as of no account—and with another argument for militant tactics, since any movement that has turned such support into open hostility should deserve the thanks of every genuine woman suffragist in the country.

May I further trespass upon your valuable space in order to point out that the primary object of the Women's Social and Political Union is not to prove the capacity of women for the vote. We consider that this has been sufficiently proved by the work women have done in the last half-century. We are fighting now for the final recognition of that capacity and that work. The Parliamentary vote is conferred upon men, not as a reward for good conduct, but as a constitutional right dependent upon certain definite qualifications. We demand it for the women who possess those qualifications.—Yours, &c.,

EVELYN SHARP.

15, Mount Carmel Chambers,
Duke's Lane, Kensington, W.
September 29th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on "Tactics of Violence" appeals to "the general body of women suffragists" to procure a cessation of these tactics. May I point out that by speaking of the leaders of the Women's Social and Political Union as if they were the only leaders of the whole body of suffragists, and by referring to the suffragist movement as "this five-year-old agitation," you bring home to peaceful, law-abiding suffragists like myself the futility of those womanly, educational, constitutional methods which alone are sanctioned by politicians. After long years of patient labor, we find ourselves apparently counting for nothing in practical politics!

Both before and during the present campaign of violence, the Prime Minister has steadily refused to see any deputation of women suffragists, even of influential women whose record of work for his own party might at least have secured them a hearing.

Many women sincerely regret such happenings as those at Birmingham, but many also regret much more that tactics of violence should be able to claim any vestige of justification from the attitude to all women suffragists alike of a Liberal Government; and that, with a General Election at hand, women have no evidence whatever that the Government programme will contain the adoption, as a Liberal measure, of the great democratic principle of full citizen rights for women.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) EMILY ASHTON.

Brighton, September 28th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is one reason why the constitutional Suffragists do not vigorously denounce the methods of the militants. To speak fairly on the subject, it would be necessary to denounce with equal vigor the methods of the Government; and the constitutional party do not wish to increase the bitterness of recrimination. It is far more important to ask, What is to be done now? The methods of the Government have led, as it was foretold they would lead, to an outbreak of fanaticism, hideous and ludicrous, as well as heroic and devoted. How is it to be cured? To those who believe in the justice of the demand, there can only be one answer. Strike at the root of the trouble: concede the just demand. Liberals seem afraid to do this, because of the bad moral effect that might be produced by the appearance of yielding to clamor and violence. But they forget that if the demand must be granted in the end, the later the yielding, the greater the clamor, the fiercer the violence, and the worse the moral effect. This is a point of the utmost importance. The Government are blind to it: it is for their tried supporters, it is for a paper such as THE NATION to open their eyes, to rouse the "will" in those "statesmen" who have "the power," and not to suffer them to "go on—as men and women go on in wrong courses—because they do not know how to draw back" (THE NATION, September 25th.).—Yours, &c.,

F. MELIAN STOWELL.

44, Westbourne Park Villas, W.
September 28th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his letter Mr. Brailsford raises a point which needs to be emphasised. He reminds us that "Liberals cannot make the violence of some 'militant' methods an excuse for inaction." To that statement I would draw the attention of all those some-time supporters of the suffragists who have been turned aside by the new tactics.

The reminder is timely and most necessary, for the latest developments are calculated to inspire nothing but despairing disgust. The women are making it very hard for men to support them by their absurd attempts to throw all responsibility on to the Government as well as by their tactics. In fact their methods of verbal warfare seem to indicate that many women will, when once possessed of the vote, become unscrupulous jugglers with words to an extent that will put even the Yellow Press to shame. Speaking personally, I know of nothing calculated to raise in the mind so many doubts and questionings on the whole question of the suffrage as a careful study of that wild periodical, "Votes for Women."

It is our business, as Liberals, to rise above all this, and if we once believed, to believe still, in the face of the difficulties erected by the hysteria of a few. The change of opinion which you mention is not creditable to Liberals or to Liberalism, and one can only hope that those who have wavered or gone over to the other side will very speedily see their mistake and return, though the entire Pankhurst family are there to bar the way. If you would get Mr. H. W. Nevinston to write us another "Essay in Freedom" on the subject there might be some light in the dark places of many muddled minds.

And in the meantime, may I offer a possible solution of the difficulty to which Mr. Brailsford refers? Let the Government determine to make the establishing of the Referendum one of the first tasks of the next Parliament, and let it be announced that the question of the suffrage will be the first matter for which the Referendum when established will be used. The agitators would then realise that it was time to set to work to convert the mass of the voters to their cause, and to cease making hard the way of those who are already converted.—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD LAKE.

Manchester, September 26th, 1909.

DANTE'S SYSTEM OF MORALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems that I have misunderstood the drift of a good deal of Mr. Reade's book and have done him incidental injustice, which I heartily regret. But the position I thought I had "demolished" was the position (which I took to be maintained in reference to Dante, though laid down with reference to Aristotle) that "injurious" sins must necessarily be committed "ex odio," and that in such cases the sinner "wills the crime because he knows that it will damage his neighbor"—the words are Mr. Reade's, but the italics are mine. It appears to me that in his letter Mr. Reade rather retreats from this position than defends it. My point was not that Jason was "intemperatus ex malitia," but that he was not "injuriosus ex odio."

As to Dante's malizia and Aristotle's kakia I must apologise. I wrote carelessly. What I ought to have said was that in my opinion the use of malizia both in line 22 and in line 82 of the eleventh Canto of the "Inferno" is to be explained (as I have attempted to show at length elsewhere) by reference to the Latin translations and mistranslations of Aristotle, Eth. Nic. VII., 1, &c., where kakia, for which it stands, is taken in a larger sense to include θηριότης, as well as in a narrower sense to contrast with it. Mr. Reade, on the other hand, interprets the word by the results of an elaborate examination of the technical language of Aquinas. This was all I meant to say.—Yours, &c.,

P. H. W.

September 28th, 1909

"THE RELIGIOUS POLICY OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I call the attention of your readers to a very important work: "The Religious Policy of the French Republic," by André Mater, which has recently appeared in France, and has been translated into English and published by Fisher Unwin. I was astonished not to see it in your interesting list of "Books to be Read." The real importance of the book lies in its semi-official character; it has been published by a Committee which includes the most distinguished professors of the Sorbonne and the Collège de France, men like D. Berthelot, E. Bourgeois, F. Buisson, L. Havet, G. Lanson, G. Leailles, G. Seignobos, &c., and writers like Anatole France and Octave Mirbeau. The aim of the committee is to defend abroad the religious policy of the French Republic. The book has been published in five languages simultaneously, French, English, German, Italian, Spanish. The review "Foi et Vie" calls it "the nearly official reply of Radical France to Reactionary France," and "the confession of new France."

M. André Mater's book is the work of a first-rate jurist, and it gives us quite impartially the history of the relations between Church and State in France since 1870. The book is crammed with facts, and shows us very minutely how it is that the Church is mainly responsible for the present state of affairs in France. By perpetually fighting for the past, for reactionary Absolutism against the Republic and the principles of 1789, she has alienated the majority of progressive Frenchmen from religion. Thanks to the Church, religion now only means to thousands of Frenchmen a reactionary attitude in politics. The fight against the Church has been for the Republic a question of life or death. "The anti-clericalism," says M. Mater, "which so many Englishmen judge intolerable, vulgar, and disproportionate, has no other cause than these clerical interventions in politics."

But the "Religious Policy of the French Republic" is not only remarkable as an exact history of the last thirty-five years in France. Its real significance lies in the distinction it makes between Roman Catholicism and religion (a distinction which the majority of Frenchmen do not make). M. André Mater declares very clearly that the anti-clerical movement has nothing to do with Atheism. The leaders of Anti-Clericalism, says he, "are afraid of Roman Catholicism, not because it is too Christian, but because it is not Christian enough, much too saturated with Pharisaism, with the vices begotten by the worship of riches and the love of power, and with the other blemishes that Jesus did not wish to sanctify like his so-called successors, but extirpate like so-called heretics and so-called demagogues, who were at most good Christians."

Further on he says, "France does not merit any more than any other nation the reproach of Atheism, but she wishes to pursue freely the divine ideal which Christianity, restored to youth by revolutions and religious, political, and social interpretations, has developed among civilised nations. Our anti-clericals and democrats, when they determine our country to repudiate all alliance with Rome, do not undertake an Atheistic (viz., materialist) work, but follow the need of idealism that has always animated the French, the tradition that has conferred on La France the title of 'Chaplain of Europe.'"

M. Mater even goes further. He acknowledges that what France suffers from is the defeat of the Reformation. "Comment la France souffre d'une réforme rentrée" is the title of one of his chapters.

No semi-official book has ever been so clear, so precise. It is perhaps the first time that such a confession is uttered by Radical France. No country can live long without a religion—above all, a democracy, where religion alone can give to each citizen a high sense of public duty, and give him the moral strength to work for the Commonwealth. Are the leaders of French anti-clericalism beginning to realise it?—Yours, &c.,

ANDRÉ DE BAVIER.

Chateau de Dully, Vaud, Switzerland,
September 21st, 1909.

[We are quite aware of M. Mater's exceptional qualifications for the work he has undertaken.—ED., NATION.]

PROFESSIONAL CONSUMERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is many years since Clough wrote the lines—

"I have seen it observed by a writer of sense,
That the labouring classes could scarce live a day
If people like us didn't eat, drink, and pay;
So useful it is to have money, heigh ho!
So useful it is to have money."

Yet there is still a tendency to value very highly the services rendered to the community by professional consumers. Much genuine alarm appears to arise in the minds of some of our friends lest the spending-power of the rich should be diminished by taxation. They fear that this event, should it occur, would react unfavorably upon the trade of the country and consequently upon employment. Now this evil result could only be reached in two ways. Either the total demand must be decreased, or some part of the demand must be transferred from commodities which we can profitably produce to commodities which, for some reason, we cannot produce so profitably. Neither of these evils seems likely to result from the taxation of professional consumers. First, as the money collected by the State is not retained by the State, but is distributed by it among its employees and dependents, who spend it upon their necessities and luxuries, there can be no decrease in the total demand for commodities. Second, as the recipients of public funds are less wealthy than the classes upon whom the new taxes are to be levied, it is unlikely that the demand will be transferred to commodities which are less profitable to produce.

The first of these statements is self-evident; the second requires closer examination. In order to give stability to trade and employment, it is most desirable that demand should be inelastic—that is to say, that it should not be subject to violent fluctuations. This constant demand should, of course, be for something produced in this country or easily obtainable from a foreign country by a process of exchange.

The demand, for instance, for Russian wheat is one which may stimulate our manufactures of agricultural machinery almost as much as a direct demand for the latter materials; while, on the other hand, a demand for Neapolitan villas will not benefit British trade at all.

If these premises are admitted, then it follows that to transfer spending power from rich professional consumers to poor old age pensioners is to stimulate trade by transforming a violently fluctuating demand for luxuries into a constant demand for necessities or conventional necessities. Much of the temporary unemployment and distress is due to the uncertainty of the demand for luxuries, the changes of fashion, and of seasonal amusements. The same man cannot be employed upon yacht-building and motor construction, yet the demand of the wealthy may at any moment be transferred from the one to the other.

The demand for necessities, on the other hand, is so constant that even a considerable rise in prices is often unaccompanied by a decrease in demand.

May we not, then, have good hope that taxation tending to diminish inequalities in the distribution of wealth will also tend towards the greater stability of employment?—Yours, &c.,

HAROLD WRIGHT.

Fairmead, Sutton, Surrey,
September 28th, 1909.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of the 18th inst. Mr. Joseph A. Leckie points out that an appeal to the country on the refusal of the Lords to pass the Budget could in no event assist the Liberal Party. If they were successful a long session would be required to pass the Finance Bill again through the House, and then probably the House of Lords would pass it or they might reject it again.

Mr. Leckie suggests that, instead of taking this course, the House of Commons should pass a resolution calling on the King to allow the Government to swamp the House of Lords.

It is, I think, quite clear that either the House of Lords must be destroyed as a legislative body or the Liberal Party must go under. A mere resolution of the House of Commons would not, however, be sufficient. There must be a General Election on that issue. The House of Lords can only be destroyed by a House of Commons who have a mandate from the people to that effect.

Is it not clear, then, that what we should have is a General Election on the issue of the House of Lords, not on the Budget? In my view, the Premier should announce before the election that, in case of the success of the Liberals, his Government would not remain in office unless the King gave them power to swamp the Lords. At such an election the Budget would be, after all, the main issue, as its rejection would be the immediate casus belli against the Lords. The result of success on such an issue would be the end of the Lords. If his Majesty was not prepared to sacrifice the Lords, he would have no alternative but to call on the Leader of the Conservatives. Mr. Balfour could not carry on the Government without a majority in the Commons, and if he asked for and was granted another dissolution, the verdict would undoubtedly be more emphatic against the Lords, and, if so, would include a condemnation of the action of the King.

Should the appeal of Mr. Asquith to the people against the Lords result in defeat, it would be much better for the Liberal Party that they should be out of power and in fighting trim rather than in power but prevented by the Lords from placing reform legislation upon the Statute Book.

There may be many in the ranks of the Liberal Party who are not in favor of a single chamber. The destruction of the Lords would not in any way decide that question. No Liberal would, I assume, wish to have a second chamber such as the Lords would agree to. It is, therefore, necessary first to get rid of that body and then the House of Commons could provide for a representative second chamber.

I think those in touch with London electors will agree that, while they strongly support the Budget, their real interest at the present time lies in the prospect of getting into close quarters with the hereditary legislators. An opportunity such as is now presented may not arise again for fifty years, and it would be unpardonable for the Liberal Party to fail to take advantage of it.

Several members of the Government have recently stated that a General Election would probably have a bad effect on the House of Lords, and, doubtless, this will be the case, no matter how the fight is made. It is not enough to be satisfied with discrediting the Lords, we must destroy them, and destroy them now.

All the above arguments would apply just as strongly in favor of a General Election to be brought on by the Government in the event of the Lords, through dire fear of the consequences, passing the Finance Bill.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH MARTIN,

Prospective Liberal Candidate for East St. Pancras.
September 23rd, 1909.

Poetry.

NORA CRIONA.

I've looked him round, and looked him through,
Know everything that he will do
In such a case, and such a case:
And when a frown comes on his face
I docket it, and when a smile,
I trace its sources in a while.

He cannot do a thing but I
Peep and find the reason why.
For I love him, and I seek
Every evening in the week
To peep behind his frowning eye
With little query, little pry,
And make him, if a woman can,
Happier than any man.

. . . Yesterday he gripped her tight,
And cut her throat—and serve her right.

JAMES STEPHENS.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. WALTER SICHEL'S "Life of Sheridan," already announced in these columns, is now almost ready for issue by Messrs. Constable. It contains an unusual proportion of hitherto unpublished material including a diary kept by Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, during the years 1788 and 1789. This establishes the fact that the Prince of Wales's famous "Letter to Mr. Pitt" was not composed by Burke, as has been long believed, but by Sheridan. There are also several letters by Sheridan's sister, Elizabeth, and a long correspondence written by Sheridan to the Duchess of Devonshire and to Lady Bessborough. Two of his poems will be printed for the first time, and there will be a full bibliography of his works, both published and unpublished. Altogether the biography promises to be a most valuable contribution to our knowledge of Sheridan's life both on its literary and political sides.

* * *

SOME interesting side-lights upon the English and Scottish history of the eighteenth century are promised in a book which the Duke of Argyll has compiled out of documents and letters in possession of his family. Among the contents are letters written by the Duke of Argyll during the years 1703-1706, treating of the negotiations for the Union, while there are also letters from the Duchess of Brunswick, George III.'s eldest sister; Dr. Moore, the author of "Zeluco," and father of the famous general; Lady Derby; Madame de Staël; and Andrew Stewart, the chief agent on the Duke of Hamilton's side in the Douglas Cause. The title of the book is "Intimate Society Letters of the Eighteenth Century," and it will be issued by Messrs. Stanley Paul.

* * *

A VOLUME of reminiscences by Lady Wake, the sister of Archbishop Tait, is announced by Messrs. Blackwood. The writer at first intended the "Reminiscences" to be merely a record of her brother's early life, but eventually they took a larger scope. Lady Wake lived in four reigns and witnessed the jubilee celebrations of two sovereigns, and as she never lost her interest in affairs, both public and private, the coming volume is sure to be rich in characteristic anecdotes. It deals at some length with Edinburgh society at the beginning of the nineteenth century, as well as with Paris in the time of the Revolution of 1830. Lady Wake's recollections of the latter event are said to be particularly vivid.

* * *

MR. EDWARD THOMAS, whose book on "The South Country" was announced in these columns a couple of weeks ago, has also finished a volume of short stories which, under the title of "Rest and Unrest," will be published by Messrs. Duckworth. Mr. Thomas has not appeared before as a writer of fiction, but his qualities of style and observation augur success in this new departure.

* * *

RECENT history does not occupy the place in English historical study that it has won in France and Germany, but within the last few years two or three writers, notably Dr. Holland Rose, have done something to secure more serious attention for the subject. A book, "The New Europe, 1798-1889," by Mr. Reginald W. Jeffery, announced by Messrs. Constable, is likely to prove a useful contribution to the study of contemporary history. A feature of the work is the attention given to foreign statesmen, soldiers, and thinkers, who, as far as possible, are dealt with in separate biographical notes. There are also several diagrams intended to provide visual illustrations of such matters as the effects of the French Revolution in England, the rise and fall of Liberalism in Spain, the growth of United Italy, and the Eastern question. Mr. Jeffery has had the advice of Professor H. A. L. Fisher, Mr. C. T. Atkinson, Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, and other historical students in the preparation of his work.

* * *

THE fascination of the French Court seems to have taken firm hold of the popular mind in this country, if we are to judge from the seemingly endless flow of books which relate the histories of its leading personages. Among the books of this class promised for the present season is "The Dauphines of France," by the writer who calls herself "Frank Hamel." Her subject has some claims to freshness, for although some of the Dauphines, such as Mary Stuart and Marie Antoinette, have been written about from almost every conceivable point of view, the long line which began with Jeanne de Bourbon and ended with Madame Royale, includes many whose careers, though not without their romance, are yet unfamiliar to most English readers.

* * *

A CALENDAR and description of "Tudor and Stuart Proclamations, 1485-1874," has just been completed by Mr. Robert Steele, and will be issued by the Clarendon Press. The work, which has been one of immense labor and research, will be indispensable to future students of the records of the period.

* * *

A TRANSLATION from the Russian of Andreev's plays, "The Life of Man" and "Anathema," is to be made by Mr. Hermann Bernstein, who has already introduced some of Andreev's stories and essays to English readers. "Anathema" is to be produced in Moscow this month.

* * *

THE two most important travel books of the season will be Lieutenant Shackleton's "The Heart of the Antarctic," which Mr. Heinemann will have ready by November, and Dr. Sven Hedin's "Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet," a book giving a description of that explorer's adventurous journey during 1906, 1907, and 1908. It is to be issued through Messrs. Macmillan who have also in the press, "In the Grip of the Nyika: Further Adventures in British East Africa," by Colonel J. H. Patterson. Colonel Patterson's former volume, "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo," is by far the best book of adventures published during recent years.

* * *

"THE SMUGGLERS: PICTURESQUE CHAPTERS IN THE HISTORY OF AN ANCIENT INDUSTRY" is the engaging title of a book by Mr. Charles Harper which appears on Messrs. Chapman & Hall's list. Much has been written about the doings of these "free-traders," but little in the way of critical investigation into their doings has been accomplished. Mr. Harper's work rejects all that is merely legendary, but it is satisfactory to learn that the authentic residue which he presents "is at least as picturesque as the unauthentic yarns."

* * *

THIS year "The Odd Volume," which will appear towards the middle of next month, takes a new departure. The editor, Mr. John G. Wilson, has been successful in his attempt to print nothing that had been previously published, and as the contributors number Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. Hilaire Belloc, Mr. Owen Seaman, Mr. Francis Grierson, Mr. Henry Newbolt, Mr. Neil Munro, Mr. H. G. Wells, and a crowd of others, the National Book Trade Provident Society is likely to profit from its sale.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum (1515-1517)." The Latin text with an English rendering, by F. G. Stokes. (Chatto & Windus. 25s. net.)

"The French Procession." By Madame Mary Duclaux. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Reminiscences of Carl Schurz." (Murray. 3 vols. 36s. net.)

"Mr. Pope: His Life and Times." By George Paston. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"Francesco Petrarca, Poet and Humanist." By Maud F. Jerrold. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Montaigne and Shakespeare." By John M. Robertson. (Enlarged edition. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral." By the Ven. W. M. Sinclair. (Chapman & Hall. 16s. net.)

"Madame de Maintenon: Her Life and Times." By C. C. Dawson. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Darwinism and Modern Socialism." By F. W. Headley. (Methuen. 5s. net.)

"Ann Veronica: A Modern Love Story." By H. G. Wells. (Unwin. 6s.)

"Penguin Island." By Anatole France. (Lane. 6s.)

"Mémoires du Général Griois (1792-1822)." Avec Introduction et Notes par Arthur Chuquet. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. Tome Second. 7fr. 50.)

"Jadis et Aujourd'hui." Deuxième Série. Par Frédéric Masson. (Paris: Ollendorff. 3fr. 50.)

"Souffrir." Roman. Par J. Marni. (Paris: Juven. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

GARIBALDI AND THE THOUSAND.*

IN this volume Mr. Trevelyan tells the second part of the great and simple epic of the nineteenth century. He begins with Garibaldi the wanderer, the candlemaker, the sailor, nursing in all the privations of his desperate exile his one indissoluble dream; he ends with Garibaldi who has carried through "the loud length of storm" the charmed life of Italy's hope, the lord and master of Sicily's citadel. Of the manner in which Mr. Trevelyan has accomplished his task, we can only say that it will bear comparison with his earlier achievement. The book is a masterpiece of construction and exposition of narrative. It is written with the native dignity of Mr. Trevelyan's vivid style. The skein of events, often tangled and difficult, is unravelled with a skill that belongs only to the great masters of his art. His treatment of men in a drama where it is not easy always to be just to the claims and temptations of individuals is conspicuously fair and judicial. Dr. Johnson once replied when irritated by the extravagant compliments of an admirer: "Sir, be careful before you lavish your praise on me; remember how much it is worth." Mr. Trevelyan's admiration for his hero is of the quality that forbids any element of exaggeration; his style never loses its head; his enthusiasm, deep and ardent, is always under control; and he is too sincere and magnanimous to wish to add a touch to the great Garibaldi's romance by depriving a rival of his share in the credit. If Garibaldi is the centre of the book, the volume is a profoundly interesting study of the minds and characters of the other great men to whom Italy owes her existence.

The new volume takes up the tale of Garibaldi's life where the last volume had laid it down. The first years after the great retreat were spent in various adventures in Tangiers and America. For a time Garibaldi made his living as a candlemaker, but a happier fortune brought him back to his beloved sea, and he made two voyages in command of a sailing ship. It was in one of these voyages that he put into an island whose lonely loveliness haunted his memory and inspired him later to make his home in the solitude of Caprera. It was in another that he arrived in Newcastle and received a sword of honor from the working men of Tyneside. But in the spring of 1854 his exile, saddened by the death of his mother and the bitter echoes of the extinguished revolt of Milan, came to an end, and he returned to live first at Nice, and then in Caprera. This solitary island, off the rocky coast of Sardinia, which he shared with a strange Englishman and the descendants of a bandit of the Marlborough Wars, was an ideal home for him, near enough to nature for him to nurse his great spirit in dignity and seclusion; near enough to Italy for his sword to flash once more in the face of the tyrants as soon as his country was ready. That hour was fast approaching.

The key to the new developments of Italian politics is to be found in the alliance of Garibaldi, Cavour, and Victor Emmanuel. This strange combination produced combinations still stranger, for it led to the campaign in which Garibaldi and Napoleon the Third fought on the same side. On the constructive side this alliance was the work of Cavour, who brought Piedmont into partnership with the democrats on one side in 1856, with Napoleon on the other two years later. The democrats had been prompted to this wise policy of renunciation and concentration by Manin, who lived just long enough to give his splendid name to the new society, "The Italian National Society," which focussed these forces. Garibaldi's own decision, "the most important and the best political action of his long career," was, of course, the capital fact in this development. "When the world knew that the defender of the Roman Republic had, at the instigation of the defender of the Venetian Republic, accepted the principle of monarchy, all chance of further disruption in the Liberal ranks was removed, and the Italian patriots, with a few important exceptions, were united under one flag." The Republicans and Piedmont joined forces to make Victor Emmanuel King of Italy and Sicily. It was a daring conspiracy in any case, and it was made the more difficult because the conspirators had to retain the confidence of Napoleon, their instrument for the expulsion of Austria in the North. Napoleon, whose Italian memories and sentimental ambitions defended his imagination from the Clericals and reactionaries who surrounded him, would still have been horrified as a Frenchman and a Catholic at the prospect of a unified Italy and a humbled Pope. At one moment it looked as if the whole design had been shattered by Orsini's bomb. When Cavour, already hard pressed between Napoleon's clamor for severity to political exiles and the demands of the democrats for liberal administration, heard of the work of that January evening in 1858, he wrung his hands, exclaiming: "If only this is not the work of Italians." When he learnt the truth, the great scheme which he had contrived with such ingenious and elaborate care seemed doomed to ruin. But by a strange turn of fortune this very catastrophe proved a blessing. The letter which Victor Emmanuel wrote to Napoleon "refusing to use violence in his kingdom," struck a chord of generous sympathy in the heart of that impressionable child of fancies and fears, and Napoleon, instead of stepping back, at last decided to step forward.

War was declared in April, 1859, and the brief campaign that followed ended abruptly, as all the world knows, with the peace of Villafranca. In that war it was the regular armies that played the decisive part, but Garibaldi's own campaign in the wooded mountains round Varese and Como was highly interesting and important. Garibaldi surrendered his red shirt to invade Lombardy as the ally of Napoleon. Cavour displayed an equally wise consideration in the spirit in which he organised the Garibaldian regiments. He designed that they should represent the national spirit and interest in the war begun by Piedmont and France, and he allowed Garibaldi to choose his own officers. The campaign showed that the Garibaldians were a match for the best Austrian soldiers, and it enabled Garibaldi to train the small force with which he was to enter on the second part of the national programme in the following year.

Mr. Trevelyan argues that Napoleon cannot be justly blamed for making peace after Solferino. His position, with Prussia ready to spring across the Rhine, and Russia growing more and more unfriendly on account of the revolutionary look of the proceedings in Tuscany and Romagna, was one of great and real danger. But the peace in which he found his escape from this peril provided for the restoration of the old Ducal and Papal despotisms in Tuscany, Modena, and the Romagna. Well might Cavour think that his great policy was blasted, and Garibaldi curse the French alliance and this infamous treaty. But Cavour's despair was for the moment only. He determined that the treaty should never be executed, and in two sentences he foretold the future. "England has done nothing yet for Italy; it is her turn now," and "I shall take Naples in hand." Those words describe the history of the next few months. Tuscany, Modena, and Romagna did not receive back their rulers; the grim restorations of 1815 were not repeated. For England's turn had come, and it was nobly taken. The General Election of May, 1859, had displaced the pro-Austrian Tories and returned the Triumvirate, Palmerston, John Russell, and Gladstone, who braved the displeasure of the Queen and Court, reversed the policy of England, and boldly gave the countenance and shelter of the British name to the resistance of the Italian peoples. It was a fortunate hour for the fame of England: it was a fortunate hour for Italy, who was thereby enabled to keep the Powers of Europe at bay and the petty rulers out of their kingdoms until Cavour, seizing his next opportunity, could buy Napoleon's consent to the annexation of Tuscany, Modena, and Romagna.

One part of the great programme was now completed, though completed at a heavy sacrifice. The more difficult part remained. How were the dominions of the Bourbons to be made part of Italy? Help from outside was essential if the Neapolitan armies were to be defeated: that had been proved by the brave, but vain, rebellions in Sicily. But if Cavour sent the armies of Piedmont to drive out the

* "Garibaldi and the Thousand." By G. M. Trevelyan, author of "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic." Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.

Bourbons, Europe would intervene. There was therefore only one way of helping the Sicilian Revolution, and that was by irregular bands, and the only man in Italy who could lead such forces with any hope of success against the large and well equipped army of King Ferdinand was at the moment in Turin, having come to denounce the statesman and the treaty that had made Nice French and Garibaldi an alien. To this Garibaldi, angry, bitter, and bereaved, comes the news of the Sicilian rising, with its message of duty and glory, and, perhaps, the greatest chapter in his life begins. Garibaldi was not eager for any more escapades: he knew that the hour for demonstrations had gone by, and he was resolved not to attempt this great adventure unless the state of Sicily justified the hope of success. For some time the news trembled in the balance, and the preparations were suspended; but at last Crispi contrived to put before Garibaldi evidence, acquired or manufactured, that the rising had not been finally extinguished, and on the 30th of April, the anniversary of one of his victories, Garibaldi decided to go. Genoa was humming as the Peiræus had hummed two thousand years earlier with the busy haste of an expedition to Sicily. But the expedition that was launched by stealth at midnight in the name of freedom, was very different from the expedition that had been launched in the noonday with the pomp and ritual of religion and ceremony, in the name of conquest. It was but two ships and a thousand men that Garibaldi took out of harbor on that night in May, while all Europe, except England, was storming at Piedmont, and Cavour and Victor Emmanuel were discussing for the last time, at a hurried meeting at Bologna, whether they should let Garibaldi go.

The rest of Mr. Trevelyan's book describes the wonders of that descent and invasion, in which every step from the disembarking at Marsala on May the 11th to the final capitulation of Palermo on June the 6th, seems a miracle. Before Garibaldi landed there were some 24,000 Neapolitan troops in Sicily. His men were armed with old and indifferent muskets. The expedition all but destroyed itself in a collision between the two ships when approaching the coast of Sicily, and there was one moment in the fighting on the Pianto dei Romani when even the redoubtable Bixio himself, Garibaldi's second in command, feared that retreat was inevitable. "Here we make Italy or die," was Garibaldi's answer. It was no mere phrase, for Garibaldi knew well from the temper of Europe and the difficulties of Piedmont beset by the vigilant unfriendliness of Prussia, Austria, Russia, and the suspicions of France, that defeat at that moment meant death to the entire scheme. The story told by Mr. Trevelyan with superb skill, of the genius and daring by which Garibaldi overcame and eluded his enemies, threading his way at last into Palermo itself, recalls the earlier chapter of the wonderful retreat from Rome. Now as then, he owed much to the infatuations and the incompetence of the enemy. The traveller standing on the hill of Citeria is still unable to understand how Garibaldi escaped from the Austrian net in the summer days of 1849. In Sicily history repeated itself, and the final capitulation of Palermo was perhaps as pusillanimous an exhibition as tyranny can boast.

Fortunately, as Mr. Trevelyan observes, some natural law in the Bourbon armies had ordained that each rank should be more incompetent than the rank below it. Fortunately, too, the Swiss Government, ashamed at last that troops bearing the cantonal crests should be the Praetorian guard of the worst tyrannies of Europe, had requested that these insignia should be removed from the banners of the Swiss mercenaries. This had led to a mutiny and the final dissolution in 1859 of the best regiments in the Bourbon service. There is one great difference between this and the earlier history, for in Sicily the Church was on the side of Garibaldi.

There are very many points of interest on which we have not been able to touch in our account of this volume. What exactly was Cavour's part in the sending of Garibaldi? What were Napoleon's motives at any stage or time? Would Italy have been freed at all, if she had not been freed in 1860? We have merely given an outline of a fascinating story, a story that will not be read by any Liberal without emotion, and by any Englishman without pride. For England, almost alone among the nations of Europe, need not fear the fierce light of this flash of freedom.

RELIGION IN ITALY.*

THIS is a singularly well-informed inquiry into contemporary religious tendencies in Italy. These tendencies are not identical with Modernism, but they are closely allied to it; and Professor Labanca is perhaps the first living authority on them; his book, "Il Papato," is a classic in the Italian schools. To certain observers the policy of the Vatican towards the liberalising Catholics seems to have been crowned with signal success. Their leaders have been discredited or silenced. No one could now quote M. Loisy or the late Fr. Tyrrell as in any sense representing a Catholic standpoint; and the lesser lights burn low. Pius X., it is said, is more than the peasant priest we took him for. Deposuit potentes de sede; he has scored a new and momentous victory for Rome. Plausible as this view is, it is, we are convinced, fallacious. The victory of Rome, in so far as it exists, is a Pyrrhic victory: it has been won at the expense of that by which Rome lives. Nothing has taken place which could not have been foreseen by those who knew the situation. Had the policy of Leo XIII. been continued—who can tell? "I discouraged rather than condemned the liberal movements within the Church," he says in Mr. Manning's brilliant "Scenes and Portraits": "my policy was one of insinuation. I can conceive a moderately successful issue to it if my successor should be a man of tact." The condition was not verified. And, given the action of the present Pope, suppose the modernists driven to choose between the Church and Modernism, it did not require a prophet to foresee the result. Reasons for compromise are never wanting: in this case material and moral motives combined to counsel temporising. The "Hohenlohe Memoirs" offer a striking and very plausible example of this attitude. A formula might be interpreted or become obsolete; separation was irrevocable. Mr. Jordan scarcely appreciates the full force of such motives as these in his criticism on the anonymity of certain modernist writers. This anonymity is, as a rule, nominal, and to discard it means to break actively or passively—the position is the same in either case—with the Church. Such a break may be a logical, or even a moral, necessity. But this, ex hypothesi, is not the modernist view.

It is not the case, it is not even claimed to be the case, that the memorable Pontifical acts of 1907 have brought about a revival of orthodoxy. That they have driven a certain number of priests into theological apathy, and forced serious students, lay and clerical, to seek the satisfaction of their higher aspirations outside Catholicism, often outside Christianity, is true; and this is why the victory of Rome is Pyrrhic; for it is only in so far as Rome is Catholic and Christian that it survives. Hence the dilemma of the Vatican. Modernism, it sees rightly, is fatal to actual Catholicism—and to talk of any other is foolish; things are not what we might wish them to be, but what they are. But, though it does not see it, to crush out Modernism is equally fatal; for Modernism stands for life, for ideas, for freedom, for the things in virtue of which churches and peoples live.

From a larger point of view than the denominational, the action of the Curia and the results attained by it are such as to fill wise and good men with dismay. Modernism—we must perhaps speak of it in the past tense—was an attempt to bridge the gulf between thought and theology, to interpret Catholicism in such a sense as to make it possible both as a creed and a system for the mind of our time. That it has failed is scarcely matter of opinion. The genius and the constitution of the Church give the Pope the decisive voice in such controversies, and his Non Possumus is final; unless infallibility is a fiction (in which case the foundation is cut away from the system) we have it here. What is the result? A nominal increase of intension at the expense of a real and very alarming decrease of extension: as education advances Catholicism declines. And who can suppose that the belief of those who swell the diminishing census of the Church is in general either real or active?—that indifference, unintelligence, external deference, do not do duty for assent? "The rock on which we build is the impregnable ignorance of the majority; the principal hope for religion lies in the fact that the lower orders do not think."

* "The Study of Religion in the Italian Universities." By Louis Henry Jordan and Professor Labanca. Oxford University Press. 6s. net.

What superstructure can be built on such a foundation? The outlook in Catholic, and in particular in Latin, Christendom is gloomy in the extreme. Here, and in Germany, the Reformed Churches offer an alternative to sacerdotal religion; neither their presence nor their influence can be ignored. But in the Latin countries no such shelter presents itself: there, save in exceptional cases, when a man finds Rome impossible, positive Christianity goes too. Hence the moral danger, on the one hand, of the anti-clerical propaganda; and, on the other, of that which gives occasion to it—the clericalising of religion which has been so accentuated during the present Pontificate. Both tend to detach men not merely from the Church of Rome, which matters little, but from religion, which matters much. Religio depopulata is the name given in the pseudo-prophecy of St. Malachi to the successor of Pius X. Should the reign of the latter be prolonged, there is every chance of the fulfilment of the forecast: it is one of the events which cast their shadow before.

For the Papacy Italy is the storm-centre. Elsewhere Modernism is a movement of ideas, and mainly affects scholars. Ideas bear fruit, and scholars lead opinion; but certain as these ultimates are, they are distant: the seed grows while men sleep—and they sleep long. But in Italy it is associated with those social and economic causes without whose operation, it is safe to say, no movement of men on a large scale has ever been, or can ever be, carried to a successful issue. Here, as elsewhere, matter is the vehicle of mind. The instinct of the Vatican was sound when it singled out Don Romolo Murri for excommunication, and that on a political ground. Murri disclaims Modernism; but the Democristiani are more to be feared than critics or exegetes: this way danger lies. The temperamental forces that make against religion in France are not present in anything like the same strength in Italy: the people are simpler, less sophisticated, nearer the soil. It is improbable that Protestantism will offer a full solution of the religious problem in any Latin country; but evangelical religion—an impossibility in France—is far from being an impossibility in Italy: the Italian is sicut parvulus, and capable of accepting religion in a simple form.

The difficulties in the way of escape from the vicious circle in which the Curia has involved Latin Christianity are great. The most serious, as Professor Labanca remarks, lies in the peculiarly Latin fallacy of abstract ideas. A singularly mischievous example of this fallacy was Cavour's famous formula—a Free Church in a Free State. It is based on the crudest of abstractions: Church and State are two sides of one and the same thing. This is forgotten when "it is continually repeated that the State does not require to scrutinise the dogmas and rites of the Church. The State has good cause to exercise this scrutiny; it has reason to feel considerable alarm touching certain ecclesiastical dogmas and rites. By reason, again, of the acceptance among us of purely abstract principles, it is held that the laity must not busy themselves with religion. These petty abstractions run counter to the teaching of history. Did ancient Rome stand completely separated from religion? And does modern political Rome, as a matter of fact, stand detached from the Catholic Church?"

Religion does not concern the clergy only. In self-defence and to protect the rights of her citizens, the State is compelled to keep a watchful eye upon the Church. Had it done so at the Vatican Council, how much injury to religion would have been spared!

To the difficulties springing from this false abstraction must be added those having their source in the political conception of religion common among Latin Catholics—it is regarded primarily as a society rather than an experience. The Papacy, again, is viewed as a national possession. Much as Italians have suffered from it, they will not willingly let it go. Hence a subserviency to clericalism on the part of politicians who are in no sense clericals, and a half-heartedness on that of would-be reformers: "I dare not" waits upon "I would." One deplorable result is the practical suppression of the free theological chairs at the Universities, and the discouragement of anything like scientific theology. The Church is hostile, the people are apathetic, and the main responsibility for the consequent stagnation lies with those from whom better things might have been expected.

"It is from the Liberal Catholics—barring some rare and noble exceptions—that there arise the most serious of all the obstacles that to-day impede the investigations undertaken by religious criticism in Italy."

Before 1870 things were better. Necessary as it was, the downfall of the Temporal Power had two sides. The veteran Gaetano Negri discerned this early.

"The Pope, an absolute ruler of a small State, was a petty tyrant, who compromised the dignity of his spiritual authority by the odious exercise of his temporal sovereignty. By despoiling him of this with violence Italy not only relieved him of a very crippling burden, but enabled him to pose before the world as a victim. There is no stronger position for one who exercises a moral power. He found himself suddenly freed from the leprosy that stained the historical Papacy; he became an object of affection, admiration, and faith. When I see the enemies of Catholicism celebrating September 20th as a festival I smile at the shortness of their sight; the day should be for them not a festival, but a fast."

Leo XIII. was clever enough to profit to the full by the situation. Pius X., than whom Liberalism has no more valuable asset, has lost more in the few years of his pontificate than his predecessor gained during his long and eventful reign.

THE "HAUT MONDE" OF THE 'FORTIES.*

EVEN within the week of its appearance gossip was babbling of this work. Persons who had probably not yet beheld the cover were crying it as the book that would, and must, be read. The noble authoress had stuck at nothing, and historic scandal was her staple! Circulating libraries could not supply it fast enough—half their subscribers were already on the waiting list, and so forth.

But "gossip Report" is not always precise in promise-keeping, and we are dreadfully afraid that some of these subscribers are in for a first-rate disappointment. Is there, then, no scandal? Oh! yes, there is scandal enow. Scandal is, however, of sundry sorts. There are the immortal scandals that go above the common world on the pinions of the eagle, and sail a good deal higher and wider than the "actions of the just"; and there are the scandals, exquisite to people in correct social sets, that are merely aeroplane. Lady Cardigan's scandals are aeroplane—and in a measure antiquated. "No scandal about Queen Elizabeth, I hope?" says Sneer in Sheridan's "Critic." So far as contemporary interest goes, the best scandals of Lady Cardigan are scandals about Queen Elizabeth. Most of the victims have long left off living, and few of them ever lived to bestow their honors on a world wider than Piccadilly or the fashionable shires.

"I have seen everything worth seeing," says Lady Cardigan, "and known everyone worth knowing." Think of being able to say that! And the lady who says it is nearly eighty-five years of age, and was born in a sphere in which opportunities are to the seekers of them. Her first husband was that famous Lord Cardigan who led the charge of the Light Brigade. An indigent reviewer, confusedly arraying in his fivopenny mind the events of the world since 1824, and the persons who took a hand in them, turns for inspiration to the pages of Lady Cardigan, and learns that "everything worth seeing" in this period is summed up in Cowes, Newmarket, and Paris, and "everyone worth knowing" in the persons of title who spent their money and ran the hazard of the divorce court in these amiable seats. Disraeli's excepted (and he is here merely the subject of a not very generous anecdote), there are in these pages very few names indeed that history will ever pause at. Yet the annals of the century distinguished by Lady Cardigan's career are stuffed with the efforts or achievements of men who will be in some degree remembered four or five generations from ours. We should, of course, include Lord Cardigan himself, but there is here little of historic interest concerning him, save that "he never seemed to attach any importance to the part he played" in the action that covered him with glory. There is a glimpse of the Duke of Wellington watching with interest a little French piece acted by children. Talleyrand is mentioned once, and we learn that "Count Batthyany had parties for his sons."

Lady Cardigan extols the society she remembers, and sharpens her pen against the society of to-day. In a book of reminiscences extending over many years, this is not at all unusual, but the author's method of comparison is a little curious. In seeking to show that the past was better than the present, she proves by implication—as it seems to us—that the present could scarcely be worse than the past. One of the first celebrities we encounter in these pages is the “wicked” Lord Hertford, Thackeray's “Marquis of Steyne.” Lady Cardigan thinks Thackeray “did a great deal to malign” this nobleman, and presents him to us as he would doubtless like to be discovered to posterity—waited on at supper by a company of ballet-dancers.

* "My Recollections." By the Countess of Cardigan and Lancastre. Eveleigh Nash. 10s. 6d. net.

Country-house parties in the 'forties, in those “stately houses” which even a modern democrat should behold with “some pride,” were very different, we are told, from the vulgar, romping affairs of to-day; and we are forthwith introduced to the notables of both sexes who met beneath these splendid roofs. There was the Marchioness to whom the author herself once said in the House of Lords: “Oh, Lady A—, you may like to know that before Lady C— died she told my Lord all about you and your illegitimate children.” There was that finished ornament, Lord Wilton, whose “numerous love affairs had gained for him the title of ‘The Wicked Earl’; in fact, many of the country people never called him anything else.” There was Lord Ward who showed his dead wife to an old admirer, Lord Colville. There was “Lady Charlotte Cadogan, who ran away with Lord Anglesey; they lived together for some years until Lady Anglesey divorced her husband, and he was free to marry Lady Charlotte.” There was the wife of Lord Palmerston (her second husband), concerning whom “it was generally known that she had been Palmerston's mistress for many years.” There was the delicately romantic Miss F—, who, in Lady Wilton's drawing-room, under cover of the music, was heard whispering to one of her gallants: “Oh, Jim, whenever I meet you I always take off my wedding ring and forget I'm married.” There was the “Parrot Club,” in Seymour Street, Portman Square, the membership of which was restricted to three married women (two of them titled) and their three lovers. But why spin out the tale?

It is with the doings of these, and such as these—“all bred in schools”—that Lady Cardigan stimulates the palates of her readers. They shone among the morning stars of her world, the world we should all return to could we be “chloroformed into a better,” the world of the admirable 'forties. “Dear days! so long ago and yet so vivid to me.”

Let it at once and emphatically be said that the excited talk about the book in some of this week's newspapers is scarcely worth listening to. Considered as literature, these “Recollections” have not the value of a shilling shocker: their insignificance is absolute. As the scourgings of a memory that seems deliberately to have cast out everything of worth, honor, and kindness, and to have stored up everything that the principle of noblesse oblige consigns to oblivion, they are not, as we appraise them, worth the trouble of picking over.

SAILING SHIPS AND THEIR STORY.*

MR. KEBLE CHATTERTON's canvas is scarcely big enough for his subject, though he has done his best to condense the marvellous history of the ship within its limits. The ships of the Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Romans have been most adequately treated; their history, together with that of the Viking ships occupying nearly a half of the volume; all very well done, extremely well illustrated, and forming perhaps the best account yet given of this somewhat obscure period of maritime history. Very exhaustive study has been devoted to all the newer sources of information now available, and the author is to be congratulated on the very reasonable and logical conclusions resulting from his labors. These prove very adequately that the necessities of commerce between the higher civilisations of the Mediterranean produced in very great variety different types of ship for the trader and the warrior, whilst the predatory Northman retained unaltered his “fast cruiser” through many centuries. It is almost a pity that among so many good pictures of the remains of the Viking ships, the actual lines of the great Gogstad ship, which were taken off by the eminent naval architect Colin Archer, and published, with a very detailed account of her construction and fitment in the Transactions of the Institute of Naval Architects in 1882, were not included. These would substantiate the claim that her builder “thoroughly understood the art, which was subsequently lost, to be revived in modern times, of shaping the under-water portion of the hull so as to reduce the resistance to the passage of the vessel through the water.” Indeed, throughout the work, the reader, if he is really an understanding lover of ships, feels the want of more illustrations of the actual under-water shapes of vessels of the various periods of history, especially the days of the great climax in the construction of wooden ships in the latter part of the eighteenth century when English constructors availed themselves most freely of the higher technical skill and scientific knowledge of the French naval architects, and copied most accurately the lines of such French ships as fell into the hands of our sailors during this very strenuous maritime period. Again, the comparison drawn between the work of Sir Robert Seppings and that of Sir William Symonds, R.N., who succeeded him as Surveyor to the Royal Navy in 1832, cannot be clearly shown without diagrams, and in justice to Seppings, the author should certainly have quoted the opinion of many sailors of the period, that although Symonds's ships, especially his frigates, were faster light-weather vessels, those designed by Seppings were almost invariably better ships in heavy weather owing to their greater displacement. The merchant vessels of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries are ably treated, and the many illustrations give a gallery of pictures of a class of ship (almost certain to disappear before the march of the steamer) that is most interesting and valuable.

The weakest part of the book is that dealing with the history of the racing yacht. The author has failed to show how completely the type of racing yacht is dominated by the rule of measurement in vogue at the period of a yacht's construction, and how the yacht has been broad or narrow, shallow or deep, solely from the desire of the designer to evade or “get the best out of” the very imperfect rules hitherto used. The “Jullanar,” an illustration of which is given, was simply the product of a very audacious attempt to evade a rule which practically allowed five feet of length to every foot of beam, and the evasion was completely successful. And how difficult a thing it is to make a perfect rule is shown to-day in the performances of the “Bloodhound,” a vessel built before the “Jullanar,” but under the same rule, which has this year—notwithstanding her age—actually beaten some of the most perfect products of the latest International Rule!

But to have drawn these comparisons would have filled another volume, and Mr. Chatterton has more than atoned for this defect by his most interesting and fully detailed history of the ships that have long since been lost in the sea mists of past ages.

DIFFICULT COUNTRY.*

THE reader who shies at the last chapters of “Open Country,” a problem novel, half-disguised by the picturesque embroideries of Mr. Hewlett's ingenious fancy, may fortify his courage with the Bishop of Southwark's declaration the other day that he welcomed serious plays or novels dealing with the marriage question. The Bishop was sagacious enough to recognise that in welcoming public discussion, the moralist's aim is, like the horticulturist's, to stimulate healthy growth and admit plenty of light and air to the tree. And the great social institution like the tree under the pruner's knife, thrives better by this cutting away of doubtful branches than by their inclusion and enforced conformity. Mr. Hewlett's sub-title, “A Comedy with a Sting,” seems apt, since the sting of Sanchia's problem arrests us while we are enjoying the mellifluous sweetness of the author's style. Over-sweet some will deem the latter, and indeed the curious Meredithian sub-flavor of the story suggests that Mr. Hewlett is indebted to the great novelist for the corrective acid of the spiritual lesson.

* “Sailing Ships and Their Story.” By E. Keble Chatterton. Sidgwick & Jackson. 16s. net.

* “Open Country.” By Maurice Hewlett. Macmillan. 6s.

The hero of "Open Country" is the gentleman gypsy and poet naturalist, Senhouse, whom we encountered in "Halfway House." His function is to serve as the conduit for the author's obiter dicta on life and literature, men and manners, and it is, perhaps, in anticipation of so literal a definition that Senhouse has been endowed with so gorgeously romantic a past. After an explosive career at Cambridge, he walks, one fine morning, out of college, taking away with him nothing but a holly stick, and leaving "all his change—gold, silver, and copper—lying at random on his dressing-table, and his cheque book in a drawer." Nothing is heard of him for two years, when his father, a prosperous colliery owner, receives a letter from him, stamped "Cracow," where this devotee of the "Simple Life" is conspiring, in Latin, against the Russian Government, which leads, in turn, to a year's exile in Siberia, and then to being "in touch with Tolstoy, Kropotkin, Stepniak, and half the dreamers of Europe." Mr. Hewlett has rightly divined that the respectable reading public will not stomach the anarchistic Bohemianism of his "artist's scribbler's and desultory scholar's" ideas, unless it be set off by the attractive mystery of "romance"; so Senhouse "periodically would vanish, as the mood took him, and perhaps be heard of in California, Colorado, the Caucasus, or Cashmere," which sojournings are paid for, one learns, by his occasional poems in "The Speaker," his contributions to "Dawn" and "The International," and his impressionistic paintings. Some of these periodicals we know have perished, but Senhouse, while helping to kill them, has other strings to his vagabond bow in the shape of his friendship with the rich and titled ones of this earth: old Lady Mauleverer of Gorston for one, Roger Charnock, Esq., of Bill Hill, the member for the county division, for another. It was, indeed, while camping on the latter's estate that Senhouse came across the exquisite Sanchia, a mortal maid of twenty, but "Goddess born" to Senhouse's sense, while she is staying on a visit to old Lady Mauleverer. Senhouse is painting a forest glade and murmuring to himself the lines from the "Witch of Atlas":—

"A lovely lady garmented in light
From her own beauty," when the girl, barefooted, appears at the edge of "a pool, twenty feet deep in leaf mould," and pulling up her skirts above her knees, wades into the water to tear away the weed that is strangling the water lilies. Explanations follow. Senhouse fetches his wooden trestle-bed that "serves excellently as a raft," and in ten minutes the lady is "thigh-deep in mud, wet to the skin, and as dirty as you please," but "exquisitely disarrayed, with her ardent eyes and fierce yet easy motions, the incarnation of all that is keen and lovely in youth." "A frightfully good sort" is Sanchia, as schoolboy Roger, alias "The Dowser," puts it, extraordinarily frank and extraordinarily reticent. "Without a tremor or flicker of self-consciousness, she revealed to this chance acquaintance as fine a pair of legs as anybody could have to show. Not Artemis, high girt for the chase, could have bared finer or dared more." Senhouse, of course, falls ecstatically in love with the purity of his divinity, and it would be doing Mr. Hewlett an injustice not to let his record of his hero's passion and the intellectual and spiritual sympathy between the pair stand in his own words:—

"The simplicity with which she—Goddess born—goes about the common ways of life, and with ardor shares our silly aims, has something in it of humility, which fills my eyes with tears. Sheer thanksgiving—sheer gratitude in me. I go about singing Pæan! She's Artemis the Bright come to earth again. Artemis Einodië—Our Lady of the Ways. She can only be served by song; no common speech of ours is wholesome enough. She's Artemis Hymnia to whom the crocus-vested Caryatides lift up arms and voices in one strain. She's Mab, Queen of Faery; she's, of course, the Lady of the Lake. I believe the blue-bells bow their heads to her as she walks the woods; and I know that the nightingale is hushed as she passes, for fear he lose one waft of her breath. . . ."

She knew absolutely nothing of this—if it be credible that a girl of twenty can spend her days with a man ten years older, and not see what is the case with him. . . . So far as she was concerned, he met, or flattered himself he met, her immediate wants. She had many, but love was certainly not one. She wanted guidance in her sketching, and his was exactly that which she wanted most. She wanted guidance in a world which was rapidly becoming complex and baffling; and he could pare off detail and accident so nearly that the straight bold outline of conduct lay plain to be seen, stretching far ahead of her like parallel lines of railway over swamps. To talk with him was to be taken on to a windy height and shown the world of men mapped out below you, accidentals blurred away, only the salient things sharply defined. Sure of him, she gave him her hand, and in the hollow of it her soul. . . . There was not, I needly hardly say, the shadow of a feeling of love for him in her. She took him as a gift of God, as meat to one starving, and said grace and filled herself. . . . This was where she ravished him quite; she was like a wood-nymph half-tamed, meek in a stiff gown and belt, her quick feet in little narrow shoes and stockings; her wild hair knotted behind her head, her quick eyes recollected, her simple movements always curbed. And yet below bodice and belt you could sense the heart beat faster for the wild kiss of the wind on the cheek; and you could well believe that, in wood, on airy summits of hills, in meadows by streams, in ploughlands after rain, she was living a double life—within, the ears of her heart alert to secret strains, magically, and invitations to be free; outwardly, all her beautiful body staidly disposed to the common world's observances. Here he saw her humble, and could shed tears of pride in such condescension; there he knew her indomitable, and could sing "Te Deum" for her immortality.

Senhouse, appointed spiritual guardian to young Artemis Hymnia, fills scores of letters to his Lady with disquisitions on things in general. Readings and declamations from the Greek and Italian poets and chosen moderns are followed by long rhapsodic outbursts on the dull slavery of our civilisation, on the nature of God, on Religion as pure Poetry, on God-making, on War, Socialism, Poverty, Miracles, Little Englanders, Avarice, the Plutocracy, Respectability, and other signs and tokens of national bondage. Although the artistic pretext for the enunciation of these views grows thinner and thinner, and, like Sanchia herself in her lover's fancy, loses all its parts and becomes "a glory of essence, of wondrous pure Being," we must confess that we find the letters fresher and more interesting than the picture of Sanchia's family, the Percivals. Her father, honest old Tom Percival, an East India merchant of the Poultry, his bitter, conventional, and snobbish wife, and their daughters Vicky, Philippa, and Melusine are mere adumbrations of Meredithian import. The social atmosphere in which the family has its being, though enlivened by some clever sketches of minor characters such as the condescending Sir George Pinwell and the amiable Mr. Chevenix, is not particularly convincing, though Mr. Hewlett may have good reason for not letting his young goddess be outlined against too realistic a background. Anyway, while Senhouse is detailing social schemes to Sanchia from the safe distance of the Land's End, where he is naturalising Alpine plants amid the rocks, another and more formidable lover appears at Great Cumberland Place, to wit, Mr. Nevile Ingram, of Wanless, a sportsman, man of the world, polo player, with a faultless and languid manner, a tanned skin, blue eyes, and a soldierin' past. Mr. Nevile Ingram has also a wife who deserted him in the first year of marriage, and ran away with somebody else to Sicily, and she has been "allowanced and let rip." Presumably a divorce cannot now be obtained, for thereby hangs this tale. The Percival family, however, are not told of the existence of Mr. Ingram's wife, and both he and Sanchia fall passionately in love. When Sanchia learns the truth from him she, in her exaltation, knows that her work is to save the soul of the "bruised, the world-begrimed Ingram." Senhouse, in a letter of "passionate flattery," has surpassed himself by "a vision of a woman to whom the whole world might bow down. . . . Oh, to read the great trust in your long gaze! Oh, for the assurance of your thrilled voice, and oh, for the touch of your lips on my forehead," and Sanchia, set afire by this ecstatic flame, ponders whether "her work in the world is to be lustral water, to pour herself out, that Ingram might wash and be made whole!" This delicate problem, whether Sanchia is to join herself in holy union, though not in formal wedlock, with Nevile Ingram, is worked out by the author in his last hundred pages, with great wealth of classical allusion, following the text, "No harm can ever come to a good woman." Our sympathies are with the author's endeavor, but though the spiritual argument would seem to have sprung from some noble Meredithian prototypes the psychological analysis of motive shows little depth. Sanchia, "arrayed in her white armor of innocence against the prestiges of this world . . . Safety, Sanction, the Uses of five thousand slavish years; Church and World, Gods and Devils, priests and people, home, law, order, Bible and prayer-book," becomes a little cheapened by the incessant hymns of homage that herald her "act of divine compassion, her swift, unfaltering act of love, sprung, as the love of God springs, from pure Pity." It is a great drawback to English novels that deal with such situations as Sanchia's that the heroine cannot give herself to the man she loves without a staggering orchestral accompaniment of cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music to celebrate the amazing spirituality of the act. And let us whisper to Mr. Hewlett that we hope that the artificial Senhouse, who is left to his tears, on the last page, while "using the hospitalities of an appreciative peer," may not emerge from that nobleman's "great and ancient yew-wood" into the daylight of another novel.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

MRS. MEYNELL's last volume, "Ceres' Runaway and Other Essays" (Constable, 3s. 6d. net) shows that her right hand has not lost its cunning. It has the same depth of thought and charm of style that appeared in "The Rhythm of Life," and returns at times to the theme that was so exquisitely treated in "The Children." Mrs. Meynell shows us that an unfavorable judgment on some of the habits of modern life may be combined with a true restfulness of soul. She takes no delight in finding fault, but neither frets at the faults nor plumes herself on superiority. She sees, for instance, how much we lose by our desire to have flowers before their season, but she will not say to the forced daffodil any such harsh word as Ruskin used of the greenhouse blossoms of December, "I hate chrysanthemums." In one essay she fails, we think, by not tracing things to their final causes. "The plaid," she writes, "is the Scotchman's contribution to the decorative art of the world," and she denounces the tartan for sundry sound reasons, as that it has "colors, not color." But is the tartan decorative in origin? Was it in the service of beauty that the Highlander first gathered the lichens from the rocks? We have seen in Sutherland two men start in pursuit of the stag, the one clad in a quiet grey, the other in a coat of many colors with a bright yellow for their master. For a time Joseph fascinated the eye, but as the two went up the moor the positions were reversed, and we could mark the speck of grey long after the other had disappeared from sight. It is just because it has colors, and not color, that the tartan blends indistinguishably with the manifold tints of a Highland hill. The plaid is the garb of the hunter. It is true that there are now many tartans which could not well be worn by the sons of Nimrod, but these are no true descendants of the first plaid. Their desire is to decorate, and they must defend themselves against Mrs. Meynell, if they can. Lovers of children will delight in the two last essays in this volume.

"A THREE-FOOT STOOL," by Peter Wright (Smith, Elder, 6s. net), is a book of the Wild West, containing "experiences of ranching, with stories told over the fire, and some verses." The verses are more variegated in subject than impressive as examples of poetic form, and we should be disposed to say that the stories are better than the verses, and the experiences of ranching best of all. The latter are told as a clever special correspondent might tell them, in colorful language, and a fine, swinging style, and they contain much interesting information concerning the old and the new sort of ranch in Mexico—the "open" ranch, where men disdained the enclosing fence, and trusted to luck and their own wits or strength to keep and increase their herds, and the more private, perhaps tamer, method of cattle farming within stated boundaries, which is gradually superseding the other. The characters with which the author surrounds himself—Reinhold, the Americanised German; Hay, the bear-trapper; Peg-leg George, the reprobate—are drawn with care, though a little stiffly; Mr. Wright has neither the introspection nor the easy touch of a Bret Harte. Neither can he avoid the temptation to display his Oxford culture through the mouth of Reinhold, who, with his pages of rhetorical generalisation about England, America, and the world in general, becomes even more tiresome than Mr. Wright, presumably in a fit of repentance for having inflicted him upon the reader, finally declares him to be. Neither do we know why, or in what capacity, "Belphebi" is introduced into this company of male ranchers, unless it is to afford Mr. Wright the opportunity of a few lines of amorous rhapsody and a few sentences of Early Victorian "sweet nothings." These interludes hardly conduce to making the book hang together; one is apt to lose the atmosphere of the ranch; it says a good deal, perhaps, for Mr. Wright's powers, that one can pick it up again as quickly as one does. Yet the book was worth writing, with all its little weaknesses, and if, as we believe it to be, it is a first book, it is very well written.

* * *

"THE JOURNAL OF AN EXPEDITION ACROSS VENEZUELA AND COLOMBIA, 1906-1907," by Dr. Henry Bingham (Unwin, 10s. net) is the record of a journey which the author, accompanied by Dr. Hamilton Rice, undertook in order to be in a position to estimate Bolivar's achievement in leading his army across Venezuela and Colombia in 1819 by a road that was then deemed impassable. Dr. Bingham has been for eight years collecting material for a history of the South American Wars of Independence and for biographies of San Martin and Bolivar. The present volume is, in part at least, a study in preparation for that work, though its main interest lies rather in its pictures of travel than in its contribution to history. It gives information about the geography, natural history, and agricultural resources of the country traversed. There is a map of the route, and the book is illustrated by a large selection of photographs.

* * *

READERS of "The Random Recollections of a Commercial Traveller" (Sherratt & Hughes, 3s. 6d. net) may perhaps be excused for wondering what on earth the portrait of Charles Mathews and the pretty view of Don Cottage, Grasmere, and Thomas Moore's cottage, which are among the illustrations, have to do with a "gentleman of the road." When, however, the letterpress is examined, it will be realised that these pictures are at least as germane to the subject as many other things contained within the volume's covers. The truth is that these anonymous "random recollections" of a commercial might as well be those of anybody else. There is a little about commercial travellers and their customers—from the Dickens point of view, one might say; but the bulk of the book is a miscellany of all topics. It is a curious production altogether. In his introductory chapter the writer apologises for making "rather profuse use of fragmentary verses," and explains, or extenuates, their introduction by saying: "They are verses that one often hears misquoted and attributed to wrong authors, and this must serve as an apology for the inordinate frequency," &c., &c. The fragmentary verses are certainly very profuse, and one suspects in places that the text was introduced to suit the verses rather than the verses to suit the text. Side by side with this literary peculiarity may be mentioned a perfect passion for long-drawn-out sentences; we counted one of more than twenty lines in length—an interminable sequence of words and commas. Yet the book, in its way, pleases. There are several excellent, if quite uncommercial, stories. At times it makes us think of an hotel commercial-room, with a bright fire and two or three of the company in good form. It has cheerfulness and charity and a sense of quaint humor. It shows a culture in standard authors, an interest in social problems, a certain number of sane, if simple, ideas regarding them. With all its clumsy artificialities, it is neither unhuman nor uninteresting.

* * *

MR. HOWARD EVANS's "Sir Randal Cremer: His Life and Work" (Unwin, 5s. net) is written with the double purpose "of telling the life-story of a man who devoted himself to the service of humanity, and of giving a succinct history of one of the most notable movements of modern times."

"..... and I find that the smoking of a pipe of

CHAIRMAN

teaches a philosophy that is well worth knowing. Its fine qualities have a pleasing and soothing effect, minimising the little troubles and difficulties of life. It never obtrudes and it never palls, but, week in and week out, is the one tobacco that gives to most men the greatest pleasure in smoking—a pleasure which only the right tobacco for their palate can give. It is cool—always cool—and burns evenly to the last shred with a rich and pleasing aroma."

BOARDMAN'S

is the same tobacco milder, and the same but fuller flavoured.

RECORDER

Most tobacconists sell them at 6d. per oz. in 1 and 2 oz. packets, and $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. tins.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

The Daily News

North and South, East and West, "The Daily News" is on sale all over England first thing in the morning. If you have any difficulty in procuring a copy communicate with the publisher.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

Head Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY.

OCTOBER.

2s. 6d.

FOUR CARTOONS BY MAX BEERBOHM

- | | |
|---------------------------------------|--|
| 1. MODERN POETRY | Arnold Bennett
Mrs. Taylor
Alfred E. Randall
Ezra Pound |
| 2. EDWARD HUTTON | The Church in Lucina's House |
| 3. ANNE DOUGLAS
SEDGWICK | The Nest |
| 4. ELIZABETH MARTINDALE | Two Essays |
| 5. S. PEREZ TRIANA | Don Marcelino |
| 6. MAX BEERBOHM | Four Studies |
| 7. C. F. KEARY | The Antiquary |
| 8. FORD MADDOX HUEFFER | A Call. III |
| 9. THE MONTH: EDITORIAL | The Critical Attitude;
English Literature of To-day |
| 10. SIR CHARLES DILKE,
Bart., M.P. | Foreign Affairs |
| 11. SIDNEY WEBB | The Economic Aspects of Poor-Law Reform |
| 12. M.P. | The Policy of the Government |
| 13. WILLIAM T. GOODE | The Present Moment in Spain |
| 14. J. A. HOBSON | The Task of Realism |
| 15. G. | Review — The Place of History in Education |

Subscription—One Year 30s.; Three Months 7s. 6d.

CHAPMAN & HALL LTD., 11, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Cremer was a workman by origin, and he took a sturdy part in most of the great movements for reform during his life-time. Thus he was a friend of old-age pensions, land nationalisation, trades unionism, and municipal Socialism. But the work of his life was done on behalf of international peace. He held that the key of the situation was in the hands of the working-classes, and he deserves his full share of credit for the fact that the artisans in most European countries are anti-militarist. Mr. Evans tells the story of the Workman's Peace Association, founded by Cremer in 1871, and the process by which it grew into the International Arbitration League. Cremer's work in connection with the movement, both on the Continent and in America, is described in clear and interesting terms, and the book gives a good account of the whole peace movement from the founding of the Peace Society in 1816 down to the present day. In 1903 the Nobel Prize of £7,000 was awarded to Sir Randal Cremer, and he at once handed over the money to the Arbitration League—a significant but thoroughly characteristic action on the part of a man who had known what it was to do skilled labor for sixpence an hour. Cremer's personality was a little dour; he was not an expansive man, and he had just a touch of eccentricity. But he was a thoroughly honest, simple-minded man.

* * *

WE have received from Mr. D. J. Rider, of St. Martin's Court, a copy of "Three Living Lions" (7s. 6d. net), a set of three caricatures by Mr. Joseph Simpson. The lions of Mr. Simpson's choice are Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, and Mr. H. G. Wells. Of the three caricatures we think that of Mr. Chesterton the best. It is witty and keen sighted, without being brutal, and, like every good caricature, is a real criticism. Mr. Simpson's treatment of Mr. Wells is not so successful. His caricature of Mr. Bernard Shaw bristles with pugnacity.

The Week in the City.

			Price Friday morning, Sept. 24.		Price Friday morning, Oct. 1.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83½	...	83½
German 3 per cent.	84½	...	84½
Great Western	122	...	120
Steel Common	86½	...	91½
Union Pacific	208½	...	216

ON Thursday the heavy reduction of the gold reserve at the Bank of England, as a result of withdrawals to Egypt, Brazil, and other countries, caused a mild sensation in the City, and warned those who are speculating with cheap money of a probable rise in the Bank rate before the end of October. Consols are dull on the chance of heavy borrowing if the Lords throw out the Budget. The principal rage just now is for rubber shares, the present price of rubber being over 9s. per lb., as against, say, 2s. 6d., which used to be considered a reasonable price. Tremendous profits are, of course, being made, and the market is overcrowded with bulls. The consumption of rubber for tyres, goloshes, &c., is, of course, bound to be checked, and when prices come tumbling down, a good many people will be ruined. It is worth observing that what is for the moment the most profitable business in the world (the growth and sale of "tame" rubber) is almost entirely run by British capital and British enterprise. There has not been much of interest in other branches of the stock markets. Home Railways and home industrials are very dull. Probably Lord Rosebery and his friends have frightened investors. Consequently there are some promising bargains to be picked up by those who will take the trouble to examine and select. To a correspondent who asks me for an absolutely safe investment without mentioning yield, I would say that real comfortable safety cannot be assured until one comes to 4 per cent. or under. Prussia and the other German State loans yield nearly 4 per cent. Municipal stocks at home yield rather less.

THE CROPS.

Since the hot spell early in August the weather has been rather bad for the crops, especially in the Midlands; but wheat and barley will probably be above the average. But as we import so much more grain than we grow, cheap bread is the greatest of British interests. Consequently one of the best signs of the times for this country is the big drop in the price of wheat, which has fallen ten or twelve shillings per quarter since the middle of August. Flour, of course, goes down proportionately, but the bakers have a knack of imposing upon the public when it comes to bread. The Indian, Russian, and Canadian crops have been the great factors in lowering prices. The United States harvest, of which so much was expected, has fallen far short of anticipations. It is certainly not a bumper crop, and this explains why the American business revival is hanging fire.

THE FRENCH INVESTOR'S TASTE.

SOME idea of the way in which Frenchmen distribute their investments may be got from a recent statistical paper of M. Neymarck on the amount and classification of the public securities negotiable on the Paris Bourse at the end of 1908. The total nominal value was £5,387,760,000, made up of £2,415,280,000 of French paper, and £2,972,480,000 of foreign loans, shares, or bonds. The market value on December 31st last was a total of £5,335,320,000, of which £2,629,520,000 was French and £2,705,800,000 foreign. French Rentes accounted for £1,020,400,000, French Railways and Tramways for £829,000,000, Credit Foncier shares and bonds for £190,880,000, City of Paris £84,000,000, and banks £67,000,000. Of course, the lion's share of the foreign loans was taken by Russia, which has over £525,000,000 of Government bonds negotiable on the Paris Bourse. It seems to be a characteristic of the French investor that he likes to have the taxpayer to provide his interest. He has no stomach for industrial speculation.

A VOICE FROM THE CITY?

THE "New York Evening Post," which is generally regarded as a Liberal newspaper, has recently published the following extraordinary announcement from a London correspondent:—

"Should the present Government be returned with a mandate to override the House of Lords, the British Constitution as it has been known for generations will have become revolutionised; and the effect, so Lombard Street believes, would be to drive all British securities into still further discredit. If, on the other hand, the Conservatives should sweep the country, there would be for a while, at any rate, so strong an upward movement in British stocks as entirely to obliterate such interest as may now be taken in American and other foreign stocks. If either party were to be returned to power with a trifling majority, then the effect must necessarily be unsettling on the stock markets for some time to come."

The idea of the Stock Exchange giving up the Foreign and American markets for home speculations upon the advent of a Conservative Government may be good enough for New York, which does not know that under the care of the last Tory administration the price of Consols and home railways, municipal stock, breweries, fell from 10 to 30 per cent.

THE U.S. IN PERU.

THE Cerro de Pasco, mentioned in my last letter, is a noteworthy instance of American enterprise, but probably the United States has a larger share in the industries of Peru than in those of other first-class South American States. Besides the advantage of proximity, there is the fact that copper and silver—Peru's staple mining products—are likewise extensively produced in the United States. Mines like the Cerro de Pasco in themselves attract a large amount of trade, as plant is naturally purchased from the country to which the mining companies belong; and, in fact, nearly all electrical machinery in Peru comes from America. In five years the States have nearly doubled their exports, and now stand second to England with £1,108,230, against £1,347,174. It is quite possible that within a few years America will stand first, as English firms are not taking much interest in new mining projects. Our Consul-General reports: "Mining tools come largely from the United States. The reason is that most, if not all, mine superintendents are Americans, and they naturally incline for appliances with which they are accustomed to work." He also says: "The railways of Peru are run according to American ideas, and the type of rolling-stock is according to American standard patterns, both as regards passenger coaches, goods waggons, and locomotives."

LUCELLUM.

RHEUMATISM

THE NATURAL CURE IN YOUR OWN HOME

Sufferers may now secure all the benefits of the world-famous Brine springs of Droitwich without leaving their own homes. "Droitwich Brine Crystals" are the actual Brine in highly concentrated form, extracted from and possessing all the virtues of the identical natural Spring found at that Spa.

DROITWICH BRINE CRYSTALS

For Rheumatism, Rheumatoid Arthritis, Lumbago, Sciatica and kindred troubles these "Crystals" effect quick relief and ultimate cure. Recommended by the Medical Profession.

Ask your Chemist for "Droitwich Brine Crystals," or send direct for a 28-lb. bag, delivered free to any address in London or Suburbs for 2s., or to any Country Station for 2s. 3d.

WESTON & WESTALL, LTD. (Dept. 26), 16, EAST CHAP, LONDON, E.C.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£18 18s. CONSTANTINOPLE, SMYRNA, PATMOS, ORETE, MALTA, AJACCIO, and the RIVIERA, Sept. 29th; also

£16 16s. October 22nd, PALESTINE, EGYPT and GREECE

Full particulars from the Secretary.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

BIBLES,
PRAYER
BOOKS, &c.

THE LARGEST SELECTION OF OXFORD AND OTHER EDITIONS FOR LECTERN, READING DESK, AND PRIVATE USE.
ILLUSTRATED PRIZE BIBLES,
PRAYER BOOKS from 1s., &c.
New Lists now ready, sent Post-Free.

Tel. No. Central 329 THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

Catalogue No. 366. 144 Pages.

GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

NOW READY. REDUCED PRICES. IMMENSE VARIETY.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
Remainder and Discount Booksellers,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ITALIAN YOUNG LADY, very good family, seeks situation as companion. Willing to teach French, Italian. Speaks English. —Further particulars apply Mrs. R. C. Trevelyan, The Shiffolds, Dorking.

WHAT DO UNITARIANS BELIEVE AND TEACH?
Send name and address to the Secretary, British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and explanatory pamphlets will be forwarded, post free.

TANGYES TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

May be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.

Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053 Central.

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children's Lady Nurses and Kindergarten. —For full particulars apply, the Principal, Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

“PYRENO”

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the Kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor.Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."LONDON.*WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.BOLTON.*THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderateSILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- weekBRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., BridportBRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, ManagerROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. PrestonBUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First HotelDARTMOOR-YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. SaraDEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. JeffersonEASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- dayHADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- dayEDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading HotelGREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per dayGREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. PearlHENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta CourseILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing SeaKEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.*CHURCH HOTEL Bowling Green and Cheap RefreshmentsLANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntoshMARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. DouthwaiteLEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either stationLIVERPOOL.*COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wiresGRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.LLANDUDNO.*The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prem., facing sea

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LLANELLY.CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. WeaverLYNTON (Devon).*ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acresMALVERN.HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. WilsonMANCHESTER."OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. ChallandROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from StationOXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. MilesPORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, ProprietorSOUTHPORT.*KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & TreatmentROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, PropALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. TaylorWHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGAINE.*THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	$\frac{1}{2}$ PAGE.	$\frac{1}{4}$ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages... ..	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions		8d. per line.
52 ,,		6d. ,,

MESSRS. BELL'S FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

NOW READY. Crown 4to, 15s. net.

SAVOY OPERAS.

By W. S. GILBERT.

With a new introduction by the Author, 32 Illustrations in Colour by W. RUSSELL FLINT, and Title-page and binding designed by the same artist.

This volume contains the libretti of Patience, The Pirates of Penzance, Princess Ida, and The Yeoman of the Guard, which have been revised by the Author for the purpose. Sir W. S. GILBERT has also contributed an Introduction to the Volume. Write for Illustrated Prospectus.

READY NOW.

Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA.

By PERCY F. HONE, B.A. (Cantab.)
(of Salisbury, Rhodesia).

The aim of this book, which is the first history of Southern Rhodesia, is to give an accurate account of the country, its inhabitants, and its resources.

Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

His Art, His Writings, and His Public Life: A Record.
By AYMER VALLANCE.

Fourth and Cheaper Edition with a reproduction in Colours of Arras Tapestry "The Woodpecker," Photogravure Portrait, and about 50 Illustrations, half tone and line.

— THE —

QUEEN'S TREASURES SERIES.

Small crown 8vo. With 8 coloured plates and decorated title-page, covers, and end papers. 2s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

Cranford. By Mrs. GASKELL. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. October.

Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. Ready.

Lob-Lie-by-the-Fire, or, the Luck of Lingborough, and other Stories. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by ALICE B. WOODWARD. Ready immediately.

Little Women. By LOUISA M. ALCOTT. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. Ready.

BELL'S MINIATURE SERIES OF MUSICIANS.

Pott 8vo, bound in cloth, with 8 Illustrations, 1s. net; or in limp leather, with Photogravure Frontispiece, 2s. net.

NEW VOLUME.

Purcell. By J. F. RUNCIMAN. Wednesday next.

Mr. Frank Hird's New Novel. Ready Oct. 8th. 6s.

THE DEEPER STAIN.

By FRANK HIRD, Author of "King Fitz's A.D.C." Mr. Hird's new novel concerns itself with questions of modern social life, and will fascinate readers as much by the brilliance of the character studies as by the restraint and dignity with which the Author has described the terrible problem which confronts his heroine.

MASTERS OF LITERATURE.

A Series of handy Single volumes containing Representative Passages from the Works of the Greatest Writers, with full Biographical and Critical Introduction and Editorial Connections. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net each.

FIRST LIST OF VOLUMES.

NOW READY.

SCOTT.
FIELDING.

By Professor GRANT.

By Professor SAINTSBURY.

DEFOE.

By John MASEFIELD.

CARLYLE.

By A. W. EVANS.

THACKERAY.

By G. K. CHESTERTON.

OTHERS TO FOLLOW.

Ready

Ready

Oct.

Oct.

VOL. 1 NOW READY.

Demy 8vo, with 2 Photogravure Portraits, 10s. 6d. net.

THE HANOVERIAN QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

By ALICE GREENWOOD.

"It is a pleasure to read a book of memoirs so well done as that of Miss Greenwood. Miss Greenwood has not 'read-up' her subject; she has written because she cares and knows—with an ample margin of knowledge which lends a sense of space and atmosphere to her work."

Fcap. 8vo, 6s.

A HANDBOOK TO DANTE.

By F. J. SNELL, M.A.

Author of "The Age of Transition," &c.

This volume will be uniform with Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR's well-known "Handbook to Browning," and Mr. MORTON LUCE's "Handbook to Tennyson" and "Handbook to Shakespeare."

Vol. V., completing the Works. Small 4to.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND.

Newly edited from the MSS.

By LUCY TOULMIN SMITH.

This edition will be completed in five volumes, of which Vol. I. (containing Parts I-III.), price 18s. net, Vol. II. (Parts IV. and V.), price 12s. net, Vol. III. (the "Itinerary in Wales"), price 10s. 6d. net, and Vol. IV. (Parts VII. and VIII.), 12s. net, are already published.

UNIFORM WITH BELL'S CATHEDRAL SERIES.

Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

CHURCHES OF COVENTRY.

By FREDERICK W. WOODHOUSE. Ready.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious bookbuyers have long learned to keep a careful eye."—Athenæum.

Complete Catalogue of nearly 800 volumes will be sent on application.

FORTHCOMING VOLUMES TO BE ISSUED IMMEDIATELY.

IN THE PRESS. 2 vols., small post 8vo, 5s. each.

THE POEMS OF JONATHAN SWIFT.

Edited by W. ERNST BROWNING.

MORE'S UTOPIA.

ROBINSON'S Translations of the "Utopia"; together with Roper's Life of Sir Thomas More, and More's Letters to Margaret Roper and others. Edited with Notes by GEORGE SAMPSON. 3s. 6d.

DANTE. The Divine Comedy.

Translated by the REV. HENRY CAREY. New Edition by MARIE LOUISE EGERTON CASTLE. 3s. 6d.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER.

Newly Translated into English Prose by F. H. BLAKENEY, M.A., Head Master of the King's School, Ely. In 2 vols. 3s. 6d. Vol. I., containing Books I-XII.

THE TRAGEDIES OF ÆSCHYLUS.

A New Prose Translation from a Revised Text by WALTER HEADLAM, Litt. D., and C. E. S. HEADLAM, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Cheap Re-Issue of "V.R.I."

THE LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

By the DUKE OF ARGYLL, K.T. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, and many other portraits and illustrations. 3s. 6d.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 2.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	33	Recollections of Francis Newman. By the Hon Lionel A. Tollemache ...	51
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		The Lords and the Budget. By S.S. ...	52
The King, the Lords, and the Budget ...	36	Fiscal Conundrums. By Scotia ...	53
The Suffragist Deadlock: a Suggestion ...	37	Oriental Languages. By C. ...	53
The Church Congress ...	38	The Business of Marriage. By Ellen Duncan ...	53
Tammany Again ...	40	POETRY:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		The Three Yew Trees. By Frederick Niven ...	53
Shakespeare's Double ...	41	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	54
Institutions and Inspiration ...	42	Books to be Read ...	54
The New Pressure and the Old Thrills ...	43	REVIEWS:—
Photography of the Wild ...	45	The Greek Epic. By Professor Gilbert Murray ...	55
PICTURES OF TRAVEL:—		Revaluations ...	56
A Death at Nohant. By E. M. Cobden Sicker ...	46	Life in the Eighteenth Century ...	56
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		Napoleon's Brothers ...	57
The Report on Small Holdings By M.P. ...	47	Christian Symbolism ...	58
THE DRAMA:—		A Traveller in Persia. By Professor Edward G. Browne ...	60
A Delightful Comedy. By William Archer ...	48	Renaissance Sculpture ...	64
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		The Seven that were Hanged ...	66
Motor Roads and the Public. By Dr. A. Shadwell and a County Justice ...	49	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Lucellum ...	68
Women's Suffrage and the Liberal Party. By St. John G. Ervine, a Steady Opponent. E. M. White, and John R. Tomlinson ...	50	SUPPLEMENT ...	73

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE atmosphere of political suspense in which we live just now is full of sensational assertions and denials. Though there could be no ground for believing it possible that Mr. Asquith would meet Lord Lansdowne at Balmoral for an open "deal" upon the Finance Bill, it is equally foolish to suggest, as does one Liberal paper, that the tearing away of the Prime Minister from his heavy Parliamentary duties this week has no deep political significance, and is unconnected with the Constitutional crisis. Though it is quite incredible that the Prime Minister should bargain away or qualify in any manner the control over finance, it is very reasonable to suppose that the King should desire from him information and advice in relation to the Constitutional changes which must ensue in the event of the rejection of the Budget, and the bearing of these changes upon the functions of the Crown.

* * *

As we expected, we find certain Liberal members of Parliament beginning to shy at the prospect of a General Election in case the Lords accept the Budget. It will, they urge, be misunderstood as an assertion of a right of the Lords to force a dissolution. For this reason, it is suggested, though it is otherwise profitable and in every way desirable for Liberals to go to the country for a general endorsement of their policy and for an express mandate to destroy the veto of the Lords, that the Government should refrain. We hope this sophistry will not prevail. Because our opponent, mistaking his own interests, urges the course to which our real interests incline, are we to follow a course ex hypothesi injurious to our cause?

UNIONIST strategy for the General Election, which is so confidently predicted, is pushing "Unemployment" as its most formidable weapon. The "Daily Telegraph" would like "to induce every Unionist candidate and everyone assisting, not to open his mouth during that period upon any other subject." The "Observer" (again Mr. J. L. Garvin) considers that "The master-word of this struggle in its appeal to industrial democracy must be this—Unemployment." The battle of Protection in most democratic countries is fought upon the cry of "higher wages," surely more desirable from the workers' standpoint than "more work." For suppose it could be shown that in order to turn out the former quantity of wealth a tariff system required more work, this "reform" would hardly be popular with those invited to this wasteful effort. Meanwhile, Unionist workers may be reminded of Mr. Balfour's recent declaration, "I do not believe that any responsible leader of the party has ever suggested that the whole problem of unemployment will be solved by Fiscal Reform."

* * *

THE mutilation sustained by the Town Planning Bill in the House of Lords has destroyed the practical utility of the measure. The amendments referring all questions of valuation and compensation to local law courts, instead of leaving them to the discretion of officials of the Government, will render nugatory the most serviceable provisions of the Bill. It is to be hoped that the Commons will reinsert these powers, refusing a destructive compromise. It is noteworthy that the leader of the attack in the Lords was the Duke of Northumberland, who urged that the provision requiring owners to put their cottages into a state fit for human habitation should be excluded from repairing leases. It is an apposite comment upon the ducal conception of duties of property that the Northumberland County Bench has just ordered the closing of twenty-two cottages belonging to the Duke in the mining village of Walbottle, on account of their bad sanitary state. The Duke, who is this year President of the Royal Sanitary Institute, summarised his view of the situation in the following neat sentence, addressed to his fellow peers: "The provision of cottages is not an urgent matter, and it is much more important that owners should be safely guarded in the possession of their property."

* * *

THE havoc which the House of Lords has played with the Irish Land Bill gives dramatic point to the declaration just issued by Mr. John Redmond to the United Irish League of America, in which he asks for "prompt and generous aid" for the General Election which, he declares, is certain within the next few weeks. "In that election the veto of the House of Lords will be at stake, and with the veto of the House of Lords will disappear the last obstacle to Home Rule." It is, of course, evident that the Government must have the support of Irish Home Rulers in the great Constitutional fight. It is equally evident that the Government, irrespective of the size of the majority by which they are returned to power, must undertake Home Rule as one of their first tasks after the barrier has been swept away.

* * *

THERE is cold comfort for Protectionists in the Preliminary Return under the Census of Production Act laid before Parliament on Thursday. What the cumulative effect of the complete census will be upon the Tariff Reform campaign, which has derived what little success it has enjoyed from our national ignorance of the real dimensions of our home trade, can be easily imagined, since a bare section of British industries so effectually reduces imports and exports to secondary considerations as determining factors in the settlement of fiscal policy. Perhaps the most significant figure in the several tables is that which shows that the selling value of the gross output of this one small group of five leading trades (and two subsidiary) considerably exceeded the total value of the whole of our export of home products in 1907, the year of the census. Nor is this likely to exaggerate the comparative importance of the home market as it will be revealed by the complete census, for the group which is the subject of the Preliminary Returns contains at least two trades in which the exports are a particularly heavy proportion of the whole production.

* * *

THE National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies publishes this week a correspondence with the Prime Minister relating to a request first made last July that he should receive a deputation "representative of women engaged in public, professional, industrial, political and philanthropic work." In the earlier of two letters, communicated through his private secretary, the Premier refers to his recent treatment at Lympe as making the moment not "propitious" for any interview. To a letter from Mrs. Fawcett, disclaiming all responsibility for the actions of a "totally distinct organisation," a reply is given acknowledging the "totally distinct footing" of the National Union, but objecting that, if a deputation from it were received, not only other organisations with the same object in view, but societies opposing the Suffrage would claim the same privilege. In view of the urgency of the situation, upon which we comment elsewhere, it is surely not undesirable that Mr. Asquith should, in spite of the urgent demands upon his time, receive a deputation of law-abiding women who may fairly claim to have new facts, if not new arguments, to place before him, better communicated by personal interview than in writing.

* * *

A SINGULARLY interesting discussion of "Socialism from the Standpoint of Christianity" occupied the Church Congress in its meeting at Swansea, last Wednesday. Two of the four Bishops who took part in the discussion expressed a strong, though carefully guarded, sympathy with Socialism of the broader evolutionary type. The Bishop of Truro, who read the opening paper, maintained that "God's order for society was founded on mutual love and fellow-service, not on competition and selfishness"; while the Bishop of Southwark "was Socialist because he had seen some of the very best thought and life of the Church moving in the direction of Socialism and because of the growth of intellectual opinion in that direction outside the Church." A vigorous and sweeping attack was made by Dr. A. Shadwell, who expressed astonishment that clergymen should accept "views which involved a purely materialistic criterion of life and happiness." Socialism, as he culled it from the declarations of exponents, simply meant redistribution of wealth as the sole cure for human ills, while the method of this gospel was an appeal to "class warfare and greed." The Bishop of London and Bishop Welldon took a middle position, not condemning all Socialism as inherently and absolutely wrong, though the latter expressed his final judgment by saying that Socialism as now understood was at once "undesirable and impracticable."

* * *

LAST week the Spanish people were congratulating themselves that the end of the Moroccan affair was at hand; it has now become more involved than ever. On the very day that the Spanish flag was hoisted on Mount Gurugu a force, sent on a reconnaissance in the direction of the mines, lost 300 killed and wounded, including the General in command. This proved that the Moors did not feel themselves beaten, and General Marina telegraphed for more troops. The Government is preparing to send another division, which will raise the expeditionary force to 50,000 men. At the same time the Spanish Press, which remains strictly under the Censor's control, is talking of settling the business once for all by taking possession of a long stretch of the coast and of the interior, and war with the Sultan has become a near possibility. But the change in European sentiment is even more remarkable. A week ago the Powers replied to the Sultan's protest by saying that the Spanish operations concern only Spain and Morocco; now they are beginning to ask for guarantees.

* * *

FRANCE took the initiative in rejecting the Sultan's appeal, and France is now more disturbed than any other Power by the prolongation and extension of Spanish operations. The papers are afraid of a Spanish march upon Taza, which will cut the communications between Algeria and Ujda, and in any case the occupation of Moorish territory or a war with the Sultan will checkmate French ambitions and claims. The Spanish Government is trying to sooth these apprehensions, and an official intimation has been given to Germany that there is no change in the Spanish programme, and that Spanish action will "continue" to be kept within the limits of the Algeiras Convention. The undertaking may mean something or just nothing, because there can be hardly much doubt that the operations up till now have been a violation of the spirit and the letter of the Algeiras Convention. How far the Spanish Government will go will depend upon the pressure brought to bear upon it from without and within.

* * *

THE internal condition of Spain is grave enough. Whatever the demonstrations after the capture of Gurugu may have been worth, it is certain that the subsequent disaster and the dispatch of further reinforcements have caused profound depression and shaken the Government severely. The people want the war and the quasi-despotism to end, and as a first measure, the Opposition parties have demanded the restoration of the Constitutional guarantees in Barcelona and Gerona. But Señor Maura has not yet given way. The arrests and the executions continue in Barcelona, and Senor Ferrer is soon to be tried by a military Court which doubtless will give him short shrift for the fatal offence of anticlericalism, unless the temper of the Spanish people proves too awkward, or European public opinion proves once again strong enough to prevent a judicial outrage. It is hardly possible to push matters to the extreme in Morocco when the situation in Spain itself is so dubious, and the real interest of the Morocco affair lies in its action and reaction upon Spanish internal affairs.

A NEW session of the Duma is about to begin, and it finds the situation in Russia unchanged, except that there has been a good instead of a bad harvest. A by-election in St. Petersburg, which was a striking victory for the Cadets, indicates that the progressive temper, at least of the big cities, remains firm, but the control of the Government is still being contested by the more extreme reactionaries. The police veto on attempts to assert the constitutionality of the country, the continued prosecutions of the Cadets as an illegal party, the war on Finnish autonomy and the ruthless hangings for venial offences committed five years ago, may possibly express the best mind of M. Stolypin himself; but even if, as is more probable, they are a concession to powers stronger than he, they show the overwhelming influence of the extreme reactionaries, and the price M. Stolypin is willing to pay for office. As is natural for a Cabinet so placed, the two questions that most occupy it are foreign affairs and the raising of money. There is pretty certain to be a heavy deficit again, and although the reported bargains may be fictions, it is abundantly clear that Russia is asking for money, and that English financiers are anxious to oblige.

* * *

HILMI PASHA, the Turkish Grand Vizier, and Talaat Bey, the Minister of the Interior, have been opening their minds to a correspondent of the "Temps" who wanted to know the Government's policy towards the nationalities. Both are agreed that the religious heads of the nationalities must have no power whatsoever to speak on secular affairs in the name of their flock. The Parliament and the Government, they say, cannot tolerate any such restriction of their authority, and the claim to intervention has no legal basis. Whatever the texts may say, the practice of centuries and the whole organisation of the Turkish Empire are behind the claim. Doubtless the identity of political with religious communities conflicts with the ideal of Ottoman unity. But that ideal will take a long time to become a reality, and a sudden break with established traditions and institutions is not wise statesmanship. Equally open to criticism is the education policy of the Government, which seems to leave little hope for the schools of the nationalities. The Young Turks need to moderate the ardor of their Ottoman Imperialism. They are taking France and Germany as their models, but Turkey can never compass the unity and homogeneity of France or Germany.

* * *

THE opening of the Peking-Kalgan railway on Saturday is a memorable event in Chinese history, for the new railway has been financed entirely by Chinese money, built entirely by Chinese labor, and constructed entirely by Chinese engineers. It is a sound piece of work, 122 miles long, taps a prosperous district, already pays well, and will soon be extended. Two days later Chang-Chih-Tung, official promoter of the Southern railways, died. Chang Chih-Tung was the most famous scholar and man of letters in China, and at his death was Vice-roy and member of the Grand Council. A statesman of absolute honesty, he was the soul of China for the Chinese party. He resisted foreign aggression, he tried to develop China's resources and self-dependence, and in the trying days of the Boxer movement he kept Central China free from disturbance. But, perhaps, his greatest service to his country was his war upon opium: he, more than anybody, dictated the opium policy of the Government. Not, perhaps, the most efficient of administrators, and not without a strong dash of old-fashioned Conservatism, Chang Chih-Tung was nevertheless open to new ideas and his patriotism and his integrity were universally honored.

* * *

AFTER many months the Agram treason trial has come to an end. Twenty prisoners are acquitted and thirty-one condemned to terms of imprisonment ranging from five to twelve years. The condemned have been guilty of nothing worse than innocuous race sentimentalism which is tolerated with equanimity in every other part of Austria-Hungary, and the trial has been a scandal in inception and a gross outrage in its conduct. The Judges acted as undisguised partisans, and on repeated occasions punished the prisoners and their advocates. The trial was begun for political purposes. When the Coalition Government in Hungary made an inroad upon the constitutional rights of Croatia it broke with the Croatian party and found itself face to face with a hostile Croatian Parliament and people. Baron Rauch was sent to Croatia as Ban to teach the people a lesson. For more than a year the Croatian Parliament has been illegally prorogued, and the Agram trial was undertaken to ruin the Croatian opposition. It has merely ruined the reputation of the Magyar rulers and struck a heavy blow at the prestige of justice in the Dual Empire.

* * *

WE deeply regret that considerations of his wife's and his own health have compelled Sir John Brunner, who has sat for Northwich for nearly a quarter of a century, to announce to his constituents his intention not to stand again for Parliament. Among our successful business men few have devoted so much time and energy to public work. For many years Sir John has been a pioneer in certain paths of progress connected with the industrial development of England, and a generous supporter of many movements in which he has not found time to take a personal share. He belongs to the sturdy school of modern industrial Radicals, not afraid of well-regulated State action directed to the improvement of the land and labor of the nation, though averse from any general "Socialistic" policy.

* * *

THE Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants at their annual meeting have for some years passed a formal resolution in favor of State ownership of railways. This week, in view of the amalgamations and working agreements which are bringing the companies into effective solidarity, they took the further step of adopting with unanimity the following resolution, that "In the opinion of this Congress the Executive Committee should, in conjunction with the Labor Party, formulate a Bill for the nationalisation of railways."

* * *

THE discovery by Dr. Wallace, an American scholar, of fresh documentary evidence touching Shakespeare's pecuniary interest in the Blackfriars and Globe Theatres has aroused more attention than the substance of the documents appears to warrant. That Shakespeare was a shareholder in these theatres has long been known, and Dr. Wallace merely discloses certain facts giving more precise information as to the amount of his pecuniary interest, which appears to have been larger than was supposed. The chief document is the plaint of a suitor, Thomasina, daughter of the actor, William Ostler, in an action against her father for wrongful disposal of a property left her by her late husband.

Politics and Affairs.

THE KING, THE LORDS, AND THE BUDGET.

WHILE no man knows what the Lords will do about the Budget—for the Lords do not yet know themselves—it is fortunately possible for Liberals to know what they will do in any event. The proceedings of this year have at last brought the constitutional issue to a point at which settlement can no longer be postponed. It is not only the control of finance which is in question. It is equally the control of legislation. It is equally the question whether any Liberal Government can again undertake the responsibility of office. If the Lords throw out the Budget, an election follows as a matter of course. If they accept the Budget, an election follows none the less, and the central issue of that election is in either case the veto of the Lords. It is impossible after what has happened this summer, following on all that passed in the three preceding years, that the Liberal Party should settle quietly down to the work of legislation next Session as though the House of Commons could legislate freely in accordance with the wishes of the majority. The Government has adumbrated a far-reaching social programme. Not only has it to redeem its pledges to Scotland and Wales, to educationalists and to temperance reformers, it has also to carry through great reforms in the administration of the Poor Law, and to make the first serious attempt to relieve the tragedy of unemployment. In these questions democracy needs a free hand. It would be out of reason to ask the House of Commons to sit down to these immense legislative tasks without the smallest guarantee that its work will produce any durable result. The House of Commons must regain the power to act before it can be called upon to go through another session as arduous as this, or even as former sessions of the present Parliament have been. More than ever the constitutional question is the "dominant issue," and to recur to the ordinary work of legislation without settling it is to attempt to build without a foundation.

Liberals then will concentrate their attention on two points and two only throughout the crisis. First they will demand that on the financial question there shall be no compromise or hint of compromise. Secondly they will insist that the issue now raised is not confined to finance; that it extends to the whole problem of legislation; and that it has to be dealt with and decided by an appeal to the people before the ordinary legislative work of Parliament can be resumed. As to the first point, the air is thick with rumors of a "deal." The Unionist leaders are—of course, for a consideration—to exercise a restraining hand on the financiers and the "wild men." The King has seen Lord Cawdor. He has seen that great leader of men and sagacious interpreter of signs and omens, Lord Rosebery. He has seen Mr. Asquith. It is evident that he is bringing the beneficent influence of an impartial authority to bear in the direction of conciliation. It is, of course, right and proper that the influence of the Crown should be directed to maintaining the traditions of the Constitution. But in this case there is no doubt whatever as to the direction in which those traditions point. One authority after another has shown that, if an unwritten Constitution has any value at all, in this matter of finance the law of our Constitution is clear. The Lords have no power in finance. They cannot touch financial clauses in ordinary legislation. With the Finance Bill they have nothing to do except read it and register their assent. This being so, there exists on the question of the Budget no materials for a compromise. Room for conciliation there has been. Concession after concession has been made, but they have been made in the House of Commons, and the time for making them is now at an end. When the Finance Bill leaves the House of Commons it leaves it in the shape in which it is destined to become law. Nor is this all. There can, in the matter of finance, be no indirect or compensatory concession which might tacitly admit the claim of the Upper House. There can be no bargaining as to the date of the dissolution, for example. If the Lords desire a dissolution in January, so do Liberals, and Liberals will not refuse to dissolve at a time of great advantage to themselves merely because the Lords press them to do so. But their leaders will make no bargain on the point. They will press the Budget. They will insist on their right to obtain the Budget without any compromise or concession or consideration offered in return. To anyone, however exalted, who should urge the avoidance of a constitutional struggle they have a very clear reply. The struggle is not of their seeking, and could not now be averted by any concession. It has been forced upon them by the Lords, who, from the moment when they mutilated the Education Bill and rejected the Plural Voting Bill, initiated a new epoch in constitutional history, by giving to their power an interpretation which would make them the masters of Governments and their Chamber the centre of gravity in the Constitution. To seek an accommodation with them on the present issue would be to recognise the most extravagant of their claims.

The first point, then, on which Liberal opinion is clear is that the financial issue offers no materials for a compromise direct or indirect. The second is scarcely less important. It is, we believe, the universal feeling of Liberals that, whatever the decision of the Lords, the entire constitutional question must at length come up for settlement. The Government has been exceedingly forbearing—we have often criticised it as too forbearing—in dealing with the action of the Upper House in thwarting its legislative efforts. The only result of such forbearance has been to extend still further the pretensions of the peers, and it is certain that if they pass the Budget they will all the more hold themselves at liberty to deal, as they are even now dealing, with all legislative proposals that come up to them at their own will and pleasure. Of the effects of this procedure on legislation and on the position of the Government we have often spoken, and shall have to speak again. But we think that Mr. C. E. Mallet speaks not especially for advanced but for average Liberal opinion in the House when he writes in the "Westminster Gazette" that if the question of the veto is left unsettled, "we return, whatever our numbers, to plough the sands once more. We return to the weary round, . . . weary because we know that our work is bound to prove waste labor, so long as the Tory Party command the House of Lords." And on a further point we agree with Mr. Mallet. The party has made up its mind to the struggle, and is fully aware that it will go into the fight under far more favorable circumstances in January than it would do after another unharvested session. But it wishes for a clear pronouncement upon the actual policy on which issue is to be joined. Here its mind is open, and it is willing to accept a lead. What is the lead to be? Does the Campbell-Bannerman resolution hold the field, or has the Government an alternative? "Whatever be the case, now is the time for leaders to consider and agree, to weigh the advantages and disadvantages of the alternative courses whereby the power of the Lords may be so defined as to enable the will of the people to prevail in legislation, and to make it possible for representatives of either party to take office without putting themselves into an impossible position. We cannot have the issue too soon or too clearly defined. The end is perfectly clear. We may fairly ask our leaders to give us their view of the means by which it is to be secured.

THE SUFFRAGIST DEADLOCK : A SUGGESTION.

THE militant suffragists, as we understand them, take this position. The case for the suffrage is just and reasonable, and for half a century its advocates have made a steady, persistent appeal to the sense of justice and the reason of male legislators and a male electorate. They have failed, and the nature of their failure makes it evident that an appeal to justice and reason is not an adequate method of attaining the object. For although by this educative method a pledge can be procured from a majority of representatives in Parliament, based on an admission of the justice and reasonability of the demand, some irrational or unjust motives enter in as barriers between the pledge and its redemption. This barrier of prejudice or unreasoning sentiment cannot, ex hypothesi, yield to an appeal the validity of which it repudiates; it can only be broken down by force and menace. 'To force and menace therefore we are compelled to resort: if we begin by the gentle force of vocable interruption and besetting, and this fails, we must strengthen the dose, proceeding to forcible intrusion upon Ministers and threatening letters to their families; if this fails, physical violence of growing degrees must follow, involving risk to life and limb, not only of those personally responsible for withholding justice, but of others in their company. If this campaign of physical force and menace can be conducted with sufficient vigor, variety, and duration, it will succeed in overpowering the 'unreason' of the opposition, and it must be extended and intensified until it does.' Answer a fool according to his folly, meet force by force.

Here we have a "war" of outlaw women against organised male society, claiming the "right" to use any sort of weapon and to inflict any sort of injury. The position taken by the extremists is that familiar in anarchist propaganda. Although the thrower of a bomb knows what he is doing and intends to do it, no moral responsibility rests with him for any injury he inflicts on innocent victims of his outrage: for whatever suffering attends his act Society is alone responsible, Society the real criminal who has driven him to such reprisals. The Government, in refusing a franchise, is morally guilty of any injury caused by throwing stones into a meeting: this being so, no legal penalty ought to be inflicted on the perpetrators of such acts, and any hardships which they suffer at the hands of the law, or which they bring upon themselves in prison, are "outrages" which simply go to aggravate the initial injustice of the Government. Apparently there is a refusal to accord any blame to any kind of act, however wild or wanton it may seem, done by anyone who is actuated by resentment at the Government, while every violence to which officials resort in enforcing the law is a new wrong. This attitude even transcends the rigid logic of anarchism. For the strict anarchist, recognising himself at war against Society, admits the doctrine "Vae victis" and does not complain of "what he gets" at the hands of the enemy. Most of the suffragists claim more "consideration" for a woman "at war" than would be claimed for any man at war, though the women have chosen to adopt male weapons and tactics. This, however, is but a minor consideration, and perhaps the peculiar logic of their case will be held to entitle them to seek to utilise for their defence any little remnant of preferential treatment which usage or obsolescent chivalry may afford.

Now, though it may be difficult to find even a specious defence in the economy of force for promiscuous violence, or the policy of run-a-mok, except a "general advertising," the broader issue of the efficacy of force and menace deserves more serious examination. Militant suffragists can point to history, male history, in support of the view that an alloy of force seems necessary to carry reason and justice to victory. "Force is the midwife of reform" is an accepted revolutionary doctrine.

But though experience appears to assign a place to physical force in history, the economical use of it requires close consideration. It appears "good" for a brief emergency where a matter can be rushed. This statement discloses the fundamental tactical error of the militant suffragists. They appear to have supposed that a quite well organised and violent assault would carry the fortress. For this purpose they choose a dictator, abrogating all the liberty and sanity of a democratic movement. If six months or a year of the earlier tactics of moderated force could have sufficed, the policy might have been historically justified. But it could not suffice, and every extension of it towards the present policy of almost indiscriminate violence is sheer loss. We are aware that this statement will be flatly denied and genuinely disbelieved by the militants, who, though they may agree that their "pledglings" in the House of Commons have turned traitors, claim that they have or shortly will have a majority of the male electorate with them, and won by the very methods we deplore. We are convinced they are mistaken. A certain amount of well-directed driving "force" may be an adjunct to the assertion of a just and reasonable cause upon the stage of human affairs, but the effect of excessive or loose violence is just the opposite. The very dramatic excitement which violence arouses cancels so much of the appeal to justice and reason. Even where this substitution consists in setting stronger violence against weaker, so that the cause prevails by methods of injustice, the victory is usually no settlement but bears upon it the brand of its unreason. But, where the force is of a definitely weaker sex, and of a sporadic, anarchic sort, acting against the whole brute force of the modern State, there can be no chance even of a Pyrrhic victory. Women who follow this course impatiently throw away the weapons of truth and right, which do in the long run prevail, in favor of weapons which they can never hope to wield with equal skill and efficacy. No body of men will actually yield to this necessarily weaker force: they would despise themselves if they did, and, what is more, the women who seek to co-operate with them in the work of government would despise them also. We do not say that this ought to be so, but it is. Therefore, granting the utmost which the stoutest "realist" can claim for "force" as a factor in progress, the recent use of force by militant suffragists is suicidal.

On this preachment we fear that "militants" will be disposed to make two brief comments. The first is that all this is mere male sophistry, used by enemies of their cause to deter them from following a successful line of attack. To this imputation of mala fides, exceedingly unjust as it will appear to those who have followed our policy throughout this movement, we can, of course, make no reply. But the second is more relevant. 'What,' they will say, "about the conduct of the Government? Why do you lecture us and not them, regarding the abuse of force? We have suffered much more physical violence than they. It is their example that has incited us: closing one after another the avenues of moral force, denying interviews, falsifying pledges, refusing us protection against male mobs, denying us the milder treatment due to political offenders, they have driven us, as a counsel of despair, to the methods you condemn.'

We might reply that, however unjust might be the treatment of the franchise question by the Government, the initial use of physical violence lay in the disturbance of meetings and the technical assaults upon the police. But such discussion of the order of events is unprofitable. We would prefer to address a reasoned appeal to both parties for a suspension of hostilities, and since we know the Government to be the stronger, we would invite them to take the first steps towards a settlement. We make this suggestion both as advocates of the suffrage and as supporters of the Government. It is idle to conceal the seriousness of a situation which by some irresponsible act of violence may any day become irretrievable. The Government have made serious blunders in their treatment of what was at first a mild though lawless method of protest. They can retrieve these blunders by a change of action appropriate to the approaching emergency of a General Election, and creditable in itself as a measure of humanity. If the Prime Minister were now to make a speech, acknowledging freely the bravery and disinterestedness, though deprecating sternly the violence, of the militant suffragists; were he to express even now a willingness to receive a deputation of the moderate wing of the movement who have never ceased to urge this course upon him by peaceful pressure; and, finally, were he to undertake that if in the first Session a clearly pledged majority of suffragists returned to the next Parliament carried a resolution in favor of woman's suffrage, the Government would allow effect to be given to this judgment in a Franchise Bill, we can hardly doubt the efficacy of this pacific policy. Such an address, attended, we would suggest, by an amnesty to all imprisoned suffragists, would be a worthy and a generous method for a Liberal Government to adopt. The coarser type of clubman might indeed deride it as "magnanimity," or as a lapse into sheer Christianity. A few of the irreconcilable suffragists might dub it "surrender" to their policy of menace or denounce it as mere electioneering. But in fact, and even in appearance, it would be neither magnanimity nor surrender, but good policy. If this truly Liberal overture were accepted by the adherents of violence in the spirit in which it was made, we should have obtained a truce, and probably a lasting peace from this most painful and degrading war. If it were not so received, the necessary effect would be to make a clear and serviceable severance between a comparatively small body of irreconcilables and the large number of adherents or sympathisers who are influenced by what they regard as the hard measure meted out to courageous women who are making tremendous personal sacrifices for an idea. Is not the present juncture one in which the Government might consider this policy of reconciliation?

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

THE Church Congress which has assembled this week at Swansea presents many points of resemblance with the Congresses that have preceded it. These similarities are probably inevitable, but the existence of them produces a feeling of sameness and monotony upon the outside public, which detracts from the real value assemblies of this kind undoubtedly possess. As we look down the list of speakers and of readers of papers we see that they are the same men or the same type of men who are always to the fore upon Church platforms. Many of them are earnest and excellent men, but we know beforehand the line they will take, and even in those cases where they have a message it is a message which we have heard many times before. It seems impossible, for example, for a Church Congress to be complete without the presence of the Dean of Canterbury on the one hand and Lord Hugh Cecil on the other. Both of these gentlemen are from their different standpoints excellent Churchmen, but the average Englishman who takes an interest in ecclesiastical affairs is perfectly familiar with the mental attitude and idiosyncrasies of both. But criticism of this kind is perhaps beside the mark when applied to ecclesiastical assemblies. Most of the people who frequent them have what may be called the ecclesiastical mind, with its affection for what it believes to be the old ways and its distrust of the new and unexpected. The organisers of a Church Congress are obliged to cater for the class of people accustomed to attend it, and if the combined result of their labors is to compel us to breathe the same old atmosphere, it is a result which inevitably flows from the limitations imposed upon them by the nature of their task. It was imperative that a Church Congress held in Wales at the present time should occupy itself with the question of Welsh Disestablishment. The Prime Minister has pledged himself to the Welsh members to take up this subject in the next session of Parliament, and, although other matters have for the time being thrust the proposal to disestablish the Welsh Church into the background, it still holds a prominent position in the Ministerial programme. In these circumstances it was only natural that the Bishop of St. David's, as President of the Congress, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, as Primate, should have something to say in defence of the existing relations between the Church and State in Wales. It is impossible for them to overlook the momentous fact that the whole of the representatives for Wales in the present Parliament are pledged to the policy of Disestablishment, but the Archbishop contends that the unanimity of the Welsh Parliamentary representatives does not imply a corresponding unanimity among the Welsh people. This is no doubt the case. But if Wales, in so far as ecclesiastical affairs are concerned, is to be looked upon as a distinct and separate entity, it is impossible to go behind the overwhelming voice of the Welsh members and to say that Disestablishment is an iniquity because it does not command the unanimous assent of the Welsh people. On this principle no legislation of any kind would be possible, inasmuch as there is always a minority, and sometimes a powerful minority, hostile to every legislative proposal.

The opponents of disestablishment are on more favorable ground when they say that for all ecclesiastical purposes England and Wales are not two separate entities, but an organic whole; that, historically, they have been indissolubly united in one communion, and that it would be just as reasonable to disestablish the dioceses of Cornwall and Devonshire as it is to disestablish the dioceses of Wales. It is probable that both Cornwall and Devon have Parliamentary majorities in favor of disestablishment, but the voices of these two counties would not be listened to unless they correspond with the wishes of the country as a whole. From the historical point of view it is no doubt true that the Episcopal Church in England and Wales has for many centuries been one organisation. But during all this time it has been ministering to two different races, and if it loses its paramount hold on one of these races it is difficult to see with what justice the more numerous race should compel the less numerous to retain the Church in its position as an establishment.

On the whole the case for disestablishment in Wales is at present strong enough without embarrassing it by weak and insincere arguments. It is a perilous approach to cant on the part of the opponents of the Episcopal Church in Wales to say to Welsh Churchmen, "We are disestablishing you for your own good; we are disendowing you because you will be better without endowments. Look at us, how free we are as compared with you." Some Churchmen, rightly or wrongly, will regard the disestablishment and disendowment of their Church as an evil and a calamity both to themselves and to the Christian faith. The bitterness which the disestablishment of the Welsh Church will inevitably produce in the minds of Churchmen will be made worse by the pretext that it has been done for the good of the Church. Lord Hugh Cecil is quite right when he points out that Welsh disestablishment will deepen the estrangement which exists between Nonconformity and the Church. Nonconformists should plead for disestablishment on the ground of religious equality, and not on the transparent fiction that it will benefit the Church. Professor Jowett used to say that the expulsion of the Nonconformists from the Anglican establishment had split up the English people into two nations, the Churchman and the Dissenter. The aim of statesmanship should be to promote national solidarity, which is another word for national strength. This end can only be achieved by pursuing as far as possible a policy of concord, and by doing nothing which will awaken the envenomed animosities of the past.

A church is primarily a religious institution, and it would be surprising if papers of a definitely religious character did not find a place within a Church Congress programme. Most of the papers to be read at Swansea appear to deal with the circumference rather than the centre of the religious problems of the day. The relation of the individual to the Church as an institution is an interesting and important question. But it is a question lying at the circumference, not at the centre; and a church, if it is to live, must deal with matters of infinitely deeper import. The relation of the individual to society as it is touched on in papers dealing with Socialism and the Poor Law, comes distinctly within the sphere of Christian ethics, but a church would never live if it were nothing more than an ethical society. The secret of the Church's life is that it has a conception of man's relation, not merely to his fellow-man or to ecclesiastical institutions, but to the whole order of the universe. In his transitory life man finds himself confronted not only with his fellow-man but also with the mysterious forces of the world, and the deepest desire of his heart is to know whether these forces are the blind operations of a mindless fate, or whether they are dominated by a conscious power behind them which he can reverence and trust. The heart of religion consists in the belief that there is such a power, and all its achievements in the world are to be attributed to this faith. The great task of the Church in modern times is to strengthen the intellectual basis of its fundamental conception. Unless Church Congresses are helping towards the fulfilment of this task their labors are not very profitable.

TAMMANY AGAIN.

NEW YORK is bracing itself for another of its periodic struggles with Tammany Hall. In less than a month the citizens of the second largest city in the world will be choosing the Mayor who is to rule over them for the next four years. The issues on which the campaign turns are almost primitive in their simplicity. So long as Tammany exists—and Tammany will always exist—they cannot well do anything else. The Republicans and Independents have put forward as their candidate Mr. Otto T. Bannard, the President of the New York Trust Company, and a banker and philanthropist of unexceptional character and capacity. In their platform they touch on various municipal questions, such as the reorganisation of the civic finances, the provision of better transit facilities, the municipal ownership and control of the tube railways, the perennial problem of the police, and the amendment of the City charter. But all these are subsidiary to the supreme issue, the issue of Tammany. In every New York Mayoralty election the problem of problems is either to get Tammany out, or to prevent it from getting in. The essential, unchanging character of that remarkable organisation makes every contest in which it takes part the touchstone of a few elementary principles. Are you for good government or for bad, for honesty in the administration of municipal affairs or for the extreme of piratical corruption, for a government of law or a government of "graft"? That is the pith of the conundrum which the presence and power of Tammany necessarily submit to the electorate. Tammany Hall, as the Republican platform truthfully insists, is something more than a political adversary. It is a public enemy. But while that is the real heart of the whole issue, not every New Yorker will realise it. It is obscured by the fact that though Tammany has been in power for the last six years, there have been few serious scandals, few revelations of gross wrong-doing; and by the further fact that throughout that period the Tammany Mayor has been Mr. McClellan, a son of the famous General, a gentleman of high social position, and of unblemished character, and an administrator of accepted competency. People no doubt suspect that Tammany is still the Tammany of old behind the scenes; that "graft" and blackmail still hold sway; that the partnership between the police and crime still exists; and that Tammany still exacts a commission on every franchise, concession, and contract granted in the City's name. But while they suspect they have little tangible proof. They may believe, they may even know, that the police are still corrupt, and that the affairs of the City have been administered with shameless waste. But they cannot lay their finger on the man or the system that is directly and obviously responsible. The anti-Tammany forces have this year comparatively little on which to base an appeal to the conscience of the voters; and it is only when the conscience of the voters has been aroused by some particular revelation of Tammany rascality, that Tammany has ever been overthrown. Moreover, the Tammany candidate in the present campaign is Mr. Justice Gaynor, a Judge of the Supreme Court of New York State, and a man, says the "Times" correspondent, "who all his life has denounced the very evils with which the name of Tammany Hall has been associated"—in other words, a respectable figurehead of a type that Tammany has always known how to utilise in its hour of need. The omens, therefore, for a victory for the "good citizens" do not look particularly bright.

What is Tammany, and why? How is it that in an English-speaking community an organisation that is a synonym all the world over for every form of political viciousness has never yet been defeated twice running? What is the secret of its inexhaustible vitality and of its hold, that only a moral earthquake can relax even for a moment, over the New York masses? We cannot attempt to answer these questions with the fulness they deserve, but merely to set forth certain considerations that may serve in part both to describe Tammany and to explain it. At bottom, Tammany is no worse and no better than a host of other "machines," Republican and Democratic, to be found all over the United States. It overshadows them in notoriety, partly because it is vastly better organised, and partly because the scene of its operations happens to be the American Metropolis. But fundamentally it does not differ either in form or methods from the normal type of American political organisation. There might be a Tammany in every city in the Union; many cities besides New York do, in fact, possess one. Wherever the system of primaries and nominating conventions obtains, there is a potential Tammany, because the system is one that makes too great a demand on the average, busy, well-intentioned but not over-earnest citizen, who is bewildered by its intricacies, repelled by its associations, and ends by leaving it to be manipulated by professional experts who give their whole time to the business. But Tammany has some special advantages that are all its own. It is the oldest political organisation in America, if not in the world. It is only a fortnight younger than the Federal Government itself. It has therefore the authority and prestige that in a new country are peculiarly apt to gather round an old institution. Then, too, Tammany is the official New York branch of the National Democratic Party. That gives it an influence which we in England with our lax notions of party discipline can hardly even realise. Tammany's candidates and programmes are binding on Democratic voters in New York City to a degree that would amaze an English campaign manager. Its loyalty to the greater body of which it is a part predisposes every Democrat to support it, and explains why, in spite of all revelations, Democrats of standing and respectability like Mr. McClellan and Mr. Justice Gaynor are willing and even eager to fight under its banner.

Tammany, again, has an unsurpassable organisation. As a mere piece of mechanism it holds its own with the German General Staff, the Roman Curia, and the Mormon hierarchy. From the omnipotent Boss to the humblest worker in the rank and file, there is a graduated descending scale of power and responsibility. Each active member is held personally to account for the vote in his area, be it a "block" or half a block, or a single tenement house, or an entire district. While obedience must be implicit and unquestioning, while slackness is punished without mercy, there is always for faithful and adequate service a tangible reward in office, hard cash, or "pull." Tammany internally is a pure democracy, with all careers open to talent, and nothing to prevent a man with the requisite powers from rising to the top. It disdains nothing that will help it towards its goal. A popular saloon-keeper, a foreman who is liked by his men, an immigrant who has influence over his countrymen, whoever and whatever he may be, white, black or yellow, Protestant, Catholic, Confucian or Jew, Tammany will stoop to him, flatter him, do him a good turn, and enrol him among its workers. "Politics," says Mr. Dooley, "is the poor man's college." But to the festering East Side Tammany is far more than a college. It is a club, a church, a centre of charity and benevolence. The poor of New York look upon Tammany as a sort of multiplied Santa Claus, a mysteriously beneficent body, that in return for a paltry vote will radiate good-fellowship and practical help, will pay a man's rent and doctor's bills, will give him a start in trade, or find a job for him in the municipal service, or "see him through" when he is in trouble with the police. And Tammany really does do all this. It succeeds where most amateur philanthropy fails; it gets among the poor and befriends them without once seeming condescending or self-righteous. To many a poor immigrant the power and authority of the American Commonwealth are summed up in the Tammany District Leader; to many thousands more he, or one of his lieutenants, is the only helpful friend they have ever known. On this foundation Tammany builds up its electoral power, seizes the city and sacks it. Trading on the merry and imperturbable cynicism with which New Yorkers regard politics and politicians, thoroughly in sympathy with the spirit of the feverish, pleasure-loving, Pagan population over which it rules, gathering round it an enormous number of beneficiaries from all classes—rich contractors and destitute aliens—whose interests are wrapped up in maintaining it in power, and filling its exchequer by blackmail, the sale of offices, the sale of immunity to every species of law-breaker, and percentages on the incalculable hinterland of spoils that lies behind every sphere, however insignificant, of municipal activity—the wonder is not that Tammany should sometimes win, but that it should ever be defeated.

Life and Letters.

SHAKESPEARE'S DOUBLE.

TILL within the last ten years the present writer used much to frequent a substantial little house on Bankside where a famous past kept peering through dingy and fading realities. Finely fitted mahogany doors told of Georgian merchants; it was no surprise to discover a secret chamber, and across the back yard stood a wash-house with barred windows and heavy lintels, dim relic of the old Clink prison and Alsatian exuberance.

Down a lane close by, if you climbed to an open grating, you could see the shallow depression in the ground which tradition still called the Bear Pit, and by raking at the surface, people said, the bones of bears could be discovered for any dog to bait and worry afresh. Here was the Swan Inn, unconsciously telling of the Swan theatre three centuries before, just as Curtain Road down Shoreditch way tells of the curtain that rose and fell in a theatre older still. Here was Park Street, reminiscent of "The Park" of better days, though its old name was Maiden Lane, when the Globe Theatre stood on one side of it or the other; and, a little further down stream towards London Bridge, you could still trace certain bits of old walls and arch built into warehouses, showing where the great palace of Winchester's bishops once stood.

Scrap-iron and electric works have swept away the house and Clink, nor is one sure about the bear-pit. But the rest remains much the same, and what with the memorial stone in Park Street and Dr. Wallace's discoveries of records, it has all been very prominent this week. The ancient spirits were called up again; for a moment the past has almost reappeared, and we have realised that one of the Southwark crowd might possibly have had a grandfather only ten times removed who saw Shakespeare hastening to the first rehearsal of "Hamlet," and was terrified at his acting of the Ghost. To be sure, the memorial stone may be set on the wrong side of the street, and Dr. Wallace's discoveries have hitherto revealed little that was unknown to scholars like Dr. Sidney Lee. But it is certain that Shakespeare really did live "near the Bear Garden," that he was an actor himself at the Globe Theatre in Maiden Lane, and that he made a few pounds extra by writing plays for it (£11 being the highest price paid for any play before 1599, when the Globe was built). And after the crack-brained theorising of last century's end, there is some comfort in remembering that he acted, wrote, or lived at all.

That we should count it a great discovery to find his name mentioned in the legal documents of a friend's family-quarrel is but an example of the iniquity with which, as Sir Thomas Browne said, oblivion scattereth her poppy, dealing with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity. It does not matter to a yard where the Globe Theatre stood, and we knew before that Shakespeare drew some £500 or £600 a year (say £4,000 or more in our money) from his shares in that theatre and the Blackfriars. We knew of Heming before, whose daughter brought this lawsuit, for it was he and his fellow-actor Condell who, after Shakespeare's death, rescued his plays from their theatre's scrap-heap. The thing that really delights us is simply the new mention of Shakespeare's name as a living man among his contemporaries. That the world knows nothing of its greatest men is in these days only a silly paradox; but of Shakespeare, certainly, no one of his times cared to know much. Had he lived among us now, what interviews we should have handed down to posterity! What details about his dogs and carpets, his pipes, his clothes, his income, and his hair! We could have turned him up in "Who's Who." We should have known the date of his knighthood, and a conspicuous friend would have presented him with a biography, analysing his nature and promising him fame. After his death, what columns of appreciation and reminiscence, what chatter about Anne, and the Dark Lady, and the dubious wife of Oxford! And a few years later, upon every shred and morsel of his existence the ghouls of literature would have settled, and for many long years they would have found fine feeding on his bones.

From all such ignominy destiny saved him like a god. It is true that we know rather more facts about Shakespeare than about most great writers of his age, unless, like Sir Thomas More, Spenser and Milton, they took some part in public affairs. For no record was considered necessary except for a man of action, and, if Boswell had not written, many of us would accept the rule. But even in Shakespeare's case, no kind of biography was attempted for a century after his death. Our facts have to be drawn from bare legal documents, and our knowledge of his personality from half-a-dozen sentences left by his friends, or from country gossip gathered among the aged after his death. It is noticeable how well each scrap of evidence harmonises in the picture we can form. As "sugared" was the word chosen by Meres to describe the sonnets, so "sweet" was the recognised quality of Shakespeare himself. He was reputed pleasant, and "of civil demeanor." Ben Jonson, who "loved the man and honored his memory on this side idolatry as much as any," proceeds after that splendid outburst to speak of him simply as "indeed honest and of an open and free nature." The Stratford people remembered him as "very good company, and of a very ready and pleasant smooth wit." Evidently he was a man of quiet and sweetly reasonable temper, courteous and serene in manner, calm rather than tempestuous, and lovable rather than dominating. We see nothing of the fighter about him, nothing of Kit Marlowe's turbulence, on whose tavern death a moralist wrote, "See now what a hook the Lord put in the nostril of this barking dog!" There was no barking dog in Shakespeare. If we take Benjamin Jowett's definition that the man of power is the original man who keeps within conventions, Shakespeare would serve as an example.

The sweetness and element of calm have, indeed, often been made a reproach to the poet's memory by those who cannot picture genius except in the rebellion of maddened hair and tempest-flashing eye. It has seemed so natural to find poets begging their bread or wallowing in the gutter, that even Shakespeare's business habit and steady income have been flung up against him as proofs of an inferior and prosaic nature. From Pope to Bishop Blougram, and onward to this day, the taunt of worldly wisdom has been repeated. Pope speaks of one who:—

"For gain not glory winged his roving flight,
And grew immortal in his own despite."

Browning makes the great Bishop appeal to Shakespeare's example in excuse for his own worldliness:—

"Let him say, 'In the face of my soul's works
Your world is worthless and I touch it not Lest I should wrong them'—I'll withdraw my plea.
But does he say so? Look upon his life!
Himself, who only can, gives judgment there.
He leaves his towers and gorgeous palaces
To build the trimmest house in Stratford town;
Saves money, spends it, owns the worth of things."

Poets, and they among the greatest, repeat the reproach against their master. How was it that this sweet-tempered, smooth-witted man, who managed his affairs so successfully; who wrote what the public wanted so as to add some £30 a year (say, £250 of our money) to his income; who, when that income seemed secure, threw away his magic wand and retired to a garden in a quiet country town, though his productive power was still at its height—how was it that such an estimable and worthy character came at the same time to possess a poetic genius which Europe has acknowledged to be unexampled in her history? The question brings us near the dangerous mystery of the soul, and the multiplied phases under which we recognise her identity. But for some guidance let us return to Sir Thomas Browne, who might well have seen Shakespeare in the flesh, since their lives overlapped by eleven years. There is a passage in which, after speaking of man as an amphibious piece, between a corporal and a spiritual essence, disposed to live in divided and distinguished worlds, he thus proceeds:—

"Now for that immaterial world, methinks we need not wander so far as the first moveable; for even in this material fabric the spirits walk as freely exempt from the affection of time, place, and motion, as beyond the extremest circumference. Do but extract from the corpulency of bodies, or resolve things beyond their first matter, and you discover the habitation of angels."

So it may be with genius lurking under smooth appearances, nor is it always in the thunder and the fire that the spirit is revealed, but in the still, small voice. Within the material fabric of that reasonable, courteous, and prudent man, the soul walked freely exempt from the affection of time, place, and motion, embracing the world, various as an English sky, capable of every emotion that rejoices or torments the heart of men and women. That outward man, so pleasing to his friends, so disconcerting to romantic critics now, was but a casing, a double, a corporal essence, having hardly more to do with the reality of Shakespeare than the smiling effigy on his tomb. Aloof and half unconscious beneath that form, lay the fine spirit that breathed with the life of all the world, and out of a breath created living souls more memorable than history has supplied. Call-boy, actor, shareholder, man of property, and substantial citizen of a country town—all these he was, and it is very good of scholars to spend so much trouble in finding out the facts and dates. But when we think of Shakespeare, we set aside this double of his soul and find these things of little consequence. For they are but the corpulency of bodies, and we must resolve them beyond their first matter before we can discover the habitation of angels.

INSTITUTIONS AND INSPIRATION.

ONE of the strangest and sometimes perhaps one of the saddest things that the student of history comes to realise must surely be that law which seems to doom every great ideal and every great movement to give birth to organisations which, while created to promote it, end by destroying it or diverting it to different channels. The cynics laugh at the contrast between present-day Christianity, as manifested in the dignity of the great historic churches, and the rude simplicity of the Galilean fishers; in a narrower field the most sympathetic of French historians has traced for us the tragic way in which the great spiritual forces that made the early Franciscan movement what it was, were trammelled, if not extinguished, by the growth of the very society which they had called into being.

The mystic laments the fall from the unrealised ideal; the statesman makes rejoinder that the change is a needful one, and a necessary means of progress. So across the centuries contend with one another the men of method and of discipline and the men of vision. Iscariot still follows in the steps of Christ, bearing his money bags, planning his arrangements of finance, ignoring his ideal.

Most of us must sympathise with Iscariot; we have so often been in his place, sometimes in spite of ourselves, perhaps. Or if we cannot sympathise with him, at least we must with Brother Elias, that born master of organisation, the practical man who saw the beauty of the character of St. Francis, recognised the power of his attractive nature, and wished to turn all to visible use, to build up around him a great society which should be a guide to kings and prelates, a Divine stronghold into which the beauty and the riches of the world should be brought. Elias doubtless felt that St. Francis was too good for this world; he himself dealt with men as men, understanding the worth of compromise, seeing the strength of institutions. The Elias whom most of us know well enough always tends to think of an ideal merely in its relation to institutions actual or possible, while the Francis, for whom we look too often in vain, thinks of the institution only as at best the imperfect embodiment of, or the means to, the ideal, and more often as the hindrance to be overcome on the way, "my brother the ass," who can only be guided with difficulty.

It is very easy for us to recognise in a far off time the failure of institutions to realise the ideal that inspired their origin, and we readily admit, in the abstract, the need for the ideal to dominate the institution and the danger of the institution running away with the ideal. It is harder to see in our own lives how far we are allowing the machinery to take us from its object, how far that machinery is out of date or out of gear, since we are in the thick of it all, our ears dulled by the roar of the wheels. Assuming that we admit that Iscariot has his right and helpful place, how are we to find it and keep him there?

How great is the failure of our countless institutions intended to promote social welfare, we to some extent realise as we take up the "Annual Charities Register and Digest," published by the Charity Organisation Society, and turn over those 700 pages describing the various societies, with all their staffs and offices, at work in the city, which is still the London that we know. Life appears almost to become at times to some men one long committee, but little, after all, seems done. And this failure may be seen, to some extent at least, even in recent movements which were originally a protest against the narrowness and superficiality of earlier methods of dealing with the problems of modern society. The first thought of the men who conceived the idea of the university settlement was surely not to found a new institution, so much as to bring life into touch with life, to make centres in which knowledge and experience might be collected, and from which men and ideas might be put at the service of all who had most need of them. Yet, in spite of themselves, they have almost become institutions; indeed, some settlements have frankly made it their aim to be such, and as one reads reports from across the water of all that our American friends are doing, one must admit that they have been most successful in achieving their object. If the settlement movement (as it is called) had not begun as it did twenty odd years ago, perhaps these wonderful centres of activity would not have come into being, or would have been very different from what they are. Yet would the founders of the first settlement have recognised as their spiritual descendants these men, unselfish as they are, whose methods are so different? Did there ever come before their vision the picture of a great building raised by some millionaire, maintained by like gifts, manned by a staff of salaried workers, and providing, at the expense of far-seeing or enlightened manufacturers, healthy amusement and duly certified religious teaching and secular instruction to the workmen of these subscribers, as well as dispersing, on behalf of Dives, basketfuls of crumbs, both of plain and fancy bread, to Lazarus and his fellows at the door?

After all we are only face to face once again with the fact that men are constantly attempting to do their duty by deputy; to subscribe to what they see to be a good work rather than to set about to do it themselves, to give of their money rather than of their lives. It is the danger that has beset the church from almost the earliest days, that the men who should be inspiring and setting others to work have too often simply done their work for them, or tried to do it. Doubtless the old robber baron returning from some murderous fray felt his heart uplifted as, rounding a corner of the road on the way to his castle on the hill, he came in sight, in the valley below, of the monastery he had founded, and thought of the holy lives of the monks, and of their prayers put up daily for him, who had such need of them. Doubtless, too, the good monks' hearts warmed towards the old freebooter who yet had so much good in him as to be their founder and protector. But it was small consolation to the men he robbed and put to death to know that some part at least of their possessions would go to Holy Church and to make possible the cloistered self-denial of these men of God. The baron's keep has vanished, and the abbey is in ruins, but do we not see the same process going on to-day? One has only to look at the subscription lists of churches and charities. The man who realises this may well hesitate to appeal to the wealthy for money to aid his plans, for he sees the effect of such methods in making religious and social agencies distrusted by many among the very classes which they aim at helping. He will rather honor the spirit in which a woman like Jane Addams of Chicago refuses to receive gifts of "tainted gold," as she feels the conscience money of some unscrupulous men of business to be. Yet here again he may be in danger of deceiving himself. He needs, it is true, to beware of accepting, still more of asking for, gifts which would merely be given to promote the vanity or to further the selfish interests of the giver, but can a man so easily wash his hands of the stain of the mammon of unrighteousness? Does he not rather need to recognise that, indirectly at least, the fruits of injustice enter into all the money that comes to him, since selfishness plays the part it does in our social life, and since our lives are so bound up with each other that no man can set himself apart from his fellows? Only let him see that the gifts he asks for will quicken in the giver the sense of social responsibility and increase the desire to do and to give more himself.

The payment of subscriptions, if this principle be disregarded, becomes a soul-destroying process, alike to him that gives and him that takes. The pious Henry III. turned once at bay, after listening to the pleading of Friar William of Abingdon, one of the most eloquent of the early Dominican preachers, and cried to him, "Brother William, you used to speak in so spiritual wise; now all that you say is, 'Give, give, give!'" One may compare the disgust with which a modern public schoolboy often turns from the familiar appeal of the clergyman who year by year comes to the school to preach on behalf of the school mission, and to carry back with him the usual collection, but nothing better. For the only thing worth giving or asking is life; and such a missoner fails to ask for it. Here surely we may find a hint of the explanation of all successful social work, which is the passing on of life from life, the result of the contact of personality with personality. In so far as organisation promotes this and makes it possible does it stand justified, and only by this test.

One does not wish to undervalue the associations, the reflexes of life, which institutions so often pass on, or the wealth of a great past which they keep in store for us. But death is perhaps as needful and as inevitable for the body corporate as for the individual; for both it is often true that whom the gods love die young. It is surely better to spend and be spent in a short life rich in ideas, than to carry on a long existence by the aid of a comfortable endowment, which may prevent men from realising how far out of touch they are with the actual needs of those about them. It is not known whether the bishops have yet decided if there be humor in Heaven, but one is inclined to think that the solemn way in which men shake their heads and lament the impending decease of an outworn institution must sometimes be greeted elsewhere by a peal of celestial laughter.

THE NEW PRESSURE AND THE OLD THRILLS.

SOME little time ago a writer in an American periodical expounded with unnecessary gusto the indisputable fact that the amusements of the Vicar of Wakefield and his family would have bored to extinction the average young American of to-day. That is all very well, but it is not only Oliver Goldsmith who must succumb in the face of so disconcerting a challenge. Things have been moving recently at such a pace that the ordinary reader refuses to be surprised at anything. At his best, the minor novelist has been always rather in the position of the conjuror whose thrills are more and more discounted by anticipation. But nowadays his rôle is becoming that of an amateur entertainer in the country who is having a bad time of it, with bored town children sitting horribly close to the platform.

South Pole, North Pole, Swimming the Channel, Flying the Channel, fluttering over skyscrapers across the Atlantic, taking ladies for a spin in the air over English lanes, Marathon records broken and mended again, daily ocean runs triumphantly exploited by marconigrams—before all these thrills of fact, following each other helter-skelter, how can our poor novelist comport himself with any sense of mastery at all? In the old days he was well abreast of the times. The leap, for example, from stage coaches to railway trains was one that he could take quite as nimbly as anybody else. The "special," indeed, became one of his most treasured stage-properties, almost as invaluable a deus ex machina as the millionaire uncle from the Colonies. The increased velocity suited him as a whipper-up of thrills, and what he lost in the romantic possibilities of highwaymen and the thieving tricks of inn-keepers he gained by improvising convenient railway accidents, to say nothing of the innumerable chances for gallantry associated with lost luggage. In brief, the atmosphere of travel, though considerably less permeated by mystery, remained a recognised medium of adventure, in which he could work quite mechanically, certain of the responsive attitude of his audience. For he was, by right of his alert desire to jump as far as possible with the cat, just a little ahead of his public in that stupendous leap from stage coaches to railway trains.

Even the coming of the motor-car was not too much for him. He saw—nobody more quickly—what could be done in the way of thrills through this new elixir of speed. In fact, the motor-car in some ways suited him better even than the private coach galloping through the night with double changes of horses, or our old friend, the "special," in its very maddest disregard of all known by-laws. The motor, from the standpoint of our manufacturer of thrills, can be made to start at any time and arrive at any place. It is the natural means of transport in a fiction perpetually prodded by telegraph and telephone, and our novelists rose gallantly to its opportunities. No longer could the Wicked Woman consider herself secure from that richly deserved pursuit until the arrival of the ossified local train at such and such an hour. No longer need the raging husband fuss with time-tables in those dim little stations on branch lines where "specials" avail him nothing. Pursuer and pursued, in short, may scamper through space so long as petroleum holds out, and our novelists, with at least a hint of the large gestures of the ancient gods, can produce their worrying situations almost unhampered by time or space. But these aeroplanes! Well, it takes a genuine expert or at the least an Italian poet to handle them in any sense whatever of the verb "handle." Innumerable confusions confront our homely thrill-monger on the very threshold of the newest move. Even the Fat Boy of Dickens would have been rather shy of aeroplanes, and he was dealing with an old lady, and not with that genuine connoisseur in thrills, our man in the street.

Then, apart altogether from the thrills of pursuit, the old attitude towards foreign travel died hard. The memory of Childe Harold lingered on side by side with the engrossing reality of Mr. Cook. Popular excursions failed wholly to kill the romance of loneliness associated with distant travel. Mystery refused wholly to abandon the youth who started gaily for the frontier places unobtrusively willing to "greet the unknown with a cheer." The novelist could—and, to do him justice, did—make great play with all such opportunities.

Quite recently, however, the public has become almost "hoity toity" in regard to these most necessary quests of fiction. The young heir has been refused in the smaller conservatory, and he is going to Central Africa in order to forget! "Well, what about it?" says the man in the street, "why, there was a lady carried over Central Africa in a hammock only the other day!" With the same truculence of the overfed he faces without creepiness the thrills of the occult. "That's a job for the Psychical Research Society," he says in his offhand fashion, as though that settled the matter for the concoctor of this facile fiction which has become so oddly difficult. Dark, hidden rooms in haunted houses, ghostly calls across shadowed water—he considers himself familiar with all there is to be known about thrills of that genre. As for what is not to be known, that he pigeonholes with a yawn as "not good enough." Even the mysterious terror of "Wuthering Heights," with its almost Æschylean atmosphere of brooding and doom, would leave him unanimated and undismayed. For, even in the sombre figure of Heathcliffe he would see only "that roaring little rotter," Bramwell Brontë, in disguise.

Again, money, perhaps the most surely magical of all the good old thrills, does not appeal to the ordinary reader as once it did. Reasonable fortunes, at least, doled out by reasonable novelists, have lost all significance. That famous fortune of Miss Crawley, for instance, would be sniffed at nowadays as merely a few odd thousands. Tittlebat Titmouse, enthroned in his borrowed kingdom, would now represent quite moderate wealth so far as modern fiction is concerned. "One should live like a bourgeois and think like a god," exclaimed the tormented Flaubert; but twentieth century England, in fiction and out of it, has a very different estimate of life. Frankly, these cheque-book heroes live like barbaric gods and think like backward schoolboys; the usual picture of them on both sides of the Atlantic is incongruously faithful. And so, in this one particular, the multitude does enjoy a portraiture which, unconscious of any satire, approximates to reality. From the standpoint of homage to reality it is well within its rights when it salutes Brewster and turns its back on Rawdon Crawley.

Another old thrill which used to be a very simple conjuring trick to the minor novelist was that of the sick-bed. Given a doctor, with a thin, pointed beard and a buttoned-up frock coat, and a hospital nurse with a figure whose lines refused to kow-tow to the austerity of her uniform—with these simples a really hard-working novelist of the old school could do almost anything in a chapter and a half. Chloroform, ice, brandy, the constantly ducking head of the doctor and the nurse's trick of smoothing pillows during pauses in dialogue—these details, plus a few odd telegrams and the surreptitious tears of the nurse on the eve of the crisis, were absolutely all that was required. But now, a public, bewildered by an undigested knowledge of microbes, demands an altogether different treatment of the sick-room, and the novelist is usually quite as confused by the new popular learning as the most exacting of his readers can possibly be. Poor fellow, he was certainly much more comfortable, and, let us admit it, more seemly under the old happy-go-lucky conditions of theatrical ignorance than under the modern régime of bogus knowledge.

Foreigners constituted another "bag of tricks" that required no great caution in handling. Apart from being used as foils to the public school hero, they were serviceable as butts during flagging intervals, and their weird jargon was accepted by centuries of convention as comic relief. The foreigner was also useful in the rôle of the flabby minor villain, and particularly when someone was required to marry the bad girl under a false name, or, better still, under a false title. But now? Foreigners have been winning things. It isn't quite the same, and the man in the street feels the change in his very bones. Once more our thoroughly tired novelist must jump with that tireless cat as best he can.

One could easily enumerate many more of his difficulties which have increased so enormously under the new pressure of other people's knowledge. But after all—if he could but realise it—what we are seeking from fiction is not so much excitement as solace, not so much knowledge as charm. Which of us, indeed, if he were put to it on his oath, would not choose thankfully to desert the most gorgeous banquet of the very newest millionaire in all the circulating libraries of the suburbs and steal quietly back through the centuries, to play hunt the slipper with the Vicar of Wakefield and his daughters?

PHOTOGRAPHY OF THE WILD.

"THE rifle has been abandoned for the camera," wrote Mr. Roosevelt enthusiastically, in an introduction, not long since, to a book of animal photography. The importance of the saying is a little minimised by the fact that the author of it is now engaged in shooting elephants in Africa. The expedition is equipped, however, with cameras as well as rifles, and the world has already seen some trophies of the former that seem likely to be more valuable than the spoil of the latter. Our Nimrods may be too deeply carved not to think that the highest good is to destroy the "tall deer" and other creatures that they love as their brothers, but already the world thinks rather lightly of them unless they can also record their prowess and the courage or beauty of their victims in something more real than skins and antlers. For the purpose of the inevitable book or lecture, at any rate, the camera has become indispensable.

We should have thought that the sport value of the hunting camera would prove far higher than that of the shot-gun or rifle. The difficulties are greater, the danger at least as real, for even the bear that has been infuriated by a wound has very little chance against the equipment of the modern hunter. There remains the result. In the one case a mass of death resurrected in some ghastly fashion by the hired skill of the taxidermist; in the other case, a living record for which the hunter is solely responsible. The only things in favor of the dead-hunter are the reality of the trophy, which makes the hunt savor of pot-hunting and its uniqueness. The animal that the hunter has dispatched no other may take a share in. It is finished for ever, and the next hunter must find another subject, whereas another photographer and another may arise and take the same big stag as we, and perhaps take him better.

The truth is, perhaps, that the photographers are made of sterner stuff than the average hunter. Who would wait hour after hour as the Keartons have done, crouching, cramp-racked, in the skin of a sheep or tormented by mosquitos that they dare not brush away, for the sake of shooting even a raven or an eagle? There are, perhaps, men in the gun-room who would take a camera and face the lion in his native desert, but none who can see the fun of staying up all night in order to photograph even the last British phalarope or bearded tit. Yet our books abound with photographs of the intimate domestic life of common, but timid, birds, every one of which must have cost hours of patience and resource to obtain. The new sport is undoubtedly one that calls for, and obtains, many virtues of a high order.

In its earliest days, animal and bird photography was very like the "night-lining" that is the lowest form of fishing. Having fixed the camera at the bird's nest, or other place where the subject was bound to come sooner or later, we retired to the end of a long rubber tube with a big bulb which, very smartly squeezed, would sometimes actuate the pneumatic release and sometimes not. The first picture of the kind that the writer made, and one of the best, was exposed with a pull on a long string, the shutter being the "up and down" elastic affair and the camera fixed focus, fixed front, fixed everything. The subject of that earliest experiment by the way is one of the best for the beginner—a missel thrush feeding her young in the nest so often obligingly placed in the lowest fork of an apple tree before the leaves are on.

Later, the amateur electrician fixed up for us the more controllable release worked by the mere pressure of a button. With this apparatus you retire so far out of the bird's sight that you yourself have but a poor idea of what the bird is doing when you make the exposure.

It may give you an ungainly back view, it may be out of focus because too far or too near, it may not be near the nest at all. The nadir of "night-line photography" was reached when we fixed matters so that the bird itself by snapping a thread made its own exposure, walked into a trap that snarled and clicked at it but, happily, seemed to fail to grab a leg. We might come back hours later to see whether the trap had sprung or no, and then it served us right if we found on the negative nothing more interesting than a cow's foot, or something that looked like a hedgehog. We were not fortunate at this method of animal photography, and we have not heard of anyone who was—except in the securing of a somewhat comic genre.

By the time a few imitators had followed the Keartons into the field with tube and electric wire, the masters had exhausted the possibilities of that form of approach, and had found means to bring their subjects under the range of the stand camera with an operator at the focussing screw. Sometimes a thrush or black-bird had built near a cowshed in the fields and could be photographed almost to the heart's content by a quiet operator in command of a convenient knot-hole. Shyer woodland species were stalked by these indefatigable men disguised as moss-grown pollards; and dippers, wheatears, and others were outwitted by means of stage rocks that gradually appeared in their haunts and contained the crouching naturalist and his apparatus. The hollow sheep and trojan bullock were invented for the benefit of curlew, plover, and other shy birds that nest in the open plain. If our naturalists had been given the magic gift of fernseed, they could scarcely have outwitted more completely the creatures of the wild that we formerly "studied" by means of the scatter-gun and the rifle. Science has given us, it is true, the shoulder camera with which the very skilled can take flying shots, and the artillery of the telephoto lens, by means of which a good sitter can be taken at the distance of half-a-mile or more, but all the great triumphs of animal photography have been won by means of infinite patience and the stealthy approach of the artist within actual camera range.

The lion pictures sent to America and Europe by President Roosevelt's expedition remind us that even the nocturnal animals are not safe from the attention of the camera. In the thick silence of night they may be pursuing the avocations of the most shy—badgers digging out wasps' nests, foxes wooing pheasants from the boughs, lions stalking their prey or in the act of leaping on the tethered calf. Then, in one act, the flashlight rips the darkness to tatters, and the camera registers the revelation. The sensation must even be worse than being shot. It is like falling through a hole out of Paradise into Hell. But it passes as soon as comes, and perhaps goes into the dim animal consciousness as something like a twinge of dyspepsia. Swift as the process is, there is time for its subjects to put on a distinct air of surprise that was not there in the velvet of darkness. Even the slow human being shows it sometimes when the magnesium imposes its flash on the well-lighted dinner table—and the wild animal is ten times as alert to respond to such a cataclysm.

Flashlight photography, which may, in one sense, be regarded as the acme of animal portraiture, is only night-line photography on a higher plane. We shall see whether a wind of the spiral will not take us to yet greater heights. No success is more marked than the application of animated photography to wild life. Mr. Kearton brings the very bird before us—the bird and the wind or the sunshine in which it lives, for we see the feathers blow awry and each muscular action by which it keeps its perch on a rather difficult twig. The youngsters thrust out their eager maws, and the parents, easily distinguishable from one another by their plumage, come rushing up with caterpillars that wriggle in their beaks. In another picture the wary sparrowhawk is placed close under our eyes. We see her bring the kill to the nest, and every action with which she tears off pieces with her sharp, curved beak for distribution among the fierce young brigands in white fluff.

The spoil of the camera, though it is not spoil in the old sense of the word, is immense. It is but a tithe, however, of the facts and incidents that come to the man who watches behind the screen while waiting for his selected pictures. Unsuspected, he sees many a comedy, and perhaps now and then a tragedy, enacted in parts of the field not covered by the lens. A few years ago someone gave us the whole story of how a thrush taught her young ones to fly, silencing for the nonce those critics who say there is no school of the woods. Then there is Mr. Kearton's robin that used to come and feed the young thrushes by stealth, much as a kindly human neighbor will look after bairns that she believes to be neglected by their parents. These observations are typical of a large class that find their way even now with great difficulty into the books of natural history. They clothe the bones of the old science with the fuller, rounder outlines of the more human and enlivening "nature study."

Pictures of Travel.

A DEATH AT NOHANT.

I HAD always wished to visit Nohant, interwoven as the name is with all one's thoughts of George Sand. There she lived, and there she died; there she spent her last serene years. Serene? Was she not always, at the heart of her, serene?

"Nous nous aimons passionnément nous cinq, et la sacrosainte littérature, comme tu l'appelles, n'est que secondaire pour moi dans la vie. J'ai toujours aimé quelqu'un plus qu'elle et ma famille plus que ce quelqu'un." So George Sand wrote from Nohant, in the last years of her life, to Flaubert, and the sentence is the keynote of her life.

"L'histoire de ma vie" is, too, the story of Nohant. The little wood, the garden, the house, were background to the men and women and children she so vividly portrayed in these immortal volumes. They live in house and wood and garden still: they will have no successors. Life will never again begin, be lived, and end there. The lady who died a few weeks ago bequeathed Nohant to her sister for her life, and after her sister's death to the French Academy. The French Academy has accepted the bequest. The house will come to them as George Sand left it, as her children and her grandchildren have kept it since her death, in fond remembrance of her and of one another. Nohant will be a temple, sacred to their memory, to be visited by the devout and by the curious: a home it will never be again.

Gabriel Nigond, the young poet, Berrichon by birth and by predilection, asked us last winter to come some day to Berry and go with him to Nohant: "I will present you to Madame Gabrielle Sand," he said. "She is beautiful, she is wise, and kind, and good. She has the gift of eternal youth, and you will see a girl of twenty who has lived for twice as many years." But when, in August, we came to Berry, Madame Gabrielle Sand was dead. "Vous venez trop tard," her neighbors at La Châtre told us sorrowfully.

We stayed at La Châtre, we walked through its streets; we wondered at which of its old, substantial, comfortable houses George Sand had stayed; in which of them had lived her friends. Through which doors had she passed? From which windows had she looked forth? Some of her life-long friends were of La Châtre. She chose her friends for qualities in them which suited with her own. In her life and in her letters no trace is found of her having ever thought that social success and social importance were things to be desired. She never said, and no one ever said to her: "Il faut arriver." It was Flaubert who wrote to her: "Il faut être bien modeste pour se trouver honoré par les honneurs." She never strove after what she did not really want; she never thought she wanted what was unimportant to her. A distinguished Englishman once called on her. He had been the night before to see the première of her new play. He came to make her acquaintance and to tell her what he thought of the play: "Before I could finish a sentence, in rushed a fat, dirty Frenchman, flung himself at her feet, seized her hand and kissed it, exclaiming, 'George, mon George.' I saw she preferred hearing what he thought of her work to listening to what I had to say of it. I took up my hat and left." George Sand had no taste for "persons of importance" as such.

Bataille drove us to Nohant—Sylvain Bataille, who knew them all—who, whenever he passes the statue of "la bonne dame"—George Sand is "la bonne dame" in Berry—takes off his hat: "Parceque, voyez vous, cela lui ressemble tellement." He meditated as he drove us, turning round to answer our questions: "Mais oui, il vient toujours des étrangers pour voir Nohant. Dire qu'une femme peut faire remuer le monde et l'argent tant d'années après sa mort!" But when we spoke of "Madame Gabrielle," Bataille choked: "Depuis que Madame Gabrielle est morte je ne peux pas entendre dire son nom sans pleurer."

We were driving through the country that George Sand loved and wrote of. There are hedges round its fields, trees in the hedgerows; herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, geese and pigs, and goats. The roads have generous breadth of land on either side, and the country is crossed and re-crossed by wide grass tracks where the poor pasture their one cow or their few sheep, guarded by the oldest or the youngest member of the family. At the least ascent you see to a great distance, and realise again the magic of wide horizons. The peasants of Berry are a fine race—tall, well set up, with oval faces and straight features.

Gabriel Nigond was waiting for us at his cottage by the roadside. He went with us to Nohant. We walked in the garden and in the little wood that, a hundred years ago, was the tangled thicket in which little Aurore Dupin built her altar of moss and stones and flowers, dedicated to the god of her imagination, "Carambé."

Nohant, built in the reign of Louis XVI., has for five generations been the home of a race loving it intensely. It is two-storeyed, constructed on straight lines, and, though of moderate size, has a certain air of stateliness. Within, the principal rooms open one into another. In the dining-room are a long table and many chairs telling of hospitality. The drawing-room walls are covered with pictures. Here are the family portraits, beginning with Aurore de Koenigsmark and her son, Maurice de Saxe. His daughter is here: "Aurore de Saxe, Comtesse de Hoorn." Her second husband was Dupin de Francueil, and she it was who bought Nohant. Her face is delicate of feature, a little prim. On the opposite wall is her son, Maurice, in uniform, hair slightly powdered, a finely cut, sensitive face. Here, most interesting of all, is the youthful portrait of his daughter Aurore—who named herself "George Sand"—dark, romantic, with splendid eyes and strong nose, the mouth and chin small and receding. And here, too, is the face into which, in the course of years, that other changed—intellectual, full of bonté, distinguished. Her children are here—Maurice and Solange—beautiful young creatures. Facing the Maréchal de Saxe, the lovely face of Gabrielle Sand looks down on us.

A door opened, and a lady came in—small and slight, and very youthful in face and movement. Her eyes and hair were of the darkest, her face extremely pale; she was dressed in dull black—yet, if she had been clothed in scarlet, she could not have seemed more vivid. She spoke in a voice of the most arresting beauty. It was Madame Lauth who held out her hand to us—the elder of the two little sisters beloved of George Sand. She is the only one living of "nous cinq" who loved one another so passionately. She is the last of her race which ends, as it began, with an "Aurore." Madame Lauth sent us upstairs to see "la chambre de bonne mère." There the writing table of George Sand still faces the window, and through the window we looked, as she looked, on a great expanse of sky and, across the garden, to the fields and plains of Berry.

* * * * *

On one side of the garden is a wall. You open an unlocked door, and in a moment you are again amongst them. A yew tree rises like a double column in their midst. Overhead its branches are flung wide, making a dark green roof for the graves which its roots are interlacing. There is only one buried there who is not of their race, who receives from the dead the hospitality that, living, they offered him—"Plauchut, homme de lettres"—who, coming when all "nous cinq" were there, stayed on until he and Madame Gabrielle alone were left at Nohant.

E. M. COBDEN SICKERT.

Le 10 juin, 1876, par la bourrasque et la pluie, le Berry portait en terre George Sand: hier, en ce même mois de juin, sous le même ciel pleuvieux et sombre, la petite fille s'en allait rejoindre la grand'mère: celle qui fut "la bonne mé" recevait auprès d'elle sa "Titite" d'autrefois. Elle est partie très vite, sans bruit, semblant user pour mourir de cette discrétion touchante qu'elle apportait à toute chose. On ne la savait point malade: on apprend qu'on l'enterre demain!

Douce, ferme et sérieuse, elle s'égayait pourtant volontiers, avec la candeur exquise et l'abandon d'un enfant. Le feu de la bonté brûlait en elle, d'une flamme égale et droite, et jamais vacillante. La réflexion habitait ses yeux graves.

Elle tenait de sa grand'mère, outre l'ardeur d'une consciencieuse persévérance en l'œuvre entreprise, un don profond d'observation et une véritable puissance poétique.

Pauvre Nohant!

Nous ne la verrons plus nous sourire, sitôt ton seuil franchi! La voix du cher Plauchut—si bon aussi, celui-là, si ingénieusement tendre et, à 85 ans, si jeune et délicat! Cette voix de cordiale bienvenue nous ne l'entendrons plus!

Cette jeune femme et ce vieillard, qui s'aimaient d'une si touchante tendresse, ne s'assièrent plus jamais à table, en face l'un de l'autre, se souriant avec une si confiante expression! Les voila couchés côte-à-côte dans le même enclos, sous le même arbre, au milieu d'autres tombes chéries dont l'une est pour toujours glorieuse!

GABRIEL NIGOND.

Present-Day Problems.

THE REPORT ON SMALL HOLDINGS.

By M.P.

To those who have watched the progress of the small holdings movement, who remember the debates of two years ago, when the Bill was passing through Parliament, and are aware of the hopes which it then aroused in every part of rural England, this Report comes with a peculiar, and perhaps rather melancholy, interest. For it was the establishment of the Small Holdings Commissioners, and the conferring on the Board of Agriculture, of which the Commissioners are in fact a part, of new and wider powers, that was, in the opinion of most of us, the real achievement of that Act. All previous legislation, for twenty years and more, had relied only on local authorities; and most of it had therefore failed. The Small Holdings and Allotments Act set up for the first time a central body, who were not merely to record and revise the action of the County Councils, but were to be themselves ultimately responsible for the whole administration of the Act. It is for them to ascertain the demand, and to report how it may best be satisfied—to co-operate, indeed, in the first place, with local authorities for this purpose, but ultimately—if within a given time, which the Board are to fix, the demand is not fully satisfied—to take steps without delay to satisfy it themselves. That is, briefly, their task, as laid down in the first five clauses of the Act. And here, in this rather unprepossessing form, is their first annual report* of its fulfilment. What does it tell us? What difficulties does it reveal? Above all, what indication does it give of the future progress of the movement?

In one respect, at least, it is very definite and satisfactory. No one who reads it can have any further excuse for doubt as to the reality and strength of the demand for land. Not merely have we the recorded fact that in the first few months after the passing of the Act more than 23,000 applications were made; that of these 13,000 were "approved" by the various County

Councils; and that others will still have to be approved, if the Act is properly carried out; but the Commissioners are emphatic as to the character and claims of those who have applied:—

"In the course of our visits to all parts of the country we have personally interviewed," they say (p. 11), "a large number of the applicants for small holdings, and we desire to place on record the fact that in our opinion a very considerable number of the approved applicants are industrious, self-reliant, and capable men of a very superior type. All over the country there are men who for years have been desiring to obtain land, and who have both the capital and the knowledge necessary to make them successful small holders. It is just this type of man who too often in the past has despaired of obtaining land in this country, and has emigrated to the colonies!"

Moreover, the applicants, as the Commissioners recognise, represent but a part of the real demand. There are many other would-be applicants held back by fear or caution, waiting to see how the Act will work. Such men are "sceptical as to the bona fides of the Act"; they want to see "how their friends and neighbors fare"; in some districts, too, there is "a widespread fear lest the fact of application having been made should be resented by their employers, and the applicants should be turned out of their cottages and lose their employment." Cases of actual intimidation—difficult as this always is to prove—have here and there been established. Altogether it is, as this report says, an "onerous and difficult task," this attempt to colonise rural England.

With regard to the work already done by the Councils, it is probably still too early to say what this really amounts to. The "schemes" which had been sent in up to the end of last year comprised altogether some 21,000 acres, and were estimated to provide for about 1,500 applicants—most of whom are no doubt by this time in possession of the land. As against a total of 13,000 approved applicants, for whom it is estimated that not less than 185,000 acres will be required, this is not at first sight a very great result; and most of it is, in fact, confined to a comparatively few counties. In a large number of rural districts, probably in the greater part of rural England, little or nothing at the end of last year had actually been done. From seven English counties, having an aggregate of more than 1,200 applicants, not a single scheme had been received. It must, however, be remembered, as the report is careful to remind us, that a good part of last year—often an unnecessarily large part—was occupied in preliminary work. In the important task of "ascertaining the demand," though this is expressly assigned to the Commissioners by the Act, the whole of the work was left to be done by the County Councils. Instead of appointing officers who would have directly represented the Commissioners and kept them in touch with the various Councils, the Board of Agriculture contented themselves with recommending the Councils to appoint their own agents, and then agreed under pressure to repay a part of the expense. If, therefore, in many districts, the progress has been slow, and applicants have been unduly discouraged, it cannot be said that the Councils are altogether to blame in the matter.

It is, in fact, when we try to discover the work of the Board themselves, that the weakness of this report appears. They are, indeed, full of good intentions. They prepare circulars and leaflets and regulations with extraordinary diligence; they "have endeavored," so they tell us, "to give all the assistance in their power by way of information and advice," they confer with committees and tabulate returns. If this were all their duty; if they were merely a recording and revising authority, to congratulate Councils which are doing their best, and to find vague threats or excuses for the rest, they must be held to have done remarkably well. But it is not in this way that the Act will be made to work satisfactorily. The forces of opposition are still active, though not at present for the most part openly. In questions affecting land, where local feeling is bound to run high, local effort alone will never be sufficient. Unless the Board of Agriculture are prepared not merely to give good advice, but to lay down a definite policy—including, of course, a time limit—to adhere to it unflinchingly, and, wherever necessary, take action themselves, there is grave danger that before very long, except in a few counties, the whole Act may be discredited. In the report before us there is no indication of any such policy. So far as any policy can be discovered in it at all, it consists in leaving as much as possible to the Councils, and putting upon them the whole responsibility for the success or failure of the Act.

* Board of Agriculture Annual Report of Proceedings under the Small Holdings and Allotments Act. Cd. 4846. Price 8d.

A single sentence on page 5 will serve to illustrate a great deal of this report: "Every suitable applicant," say the Commissioners, "has the right to an explicit assurance that land will be offered to him with the least possible delay, and we are confident that if applicants will exercise a certain amount of patience, and if their requirements are not unreasonable, it should be quite possible to satisfy the whole of the present demand within the next two or three years." To the seven County Councils who had not sent in any scheme, and to the other councils who had not yet completed their enquiries, such observations may have a reassuring sound. But the man who made his application, as many applicants did, in 1907, who has held on in spite of discouragement and delay—often, too, at considerable risk—and now hears that if his requirements are not unreasonable, "it should be quite possible" to satisfy him before 1912, will feel rather differently about it. If he happens to be a Liberal, he will be inclined to ask whether, when C.-B. at the Albert Hall and the Holborn Restaurant spoke of colonising our own country, and of the urgent need for State action, this was really all he intended. And what of those others, who already, we are told, are "sceptical as to the bona fides of the Act"?

One word more as to the date of publication. It is surely unnecessary, as well as inconvenient, that a report for the year 1908 should not appear till September 1909. The official explanation for part of this delay is as curious as, happily, it is unusual. The report is dated June 15th, which is, to say the least, late enough. It was sent to the printer, so we are told, on June 22nd; "but unfortunately was mislaid by the printer, and not found until July 26th." Even then it took nearly two months more to get it ready; and it was only on September 10th that it was actually available. It may be hoped that in future years the Board will succeed in producing both an earlier and a stronger report.

The Drama.

A DELIGHTFUL COMEDY.

THERE is nothing in nature more wonderful than the British journalist in a paroxysm of propriety. Chance led me to look through a bundle of press-cuttings relating to Mr. Maugham's new play, "Smith," which I had just seen with the liveliest enjoyment at the Comedy Theatre; and I was amazed to find that I had been listening to things "à faire rougir des singes," as the man says in Dumas—things unspeakable and unprintable, against which two of my colleagues felt it necessary to protest in the strongest terms. The unanimity of the indictment makes it all the more impressive, and must be displayed in parallel columns:—

"STANDARD."

Mr. Maugham has fallen into the prevalent habit among our dramatic authors of calling a spade a spade. . . . Some of the things he says in the first two acts of "Smith" are almost unpardonable. They were not only in the worst of taste, but they were uncalled for and unreal. . . . These obstetrics upon our stage are growing stale as well as unpleasant. . . . We have to ask the reader to take this censure on trust—it is impossible to give chapter and verse or to prove the justice of our strictures by quotation.

"EVENING STANDARD."

Mr. Maugham's new comedy is nice and nasty, pretty and ugly, fresh and stale. At one moment it is unblushingly obstetric; the next it takes us into Fairyland. Now it is coarse and then it is dainty. Sometimes the characters are talking in a way no decent men and women would talk, and at others it is all delightful make-believe. It is quite an extraordinary mixture. I cannot prove to you the counts of my indictment—for, honestly, I could not print the things the people say to each other.

One could almost suspect these two deliverances of having proceeded from one and the same maiden lady, brought up exclusively on mid-Victorian prunes and prisms. Yet even this respectable spinster could scarcely be acquitted of a certain amount of affectation, for it is the veriest nonsense to pretend that there is anything in Mr. Maugham's play which could not be printed, and read without discomfort by any reasonable person. A brother, returning from a ten years' absence abroad, asks his married sister whether her childlessness is not a sorrow to her, and she replies, without any sort of crudity, that she does not desire to have children, and does not envy those of her friends who are mothers. I cannot print the passage because I have not the text; but to talk about "obstetrics" in connexion with it is childish absurdity. Certain words, supposed to be luminous and epigrammatic, take hold upon the critical mind now and then like a disease, and break out in a sort of eruption over the theatrical columns of the press. Ten or twelve years ago the "Ibscenity" pimple was everywhere prevalent; now it is the "obstetric" rash. I regret that Sir Herbert Tree fell a victim to it in his evidence before the Committee on Stage Plays. And the remarkable thing is that the critics who are shocked when motherhood is mentioned on the stage will accept without turning a hair the glorification of systematic adultery and the ridiculing of every decent ideal of conduct. I had occasion, a little while ago, to go through the criticisms of "Dear Old Charlie," and I do not remember any vehemence of protest on the part of the "Standard," any suggestion of unprintable horrors. Yet the gentleman who strains at "Smith" and swallows "Dear Old Charlie" would be a quite probable candidate for the succession to the Censorship, should the post become vacant. His appointment, at any rate, would not be a cynical absurdity, like others one could mention. Had he now been in Mr. Redford's place, he would doubtless, out of some respectable but entirely ridiculous scruple of propriety, have insisted that "Smith" should be docked of its sound and excellent, almost too obvious, moral, and sent forth irrelevant and meaningless. A good example, surely, of the folly of subjecting the English drama to the autocratic caprice of a single individual—a Bowdler blind of one eye.

I will not go so far as another critic and say that "Smith" is worth fifty "Lady Fredericks"; but I will say that it is far the best thing Mr. Maugham has done since "Lady Frederick," and is a work that deserves to count more seriously than even that charming comedy. The formula is not new. We are fairly familiar with the sterling, sound-natured, fresh and frank Colonial, who offers such an attractive contrast to our sophisticated and enervated, if not hopelessly corrupt, society. A third critic—you see I have been studying my press-cuttings to some purpose—tells us that in "introducing a breezy young man fresh from a Rhodesian farm," Mr. Maugham has adopted "a device used by Sheridan in 'The School for Scandal.'" At first this remark entirely bewildered me; but on reflection I presume it must be our old friend, Sir Oliver Surface, who figures in the writer's mind as the counterpart of the young man from Rhodesia. He would be a good deal amazed, I fancy, to find himself in this position. But we need not go so far as to Sheridan in search of an analogy: Mr. Sutro's "Walls of Jericho" will serve the turn well enough. Mr. Maugham, however, does not accept the formula in its primitive simplicity. He does not give us to understand that Tom Freeman's sturdy virtue is sufficiently explained the moment you know that he comes from one of the Britains beyond the Seas. In truth, his connection with Rhodesia is quite recent. He is an ex-Londoner, an ex-stockbroker, who was "hammered" only eight years ago. Rhodesia, then, has merely brought out the innate quality of his disposition. In other words, he is not a conventionally virtuous Colonial, but an essentially unconventional person, a born humorist; and his absence from England was devised solely that he might look with fresh eyes upon the trend of social life (as the author is pleased to represent it) during his absence. Nor is it only in the case of Freeman that Mr. Maugham freshens and deconventionalises a familiar type. The same may be said of Rose Dallas-Baker, the insatiate pleasure-huntress, Algy Peppercorn, the "tame cat," and even Smith, the ideal parlor maid, the "neat-handed Phillis" of romantic fancy. All these figures we know in a general way, but all of them Mr. Maugham re-creates with a new and characteristic felicity of touch. I enjoyed his comedy immensely, and wish to say so without reserve. It is full of wit and scenic ingenuity; and its undercurrent of seriousness is very much to the purpose. I am no great believer in the direct moral influence of a single play; yet one can scarcely imagine the Rose Dallas-Bakers of the audience going away from "Smith" quite unperturbed.

No doubt there are touches of exaggeration here and there, that rouse a momentary regret. One could wish, for example, that Mr. Dallas-Baker, K.C., were a little less of an imbecile; one could wish that Tom Freeman's conduct to the hapless Emily Chapman were a little less resolutely angelic. One could wish—no, one could not wish it, but one would not complain, if "Smith" were a little less obviously a princess of fairyland. On the other hand, I am not one of those who object to the death of Mrs. Rosenberg's baby. The incident is not dragged in as a piece of cheap pathos, but supplies the occasion for a crowning display of Rose Dallas-Baker's fierce shrinking (if the expression be permissible) from the realities of life. Without it, her character would be incomplete. The baby itself, vaguely heard of on the outskirts of the action, cannot possibly interest us, and is not supposed to; what does interest us is Rose's deliberate suppression of the telephone message as to the child's illness, lest her bridge-party should be broken up. This is a cruel trait, but who shall say that it is impossible? Rose has carefully built up around herself a fortress of egoism, and is ferociously on her guard lest any breach be made in its ramparts. She has schooled herself to disbelieve in the reality of anything that could possibly disturb the round of distractions and diversions in which she finds the sole meaning of life. Birth and death are unspeakable bores to her; she will not hear of them; with a fanaticism beyond that of Christian Science, she thinks she can will them out of existence. Mr. Sutro's Rosie in "Making a Gentleman" is a character of the same type, but a little more instinctive in her invulnerable egoism. The distinction between the characters is, in fact, aptly indicated in the distinction between the names. It is odd that two playwrights, clearly without any collusion or copying, should have hit on such similar characters, and named them so much alike. And yet, perhaps, it is no mere coincidence. Is not this type of selfishness more than usually in evidence at present, on every hand? Is it only ill-bred young women who display the conviction that their luxuries and dissipations are essential to the order of nature, and that the stars shall sooner stray from their courses than the habits of British upper class life shall in one jot or tittle be disturbed?

The acting of "Smith" is as near perfection as anything well can be. It would be curious to see the title-part in other hands than those of Miss Marie Löhr, in order to ascertain whether "Smith" is incurably a fairy changeling, or only in virtue of the extreme refinement and delicacy which Miss Löhr cannot help lending to the part. In other words, there might conceivably be a more possible "Smith"—there could not possibly be a more delightful one. Mr. Robert Loraine has no very easy task in dealing with Tom Freeman; but he acquits himself admirably in tempering the Rhodesian's robust didacticism with the saving grace of humor. Miss Kate Cutler is quite excellent as Rose Dallas-Baker, and Miss Edyth Latimer's performance of Emily Chapman is singularly able. As for Mr. A. E. Matthews, he finds in Algernon Peppercorn the very best of a long line of similar parts, and he plays him in his very best style. One could not possibly have three words better delivered than those in which he introduces himself to Freeman: "I'm nobody—Algy."

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters to the Editor.

MOTOR ROADS AND THE PUBLIC.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—All road users, including reasonable motorists, owe THE NATION hearty thanks for its vigorous defence of their rights against the road abusers. Your article in this week's number is a welcome sign that you have not relaxed your vigilance on their behalf. It was never more needed. The further progress of the Development Bill and the proceedings taken under it must be carefully watched. For myself, I have confidence in the intentions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and of the Solicitor-General, who is acting as his lieutenant in this matter. They have listened to representations made on behalf of the general public, have given effect to some, and made promises in regard to others. The Bill has been transformed in Committee greatly for the better. In its original form it was a Motorists' Bill, and one cannot be surprised that the more aggressive motor societies looked upon it as their own affair. Now the principle has been affirmed that the object is the improvement of traffic in general, not of motor traffic only; and the fatal section abolishing speed limits on new roads has gone. But a great deal has been left in an indeterminate state, and until the complete text of the amended Bill is available it is difficult to form a judgment on several points. One of them is the relation of local authorities to the Road Board. In any proposed alterations the local ratepayers should have their say, and it is by no means clear that they will. Then there are other interests besides those of traffic. Improving the facilities for traffic is all very well; but that really means enabling vehicles to go faster, and the vehicles which want to go faster are private motor-cars. The proposed deviations, loops, and cutting down of hedges really mean that. What about the residents, who will be prejudicially affected by the increased speed thus secured and by the bringing of the fast traffic past now secluded houses? Another point is the converse of that—the old routes, presumably through towns or villages, where deviations are made. Are motor-cars, for which these expensive alterations and disturbances are made, to be still allowed a free run at top speed through the old routes if they choose to go that way? Surely there should be some quid pro quo in the form of restriction on the old routes.

Then there is the supremely important point of the composition of the Road Board. The preposterous demand is still freely made that this administrative Government department, entrusted with large powers and the expenditure of public money, shall be manned and run by the nominees of motor societies—that is to say, by notorious motorists, who have become notorious by defending, if not by practising, every abuse of the roads, by persons pecuniarily interested in the trade and by county surveyors who are selected because they are believed to be favorable to motorism. I have even seen it suggested that the secretary of the Motor Union should be appointed secretary of the Road Board. In short, the Road Board is to be the tool of the motor organisations. Of course, the Government cannot for a moment entertain these absurd suggestions, which merely indicate the profound state of prejudice in which their authors are sunk. They see the whole world through motor goggles. The Road Board must be a perfectly impartial, non-partisan body, consisting of men who will look only to the public interest and in whom the public can place confidence. There should be an experienced road surveyor upon it, but he should not be one selected by any motor society.

In short, the public welfare is the one consideration to be kept in view both in the working and in the administration of the Act. If not, we are better without it. The object is not to facilitate motor traffic, but to render it less burdensome and injurious without suppressing it. The idea is that this can be done by altering the roads in various ways; and possibly it may, but not by merely enabling the traffic to go faster. That in itself can only make matters worse. There must be some effective relief on existing roads. That was, I believe, Mr. Lloyd George's real and original object, but it fell out of sight when the Bill was drafted, and unless explicitly provided for, it will fall out of sight again. Unfortunately motorists cannot be trusted. There has been a marked improvement in the behavior of many drivers since the agitation last autumn, but determined offenders are worse than ever, and they have developed a whole series of tricks for defying the law with impunity, such as false car numbers, faked speedometers, and licences obtained under false pretences. While these brigands are at large the public needs a great deal more protection than it enjoys now, and if this Bill gives none, it will only be an added curse.—Yours, &c.,

A. SHADWELL.

The Road Union,
October 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The public are under no slight obligation to you for the timely and temperate article on Motor Roads in the current number of THE NATION. Supporters of the Ministry are doubtless well-advised to couch any criticism or censure of this portion of the Development plan in measured terms, though I confess that those who, like myself, owe no allegiance to any political party, would willingly see the scheme stripped of its thin disguise with ruthless hands. Many of us who stand in daily peril of life and limb—not to speak of the lesser nuisances created by motor traffic—have for years demanded the imposition of a ten or twelve miles limit in populous districts, coupled with the closing to motor traffic of narrow and dangerous roadways. So far from any concession being made, the reasonable demands of the public seem to have received little or no consideration. Indeed, the appeals of certain large municipalities for lower speed limits in congested areas have actually been ignored; and, so far as can be ascertained, the Local Government Board have rarely exercised their powers under S. 8 of the Motor Car Act, 1903. The existing laws are openly flouted. Cars provided out of public monies, carrying officials and public servants, set the speed limit at naught. In some places the police appear to be supine or inactive. A "heavy" motor, with the statutory maximum limit of twelve miles conspicuously marked on the near side, in compliance with the order of 1904, was recently timed on a journey of thirty-four miles to average twenty-two miles per hour—and this occurred, day by day, without any action being taken by the authorities. A deaf ear has been turned to all remonstrance, while a Bill to secure a lower speed limit in towns and villages would appear to have as little chance of success as a Bill to repeal the Game Laws! Now, to crown our sorrows, under the guise of "taxing" motorists, costly motor tracks are to be provided for their special profit and amusement; and this, in large measure, at public charges, and by the aid of a financial device which you justly describe as "radically bad."—Yours, &c.,

A COUNTRY JUSTICE.

October 5th, 1909.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE AND THE LIBERAL PARTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The militant suffragettes have now reached that stage in their career when someone should seriously take them in hand and save them from themselves. I am writing as one entirely convinced of the desirability of extending the franchise to women, and as one, moreover, who possesses the rare faculty of distinguishing between personalities and principles. I will not, as so many bubbly-minded M.P.'s are now doing, refuse to support the suffrage for women movement because of the suffragettes, any more than I would refuse to be a Christian because the late Charles Peace was a regular attendant at chapel. Therefore, what follows, it is evident, is written by a friend of the suffragettes, who, however, is more concerned about the securing of the vote to women than about the pleasing personality of Miss Christabel Pankhurst.

The trouble with these women is that they are too logical. It is an extraordinary sign of the persistent stupidity of human beings generally that they have always conspired together to regard men as the logical, and women as the illogical, sex. The converse is the truth. It is men who are illogical; which is why they are so frequently right.

It is women who are logical; which is why they are so frequently wrong. The plain truth of the matter is that life is not a series of logical developments, but a series of disheartening compromises. There is sufficient error in all expressions of truth to enable the opponents of any particular expression of truth to present a plausible case against it; and therefore, unless we are in so powerful a majority that we can over-ride our opponents ruthlessly (and such majorities do not and never will exist) we have to compromise with our opponents in order to obtain some of the things for which we are striving.

That is the great, tremendous truth which the suffragettes, in their logical fashion, ignore. They are like Torquemada, they are like Bloody Mary and Improper Elizabeth; they are much too logical. I have heard more logic in St. James's Hall in fifteen minutes than I am likely to hear anywhere else in fifteen years; and, between you and me, sir, I do not want to hear any more. It is not enough in this world to be logical; it is not enough even to be right. What is enough is that you bear in mind always that man is very wicked and very stupid and very full of prejudices; and deal with him accordingly. Now, one of the wicked, stupid prejudices which the average man has somehow got into his head is that the Prime Minister of this country is an important person. Another is, that he should be allowed to go about the business of the country, and certainly to eat his dinner, without being badgered by unduly enthusiastic young women. There is a sort of superstition abroad that at all events he should be allowed to pray in peace. The suffragettes, in their logical fashion, can produce all sorts of arguments to combat this superstition; but the remarkable thing about a superstition is that it has amazing vitality; and all the logic in the world will not convince the superstitious person that it is a proper thing to chase Mr. Asquith over golf courses, down dark passages, and up church aisles; nor will the most brilliant suffragette persuade him that he should give up his ridiculous belief that if you hit Mr. Asquith with a piece of lead-piping, you will probably hurt Mr. Asquith. Somehow, that very stupid man in the street does not think it quite right that Mr. Asquith should be hurt.

Personally, I have no particular reverence for Mr. Asquith. I do not know anyone who has. In this connection, he has displayed singular ineptitude. It does not appear to me to be the highest statesmanship to reply, when a woman says, "Mr. Asquith, when are you going to do justice to women?" "My good woman, don't be silly!" or to dodge behind a policeman and shout, "Shan't!" I will admit all that the most suffragetty suffragette can say about Mr. Asquith . . . but when I have admitted all that, I still contend that the suffragettes are now in serious and grievous danger of damning their whole movement; for in this connection the innocent, who are the peaceful suffragists, suffer as severely as the guilty, who are the militant suffragettes. You see, sir, the man in the street, on whom, by the way, a great deal depends, does not care much about Mr. Asquith, but he does care a great deal about the Prime Minister of this country. The suffragette, in her logical fashion, says, "The Premier is Mr. Asquith!" The man in the street, in his contemptibly illogical fashion, says, "Mr. Asquith is the Premier!" It is the inability of the militant suffragettes to see how very important that distinction is that alarms me.

The time for militant tactics is really past. It is now the time for downright, sober work. The border line between enthusiasm and hysteria is very slight; and sometimes it seems as if the suffragettes have crossed it. Even I, devoid as I am of respect for Mr. Asquith, am frequently annoyed by the silly things the suffragettes do to him. If it be thus with me, how must it be with those who do respect Mr. Asquith? If it be thus with me, who am a supporter of women's suffrage, how must it be with those who are opposed to it, or wavering between two opinions!

The suffragettes have had remarkable luck so far. Whenever they have done anything silly, such as hurling lead-piping at Mr. Asquith, the Government have capped their silliness with something sillier. The suffragettes have thrust bricks into railway carriages, and the Government have thrust feeding-tubes into the suffragettes. But luck like that cannot last for ever. The public is beginning to sicken of these silly street brawls. When the Government ceases to be idiotic over this business, the public will sicken altogether; and then where will the W.S.P.U. be?—Yours, &c., ST. JOHN G. ERVINE.

13, Champion Park, Denmark Hill, S.E.
October 4th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In an editorial note on the above controversy you seem to express disapproval of the attitude of those erstwhile supporters of female suffrage whom recent events have converted into opponents. The impression you convey is, that while their attitude is to be condoned on the ground of political human nature, it is not defensible per se, but only as the result of irritation and annoyance.

Yet surely the position of these converted Suffragists is perfectly logical. As one of them put it to me the other day: "I used to believe women to be capable of political judgment and fit to exercise political rights. They have now given evidence (at least those who want the vote have) that they are not fit for the responsibilities they claim. Hence my change of attitude within the last few months!" Can any argument be more plain and straightforward than this, or more justified by events? As I have all along held strong views on the incapacity of women to interfere with advantage to the community in public affairs, I was in the position of being able to say to my friend, "I always told you so!" But surely this conversion is a testimony to his candor and open-mindedness.—Yours, &c.,

A STEADY OPPONENT.

October 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I crave a small space for reply to Mrs. Byles's letter?

She asks why I do not join the militant party. If she refers to my letter in your previous issue she will see that I there gave my reason frankly. My position in that respect may be "an enigma" to her, but it scarcely warrants her in saying that I am "willing they (the militant suffragists) should break their word of honor" while declining to do such things myself. I said expressly in my letter: "As for the broken word of honor, I have nothing but reprobation for it." "In the interests of clear thinking," which Mrs. Byles sets out to champion, it is well to avoid flat misrepresentation of that kind.

As regards "the ordinary voter," Mrs. Byles credits me with wishing "apparently to get the vote without him." I am puzzled to find where such a curious idea is apparent in my letter. What I did endeavor to intimate was this, that since policy shaped "to please him" had signally failed to secure for the women's suffrage question a decent consideration and a practical acceptance, it was at least possible that policy shaped to annoy him might be more successful, even as, of old, one is said to have done tardy justice wearied by importunity.

To say that the electorate has never been sued for women's suffrage is merely to juggle with words. The question—the plea for justice—has been before the electorate ever since the days of Mill, and men (representatives, surely, of the only existing electorate) have been sued peaceably all that time. And in this connection, sir, may I be pardoned for venturing to protest against your dismissing, in one of your leading articles, this forty-years'-long constitutional struggle as a "five-year-old agitation," and again as "a few months of constitutional agitation"? A generation has striven in vain for what, at the close of the same article, you rightly call "justice": is it wonderful that the following generation should have, at last, despaired of their methods?

I think I know quite as well as Mrs. Byles that some men have tried with zeal and occasionally with success to amend some of the iniquitous existing laws in regard to women; but that does not for a moment invalidate my previous assertion that it was men who in the first instance made those laws, and that, in general, the whole trend of man-made legislation is towards the dominance of men and the subservience of women.

In conclusion, I submit that under existing conditions it can be only matter of unverifiable opinion whether there are at present more men than women ("far more," Mrs. Byles asserts) engaged in fighting intemperance, insanitary housing, contaminated milk supply, and the like, seeing that women have at present no political status for the waging of that fight, and must therefore of necessity do most of their fighting behind the scenes, heavily handicapped, scantily recognised. Surely, surely Mrs. Byles cannot be unaware that it is largely for that very reason—to gain by a recognised political status the power of more effective warfare against these national evils—that women are now concentrating their energies in the present determined struggle for the franchise, believing that, once this is secured, power for good in all those directions will naturally accrue from it.—Yours, &c.,

E. M. WHITE.

Auchnabach, Ballinluig, Perthshire,
September 27th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Mr. Rankine Finlayson writes in a recent issue: "The 'silence' of the constitutional suffragists has 'given consent' to the party of violence and disorder, and, therefore, the former cannot escape their full share of blame for the set-back to women's suffrage."

Now, Mr. Finlayson is a good Liberal, as I hope I am myself. Let him, therefore, read and digest Lord Crewe's answer to the Earl of Malmesbury when the latter complained that neither he (Lord Crewe) nor the Prime Minister had said a word to deplore the Budget protest meeting disturbances. Lord Crewe said: "The noble lord (the Earl of Malmesbury) has administered to us a lecture because we do not make a formal repudiation of these proceedings. It is entirely unnecessary." ("Manchester Guardian," September 21st.)

Let Mr. Finlayson take this also as the answer of the constitutional suffragists—who, as a matter of fact, have continually deprecated disorderly proceedings, whose methods are "by orderly propaganda and public discussion to put the question before the electors, that they may induce Members of Parliament to press it forward"—and who have obtained correspondingly little notice or attention—more shame to the Liberal members and the whole Liberal Party.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN R. TOMLINSON.

Ryefield, Knutsford, Cheshire.

RECOLLECTIONS OF FRANCIS NEWMAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the article on Francis Newman in your issue of September 25th, you do me the honor of quoting an anecdote of mine. May I improve the occasion by submitting to you some personal recollections of him? It was in 1871 that I made his acquaintance through the agency of Miss Swanwick. The following extract from the account of her in my "Old and Odd Memories" may serve to illustrate an obscure passage in Newman's life:—

"Being on very cordial terms with Francis Newman, Miss Swanwick was surprised and shocked by the tone of the book he wrote after the death of his brother. He had spoken to her in very friendly terms of the Cardinal, and had shown her an affectionate letter which he had received from him on his birthday. It appears that Francis told John Henry that, in spite of theological differences, there was really great spiritual sympathy between them; and received for reply that there could be no such sympathy whatever. The younger brother felt this bitterly; and Miss Swanwick was inclined to regard it as one cause of his asperity. I remarked to her that Arthur Stanley—I think in his "American Addresses"—expressed the paradoxical opinion that some of Francis Newman's writings would probably outlive those of his brother. She replied that the Dean had expressed the same opinion to her in conversation. He once talked to me about the Cardinal not very sympathetically. But can he seriously have thought that any writing of Francis Newman will be remembered so long as 'Lead, Kindly Light'? People will differ as to the comparative soundness of the views of the two brothers; but almost all agree that in point of style the elder brother was infinitely superior; and style is the anti-septic of literature. Le livre, c'est le style would be true enough for an epigram. Miss Swanwick was startled and annoyed when, in 1873, Francis Newman and the present writer put in a plea for euthanasia."

It may here be stated that Mr. Gladstone, while expressing a highly creditable admiration for the saintly infidel, told me that he hated his book about his brother. Jowett took a more indulgent view. He regarded the two brothers as made of wholly different clay. Frank Newman carried his love of truth, or at least of minute accuracy, to the point of pedantry, while John Henry was, in Jowett's opinion, by no means thus pedantic. Let me add that Frank Newman was far from regarding Jowett as righteous overmuch in respect to truth. He spoke to me in high praise of the Master's theological essays; but he could not understand how the author of those essays could reconcile it to his conscience to remain in orders. He surprised me by showing—like Jowett, A. P. Stanley, and Pattison—a side of sympathy with the (then) ex-Emperor of the French. He told me that Kossuth had started with a strong prejudice against Louis Napoleon, but that, having communicated with him more than once, he found that his opinion of him, not intellectually only, but morally, was continually raised.

An opponent of women's rights remarked to Newman, in my presence, that, arguing from the analogy of the higher animals, we may infer that the average man is likely to be superior to the average woman in intellect, as he is certainly superior to her, not only in size and stature, but in strength and consequent endurance of work. Newman: "Let us assume that men collectively have three-fifths of the intellect of the country. Why should the remaining two-fifths be excluded from all share in the government?"

Miss Swanwick amazed me by announcing that Newman had heard in Persia of a certificate of marriage which was to last half-an-hour. I inquired of Newman concerning these toy-marriages (to use no harsher term) and his reply, somewhat abridged, was as follows:—

"Being in Persia in 1832, I knew a Government official, a religious man, and, in my esteem, highly veracious, who had the Arsenal under his command, with a control over the Persian soldiers and civilians in it. Recently he had seen a Persian walking in evident intimacy with a woman of bad reputation, and remonstrated with him about it. The man replied by producing the certificate of that form of marriage which they call, I think, cazbeen. My friend read it and found it signed by the priest, and all correct; but it married the man and woman for half an hour. My friend added that when a merchant who has left a wife at home desires a temporary wife, he goes to the priest, who keeps a list of women willing to become wives for a specified time, and sends for a company of perhaps half a dozen of these to meet the merchant. They are all closely veiled, and the applicant must select one without raising her veil; upon which the priest makes out and signs the document of cazbeen. This custom has impressed me with great horror of all marriage that is limited to definite time, so as to contemplate any breach except by failure of life or of essential duty."

On another occasion I heard him somewhat qualify the opinion expressed in the words here italicised. He intimated that perhaps divorce should be allowed in cases of confirmed drunkenness or hopeless insanity. He also mentioned to me with seeming approval a custom which was said to prevail in a certain community. He had been told that in that community, when two married persons wish to be divorced for incompatibility of temper, they notify their wish to a Government official and are told by him that, if they are of the same mind after the lapse of three years, their request shall be granted. During the interval, unless in extreme cases, friends do their utmost to reconcile this semi-detached couple; and so effectual is the application of this balm that, when the three years are over, the untoward petition is but seldom renewed.

That Radical pioneer, Charles Austin, being a member of Johnson's Club, which sometimes less modestly calls itself the club, was asked by me, forty years ago, why Francis Newman had not been elected among its members. He replied that Newman was hardly distinguished enough. To which I objected that Lord Stanhope, the historian, was one of the members—was he an abler man than Newman? Austin: "I should think that Newman is at least as able as Lord Stanhope; but we have to take into consideration the various elements of distinction." This rejoinder seems to me noteworthy, or, so to say, quoteworthy, as showing the wide gulf between the Whigs of those times and their modern successors. It is marked by a quaint old-worldliness which a hostile critic might now call snobbishness, and it is curious as coming from one who had been a friend of Bentham and of the two Mills, of whose conversational powers John Mill spoke to me in high terms, and who is described by Sir G.

Trevelyan as having had "a dominating influence" over Macaulay. But in justice to Austin we must bear in mind, first, that when he took that line he had been de-Liberalised by age; and, secondly, that Newman, with his unpopular opinions and somewhat aggressive personality, might have been a source of disturbance in the club.—Yours, &c.,

LIONEL A. TOLLEMACHE.

Athenæum Club, Pall Mall, S.W.

October 4th, 1909.

THE LORDS AND THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—An objection was raised in last week's "Observer" to the remarks of THE NATION concerning the position of the King in the event of a possible rejection of the Finance Bill by the House of Lords.

But it is difficult to see how the functions of the King, the Lords, and the Commons can possibly be separated. Moreover the rejection of the Bill by the Lords would operate more as an interference with the Royal Prerogative than anything else which it is possible to conceive.

It is admitted that the Lords cannot originate or amend a Money Bill; but they can reject it. Nevertheless, the function of providing revenue is vested exclusively in the Commons. We have but to refer to the King's Speech at the opening of the present session to perceive this.

The King's Speech is well known to be the message to Parliament which the Government of the day advise the King to make, and it represents, when delivered, the final result of the King's acceptance of such advice.

On February 16th last the King addressed both Houses as "My Lords and Gentlemen," and after referring to general matters, addressed himself solely on matters of finance to "Gentlemen of the House of Commons," and proceeded as follows: "Estimates for the expenditure of the year will be laid before you. . . . The provision necessary for the services of the State in the ensuing year will require very serious consideration, and, in consequence, less time than usual will, I fear, be available for the consideration of other legislative measures." And then the Speech addressed itself again to "My Lords and Gentlemen."

Now the rejection of the Finance Bill by the Lords would be a deliberate refusal to the King of the supplies which, in response to the Royal command, the "faithful Commons" had voted, and it is almost unthinkable that the Lords could possibly intervene between the King as the source of all authority in the State and the supplies by which alone such authority can be sustained.

A short glance at the most recent form of written constitution which the world has seen may be of use in this connection. By the South Africa Act, 1909, which was the product of the united wisdom of the statesmen of the four colonies of South Africa, and which has been passed unaltered by both Houses of the Imperial Parliament and received the Royal assent, it is provided that all money Bills must originate in the Lower House of Assembly, and that such Bills cannot be amended by the Upper House, or Senate. The Senate is, however, an elected, and not a perpetual body, and if it should reject a Bill, then, if the House of Assembly shall pass the same Bill in a subsequent session and the Senate should again reject it, both Houses are to be summoned to meet together, and if the Bill is carried by a majority of those present it becomes law forthwith.

Upon the first rejection, therefore, the Governor-General, acting upon the advice of the Executive Government, would prorogue Parliament, and could at once summon a fresh session and then call a joint meeting of both Houses and so remove the deadlock immediately.

From this it will be seen that the supreme power lies in the Lower House, and this fact alone should be enough to show that resistance to a Finance Bill by the Upper House must be ineffectual if the Party in power has a sufficient majority in both Houses combined to support them in their policy and proposals. That some such provision in the Imperial Parliament will be the inevitable consequence of any attempt by the House of Lords to reject the Finance Bill seems clear; and whether the Budget is rejected or passed, ample notice has already been repeatedly given that no Liberal Government will again take office unless it is endowed with power to prevent the veto of the Lords being effectual entirely to frustrate the measures of the Government in ordinary matters or to amend or reject Finance Bills at all.—Yours, &c.,

S. S.

National Liberal Club,
October 5th, 1909.

FISCAL CONUNDRUMS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Here is a Fiscal conundrum that has proved of inestimable value to the Free Trade argument on many a platform. Everyone has heard it: How can foreign imports be shut out in order to benefit home employment, and, at the same time, a revenue be raised by letting them in?

We cannot have too many of these. I suggest another: If the foreigner is to pay, in what form will payment be made? I think the question is a pertinent one. Its nature to the Free Trader may not be at once apparent; but let someone try to answer it.—Yours, &c.,

SCOTIA.

September 27th, 1909.

ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Have you not mistaken the report on the teaching of Oriental languages? It contrasted London with Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg, but you say that the British Empire has in this field "hitherto done virtually nothing." But the University of Oxford alone maintains Professors in Sanskrit, Arabic, and Chinese, and, in addition, provides teaching, satisfactory to the India Office, for "those who are sent to govern" India, and teaching satisfactory to the Egyptian Government for the few young Englishmen who receive appointments in that country. A chair of Japanese has just been established, and the Oriental publications of the University during the last thirty or forty years are well known. Cambridge offers much the same facilities.—Yours, &c.,

C.

Oxford, October 6th, 1909.

THE BUSINESS OF MARRIAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have just read your interesting review of Miss Hamilton's book, entitled "The Business of Marriage," in your issue of September 11th. The review is sympathetic, and shows a certain insight and freedom from prejudice still rare amongst masculine critics. I read on nearly to the end, with a sort of pleased surprise at your reviewer's open mind. Then, in the last paragraph but one, came the inevitable fall to earth. Your reviewer is shocked, genuinely shocked, by what he calls an "amazing sentence" in Miss Hamilton's book. Here is the sentence: "To him (man) the accidental factor in woman's life is the all important." In your reviewer's indignation that marriage should be regarded as an "accidental" factor, you have the true civilised male attitude. It is horrible to him that woman should be regarded as a free human being; that she should fail to recognise "the dominant part of maternity" in her life. Her refusal to recognise this dominance of the maternal instinct is, to the average man, the vilest of heresies. Perhaps it is for that reason that a woman seldom dares to utter it. The individuality of woman is still in swaddling clothes: she is still burdened with a heavy load of "slave virtues": she knows, subconsciously at least, that a frankly egoistic attitude will alienate sympathy from her cause, and will be regarded (vide your reviewer) as "the most hopeless of all solutions and the most unworthy." Therefore, at all costs, and to strengthen the weak brother, she holds aloft the banner of the Ideal, even though staggering under its weight. She seldom dares to say, "I want freedom for myself." Such plain speaking would be undiplomatic as well as startling. She says instead, "Look at my cause: it is the cause of the children, the poor, the oppressed, the weak." She must invoke pity, or claim concessions on grounds of high polity, or seek justification for her demands by reason of her good works and her intimate connection with Nature or the World Spirit. Your reviewer is horrified at what he calls Miss Hamilton's "dogmatic assertion of feminine individualism." No wonder. Feminine individualism has been obliged to go masked, and the mask has become so familiar that we are shocked when it is thrown aside.

I have not read Miss Hamilton's book, but I am glad to know that she has had the courage to lift the curtain even a little, and to show women in another rôle from the ever-popular one of self-sacrificing race-builder.

But, having said so much, let me add a word more. I do not wish to be understood as minimising the importance of sex. My view of the enlightened woman is that she neither seeks to escape from her sex nor fails to recognise its importance. On the contrary, she accepts its responsibilities cheerfully, not because they are imposed by custom, but because she wills freely to do so. If her will, acting with the forces of nature, leads her to impose bonds on herself, well and good. But let the sanction lie in her own will. When, I wonder, shall we see clearly that not in self-sacrifice but in a glorious self-assertion—in that very "feminine individualism" which your reviewer so deplotes—is to be found the best hope for the race?

A free and joyous life for all is what we aim at: a free life that accepts bonds freely: a joyous life that in its joyousness brings joy to others.—Yours, &c.,

ELLEN DUNCAN.

Poetry.

THE THREE YEW TREES.

THE wind that talks in the trees
Is more to me than love;
Talking over the time-worn graves
Where my forefathers lie at ease:
And I heed what the wind says, as it waves
The branches, and soft o'er the worn stones move
Sunlight, and shade of the three yew trees.

I lie awake and with delight
Hear the rain along the rones,
And smile to think it beats all night
On the gray and time-worn stones;
And the thought of the beds where my fathers lie
Somehow subdues my soul, that says:
"What are the light of a woman's eye
And the feet of the children along the ways?"

I hear the ring of the stone
On the scythes at reaping time,
And take my place with them there;
But somehow I seem alone
'Midst the scythe-men red and the reapers fair
As they bend and bind, where the green hills climb
From the valley, where are the three yew trees
And all my people lying at ease.

The men look puzzled on me at times,
As I swing the scythe, and the women smile,
White-teethed women with full red lips,
And arms that shall some man beguile;
But if at the meal-time I should pass
The scones, or the jar from the long, cool grass,
And happen to touch their finger tips,
I look to the vale whence the calm hill climbs,
Where my forefathers lie at ease
'Neath the worn stones and the three yew trees.

FREDERICK NIVEN.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

A REVISED edition of Mrs. J. R. Green's "The Making of Ireland and its Undoing" will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan. It contains an appendix furnishing additional evidence, drawn from the State Papers and other records, on many points that have been controverted. Mrs. Green is able to show that an extensive and varied commerce between Ireland and the Continent was carried on throughout the Middle Ages until the Elizabethan wars, while there is no reason to hold that the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries marked a time of decay and relapse to semi-barbarism. On the question of the part played by the native Irish in town life, in commerce, and in manufactures, Mrs. Green not only gives illustrative lists of Irish names that occur in municipal life, but is also able to show by further references the extent to which the Irish were obliged to take foreign names, a matter that has been much questioned. In her new preface Mrs. Green lays stress upon the need for "a complete study of Irish sources by competent Irish scholars, an examination by historical students of the materials existing in Irish, English, and foreign libraries and collections, and an investigation by trained archæologists into the wealth of medieval ruins that should be the glory of Ireland, but are, in fact, too often rapidly disappearing through indifference."

THE autobiography of Mr. Bennet Burleigh, the famous war-correspondent, which we learn from the "Westminster Gazette" is to be issued by one of the leading publishers, is likely to be one of the most stirring books of adventure of the season. Besides the Russo-Japanese and the South African wars, Mr. Burleigh went through the French Expedition to Madagascar, and took part in practically every Egyptian campaign from Tel-el-Kebir to Omdurman. Of still greater interest than his accounts of recent events will be his recollections of the American war, where he fought on the Confederate side and was twice sentenced to death. Mr. Burleigh has been war-correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" since 1882.

AMONG Mr. Murray's announcements are "The Skene Papers: Memories of Sir Walter Scott," by James Skene, edited by Mr. Basil Thomson. Skene was Scott's intimate friend for nearly forty years, and considerable use was made of his papers in Lockhart's "Life of Sir Walter Scott." The acquaintance between the two men first came about through a common interest in German literature, and was strengthened by the patriotic enthusiasm which led both of them to take an active part in raising the Edinburgh Light Horse. It was after reading what Lockhart calls "an accurate and lively journal" of a tour in France by Skene that Scott decided to break fresh ground and lay the scene of one of his novels on the Continent. The result was "Quentin Durward," and the substance of the original introduction to that work was taken from one of Skene's chapters. The papers now to be published are said to give a very intimate and amiable picture of the poet's character.

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON has finished a new book described as "a typical fantastic, philosophical romance, dealing with many problems of the day, and especially with the conflict between Religion and Free Thought." This announcement leads us to expect something similar to "The Man Who was Thursday," a book which many readers regard as the best Mr. Chesterton has yet written. The title of the coming volume is "The Ball and the Cross," and it will be published by Messrs. Wells, Gardner.

MR. FIFIELD has in the press a volume containing English translations of three of M. Brieux's plays, together with a preface by Mr. Bernard Shaw. The plays included are "Maternity," translated by Mrs. Bernard Shaw; "The Three Daughters of Monsieur Dupont," translated by the late Mr. St. John Hankin; and "Damaged Goods," translated by Mr. John Pollock.

CRITICS have argued as to whether women or men are the better letter writers, and the controversy is not unlikely to be opened afresh by a collection of letters written by women, which Mrs. A. M. Ingpen is about to issue through Messrs. Hutchinson. The title is "Women as Letter Writers," and the editor begins as far back as the "Paston Letters," and closes with Christina Rossetti. The plan should furnish us with an attractive volume, since representative letters by Lady Mary Montague, Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, Mrs. Inchbold, Mrs. Thrale, Hannah More, Fanny Burney, Lady Morgan, Charlotte Brontë, Mrs. Browning, and Mrs. Carlyle will be included.

"PRIVATEERS AND PRIVATEERING" is the title of a book by Commander E. P. Statham, announced by the same publishers. The author begins by tracing the origin and development of "private men of war," and then proceeds to relate the lives and adventures of a number of these famous sailors of fortune. The book is not confined to the doings of British privateers, but includes the adventures of several French and American seamen who lived in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

A CONSIDERABLE amount of fresh information concerning John Wesley's early life will be contained in the new edition of the "Journal" which the Methodist Publishing House have in preparation. The editor, Mr. Curnock, has made use of several unpublished diaries and other manuscripts of Wesley, while he has also succeeded in reading the complex cipher which Wesley made use of in his early journals. The new material thus provided throws valuable light upon the development of Wesley's character, his literary and political activity in America, and the growth of the Methodist system. The edition is to be completed in six volumes, and the first, which will be issued within a couple of weeks, contains an account of Wesley's love affair with Miss Sophia Hopkey, written in his own hand and probably intended for his mother.

SOME fresh materials for the later history of the Tractarian Movement will be furnished by the "Letters of John Mason Neale," which Messrs. Longmans have in the press. Neale took an active part in founding the East Grinstead sisterhood and wrote extensively on theological and ecclesiastical subjects. He is the author of nearly one-eighth of the total number of hymns in "Hymns Ancient and Modern," and was, besides, one of the founders of the Cambridge Camden Society which developed into the Ecclesiological Society.

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "A Memoir of the Right Hon. William Edward Hartpole Lecky." By his Wife. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)
- "Early Church History (To A.D. 313)." By H. M. Gwatkin. (Macmillan. Two vols. 17s. net.)
- "In the Days of the Georges." By W. B. Boulton. (Nash. 15s. net.)
- "Greece in Evolution." Edited by G. F. Abbott. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- "Reminiscences of Charlotte, Lady Wake." Edited by Lucy Wake. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.)
- "Handel." By R. A. Streatfeild. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "Home Life in Ireland." By Robert Lynd. (Mills & Boon. 8s. net.)
- "Chateaubriand and his Court of Women." By Francis Gribble. (Chapman & Hall. 15s. net.)
- "Rome." By Edward Hutton. (Methuen. 6s.)
- "Old Etruria and Modern Tuscany." By M. L. Cameron. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "The New Socialism." By J. T. Stoddart. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net.)
- "Sir Walter Scott and His Friends." By Florence MacCunn. (Blackwood. 10s. net.)
- "Versions and Perversions of Heine and Others." By G. Tyrrell. (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
- "The Cruciality of the Cross." By P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.)
- "The Soul of St. Paul." By A. L. Lilley. (Griffiths. 3s. 6d. net.)
- "The Glimpse." By Arnold Bennett. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- "La France de Louis XIII." Par Noël Aymès. (Paris: Nouvelle Librairie Nationale. 3fr. 50.)
- "La Critique du Darwinisme Social." Par J. Novicow. (Paris: Alcan. 7fr. 50.)
- "La Vie de Frédéric Nietzsche." Par Daniel Halévy. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3fr. 50.)
- "L'Inspirée." Roman. Par Gabriel Sarrazin. (Paris: Perrin. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE GREEK EPIC.*

MISS STAWELL is a fine scholar and a brilliant writer. And this book, despite its grave critical weaknesses, is in the highest degree alive, sensitive, acute, and most persuasively written. In general it seems to me that where Miss Stawell is simply expounding Homer her work is of very high value, both for close observation and for imaginative quality. She has certainly made me see a number of important points which I had overlooked. Where she ventures into the field of historical criticism and the "Homeric Question" proper, I feel a marked weakness. I doubt if she has understood the point of view she is attacking or even thoroughly thought out her own theory.

Of course we Homeric scholars are apt to have each his bee in his own bonnet, and it may be that a certain deafness to the singing of my bee seems to me a more serious fault than it really is. This book was written before the publication of my "Rise of the Greek Epic," and has, naturally enough, not taken account of the re-statement of the critical case there contained. I am the more pleased to find that in many of our aesthetic criticisms and also in our protest against regarding the Odyssey as, without qualification, later than the Iliad, Miss Stawell and I are in agreement. Her whole statement of the value of Books xxiii. and xxiv. in the story of the Iliad is luminously good; so, in spite of some over-emphasis, is her exposition of the character of Achilles. In the discussions of the Odyssey I feel a less sure touch. The psychology attributed to the poet is elaborate and sometimes fanciful. And I cannot acquiesce in the treatment of Penelope, as a sort of epic Mrs. Nickleby. Seldom have I seen a noble lady so disrespectfully handled.

Miss Stawell's theory of the composition of the poems may be roughly stated thus: there was an original Iliad, containing about three-fifths of curs. It included, for instance, Books xxiii. and xxiv., but not vii., viii., ix., x., xiii., xiv. The same poet wrote practically the whole of the Odyssey, as it has come down to us. Later reciters then made "additions" to the Iliad. Now, to state what seems to me to be true in this theory, if Miss Stawell, instead of speaking of "the original Iliad," would say "a penultimate state of the Iliad," I should largely agree with her. If the Iliad was a Traditional Book, recited constantly by new poets in new generations from at least the tenth century B.C. to the fourth, it was probably in every stage of its growth a unity. Certainly every version of the Roland or the Niebelungenlied that we possess is a unity. And one of these unities may very likely have been much what Miss Stawell describes. That is, Books ix. and x. and some other long passages are, as parts of the Iliad, later than vi., xxiii., and xxiv. Again, as to the Odyssey, if instead of attributing it to "the same poet" as the Iliad, Miss Stawell would say "for a great part of its history it was recited and reshaped by the same poets" as the Iliad, she would have my cordial assent.

The thing that, to my mind, prevents Miss Stawell from reaching a satisfactory statement of the critical questions is that she operates with far too limited an idea of the processes and possibilities that are involved. She operates practically with nothing but a great "original poet" and a poor "interpolator" or "writer of additions." Now, as I have tried to show in my book, the history of any of the great traditional poems that we know involves processes far more numerous and subtle than this. To understand the question we must get back behind the days of published books and a reading public and the idea of literary property. We must get behind the distinction of the poet and reciter. Every reciter was also a poet, and was occupied both consciously and unconsciously in making his poem as good as possible. Consciously he added, altered, and expurgated; unconsciously he modernised the language. All these questions need, in my judgment, a great deal more analysis than Miss Stawell is prepared to give them. True, if we considered all the factors we should find our knowledge very uncertain and defective, and we should probably not arrive at any clear-cut theory of what verses were written by any particular bard. But that is not an argument against analysing; it is an argument against forming too positive a conclusion.

The same lack of analysis, we fear, vitiates the whole of the authoress's full and painstaking collection of statistics, as given in Appendices B and C. B collects the Odyssean lines and half-lines in Books i. and xxiv. of the Iliad, in order to prove that one is as "Odyssean" as the other; C, at much greater length, discusses and tries to minimise the numerous minute differences of language between the Iliad and the Odyssey, as given by Monro in his Homeric Grammar. I can best illustrate what seems to me the inadequacy of Miss Stawell's method by taking a particular instance in detail. I select one where to the casual reader her case seems surprisingly strong.

The use of ἐν with plur. of persons (= μετά, among) is generally taken to be Odyssean. Monro, agreeing with Jebb, says that in the Iliad "this use is almost confined to Books ix., x., xxiii., and xxiv."—that is, to the books recognised by most scholars as late and tending to Odyssean language.

Miss Stawell totally denies this statement. On the contrary, she says, there are only thirty-four instances of ἐν with persons in the Odyssey and actually sixty-four in the Iliad outside the four "late" books. She proceeds to give the instances.

This seems crushing; but she has omitted to notice that Monro is speaking of those cases with persons which are "departures from the strict local sense." He means cases like: "He rose and spoke in (ἐν) the Argives" for "among" the Argives; where the use is clearly, though slightly, different from cases like "in the front fighters," "in the middle lines," or even "lying in the dead bodies," and "So-and-so is in the Trojans, cut off." This distinction disposes at once of 38 of Miss Stawell's instances, and if closely considered will dispose of several more.

Next, consider the instances remaining. Take those in Book i., "The Mênis," as Miss Stawell light-heartedly calls it. They are four: 520, 398, 109, 575. Of these 520 is in the Thetis episode, very generally regarded as a late addition, e.g., by Leaf; 398 was condemned as "spurious" by Zenodotus; 575 is highly suspicious. It contains a word not elsewhere found in Homer, and forms the beginning of a passage quoted from the Odyssey and containing the Attic use of the article. No one could possibly cite the passage as evidence for early Iliadic use. There remains one line, 109, of which all we need say is that it is "inorganic"—i.e., it goes in or out without affecting the sense or the grammar. Miss Stawell is wrong, then, in my judgment—(1) in not accurately seeing what Monro meant, and thereby accusing two great scholars of a very considerable mistake; (2) in labelling Book i. "The Mênis," as if, on the theory she is attacking, it was all homogeneous; (3) in not considering the credentials of each line that she quotes. These points would not matter so much were not Miss Stawell actually using the fact that these late and suspicious lines agree with the Odyssey as an argument that the Odyssey is by the author of the "Original Iliad." This is not an isolated instance. It is only typical. On the next page, for instance, in the treatment of ἐν with Abstract Words, we light at once on five alleged cases in the "original books," not one of which will bear strict analysis. In xv., 426, στέλει is hardly an abstract: it is rather "a narrow place." Cf. Miss Stawell's own excellent remark on ἐνὶ θυμῷ (p. 269). In xv., 741, Dionysius Thrax had a different reading; the uncertainty of the text is here vital. In xxii., 483, the passage recurs in the "late" book xxiv., and may be taken from there. xxii., 199, is in a passage generally suspected: it is condemned, for instance, by the Scholiast, Leaf, Van Leeuwen, and Christ. xxii., 61, is in a passage which Mulder has shown to be probably taken from Kallinos, and therefore not early. On the next page Miss Stawell actually quotes ὅρη ἐν εἰαρίῃ four times as evidence of the use of ἐν. The phrase is a well-known instance of the digamma; the metre proves that ἐν can only have been introduced after the digamma had ceased to be regarded—that is, in times far too late to have any bearing on the grammar of any "Original Iliad."

The fact is that as a contribution to the Homeric Question Miss Stawell's work does not cut deep enough. Her great literary gifts and excellent scholarship are not enough to carry her through that difficult and somewhat thankless subject. But as an exposition of the Homeric Poems, as they now stand—or, at least, of the Iliad, for I cannot forget Penelope—the book is very remarkable in quality and should prove most stimulating to students. It does at least treat the Iliad and Odyssey as great poetry, and with the insight of one who knows and loves great poetry.

* "Homer and the Iliad." By F. M. Stawell, Newnham College, Cambridge. Dent. 10s. 6d. net.

GILBERT MURRAY.

REVALUATIONS.*

MALEBRANCHE saw all things in God; Professor Freeman in Teutonism. Of Mr. Benn it may be said that he sees them in Hellenism. This, for him, is the universal medium; in it we live and move and are. What is, perhaps, the most striking of these essays, that on "The Ethical Value of Hellenism," finds this "not in any opposition to the highest modern ideals of conduct, but in its approach to and anticipation of what we cherish as most essential to modern civilisation." The recently discovered Comedies of Menander, quoted in the preface, support this view. But for the possible intervention of the Censor—for the author does not represent sex aberrations in a comic light—"Arbitration" might be reproduced on the English stage.

The notes of Hellenism require revision. Σωφροσύνη was the distinctive virtue of Greek life, which was simple, strenuous, and restrained. Mr. Benn accentuates this.

"I have no desire to be classed with the neo-Pagans—if the persons calling themselves by that name still exist as a class; I detest their theories, and I believe that in most ancient Greek communities they would have been summarily lynched had they tried to put those theories into practice."

And he calls attention, rightly, to the fact that the medieval view of classical morality was diametrically opposed to the modern. The moralist of to-day opposes Pagan vice to Christian virtue; Abélard, Roger Bacon, John of Salisbury, and the rest, contrast Pagan virtue with Christian vice. Why?

"The truth is that their reading of classical antiquity was not biased, as ours it, by an apologetic interest. They accepted Christianity because it was true, not because it strengthened the hands of the social reformer, the magistrate, and the policeman. Hence there was no particular motive for exaggerating its services in that direction. Religion, no doubt, was useful; but its utility consisted not so much in making people better members of society as in saving them from eternal damnation. Baptism gave a chance, absolution in articulo mortis a certainty, of escaping from that dreadful fate; and the possession of so precious a privilege was the great advantage that the Christian possessed over the Pagan. Otherwise he had nothing to boast of—rather the contrary."

It may be added that to the average religious mind of the time this would not have seemed incongruous. The tie between religion and morality was loose. The former was a system of magic or spells: the priest possessed a stronger "medicine" than the moralist, who, indeed, possessed no "medicine" at all. The Reformation, which accentuated the ethical note, at the same time brought in a false historical perspective. The dogmatic prepossessions of the Reformers combined with their moral sense to produce the change of view.

"The dogmas which Luther attacked had been bound up in a peculiar way with the philosophy of Aristotle, and therefore the Aristotelian ethics became a special object of his animosity. The doctrine of moral habits seemed radically inconsistent with the doctrine of instantaneous regeneration. Men do not become just by performing just actions; they perform just actions because they have been made just."

Mr. Benn, we think, has proved his case, that the ethical value of Hellenism equals its intellectual and artistic value. If his book is as widely read as it deserves to be, the apologetic argument derived from the supposed contrast between Pagan and Christian morality must, as far as Greece is concerned, be dropped. The contribution of the Hebrews to the progress of the race was not ethical, but religious: "Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

Nor is it the fact that Greek philosophy was without influence on public life. It taught men to regard life "from a universal point of view," thus enlarging their practical as well as their speculative outlook. The physiocratic method "made on the whole for righteousness"; both in its defects and in its qualities it was the spiritual ancestor of Socialism, in the larger sense of the word, as we know it to-day. If it seems a paradox to be told, as we are by Plato, that the worst of the Greeks is better than the best of the barbarians, it must be remembered that the civilisation of the time lived side by side with savagery, as was the case a generation ago in the Western States of America. The wonder is, not that the antagonism between the two was strong, but that it was not stronger; that the cruelties of modern frontier warfare are foreign to the Greek temper, which was at once easy and light. Nor was there any insuperable race barrier. "According to Isocrates, what made a Hellene was not race, but education." Never, perhaps, has the dream of the philosopher-king and the king-philosopher been approached so nearly as in the Greek city commonwealth at its best. "The social question took precedence of every other. The whole object of a Greek democracy was first to secure the poorer classes against oppression, and then to provide them with a larger share of material advantages." To read that "in Athens the principal weight of necessary taxation was thrown on the rich" recalls contemporary controversies, and connects Pericles with Mr. Lloyd-George.

"The Higher Criticism and the Supernatural" accentuates the historical factor in the former: history rather than philosophy is the solvent under which the old orthodoxies have given way. History, we should rather put it, shows what the course of events has been; philosophy shows that it could not have been otherwise: it places us in a world of process not of fixed quantities, of reason not of chance. "Pascal's Wager" is an examination of an, it is to be hoped, extinct form of pietism. It is one of the ironies of theology that while the Provincial Letters have gone out of vogue in religious circles, stress is laid, by those from whom better things might have been looked for, on the less sane elements of the writer's tortured spirit—his sophistry, his asceticism, his craven fear. Such a God as he conceived must be destroyed as ruthlessly as Baal or Moloch, if Theism is to be saved.

"The Alleged Socialism of the Prophets" is a severe criticism of Renan's "Histoire du Peuple d'Israel." The author "simply ignores the more modern criticism," and writes not for students, but for the boulevardier, for whose taste he caters and to whose prejudices he condescends. To speak of Socialism in relation to the prophets, is to discredit them in the judgment of a community of which it may be said emphatically that its life consisteth in the abundance of the things that it possesseth. But it is an anachronism. Socialism can be developed only at a later stage of civilisation: it presupposes an experience, an abstraction, a theological standpoint foreign to the prophetic age. "Only in the centres of Western civilisation has such an elaboration of ideas ever been possible." To reach it "men must have convinced themselves that the social organism is a machine that they have created for themselves, rather than a divine creation to be altered only at the good pleasure of God." What the prophets denounce is not wealth, but unjustly acquired wealth. And, for them, the value of monotheism lay not in its correctness as a speculation but in its ethical implications: "unity of person and power implied unity of will."

"They no more anticipated the problems of modern society than they predicted the events of modern history. But balance and harmony are the most pervasive characteristics of their teaching, by whatever test it is tried, with whatever order of interests it has to deal. No minds were ever, in T. H. Green's sense, more truly organic to the eternal consciousness. None ever placed the divine so far above the human, but none ever wrought more surely for the re-union and recognition of both as interdependent elements of a single absolute existence."

The last essay, "What is Agnosticism?" is, perhaps, too speculative to be quite convincing. But the book as a whole is singularly full and suggestive: it should be in the hands of every candidate for honors in Oxford Greats.

LIFE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.*

THE stream of books that is poured out on the subject of eighteenth century life and eighteenth century scandals seems to suggest that interest in this topic cannot die. This is at first sight a strange and bewildering phenomenon. There is nothing particularly heroic or romantic about the little world that treated its pleasures, its accomplishments, and its escapades as the capital object of existence for itself and the nation which it governed. In particular there is nothing heroic or romantic about the scarcely acclimatised Court whose chief members certainly did not succeed by any gifts or graces of character in eliminating the grossness of vice or the harshness of virtue. It might seem odd that we should all still want to know how many fortunes disappeared at the gaming tables of Brooks', and still more odd that anybody should care still to pursue the squalid stories of the domestic quarrels and treacheries of the Georges. Yet this interest undoubtedly persists and the world continues to swallow all the innumerable books that are printed about the intrigues and careers of the spoilt children of this age. An analogous case is that of the contemporary Court of France, whose frivolous and monotonous life preserves its curious fascination for the modern mind, and commands an audience for any book on the memoirs or confessions of those who enjoyed or endured the life of Versailles. In that case, of course, the dramatic catastrophe that overwhelmed and extinguished this existence gives a certain piquancy to the story. The men and women who intrigued and quarrelled over the most tedious trifles about the precedence and privileges of rank stand out against a red background of engulfing realities. The English eighteenth century aristocracy has not been made morbidly interesting by such a fate, but it has succeeded in making a later age read the century with its own eyes and in provoking a permanent curiosity about its own trivial doings. This is partly due, of course, to the splendid art in which it could perpetuate even the most undistinguished features of its most undistinguished members. When we think of the eighteenth century we call up a gallery of Sir Joshua's, of Gainsborough's, of men and women painted in every dress and every disguise, as if they were determined that their faces and their graces should haunt and pursue the centuries that came after. Perhaps a democratic society will oblige all the best artists to paint only the portraits of the poor, so that succeeding generations may not forget the realities of life in contemplating the calm and leisured comfort of a small class.

* "Revaluations: Historical and Ideal." By Alfred W. Benn Watts. 3s 6d. net.

* "In the Days of the Georges." By W. B. Boulton. Eveleigh Nash. 15s. net.

Mr. Boulton's book is a good example of the kind of fiction of "eighteenth century" society that is sure to interest a great many readers. He is a pleasant and entertaining writer. He gives us a realistic picture of the business of running a faro bank at Brooks'; the sort of profession adopted by members of the governing class who, in modern times, would be directors of a company. It was in this cheating pursuit that Lord Robert Spencer made the fortune with which he bought his estate at Woolbeding, and that Lord Foley disengaged himself of an income of £18,000 a year and £100,000 in ready money, leaving an estate which he received unencumbered under a heavy weight of mortgages. It is when we peep into Brooks' that we understand the important part played by our Family Settlements, which came in with the Restoration, in keeping the aristocracy together. In the sixteenth century the estates of "unthrifty gentlemen" had a way of passing into the hands of yeomen. Another chapter in Mr. Boulton's book describes the amazing legend of George the Third's early marriage with a Quakeress. The story was that, when Prince of Wales, George the Third fell in love with a charming Quakeress named Hannah Lightfoot, that he married her, had several children, and kept her in seclusion till her death. A variant of the story represented Hannah Lightfoot, not as the wife of the Prince of Wales, but as his mistress, their relations being covered by a marriage with an obliging tradesman. This story appeared from time to time in various forms, amongst those who aided in its circulation being William Combe, the author of the "Tours of Dr. Syntax," and Mrs. Thrale. But during the life of George the Third the story did not make any very bold appearance, and remained in the stage of rumor and innuendo. After the death of the King the story made more headway and got entangled, like most things in the quarrels of George the Fourth and his Queen. The author of "An Historical Fragment," relative to her late Majesty Queen Caroline, referred to the story as follows: "The Queen at this time labored under a very curious, and, to me, unaccountable species of delusion. She fancied herself in reality neither a Queen nor a wife. She believed his present Majesty to have been actually married to Mrs. Fitzherbert, and she as fully believed his late Majesty to have been married to Miss Hannah Lightfoot, the beautiful Quakeress, previous to his marriage with Queen Charlotte: that a marriage between King George and Queen Charlotte was a second time solemnised at Kew under the color of an evening's entertainment after the death of Miss Lightfoot; and that as that lady did not die until after the births of the present King and H.R.H. the Duke of York, her Majesty really considered the Duke of Clarence the true heir to the throne. Her Majesty thought also that the knowledge of that circumstance by the Ministers was the true cause of George the Fourth's retaining the Tory administration when he came into power." Mr. Boulton traces the later history of this story with the controversy between Jesse, the author of the "History of the Court of George the Third," and Mr. Thorne, the founder of "Notes and Queries," and its connexion with the story of a marriage between the Duke of Cumberland and Olive Wilmot. It is a curious irony that attached such a story to the memory of George the Third, of whom Thurlow once said with his brutal frankness to the Prince of Wales, "Sir, your father will continue to be a popular King, as long as he continues to go to church every Sunday and to be faithful to that ugly woman, your mother; but you, Sir, will never be popular."

No eighteenth century book would be complete without an account of Beau Brummell, the subject of Mr. Boulton's last chapter. This king of dandies was the grandson of a tradesman, who let lodgings in Bury Street, St. James's. Charles Jenkinson, afterwards Lord Liverpool, being attracted, it is said, by the elegance of the inscription, "Apartments to Let," took rooms there, and took up the son who had made such a success of his handwriting, finally giving him a clerkship in the Treasury. The next step in the fortunes of the family was the promotion of the young clerk to the position of private secretary to Lord North. This happened in 1767. By 1788 William Brummell was in a position to retire to a country house in Berkshire with the dignity of high sheriff, and some £2,500 a year in sinecures. Young George came into £30,000, went to Eton and Oxford, and made his fortune, such as it was, at his first casual meeting with the Prince of Wales, who was vastly impressed by his deportment. Mr. Boulton tells the well-known story of his rise and fall. His last phase was ignominious, but something of his strange power remained to the last. By the efforts of the Vice-Consul at Caen he was allowed milk in his bath in prison, and two hundred pounds of public money was spent in getting him out of it. "Je puis vous assurer," he said on the day of his release, "que c'est aujourd'hui le plus heureux jour de ma vie car je suis sorti de prison et j'ai mangé de saumon."

NAPOLEON'S BROTHERS.*

THE great Corsican overshadowed his brothers so completely that it is difficult to realise that two, at least, of them, Joseph and Lucien, possessed abilities far above the average. The sisters, too, as M. Turquan has recently shown, were decidedly clever, each in her own wayward manner; and we realise, at least in part, the genius of the chief of the family when we observe the way in which he dominates, elevates, and controls these seven masterful characters.

The story of the brothers is by no means an easy one to tell. Their natures were so diverse, their paths so widely divergent, that Mr. Atteridge has, as it were, to grasp four oiled billiard balls at once. True, the career of Napoleon lends a certain unity to the narrative; but to lay stress on that is to dwarf the brothers. Mr. Atteridge has not fully overcome these difficulties. His chapters are often so full of the great man that the references to the brothers come in as little more than side-shows; and, in places, the facts come so thick and fast as entirely to blur the personalities of the actors. Indeed, a lack of characterisation appears to us the chief defect of the book. There is no effective portraiture of "Madame Mère," that uncultured, prim, and parsimonious dame, whom her children revered, but not seldom disobeyed. Joseph's marriage to Mlle.

* "Napoleon's Brothers." By A. Hilliard Atteridge. Methuen. 18s. net.

Clary, of Marseilles, is also referred to without a sufficient description of her, or, later on, of her sister Désirée, the future Queen of Sweden. It would also have added to the interest of the book to present portrait sketches of the four brothers—Joseph, Lucien, Louis, and Jerome—when their characters were matured. The time at which Jerome took possession of his Kingdom of Westphalia (November, 1807) would have been a convenient opportunity to take a survey of their personality and of the means by which the family had reached its perilous height of glory. As it is, the reader has to construct for himself the characters of the brothers from the plentiful store of events and incidents here to be found.

Mr. Atteridge states his facts carefully and without manifest bias; but the discerning reader can see that his penchant is for Napoleon, and in nearly all cases against the recalcitrant Lucien and Louis. He is rather hard on the former. Certainly the way in which "Citizen Brutus" shirked the military duties entrusted to him in 1793-4 was far from creditable; but the young man had a strong bent towards oratory and politics. And how can an embryo statesman put up with commissariat duties? In truth, except during the few weeks which culminated in the coup d'état of Brumaire, Lucien never had fit scope for his undoubtedly great abilities; and he always considered, probably with justice, that Napoleon disliked him for the superior tactfulness and courage which he displayed at that crisis. The feud soon became all but irreconcilable, and Lucien settled at Rome, becoming Prince of Canino, and devoting himself to artistic and agricultural pursuits, which, by the way, we wish that Mr. Atteridge had described more fully in Chapter XV. A longer sketch of his novel, "La Tribu Indienne," and some notice of his epic, "Charlemagne," would also have been a relief to a narrative which is necessarily concerned mainly with politics. How much Napoleon missed by not always having the support of Lucien appears from the prompt and able conduct of the younger brother after Waterloo. Lucien it was who persuaded the Emperor to proclaim Napoleon II., and did much to stay the adverse tide of events. Lucien would probably have made a better King of Spain than Joseph. He had more energy; his oratory was impressive; and he would not have tried to meddle in military affairs and to command armies. If the Spanish experiment could have succeeded at all (which is very doubtful after the perfidy of Bayonne), it would have been with Lucien, or Murat, at Madrid. Joseph was doing good work at Naples; and from the beginning he was clearly a misfit in Spain. At first the scheme was mooted of placing Lucien as Viceroy of Joseph in the New World. Singular it would have been to see the quondam "Brutus" of the Jacobin Club of "Marathon" (St. Maximin) reigning at Mexico over more than half of the New World.

There is one side of the career of Joseph Bonaparte which Mr. Atteridge scarcely notices. The eldest of the Bonapartes was an able diplomatist, as appeared by his conduct of the negotiations with Austria at Lunéville early in 1801, and at Amiens with Great Britain in 1802-3. In both of these episodes Joseph acquitted himself most creditably, and in the latter he and Maret clearly outmatched Cornwallis and Merry. All the points in dispute were decided in favor of France, and Napoleon's gratitude for his brother's services was unbounded. Joseph himself spoke of the Peace of Amiens as "My peace." The references here given to Joseph's constructive work at Naples are also inadequate; and there is the less excuse for this, as it had been well described by Mr. R. M. Johnston in "The Napoleonic Empire in Southern Italy." None of the Bonapartes rendered more important services than Joseph, aided by his Minister, Roederer, in sweeping away feudal abuses, in transferring the burden of taxation from the poor to the rich, and in preparing to revise Neapolitan law in conformity to the spirit, though not the letter, of the "Code Napoléon." The restoring of order to the finances, and the re-establishment of public contentment and order within the space of two years (despite the revolt consequent on the British victory of Maida) was an achievement of which any ruler might be proud. Not the least of Napoleon's blunders after Tilsit was the transference of Joseph to Madrid. That the latter resented it appears from his petty conduct towards his successor, Murat, which the author rightly stigmatises.

The pettiness which occasionally manifests itself even in the greater of the Bonapartes is painfully obvious in the characters of Louis and Jerome. The author's description of Louis well brings out the morbid elements of that singular character. Perhaps Mr. Atteridge does not allow sufficiently for the growing difficulties of Louis as King of Holland under the terrible grip of the Continental system, or for the generosity of his aims for his Dutch subjects. But the general outlines of his character and that of Jerome come out distinctly, though it would have been better to describe continuously the curious story of the Patterson marriage. It is singular that the first child of that union was born at Camberwell; also that Lucien should do literary work at Ludlow and Thorngrove in and after 1809.

Turning to details, we may notice that Mr. Atteridge exaggerates the importance of Napoleon's suggestions, in September, 1793, of the means of capturing Toulon. It is now recognised by impartial inquirers that the Commissioners of the Convention had suggested a similar plan. Again, after Vendémiaire, Bonaparte was not Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Interior, but second in command, until Barras resigned the chief command. Mr. Atteridge concludes that Bonaparte wished well to the Papacy in 1797-8 because, after his success over the Papalini at Tolentino, he did not march on Rome; but, surely, he stayed his march because he had to settle matters with Austria in the North. In point of fact, his references to the Papacy in his letters breathe contempt; and after the rupture at the end of 1797 he sent Berthier to Rome with the significant remark that he was to consider himself as Treasurer for the Army of England. The account of the scuffles before the French Embassy on December 27th and 28th is, also, favorable to the democrats and Joseph Bonaparte; and the Roman populace declared the Republic on February 15th, before Berthier's troops entered the city. Military affairs in general are touched on loosely. The importance of the surrender of some 22,000 French and Swiss troops at Baylen in July, 1808, is not pointed out. There is also a curious reference to "Vimiera and Roliça," though the skirmish at Roliça preceded the victory at Vimiera; and the sentence concludes, "Wellesley had driven Junot from Lisbon." That is what Wellesley wanted to do, and what Burrard and Dalrymple prevented him from doing. The description of Vittoria (the climax of Joseph's career) is also less careful than that of Maida, for which Joseph was not in the least responsible. Finally, it is regrettable that Mr. Atteridge appended the hurried chapters dealing with Napoleon III. The theme, "Napoleon's Brothers," was wide enough in itself, and the work would have gained in interest by fuller and more connected treatment. Even so, he has given us an interesting and instructive work.

CHRISTIAN SYMBOLISM.*

MR. SIDNEY HEATH, the author of "The Romance of Symbolism," advances in a somewhat tentative and hesitating fashion the old hypothesis that Gothic art was the creation of secret and mysterious brotherhoods. "The (Gothic) style," he says, "may have originated from some artistic association, closely allied and confederated in different countries." The "artistic association" is, presumably, meant to indicate the Freemasons, and for the sake of the innocent and unwary, it may be well to register the very flattest possible denial of this picturesque but fallacious fancy. Hallam, writing in the days of ignorance, when Gothic was but dimly understood, may be excused for putting forward the Masonic theory; but the studies and labors of the last seventy years have shown that the hypothesis is without foundation. For the fact is that the Gothic of every country is a thing distinct and apart; Spanish Gothic is different from French, French from English, and both from German. Indeed, county often differs from county; the Perpendicular of East Anglia compared with that of South Wales is as a palace to a hovel; and an early English lancet in a Welsh Church is sometimes so rudely shaped that it may easily be mistaken for a Norman window. Gothic, then, though it was the manifestation of one spirit, was a curiously

* "The Romance of Symbolism and its Relation to Church Ornament and Architecture." By Sidney Heath. Griffiths. 7s. 6d.

WILLIAMS & NORSGATE'S LIST.

HIBBERT JOURNAL SUPPLEMENT,

1909.

Ready about October 14th.

JESUS OR CHRIST?

The Volume will comprise contributions from the undermentioned writers, which have been written independently, and will be published bound in cloth, at 5s. net (postage 4d. extra). The Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL. The Point at Issue.

The BISHOP of SOUTHWARK. Who say ye that I am?

Professor H. WEINEL. Jesus our Saviour.

Professor PERCY GARDNER. Jesus or Christ? A Pragmatist View.

Professor F. SCHMIEDEL. The Christ of Theology and the Jesus of Religion.

Professor HENRY JONES. The Idealism of Jesus.

The Rev. RICHARD MORRIS, B.D. The Rationality of the Incarnation.

Sir OLIVER LODGE. A Divine Incarnation.

Canon H. SCOTT HOLLAND. The Jesus of History and the Christ of Religion.

The Rev. Father JOSEPH RICKABY, S.J. One Lord Jesus Christ.

Professor NATHAN SODERBLOM (Upsala). Father, Son, and Holy Spirit: Their Changed Relationships in Modern Thought.

Rev. Principal A. E. GARVIE, D.D. Faith and Fact.

The Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A. Jesus or Christ?

The Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, D.D. Jesus Christ and His Teaching.

Professor B. W. BACON, D.D. The Jesus of History and the Christ of Religion: The Approach toward Consistency.

Rev. Principal J. E. CARPENTER, D.D. Jesus or Christ?

Mr. JAMES COLLIER. The Christian Cult as Christ Worship.

The Rev. R. ROBERTS. Jesus or Christ? A Plea for Consistency.

NEW VOLUME COMMENCING.

OCTOBER. Ready on the 1st.
2s. 6d. net; 2s. 9d. post free.

HIBBERT JOURNAL.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:

Germany and England. Professor Dr. ADOLF HARNACK.

The Christian Religion as a Healing Power. The Rev. SAMUEL MCCOMB, M.A., D.D.

Luke the Physician and Ancient Medicine. The Rev. JOHN NAYLOR.

Ptolemaic and Copernican Views of the Place of Mind in the Universe. Professor S. ALEXANDER, M.A., LL.D.

Modernism: A Retrospect and a Prospect. The Rev. ALFRED FAWKES, M.A.

Jesus or Christ? A Rejoinder. The Rev. R. ROBERTS.

Calvin and Calvinism. Professor Dr. E. TROELTSCH.

Darwin and Darwinism. Professor BORDEN P. BOWNE.

The Paladin of Philanthropy. The Rev. F. G. PEABODY, D.D.

Crime and Punishment. Sir WILLIAM COLLINS, M.P.

Historical Fact in Relation to Philosophy of Religion. Rev. F. R. TENNANT, D.D., B.Sc.

Ready. Demy 8vo, 336 pages. 6s. net.

MAN AND THE BIBLE.

A Review of the Place of the Bible in Human History.

By J. ALLANSON PICTON, M.A. (Lond.). Author of "The Mystery of Matter," "The Religion of the Universe," &c., &c.

CONTENTS:—The Bible of our Fathers. The Bible in Protestant and Lollard Times. The Bible in the Later Middle Ages. The Bible in the Darkest Ages. The Bible in the Church's Silver Age. The Bible and Primitive Christianity. The Bible and Religion. The Bible and Morals. The Bible and Social Evolution.

Ready. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s.

DEMOCRACY AND CHARACTER.

By REGINALD STEPHEN, M.A., Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, Melbourne. Being the Moorhouse Lectures for 1908.

FROM THE CONTENTS.

I. The Spirit of Democracy. II. The Need of Dependence. III. Public Service. IV. The Demand for Equality. V. The Competitive System. VI. Circumstances and Character. VII. Democracy and Christianity. VIII. Morality in Business. IX. Property: Its Responsibilities and Rights.

"Canon Stephen's book is much too clear and thoughtful to be neglected in this country. Within the narrow limits of seven lectures he has discussed some important issues of politics in a democratic country with strong practical common sense and the right kind of theoretical learning."—Athenæum.

Almost Ready. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

SCIENCE, MATTER, AND IMMORTALITY.

By RONALD C. MACFIE, M.A., M.B., Author of "The Romance of Modern Medicine," etc.

From the Chapter Headings.—The Fabric of Matter—The Atomic Theory in its First Beginnings. The Growth of the Modern Mechanic Conception of Matter. Atoms and Molecules. Electrons. Matter and its Dematerialisation. The Ether. Life. The Origin of Life. The Physical Basis of Life. The Organic Evolution of Man. Some Thoughts on the Evolutionary Theory of the Origin of Man from Matter. What has Evolution in Store? Is Serial Organic Evolution Proven? Science and Mind. Science and Death. Science and Christian Science. The Place of Science.

Ready this month.

Demy 8vo, 403 pages, cloth 6s. net.

THE ETHICS OF PROGRESS.

By CHARLES F. DOLE, Author of "The Coming People," "The Spirit of Democracy," Contributor to the Hibbert Journal, etc.

Divisions of the Work—

ETHICS AND EVOLUTION.

THE DOCTRINE OF GOOD WILL.

CONSCIENCE AND THE RIGHT.

MORAL EVIL: HOW TO TREAT IT.

THE PROBLEMS OF HUMAN NATURE.

THE REALM OF CASUISTRY.

PROBLEMS IN PRACTICE.

NEW VOLUMES OF THE

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

In the Press.

THE OLD EGYPTIAN FAITH. By PROF. EDOUARD NAVILLE. Translated by REV. COLIN CAMPBELL, D.D.

Ready. Cloth, 4s.

MONASTICISM: Its Ideals and History; and the Confessions of St. Augustine. Two Lectures by ADOLF HARNACK. Translated by E. E. KELLET and F. H. MARSEILLE.

In the Press. Crown 8vo, Cloth.

BLAISE PASCAL, a Study in Religious Psychology. By HUMPHREY R. JORDAN.

4s. 6d. net; 4s. 10d. post free.

MAN'S ORIGIN, DESTINY, AND DUTY. By

HUGH MACCOLL. Crown 8vo, Cloth.

Professor A. E. TAYLOR in Mind.—"On the main issues involved the writer of the present notice must avow himself entirely on the author's side, and would unreservedly express his admiration for the skill and luminosity with which the chief points are made, and the happiness of the illustrations."

"Would that some public-minded society would provide the funds for circulating a book like the present in a sixpenny edition as a counterblast to the sorry stuff which the secularist press is providing as spiritual pabulum for the inquiring artisan."

5s. net; 5s. 4d. post free.

THE GOSPEL OF RIGHTNESS. A Study in

Pauline Philosophy. By C. E. WOODS. 300 pages, Cloth. The chief purpose in the author's mind has been to present a book to a class of thinkers and readers who are not so widely catered for as might be, and by whom the writings of the great Apostle have been shelved as no longer in keeping with the liberal thought of to-day. The attempt is made to present the Apostle in a somewhat new light as a philosopher who develops a remarkable scheme of spiritual thought from one or two very simple and self-evident principles.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. 2s. 6d. net.

THE GENESIS AND EVOLUTION OF THE INDIVIDUAL SOUL. By Rev. J. O. BEVAN, M.A., F.G.S., F.S.A., etc., Rector of Chillenden, Dover.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY. Its Writings and Teachings in their Historical Connections. By OTTO PFLEIDERER, Professor of Practical Theology in the University of Berlin. Volumes I. and II. ready, 10s. 6d. each net.

DIVISIONS OF VOLUME II.—"The Gospel of the Mark" "The Gospel of Luke" "The Acts of the Apostles" "The Lucan Writings" "The Gospel of Matthew" "The Preaching of Jesus and the Faith of the First Disciples."

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH. By HANS VON

SCHUBERT, Professor of Church History at Kiel. Translated from the German Edition by MAURICE A. CANNEY, M.A. Demy 8vo, Cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

"Professor Schubert has performed this task with a masterly hand. It is no exaggeration to say that this compendium of Church History is immeasurably ahead of any other in the English language."—The Nation.

THE INCARNATE PURPOSE. Essays on the Spiritual Unity of Life. By G. H. PERCIVAL. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Just Ready.] "This book is well worth reading, and contains much that is both illuminative and suggestive."—Liverpool Post.

DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI, AND OTHER SERMONS.

By Rev. J. Hunter, D.D. Large Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s. net. "Breadth of thought and evangelical fervour are combined in an unusual degree in this volume of eloquent sermons, which appeals to men of various shades of belief by reason of its culture and its deep religious earnestness and the winning freshness of the preacher's message."—Scotsman.

local art, the work of local craftsmen, not of a cosmopolitan society.

However, the hypothesis in question is put forward, as has been said, in a tentative manner; one is sorry to see that other statements of the author are less tentative, and, if possible, less accurate. It is with astonishment that one reads that the Temple Church was built by the Knights Hospitallers, that the position of the pulpit in the nave is peculiar to the Roman Catholic Church, that the word "porch" is derived from the Latin "porche," that βαπτίζω means "to wash," and that aspersion, or sprinkling, is allowed by the Rubric of the English Baptismal Service. Then we are told that the Fish Symbol was entirely abandoned at the beginning of the fifth century; while, on the preceding page, the author describes the seal of Aberdeen Cathedral, dated c. 1250, as figuring a Fish, instead of the Infant Saviour in the Manger. It is hardly harsh to say that these errors—the list might be extended—are inexcusable; and that their occurrence renders Mr. Heath's book of little value.

And then, one feels that the author has made but poor use of his opportunities; he sins not only by commission, but by omission. Take the article on the Fish Symbol. We have seen how Mr. Heath contradicts himself over the disuse of this emblem. "After gradually falling into disuse during the fourth century, it was entirely abandoned at the beginning of the fifth century." This false statement occurs at the end of the "Fish" article, which begins as follows:—

"At an early date (fourth century) it was discovered that the five Greek letters forming the word fish (Ι.Χ.Θ.Υ.Σ.) when separated, supplied the initials for the five words Jesus Christ (the) Son of God (the) Saviour, and this undoubtedly caused the fish to be adopted as a secret sign of the primitive Church."

So the symbol was "adopted" in the century in which it gradually fell into disuse! But, leaving these confusions on one side, it is necessary to say that the whole article is quite jejune and insufficient. It is not in the least likely that the cipher initials suggested the use of the symbol; this was surely a far later fancy. Moreover, the fourth century is quite a preposterous date for the origin of the symbol, which is recommended by Clemens Alexandrinus in the second century; it was probably of Egyptian source. Used generally as a Christian emblem, the fish was more especially the sign of the Elements of the Eucharist and of their Content, since the Early Church jealously concealed the matter of the sacraments from the uninitiated. Thus St. Augustine, after discussing Baptism, speaks of that other "solemnitas in qua ille piscis exhibetur, quem levatum de profundo, terra pia comedit." So an early inscription at Autun: "Offspring of the Heavenly Ichthus . . . eat with a longing hunger, holding Ichthus in thy hands." Thus, again, Abercius, Bishop of Hierapolis in the reign of Marcus Aurelius: "et apponit Cibum, ex uno fonte piscem, fides namque singulis produxit, prægrandem, impollutum, quem apprehendit immaculata virgo." These are but a few of the many loci which bear upon the early Christian symbol of the fish, and yet, though they are by no means recondite, the author of "The Romance of Symbolism" has contrived to pass them by unnoticed. When the need for the disciplina arcani ceased, when the expulsion of the catechumens and the heathen became a mere form, no doubt the Ichthus symbol ceased to be in common use; but it would be rash to declare that the meaning of the symbol was altogether lost: the imagery of the medieval seal, cited by Mr. Heath, seems to show that this was not the case. Certain parts of the Church may, no doubt, have forgotten the significance of the fish; and it is possible that the puzzling title of the Graal King, "the Rich Fisher," or "the King Fisher," together with the "piscis prægrandis," that occupies such an important position in certain of the Romances, owe their origin to misunderstanding or forgetfulness of the original significance of the emblem.

It is satisfactory to find that Mr. Heath, unsound and insufficient as he is in many ways, has not been taken in the desperate toils of the "occult" symbolists. He does not tell us that the two towers which are (sometimes) found at the west end of the Gothic cathedral are in reality high mysteries, and stand in the closest connection with the twin pillars Jachin and Boaz of Solomon's Temple, and the Masonic Ritual. He gives no space to the stupid and extravagant hypotheses about the Templars, who are supposed by some unfortunate and misguided persons to have been Rosicrucians, Gnostics, Adepts, Freemasons, Baphomet-worshippers, and many other things, and to have left memorials of their profundities and iniquities in the sculptures of the Temple churches. The truth is that the symbolism of medieval art is of catholic, and not of particular interpretation. There are, of course, well-ascertained exceptions to this rule: the Fish, for example, the signs of the Passion, and others; but if we consider the great work of the cathedral as a whole, we shall do well not to insist, as it were, on a literal translation. The cathedral is the tabernacle of the Mass; it shows all creation, beautiful and horrible, bright and dark, gathered together to celebrate the one Event; it shows the dead stones consecrated and transmuted, made into "living philosophical stones" to praise this one mystery, and to show this mystery to the world. If one thinks of it, there is the greatest of all gulfs between the Christian cathedral and the classic temple; lovely as this latter was in its own grade and fashion. But the Greek temple was, after all, but the translation of a common and earthly dwelling into the most beautiful materials obtainable. In a hot climate there are as few windows as possible to a house, if it is to be habitable, and so the window is not a feature in classic architecture. At the same time, a verandah, piazza, or "stoop" is a pleasant and desirable addition to such a habitation; hence the columns and portico of shining marble before the temple of Athene. Still, giving due credit to the builder's fine sense of proportion, the Parthenon is a log hut translated into marble, but not by any means translated into spiritual significance. The cathedral is not a glorified house. It is not like a feudal baron's castle, built of better materials and on larger lines. The king or baron did not say "Windsor (or Arundel) is my idea of a splendid house; so, no doubt, my god will be pleased if I build him a Windsor (or Arundel) on a larger scale, and of finer workmanship." The cathedral was rather the expression of adoration, and ecstasy, and mystery, in stone; it symbolised the earth, and all that therein is, exalted and assumed and redeemed into the region of eternal beauty by the power of the Sacrifice of the Mass. Here, one might say, are all the common objects that surround us, that make up our world. Here are the hard and shapeless stones, the rough ashlers of the quarry, here are the heavy logs of the timber yard, here are the colors red and blue and yellow, here are fragments of glass, and metal, here are stuffs of silk and velvet, here, finally, are men—ourselves. And all these things are capable of vile use and ugly use; squalor can be signified by stone, color can glare hideously, silk and velvet may be the expression of vulgar luxury, and wood can make a gallows tree. But in place of these uses, the old artists made of the wood the Rood, and brought, as it were, all the visible world into this one service—the Quest of the Perfect Beauty and of that Love which moves the sun and the other stars. And when the Rood was cast down it was time to build up the workhouse; and this was done accordingly, with results that are of common knowledge.

A TRAVELLER IN PERSIA.*

LORD CURZON remarks in his book on Persia that few countries in the world have given rise to so many books of travel, and that these include some of the best and some of the worst works of this class ever written. The book now before us belongs to neither of these extremes, for, though on the one hand it describes the quite ordinary journey through Persia by the main route from Bushire to Enzeli of a traveller who apparently had but a slight acquaintance with the Persian language, met with no remarkable adventures, and, with the exception of one or two formal visits to provincial governors, held converse with no Persians of note, it yet displays a certain sympathy and appreciation which make parts of it pleasant reading; so that, though the expert in Persian matters will learn little from its perusal, it will be read with pleasure and interest by those who,

* "Through Persia from the Gulf to the Caspian." By F. B. Bradley-Birt, F.R.G.S., I.C.S. Smith, Elder. 12s. 6d. net.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST

AUTUMN 6s. NOVELS.

By the Author of "The Waters of Jordan."

THE PALADIN: as Beheld by a Woman of Temperament.
HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

Daily Telegraph.—"A remarkably clever study of diverse characters and a deeply interesting story . . . one of the best novels that Mr. Vachell has given us; a book to be read and remembered."

Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Vachell, with this forceful and dramatic novel, will strengthen his hold on the large public which looks to him for a stimulating and regular fiction refreshment."

MR. JUSTICE RAFFLES. E. W. HORNUNG.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"In these vivacious pages we meet the attractively unscrupulous A. J. once more . . . quite amusing, and will doubtless extend the already large circle of A. J.'s admirers."

DORRIEN CARFAX: NOWELL GRIFFITH.
A Game of Hide and Seek.

Liverpool Daily Post.—"Weird and striking to a degree . . . the author wields a power of graphic and sympathetic description which is intensely convincing."

WORKS BY A. C. CURTIS. Large post 8vo, 3s. 6d. net each.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. With 16 Illustrations and 10 Plans.

THE SMALL GARDEN BEAUTIFUL.

Standard.—"No better little book could be desired by the amateur gardener, be he interested in vegetables or flowers."

With 4 Half-tone and 2 Line Illustrations.

THE SMALL GARDEN USEFUL.

Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

SAN CELESTINO: By JOHN AYSCOUGH.

An Essay in Reconstruction.

Author of "Marotz," "Admonition," "Dromina," &c.

A work that throws fresh light upon the career of Cestius V., the man ever remembered for his connection with the "gran rifiuto."

Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

GREAT AND GREATER BRITAIN:

The Political, Naval, Military, Industrial, Financial, and Social Problems of the Motherland and Empire.

By J. ELLIS BARKER, Author of "Modern Germany," "British Socialism," &c.

With 16 Illustrations. Sm. demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON AT PRAYER. By CHARLES MORLEY.

Author of "Studies in Board Schools," &c.

A series of impressions of various places of worship in London. The papers describe many scenes and characters encountered where London's millions go to pray, and include word-pictures of Catholics, Anglicans, the Church Army, the Salvation Army, Wesleyans, Independents, Presbyterians, Moravians, Quakers, the Mission Halls, and many others.

Ready October 12. With 2 Maps. Large Post 8vo, 6s. net.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE CONGO:

The Pillage of the Congo Basin.

By E. D. MOREL, Hon. Sec. of the Congo Reform Association, Author of "Affairs of West Africa," "The British Case in French Congo," "Red Rubber," &c.

With an Introduction by Sir A. CONAN DOYLE.

The primary object of this book is to convey the conviction that Great Britain cannot afford to be beaten in the struggle against the Slave System set up in the Congo by King Leopold as autocratic sovereign of the Congo Free State, and now being continued by King Leopold II.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL'S LIST

Mr. ALFRED H. MILES' NEW SERIES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

By the Editor of the famous "Fifty-two Series," which has already reached the phenomenal sale of nearly half-a-million copies.

Each Volume in Large Crown 8vo. 384 pages.

Printed on good paper from clear type, with about 20 original illustrations, handsome cloth gilt, special cover designs, full gilt edges. Five shillings each.

A Book of Brave Boys All the World Over, being Stories of Courage and Heroism in History and Modern Life, told by G. MANVILLE FENN, CLIVE FENN, H. J. A. HERVEY, and others. Edited by Alfred H. Miles.

A Book of Brave Girls At Home and Abroad, being True Stories of Courage and Heroism shown in Modern Life by Women and Girls, by MARY E. WILKINS, E. EVERETT-GREEN, ALICE F. JACKSON, &c. Edited by Alfred H. Miles.

In the Teeth of Adventure Up and Down the World. True Stories of real Peril by G. MANVILLE FENN, &c. Edited by Alfred H. Miles.

Billicks, Humorist and Philosopher. A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK. With cover design and original illustrations by George Fyfe-Christie. In crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Fatal Thirteen. WILLIAM LE QUEUX. An Experiment in issuing a new book by a famous author, in the first instance, at a popular price. In crown 8vo, attractive paper covers, 1s. net; or in cloth, gilt, 2s. net.

Brother Rogue and Brother Saint. TOM GALLON.
The Death Gamble. GEORGE R. SIMS.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

The Rose of Dauphiny. PHILIP L. STEVENSON.

The Ghost Pirates. WILLIAM HOPE HODGSON.

The Submarine Girl. EDGAR TURNER.

Love, the Thief. Fourth edition. HELEN MATHERS.

Troubled Waters. Second edition. HEADON HILL.

Strange Fire. CHRISTOPHER MAUGHAN.

Golden Aphrodite. WINIFRED CRISPE.

Shoes of Gold. Second edition. HAMILTON DRUMMOND.

Stolen Honey. Second edition. ADA and DUDLEY JAMES.

Adventures of a Pretty Woman. FLORENCE WARDEN.

Co-Heiresses. E. EVERETT-GREEN.

The Vortex. FRED WHISHAW.

Tropical Tales. DOLF WYLLARDE.

Love Besieged. CHARLES E. PEARCE.

Intimate Society Letters of the 18th Century.

By His Grace the DUKE OF ARGYLL, Author of "Passages from the Past," &c. In two volumes, demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top. With two photogravure frontispieces and numerous other full-page illustrations, printed on art paper, of original letters, autographs, and other interesting matter. 24s. net.

The Dauphines of France. FRANK HAMEL, Author of "Famous French Salons," &c. Demy 8vo, handsome cloth gilt, with gilt top. With a photogravure frontispiece and 16 full-page illustrations on art paper. 16s. net.

The Romance of Fra Filippo Lippi. A. J. ANDERSON. Second edition. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt. With a photogravure frontispiece and 16 full-page illustrations on art paper. 10s. 6d. net.

Modern Artists. CHRISTIAN BRINTON. In one large 4to volume, handsomely bound, 7½ ins. by 10½ ins., 350 pages. Sixty half-tone illustrations, with tint, on art paper, including 4 coloured plates and 1 photogravure. Cloth, 25s. net.

The Appreciation of the Drama. CHARLES and CAROLINE A. CAFFIN. In cloth gilt, with 16 illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

A Child's Guide to Mythology. HELEN A. CLARKE. In cloth gilt, illustrated, 400 pages. 5s. net.

A Child's Guide to Pictures. CHARLES H. CAFFIN. In cloth gilt, 253 pages, fully illustrated. 5s. net.

Ballads of Brave Women. ALFRED H. MILES. Large crown 8vo, red limp, 1s. net; cloth, gilt, 1s. 6d. net; paste grain, gilt (boxed), 3s. net; Persian yapp, gilt top (boxed), 4s. net.

Drawing-Room Entertainments. Monologues, Duologues, Dialogues, and Playlets for Home and Platform use. By CATHERINE EVELYN, CLARE SHIRLEY, ROBERT OVERTON, and others. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. In crown 8vo, red limp, 1s. net; cloth gilt, 1s. 6d. net; paste grain, gilt (boxed), 3s. net; Persian yapp, gilt (boxed), 4s. net.

Cole's Treasury of Song. A Collection of the most popular songs, old and new. Edited by E. W. Cole. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 400 pages. 3s. 6d.

ABC of Collecting Old English Pottery. J. F. BLACKER. Illustrated with about 400 line and half-tone illustrations. In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 5s. net.

Quantities. GEORGE STEPHENSON, Author of "Estimating," "Repairs," &c. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 7s. 6d. net.

The First Favourite Reciter. Edited by ALFRED H. MILES. Crown 4to. 6d. net.

Rambles of an Idler. CHARLES CONRAD ABBOTT, M.A., In crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Home Occupation for Boys and Girls. BERTHA JOHNSTON. Small 8vo, cloth. 2s. net.

How to Train Children. EMMA CHURCHMAN HEWITT. Small 8vo, cloth. 2s. net.

Your Health! (A Book of Bright Toasts) Compiled by IDELLE PHELPS. With coloured illustrations on each page by Ellen Alden Knipe. 18mo. 2s. net.

Phazes, Mazes and Crazes of Love (as the Title indicates). Compiled by MINNA THOMAS ANTRIM, with coloured illustrations on each page by Clara Elsen Peck. 18mo. 2s. net.

Descriptive Catalogue sent on Application.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

being ignorant of the country, wish to obtain a general idea of its appearance and chief characteristics.

For an Anglo-Indian the author is wonderfully appreciative of things Persian, and he frankly recognises that "it is a new, and perhaps, a salutary experience for an Indian official to come into contact with an Oriental people who owe no allegiance to the West." Yet he cannot altogether shake off his Anglo-Indian idiosyncrasies. Thus he twice makes use of the dreadful expression "a white man"; talks of the English "not scrupling to join forces with an Asiatic against a European nation in their bitter rivalry with the Portuguese," as though some common element lacked by the Persians united the Portuguese and the English, and loads his pages with such Indianisms as "puggaree" for turban; "Khansamah," "Moulvis" for Mullás, "chota haziri" for first breakfast or early tea, "tiffin" for luncheon, "dák" and "dák-bungalow" for stage and post-house, and the like. No objection need be raised to a moderate use of foreign words, for which no exact English equivalent exists, in books of travel, but they should be the words of the country described, not those of some other country, else, instead of giving local color, they tend to call up a false picture, as do the descriptions of Persians sitting "cross-legged" at a meal, or wearing "the usual Persian fez," as though they were Turks, whereas they no doubt sat on their heels (du zánú nishastan, "to sit on the two knees," is the Persian expression) and wore the Persian lambskin hat or kuláh. The transliteration of Oriental words also leaves a good deal to be desired. It would, perhaps, be too much to hope that the author should write Muhammad (or even Mohammed) instead of the incorrect "Mahomed" (which is little better than the old "Mahound"), but he does not even adhere to this, and, having written "Mahomed" on p. 122, tries the effect of "Mohamed" on p. 123. It is also a pity that he speaks of the present Shah's great-grandfather as "Nasr-ed-Din," though here again he errs in company with most English writers and journalists, because these Arabic titles have meanings which are vitiated by such slipshod transliterations, and there are three distinct titles compounded with three different derivatives of this root, the verbal noun (Nasr), the active participle (Násir), and the passive participle (Nasir or Naseer), so that to confound together Nasr-ud-Din ("the Help of the Faith"), Násir-ud-Din ("the Helper of the Faith"), and Nasir-ud-Din ("Helped by the Faith") is to create the same kind of confusion as would be caused in English history by reducing to one conventional form the names Edward, Edwin, and Edmund, and regarding as "pedantic" any attempt to differentiate them. Other errors of transliteration occur, however, for which less excuse exists—e.g., "Kawerun" for Kazerun; "Puseh" for Puzeh (or better Puza, "the Snout"); "Bujah" for Buyah; "Shuster" for Shushter; "Kavi" for Káwa, and the like. A scientific transliteration must differentiate between the ordinary k, the guttural q, and the aspirated kh, and between the ordinary hard g and the aspirated gh; and though, perhaps, one can hardly expect ordinary writers to use a form so strange to English eyes as Qiwám, and must rest contented with Kiwám, it is unnecessarily distressing to find in one place "Khawam" and in another "Kovam."

There are a few more serious errors which should have been avoided by anyone familiar with the Muhammadan East. Thus we find the old delusion that one who has made the pilgrimage to Mecca is entitled to wear the green turban, whereas this privilege is, of course, peculiar to Sayyids, or descendants of the Prophet; and a still more serious slip occurs on p. 119, where the author, in describing the festival of the "Umar-Kushán," which he fairly enough compares with the English Guy Fawkes' Day, says that the guy "represents Omar, who slew Ali, the son-in-law of the Prophet," though any historical manual would have told him that the latter survived the former by a good many years, and was, in fact, the last of those "four orthodox Caliphs" of whom Omar was the second. This is as though a foreign traveller, describing the observance of the Fifth of November in England, should state that Guy Fawkes was held up to execration because he decapitated Charles the First!

In general the author writes in a pleasing style, but he has one mannerism which tends to get on the reader's nerves, and that is the constant use of "one" in place of the pronoun of the first person. A book of travels is almost necessarily autobiographical; it is hard to be autobiographical and at the same time to avoid saying "I" and "my," without producing such clumsy sentences as these:—

"Later on, when Persia and Persian ways have grown more familiar, one is forced reluctantly to acknowledge that the inner mind of the people is a closed book that no foreigner may read; but at the outset, with one's enthusiasm still fresh, as one treads the silent, narrow streets of Bushire, one is still restless with the desire to know and understand."—(Page 36.)

"All one's bedding is tied on the back, and, even more important, one's camera, and all one's films are there too, in imminent danger of total immersion. . . . This is the worst fate that has yet overtaken the baggage, but one takes it far more philosophically than one would anywhere else than in Persia. If one's camera and sixteen dozen films have been utterly ruined it cannot be helped. . . ."—(Page 175.)

"Fortunately a new conveyance is available, and the old one may be discarded. The last one sees of it, it is standing in the Meidan-i-Shah, a perfect wreck of all that a carriage should be. One wonders when, if ever, patched up and repaired, it will attempt the adventurous journey again. Yet it is with something of regret one parts company with it. In spite of its dilapidated appearance . . . it had carried one for over three hundred miles without a breakdown, and had one known what lay ahead one would have still further appreciated its powers of endurance."

Another feature of the book which lends itself to criticism is the lack of references. Translations of cuneiform inscriptions and Persian poems are quoted without any indication or acknowledgment of their source, and well-known stories, like that connected with the pathetic inscription, "Cy git Rodolfe," in the cemetery at Ispahan, are occasionally given in garbled forms, without any attempt to check them by contemporary authorities. The Index, too, is inadequate; for example, it contains no reference to the above-mentioned Rodolfe or Ralph Stadler, yet comprises entries like "American Consul, 5"; "Austria, 269"; "Charles the First, 14, 141"; "Charing Cross 316," and the like. The illustrations, on the other hand, are good, and the map at the end of the volume is satisfactory. Some of the author's reflections show a certain lack of consideration, as when he discusses the inappropriateness of the names "Kaleh-i-Dokhter," "the Maiden Fortress," and "Kotal-i-Dokhter," "the Pass of the Maiden," expressing wonder that "so mild" or "so picturesque and gentle" a name should be conferred on places so forbidding and unapproachable. Does he think the Jungfrau in Switzerland (which, however picturesque, can hardly even now, when a railway threatens its ancient inviolability, be described as "mild") ill named, or would he anticipate "mildness" if he set out to scale a "virgin peak"?

It is also curious to find absolutely no dates in a book which is essentially a diary. The author's journey was made in the spring, and, presumably, from his references to the departure for the capital of the Shírázi deputies to the "Majlis" or National Assembly, in the year 1907, since it is not clear whether a passing reference to the assassination of the Amínu's-Sultán, which happened on August 31st of that year, indicates that he was still in Persia at the time of this event. Some of his remarks about the "Majlis" (e.g., on p. 324) are unfair and misleading, though elsewhere he seems disposed to give it credit for potentialities of good, and it is to be regretted that the Persian struggle for freedom suggests nothing to him—not even an alternative expression—but "comic opera," which term he uses in at least four different places. His view of the whole constitutional movement in Persia, which really goes back for some thirty years, and was by no means the sudden mushroom creation that he supposes, is superficial; while his suggestion that it was largely inspired by "the Indian, and more particularly the Calcutta and Bombay agitator," is not merely misleading, but mischievous in the highest degree. The weekly paper to which he no doubt alludes in this passage (the "Hablú'l-Matín"), though printed in Calcutta, was entirely edited and managed by Persians, and, so soon as the freedom of the Press was established in Persia, began to appear as a daily paper at Teheran on April 29th, 1907, though it was suppressed after the coup d'état of June 23rd, 1908.

Mr. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

BYRON: THE LAST PHASE. By RICHARD EDGCUMBE. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF SIR WILLIAM BROADBENT, Bart., K.C.V.O., F.R.S. A Short Record of his life, told mainly in his own letters, showing the early struggles which led up to a successful professional career, and giving an example of determined and high-minded perseverance in the face of difficulties. Edited by his Daughter, Miss BROADBENT. With Portraits. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LETTERS FROM THE PENINSULA (1808-1812). By Lieut.-General Sir WILLIAM WARRE, C.B., K.T.S. Edited by his Nephew, the Rev. EDMOND WARRE, D.D., C.B., M.V.O. With a Portrait and Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready next week.]

INTERNATIONAL LAW. By T. BATY, D.C.L., LL.D., Inner Temple Barrister-at-Law. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A New Novel by
AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.
DIAMOND CUT PASTE.
6s.

"A very witty title for a very witty book. The whole thing sparkles; there is not a dull sentence in it—not a clumsy touch. The plot is exceedingly clever and original, and the characterisation has a deftness and quickness which are very charming . . . We doubt whether the season will give us another book as sunny and engaging as this."
—Liverpool Daily Courier.

A New Novel by EDEN PHILLPOTTS.
THE HAVEN.
6s.

A New Novel by MAUDE GOLDRING.
THE TENANTS OF PIXY FARM.
6s.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

HARRAP'S NEW BOOKS.

THE FITZGERALD CENTENARY EDITION OF

Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám

This beautiful volume is printed throughout in colours, and is the work of the rising Hungarian artist

WILLY POGANY.

In addition to 24 drawings reproduced in colour, there are a large number of exquisite border designs in colours, and the poem has been printed in a character which suggests the Arabic.

The artist has studied to reproduce the Oriental spirit, and he has been advised throughout by a competent Orientalist, Dr. Julius Germanus. Size 11 in. by 7½ in.

Ordinary Edition.

Bound in three-quarter Japon vellum, printed in four colours after Oriental design, with stout canvas back, gilt, also in full cloth,

Price 10s. 6d. net.

Bound in full velvet Persian, yapp, boxed. Price 17s. 6d. net. The Limited Edition of 525 copies on Japon Vellum is practically all sold.

There is also an édition de luxe, limited to 25 signed copies, printed on Japanese vellum, bound in full vellum, hand-tooled.
£10 10s. net.

Myths & Legends of the Middle Ages

By H. A. GUERBER.

Author of "The Myths of Greece and Rome," and "Myths of the Norsemen."

With 64 exquisite full-page illustrations from important works of great artists, and complete Glossary and Index. Demy 8vo, 8½ in. by 5½ in. 416 pages.

The object of this work is to familiarise students with the myths and legends which form the principal subjects of mediæval literature, and whose influence is everywhere apparent in the subsequent history of literature and art. Price 7s. 6d. net.

OTHER IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS INCLUDE:—

Later Poems from Punch (1887-1908). Introduction by Arthur Waugh. Imp. 8vo, 5s. net.

The Story of Hereward. By Douglas C. Stedman, B.A. With 16 Collotype plates by G. Demain Hammond, R.I.

Cuchulain: The Hound of Ulster. By Eleanor Hull. With 16 plates in colour by Stephen Reid.

New Illustrated List now Ready.

LONDON:

GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO., 15, York St., Covent Garden.

Messrs. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST

New Book by Professor William James.

THE MEANING OF TRUTH.

A Sequel to "Pragmatism."

By WILLIAM JAMES,

Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University.

8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

(Inland postage 3d.) [On Monday next.]

A MEMOIR OF THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM EDWARD HARTPOLE LECKY.

By his Wife. With Portraits. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

[Inland postage 5d.]

"This magnificent contribution to historical literature."

—Scotsman.

"It is a fine story, finely told."—Daily Telegraph.

GARIBALDI AND THE THOUSAND.

By GEORGE MACAULAY TREVELYAN. With 5 Maps and numerous Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

[Inland postage 4d.]

THE ELECTRESS SOPHIA AND THE HANOVERIAN SUCCESSION.

By ADOLPHUS WILLIAM WARD, Litt.D., Hon. LL.D., Master of Peterhouse. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Inland postage 4d.]

This is reprinted from GOUPIL'S EDITION DE LUXE, and Revised and Enlarged.

LETTERS TO "THE TIMES" UPON WAR AND NEUTRALITY (1881-1909).

With some Commentary. By THOMAS FRSKINE HOLLAND, K.C., D.C.L., F.B.A., Chichele Professor of International Law, Vice-President de l'Institut de Droit International, &c. 8vo, 6s. net.

[Inland postage 4d.]

MEMOIRS OF SCOTTISH CATHOLICS DURING THE XVIIth AND XVIIIth CENTURIES.

Selected from hitherto inedited MSS. by WILLIAM FORBES LEITH, S.J. With Illustrations. 2 vols. medium 8vo, 24s. net.

[Inland postage 6d.]

AN OVERLAND TREK FROM INDIA, BY SIDE-SADDLE, CAMEL AND RAIL.

The Records of a Journey from Baluchistan to Europe. By EDITH FRASER BENN. With 80 illustrations and a Map. 8vo, 15s. net.

[Inland postage 5d.]

SPRING FLOWERS AT BELVOIR CASTLE.

With Directions for Cultivation and Notes on the Gardens. By W. H. DIVERS, Head Gardener to His Grace the Duke of Rutland. With 32 illustrations from Photographs. Post 4to, 5s. net.

[Inland postage 4d.]

THE FAMILY AND THE NATION:

A Study in Natural Inheritance and Social Responsibility. By CATHERINE DURNING WHETHAM and WILLIAM CECIL DAMPIER WHETHAM, M.A., F.R.S., Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

[Inland postage 6d.]

RESEARCHES ON FUNGI:

An Account of the Production, Liberation, and Dispersion of the Spores of Hymenomycetes Treated Botanically and Physically. Also some Observations upon the Discharge and Dispersion of the Spores of Ascomycetes and of Phlobolus. By A. H. REGINALD BULLER, B.Sc. (Lond.), D.Sc. (Birm.), Ph.D. (Lelp.), Professor of Botany at the University of Manitoba. With 5 Plates and 83 Figures in the Text. 8vo., 12s. 6d. net.

[Inland postage 5d.]

OUTLINES OF BACTERIOLOGY:

Technical and Agricultural. By DAVID ELLIS, Ph.D. (Marburg), D.Sc. (London), F.R.S.E., Lecturer in Bacteriology and Botany to the Glasgow and West of Scotland Technical College, Glasgow. With Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

[Inland postage 4d.]

LONGMANS' POCKET LIBRARY.—Two New Volumes.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD: A Poem.

By Sir EDWIN ARNOLD, K.C.I.E., C.S.I. With Photogravure Frontispiece of W. HOLMAN HUNT'S "Light of the World." NEW EDITION. Fcap. 8vo, gilt top, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

[Inland postage 3d.]

DEUTSCHE LIEBE (GERMAN LOVE).

By F. MAX MULLER. Translated from the German by his Wife. With Photogravure Portrait. Fcap. 8vo, gilt top, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

[Inland postage 3d.]

With New Preface by Mrs. MAX MULLER, specially written for this Edition.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,

39, Paternoster Row, LONDON, E.C.

Yet, notwithstanding all these defects, this book contains much that is admirable, including many fine descriptions of the wonderful scenery and the majestic ruins which give to Persia—especially Southern Persia—so unique a charm, as well as many sympathetic and appreciative remarks on the good points in the Persian character which are too often ignored by European travellers. This makes us regret the more that the whole book is not equal in merit to certain considerable portions of it. On the whole, the earlier chapters, especially chapters iii—ix inclusive, are much better than the later ones, perhaps because the writer's mind was at the beginning of his journey more receptive of fresh impressions.

EDWARD G. BROWNE.

RENAISSANCE SCULPTURE.*

SOME of Mr. Davies's criticisms in his new "Life of Michelangelo" strike us as rather vague and nebulous—rather, we should say, like the criticism of a writer consciously on the look-out for new theories and suggestions; but he brings out well one important aspect of the great sculptor's genius. "Pure symbol meant," as he says, to Michelangelo, "symbol expressed in terms of the human body." And he points out that to understand the Sistine frescoes, we must realise that "throughout this great work the facts, moral and physical, of man's relation to the Creator are without exception expressed through the human form." That this was so is, of course, an obvious fact; the clue lies in the realisation of the fact's meaning.

All emotions and feelings of whatever kind which man can appreciate are such as man himself feels. We cannot attribute even to birds and beasts and flowers and trees emotions other than our own. The sea's calmness and tranquillity under a blue sky, its rage and fury in the hour of storm, the cliff's sternness, the desert's cruelty, dancing brooks and laughing flowers, all these are aspects of our own moods and emotions. It is we who infect the sea with fury and the desert with cruelty, for it is not likely that either entertain any such feelings on their own account. Man himself in short is the source of all the emotions or ideas he can in any way grasp the meaning of. The significance of the whole universe is packed into a man, and all these ideas and emotions, all this significance, in so far as we can imagine it made visible at all, is made visible in man's body, countenance, expression, and features.

This is the sculptor's view of the matter. For him the human body, as it is the source of all feeling, so it affords the only adequate means of visibly interpreting such feeling. Set a born sculptor any story to tell with whatever complicated accessories you choose, and his instinct will be to narrow it all down to terms of the naked human figure. The sun touches many things with light, but the light is in the sun. It is to the orb itself that your true Zoroastrian turns. Man's thought and emotion touch many an object and bring them into relation with the human lot and fill them with meaning, but the thought and emotion are in man and it is to man your sculptor turns. His genius is of that order that no reflected emotions satisfy it. With an insatiable, almost a bloodhound, instinct, he tracks them back to their lair in the human body. It seems he craves closer touch and more intimate acquaintance with a man's thoughts than others do. The sea's anger, the cliff's fierceness are at the best but feeble and far away reproductions of those feelings. He would grasp them as nearly in the concrete as possible, in their first manifestations, as they portray themselves in living terms of bearing, look, and gesture. What is the fierceness and rage of storm and salt water to the fierceness and rage of a set brow and clenched hand? We speak, of course, of the true sculptor, of him who adores the body for the meaning of it, and because it is the most forcible and direct expression of the human mind and soul. There is another kind, the imitative or photographic sculptor, well known to all of us, who regards the reproduction of external appearance as the sculptor's true aim, and whose dealings with the human body, or "the nude" as he often calls it, are quite rightly felt by a discerning public to be indecent. Him we may pass by.

Michelangelo possesses, and makes one more conscious of than any other, the sculptor's passion for the human body. "You may hunt these frescoes through," Mr. Davies says of the Pisturi series, "and you will find but a few scant, almost unavoidable instances in which any form whatever save that of man has been employed. In the 'Creation of Plants' a mere spray of fern upon a jutting rock; a great colored circle for the sun; a withered leafless tree in the 'Deluge'; a stump of another tree in the 'Creation of Adam,' and a tree with one side bearing leafage and fruit in the 'Temptation'; the head of an ox and a fallen sheep in the 'Sacrifice of Noah,' some snakes in the 'Brazen Serpent,' and a few wreaths of colossal oak-leaves among the 'Athletes'—these are the sweeping together of such few natural forms as are to be found in the whole of that vast work." That this example is painting, not sculpture, enhances its value. So strong was Michelangelo's bias towards the sculptor's vision and treatment that this work of his, the greatest work of fresco-painting, most critics would say, extant on the earth, is conceived not as painting at all but as sculpture. Brush does the work, but the entire story from creation to judgment is thought out and acted in terms of the chisel. There are no accessories and none of the aids to illusion, or amplifications and details which painting, rightly enough, relies on to tell her story. It is all boiled down into the carcase and lineaments of man. Aids, explanations, amplifications, corroborative evidence, these are not for the sculptor. He looks through these to the source of all thought, to man.

It is this passionate concentration of his genius upon the human body as the vehicle and means of all possible expression which is, as it were, the very essence of Michelangelo's creative energy. The painted sculpture of the Sistine Vaults is one remarkable example of it, but everything he ever put his hand to is visibly inspired by the same impulse. There have been many tales told of this obsession of his. How he could see the figure he was engaged on within the block, and would set himself to hack off the marble with furious blows to set it free; how he used to be led, an old man, to the Hercules torso in the Capitol that he might stroke its thighs and muscles. But it is, of course, his own sculptural forms that are most full of this spirit. Marble in Michelangelo's hands seems not marble, but visible emotion. Fear, hope, pity, despair and doubt, or faith and courage, all the passions and impulses which make up the sum of human experience, seem present to his touch, and constitute the material he works in. If this conviction, that the human form is the essence of expression, is the inspiration of the sculptor's art, what sculptor ever attained to the genius of Michelangelo? In truth, as a sheer vital force, his influence is probably unapproached. His personal gift, the strength of the conviction in which he worked, strikes one—so far as we are able to judge of these things—as greater, more irresistible, than in the case of even the great sculptors of antiquity. It is difficult not to doubt if the Greeks felt quite as keenly as Michelangelo the limitless capacities for expression stored up in the human form.

In any case, they give it differently. Form is the mother tongue of Greek art, and the mother tongue of Florentine art, yet not the same message is conveyed in both. Betwixt Athens and Florence how close a resemblance, yet how deep a gulf! The old intellectual zest has re-awakened; the love of definition, the mental craving for identifying, separating, explaining, for assigning to all things their proper form and function, which had been the Greek ideal, once more inspires life. Inevitably this love of definition had led in Athens to a remarkable development of the arts of form; for the arts of form are but the aesthetic counterpart of the intellectual love of defining things. And now that the same spirit revives in the Renaissance the same artistic development attends it. Florence, leader of the intellectual movement, leads the artistic movement also, as Athens led both in the classic age, and in Florentine as in Attic art the prevailing quality is the quality of form.

Here is the resemblance: a similar influence palpitating through life and art both. Who can fail to see it? But also what a difference! Where is now the serenity, the calmness, the sense of attainment of classic sculpture? The Athenian loved defining, and he was satisfied with his definitions, and his satisfaction is reflected in that art which has definition for its object, in sculpture, namely, for Greek

* "Michelangelo." By Gerald S. Davies. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

BOOKS OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Foolscap 8vo, 64 pp., 1s. net.

The Bearings of the Darwinian Theory of Evolution on Moral and Religious Progress.

By F. E. WEISS, D.Sc., F.L.S.

Cr. 8vo, gilt top, 128 pp., 2s. net.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

By WILLIAM LAWRENCE SCHROEDER, M.A.

"Mr. Schroeder has established an irresistible claim to the thanks of all the admirers of Holmes, by a really fine study of his more striking characteristic and works."—Leicester Daily Post.

Cr. 8vo, 140 pp., 2s. net.

THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS.

By Lic. Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle.

Translated by EDWARD W. LUMMIS, M.A.

"A concise, well digested account of the results of recent investigations into its subject."—Scotsman.

Cr. 8vo, 152 pp., 2s. net.

CHURCH COUNCILS AND THEIR DECREES.

By AMBROSE N. BLATCHFORD, B.A.

Cr. 8vo., 76 pp., 1s. 6d. net.

WHOSE SON IS CHRIST?

Two Lectures on Progress in Religion.

By Prof. FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, of Berlin.

Cr. 8vo, 164 pp., 2s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS.

By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Theol., of Basle.

Cr. 8vo, 184 pp., 2s. net.

PAUL.

By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE.

Translated by EDWARD W. LAMMIS, M.A.

Preface by J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.D.

Fcap. 8vo, 144 pp., 1s. 6d. net.

MIRACLES AND MYTHS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By JOSEPH MAY, LL.D.

London:

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

Re-appearance of

"THE THRUSH,"

A MONTHLY PERIODICAL FOR THE PUBLICATION OF ORIGINAL POETRY.

Dec. 1st, 1909.

New Feature—Literary Articles on all Subjects.

Contributions (which will be paid for) should be addressed to—

The Editor, "The Thrush" Office,
12 & 13, Henrietta Street,
Covent Garden, W.C.

Now ready, 6d. net, the BOOK MONTHLY, for October.

CONTENTS

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Babble of the Book Shops, with a Series of Engaging Illustrations.

REVIEWERS ON TRIAL. A Review of them from the Author's Point of View.—By Adam Gowans Whyte.

PUBLISHERS' "Ads." As they were Written in Queen Anne's Time.

A LONDON LETTER. On the Outlook for the Autumn Publishing Season.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classified Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions and Reprints of September.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of this Month's Reviews and Magazines.

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court,
London, E.C.

Ready this month. La. Cr. 3vo. 640 pp. Cloth, 6s. net.

THE PRINCE OF DESTINY.

A Romance. By SARATH KUMAR GHOSH. Being a Presentation of India by an Indian.

It draws a picture of Indian life from the inside, with its social customs and moral ideals, its eternal patience, its religious fervour, its passionate love. The book also reveals the Indian view of the causes of the present unrest, and Britain's unseen peril in India. If Britain loses India, it will be by the neglect of such a warning. In the circumstances depicted it would need the extraordinary love of an extraordinary man like the hero to save Britain's cause.

Above all, this romance envelops the reader in the atmosphere of India as no work of a European has ever done, and is a storehouse of Indian information which could not be obtained from any other source. Withal, it unfolds a story full of dramatic interest and instinct with deep emotions.

Ready in October. Demy 8vo. 626 pp., cloth, price 12s. 6d. net.

PROGRESSIVE REDEMPTION:

The Catholic Church, its Functions and Offices in the World reviewed in the Light of the Ancient Mysteries and Modern Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

Author of "Progressive Creation" (see below).

This book, by its powerfully reasoned-out thesis, is of profound interest and importance to theologians, Clergymen, Ministers of all denominations, as well as religious thinkers and workers generally.

Also now ready. Two demy 8vo. Vols. Over 1,000 pp., cloth, price 21s. net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION:

A Reconciliation of Religion with Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

A book that has confessedly baffled the reviewers, and of which Mr. Arthur E. Waite, writing in the Occult Review, gave it as his opinion that in many parts "it was of the quality of Revelation."

Recently issued. Demy 8vo, 452 pp. Price 7s. 6d. net.

SCIENTIFIC IDEALISM:

Or, Matter and Force, and their Relation to Life and Consciousness. By WILLIAM KINGSLAND, Author of "The Mystic Quest," "The Esoteric Basis of Christianity," &c.

"In every way a great book."—Light.

"It is an ably written volume."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

Ready next week. Cr. 8vo, 86 pp. paper covers. Price 1s. net.

THE CASE FOR ALCOHOL;

Or, The Action of Alcohol on Body and Soul.

By Dr. ROBERT PARK.

Please send for Descriptive Circulars of these and other important books.

LONDON:

REBMAN, Ltd.,

129,

Shaftesbury Avenue
W.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Other Bibles and Prayer Books from Oxford and
6d. to $10.

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear
Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

Telephone Central 329

Catalogue No. 366. 144 Pages.

GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

NOW READY. REDUCED PRICES. IMMENSE VARIETY

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,

Remainder and Discount Booksellers,

265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"

Book Reviews and Special Literary

Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

sculpture achieves its end, is content, says all it wants to say. The Florentine, too, loved defining, but can he live satisfied within the limits of his own definition? There have come into the world, since the old clear-cut classic days, thoughts, emotions, aspirations, questionings which classic life was little either illumined or perplexed by. They cannot be quite answered, those thoughts and aspirations; they cannot be brought within the bounds of the definable, neither can they be cast out. It is impossible to ignore them—impossible, above all, for an artist to ignore them—for they are part of the life it is his very mission to express. Yet it is impossible completely to suppress them. They inspire, but they dislocate.

Let the reader look on Michelangelo's designs with the thought in his mind of the forces that have come into the world since classic life and classic art collapsed together. He will find those forces there, in the passion and doubt and restlessness, in the spiritual groping and yearning which trouble and convulse the creations of the great artist who pre-eminently stands for the Renaissance. Never no more, the perturbed, inspired figures, the strained sinews, the furrowed brows seem to say, never no more the old composure and serene assurance of a life which accepted definite limitations. But yet, if the composure and serenity have gone, so, too, have the limitations. If the old perfect, rounded utterance is no longer possible, hints are possible, questionings, half revelations, dim recognition of things beyond the veil, are possible. It was by the light of these that Michelangelo worked.

Hence his hold upon us. We are still living in the Renaissance. Michelangelo is still our spokesman. The Problem he thought and sweated over, the problem how to reconcile the claims of the intellectual and spiritual faculties, is the problem which still engrosses and wearies and perplexes and fascinates the world.

"THE SEVEN THAT WERE HANGED."*

It is melancholy to reflect how dependent is educated opinion, for its insight into life, on the chance arrival of genius. Had a writer of Tolstoy's or Dostoevsky's force arisen in the last few years to chronicle the moral débâcle in Russia, the triumph of cynicism in the general reaction, the brutalising effects of anarchical gospels on the one hand and of callous, wanton murders under the flag of martial law on the other, Europe might have realised that it is less the tragic facts of the abortive revolution that are to be deplored than the general spiritual degeneration that follows in their train. It is, perhaps, significant that the talent that appears of most interest to the Russian public which has lived through these last years of feverish disillusionment should be that of the neurasthenic Andreieff. A most unequal writer, Andreieff has assuredly genius, but it is genius decadent in its fibres, and expressive of the disintegration of the forces of self-command and moral control. His play, "Tzar Hunger," is indeed like a series of weird hallucinations in the head of a man excited by stimulants, though it is none the less characterised by true imaginative intensity. His "Red Laugh" is almost destroyed artistically by its nightmarish atmosphere of unreality, and nothing further from Tolstoy's objective truth and Turguenev's classic balance can be conceived. The story before us "The Seven that were Hanged" will probably make a much more successful appeal to English readers than would Andreieff's other works, for it is simple, moving, sincere, and comparatively free from exaggeration and tricks of effect. Of course in the hands of the author of "The House of the Dead," or of the author of "Ivan Ilyitch," the subject might sear the conscience of the civilised world, but, as we have said, genius is so rare that we must be grateful even for its briefest flashes and its fitful glow. The story, which is written without political bias or any ostensible humanitarianism, appeals to men of all camps.

The first few pages describe the feelings of a Minister who has been warned that an attempt will be made on his life by terrorists next day, "at one o'clock in the afternoon, your Excellency!" The Minister, who has changed his residence instantly on receipt of the news, finds it impossible to get to sleep in his new apartments, and, beset by night terrors, broods over "the multitude of inauspicious things that surrounded his life." Andreieff is evidently trying in imagination to diagnose the sensations of Plehve, who, hated and feared by all Russia, was to fall a victim to the bombs of terrorists inspired by his own official enemies. The five terrorists, Sergey Golovin, Werner, Vasily Kashirin, and Musya and Tanya Kovalchuk, are seized by the police, tried, and sentenced to be hanged. In the prison to which they are taken, two criminals, Yanson, an Esthonian farm-hand, and Michka the Tzigane, a peasant from Orel, are awaiting execution. Yanson, who has murdered his master and assaulted his mistress in a most callous fashion, is so stupid that he can only repeat obstinately to the prison warders, "I must not be hanged." But when little by little it is borne in upon him that there is no escape for him, he is plunged into a state of astonishment. "His weak mind could not reconcile the monstrous contradiction between, on the one hand, the bright light and the odour of the cabbage, and on the other the fact that, two days later, he must die. He thought of nothing; he did not even count the hours; he was simply the prey of a dumb terror in presence of this contradiction that bewildered his brain—to-day life, to-morrow death. He ate nothing more, he slept no more; he sat timidly all night long on a stool, with his legs crossed under him, or else he walked up and down his cell with furtive steps." For Michka the Tzigane, a wild and savage brigand, the seventeen days of suspense pass as a single day, filled with the thought of flight, liberty, and life. He is offered his life if he will accept the post of hangman, but he procrastinates, so loses his chance. His last days are spent in a state of animal-like fury and ceaseless agitation. He screams with rage, curses everything and everyone, and only regains his composure when he is led out to the gallows. The five terrorists are told, in prison, that they may see their relatives the next day, by which they understand that the execution is fixed for Friday at daybreak. The finest passage in the story—a passage of true genius—is the description of Sergey Golovin's farewell to his father and mother. His father, Nicolas Sergiévitich Golovin, a retired colonel, enters the cell with a precise and measured step, and greets him in a firm voice. His mother follows behind, with a strange smile. But after kissing him she sits down without saying a word. "She did not throw herself upon her son, she did not begin to weep or cry, as Sergey expected her to do. She kissed him and sat down without speaking. With a trembling hand she even smoothed the wrinkles in her black silk gown." But Sergey does not know that the colonel had spent the entire previous night in rehearsing this interview. The father has explained to the mother that above all she is not to weep—"You will kill him if you weep, mother!"—and the mother has schooled herself accordingly. Everything is unnatural in their manner and talk till suddenly Sergey asks after his sister.

"Ninotchka knows nothing!" answered the mother, quickly. But the colonel sternly interrupted her:

"What is the use of lying? She has read the newspapers . . . let Sergey know that . . . all . . . his own . . . have thought . . . and . . ."

Unable to continue, he stopped. Suddenly the mother's face contracted, her features became confused and wild. Her colorless eyes were madly distended; more and more she panted for breath.

"Se . . . Ser . . . Ser . . . Ser . . ." she repeated, without moving her lips; "Ser . . ."

"My little mother!"

The colonel took a step; trembling all over, without knowing how frightful he was in his corpse-like pallor, in his desperate and forced firmness, he said to his wife:

"Be silent! Do not torture him! Do not torture him! Do not torture him! He must die! Do not torture him!"

Frightened, she was silent already, and he continued to repeat, with his trembling hands pressed against his breast:

"Do not torture him!"

Then he took a step backward, and again thrust his hand into the front of his frock-coat; wearing an expression of forced calmness, he asked aloud, with pallid lips:

"When?"

"To-morrow morning," answered Sergey.

The mother looked at the ground, biting her lips, as if she heard nothing. And she seemed to continue to bite her lips as she let fall these simple words:

"Ninotchka told me to kiss you, my little Sergey!"

* "The Seven that were Hanged." By Leonid Andreieff. Fifield. 6d.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

Social amenities make necessary the entertainment of your friends. To entertain them successfully is not always easy. And nothing disheartens a host more than a slow evening. The evenings will always be a delight if you have a Billiard Table in the house. An adjournment to the Billiard Room is always welcomed.

RILEY'S COMBINED DINING AND BILLIARD TABLES

will be found most convenient where space is limited. Are made in all sizes. Fitted with Riley's patent automatic action, enabling the table to be converted from Dining to Billiard Table and vice versa in less than a minute. A handsome piece of furniture and a perfect billiard table.

Prices from £13 10s. CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Riley's Standard Tables

(as used in the Championship matches).

These tables are designed on most artistic lines, and built of the finest materials in the best possible manner. They are fitted with low frost-proof cushions, patent pockets, and are fully warranted for ten years. Prices from 55 guineas upwards.

FREE On receipt of postcard, full detailed Illustrated Catalogue of Billiard and Dining Tables, and small or full sized tables and sundries.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Willow Bank Works, ACCRINGTON.

London Showrooms: 147, ALDERSGATE STREET, E.C.

RILEY'S Billiard Tables.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING.

The Flavour of Rowntree's Cocoa delicious!

RHEUMATISM

THE NATURAL CURE IN YOUR OWN HOME

Sufferers may now secure all the benefits of the world-famous Brine springs of Droitwich without leaving their own homes. "Droitwich Brine Crystals" are the actual Brine in highly concentrated form, extracted from and possessing all the virtues of the identical and natural Spring found at that Spa.

DROITWICH BRINE CRYSTALS

For Rheumatism, Rheumatoid Arthritis, Lumbago, Sciatica and kindred troubles these "Crystals" effect quick relief and ultimate cure. Recommended by the Medical Profession.

Ask your Chemist for "Droitwich Brine Crystals," or send direct for a 28-lb. bag, delivered free to any address in London or Suburbs for 2s., or to any Country Station for 2s. 3d.

WESTON & WESTALL, LTD. (Dept. 26), 16, EASTERN AVENUE, LONDON, E.C.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£16 18s. GREECE, HAIFA (FOR GALILEE AND FOR DAMASCUS), JAFFA (FOR JERUSALEM AND BETH-LEHEM), ALEXANDRIA (FOR CAIRO), NAPLES AND MARSEILLE'S, October 22nd.

Full particulars from the Secretary.

5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

ALPINE SPORTS LIMITED beg to announce that they have secured the entire accommodation in the following hotels for the winter season for SKATING, TOBOGGANNING, CURLING, SKIING and SLEIGHING:—MONTANA PALACE, VILLARS-SUR-OLLON, the seven principal hotels; MORGINS-LES-BAINS, two hotels; ST. BEATENBERG, two hotels; KANDERSTEG, Hotel VICTORIA, WENGEN, four hotels; LENZERHEIDE, Kurhaus; BALLAIGUES, GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE, &c. For illustrated handbook apply to The Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"Kiss her for me!" said the condemned man.
"Good! The Chvostofs send their salutations. . . ."
"Who are they? Ah! yes. . . ."
The colonel interrupted him:
"Well, we must start. Rise, mother, it is necessary!"
The two men lifted the swooning woman.
"Bid him farewell!" ordered the colonel. "Give him your blessing!"
She did everything that she was told. But, while giving her son a short kiss and making on his person the sign of the cross, she shook her head and repeated distractedly:
"No, it is not that! No, it is not that!"
"Adieu, Sergey!" said the father. They shook hands, and exchanged a short, but earnest, kiss.

The visit of Vasily Kashirin's mother to her son is also most true to life. He treats her harshly and is irritated by her talk. The mother goes away weeping and blinded by her tears, and only when she has lost her way in the city does she suddenly realise the frightful truth—they are going to hang her son to-morrow. There are some beautiful touches here and there in the narrative, such as the description of the coming of spring in the streets and squares outside the fortress, and the light, fresh air blowing in the faces of the passers-by, and their holiday mood. The modesty of the young heroine, Musya, who is peacefully happy while awaiting the end, and tries to justify to herself that the finest of deaths, reserved hitherto for martyrs, should have been assigned to so humble a woman as herself, is, no doubt, taken direct from life. Musya's spirit is that of the flower of the Nihilistic youth who have died for their cause. Of much psychological interest is the analysis of Sergey Golovin's astonishment when he discovers that he, too, is afraid of death. "Is it possible that I am afraid?" thought Sergey, in astonishment. "How stupid!" But "it was not he who was afraid; it was his young, robust, and vigorous body." And when Sergey realises this he determines to weaken and starve his body. The description of the cold and intrepid Werner's mental transformation from contempt and indifference to softness and love of his fellows seems to us much more true to life than the accompanying analysis of Vasily Kashirin's terror. The defect of Andreieff's intensely subjective method is that he frequently projects himself into the mind of a character which is built on lines radically different from his own. The first half of "The Seven that were Hanged" is indisputably superior to the second. Could the actual scene of the execution have been carried through with the relentless force with which Tolstoy, in a well-known passage, describes the flogging of village elders by a company of soldiers, the story would be absolutely shattering. But, imperfect as it is, it is one that the English reader who is not too pre-occupied in preserving his own comfort should read for himself.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Oct. 1.	Price Friday morning, Oct. 8.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83¼	83
German Threes	84½	82½
Spanish Fours	95¾	94¼
Great Western	120	120½
Union Pacific	216	213½
Steel Common	91½	93¾

THOUGH money is still plentiful, the drain of gold has been so rapid and heavy that the Bank directors were quite justified in raising the rate yesterday from 2½ to 3 per cent. The event had no adverse effect on the stock markets, which are quite buoyant. Stock Exchange leaders and financial men in the City are generally hoping that the House of Lords will not throw out the Budget. They are making so much money now that they care very little about the new taxes, and feel that the upset of a general election would cause them far more loss than they could expect to gain by the rejection of the Budget. The City petition is generally voted as a mistake, and as another evidence of the political incompetence which has marked the campaign of the Dukes and the Rothschilds. The clerks who have to sign the petition are secretly in love with the Budget just because the magnates dislike it so much. The situation in Morocco is thought to be getting more serious, and Paris for the first time is becoming seriously concerned about Spanish politics and finance. This has affected the foreign market and many of the South American securities in which the French invest and speculate.

THE ART OF INVESTMENT.

Many people "prefer to restrict their investments and keep them homogeneous, so that without any great mental strain they can follow carefully both the movements of the market and the ups and downs of the business." This quotation is from a remarkably instructive article in the current number of the "Investor's Monthly Manual." The writer refers, by way of illustrating the advantages of homogeneity, to a wealthy man who has done very well out of London drapery shares by watching the market closely for many years past. But for the sleepy sort of investor it is better to spread than to concentrate, as the rewards of concentration have to be balanced against its risks. Here are two interesting tables to illustrate the thesis. In the first we suppose the case of a man who invested £10,000 in South American Railways in 1908 and left them there:—

Securities.	Value 1898.	Value Now.	Difference.
	£	£	£
Argentine Great Western	1,000	1,338	+ 338
Central Argentine	1,000	1,481	+ 481
Buenos Ayres and Pacific	1,000	1,633	+ 633
Buenos Ayres Great Southern	1,000	883	- 117
Buenos Ayres Western	1,000	1,182	+ 182
San Paulo	1,000	1,238	+ 238
Entre Rios	1,000	5,562	+ 4,562
Leopoldina	1,000	1,739	+ 739
Mexican Ordinary	1,000	1,857	+ 857
Mexican Southern	1,000	3,856	+ 2,856
	10,000	20,769	+ 10,769

Here it will be seen that this fortunate individual doubled his fortune. Supposing, however, some kind friend had induced him to try electric and tramway companies, he might have chosen his investments as follows:—

Securities.	Value 1898.	Value Now.	Difference.
	£	£	£
Charing Cross, West End, and City	1,000	324	- 676
City of London	1,000	411	- 589
County of London	1,000	563	- 437
London Electric Supply	1,000	586	- 414
South London Electric	1,000	523	- 477
Westminster Electric	1,000	424	- 576
British Electric Traction	1,000	43	- 957
Dublin United Tramways	1,000	688	- 312
Provincial Tramways	1,000	667	- 333
City of Birmingham Tramways	1,000	741	- 259
	10,000	4,970	- 5,030

Thus, instead of doubling his capital, he has just about halved it, and we are at once struck by the dangers of concentration and begin to return again to the theory of spreading investments.

LUCELLUM.

EVANS'

ANTISEPTIC THROAT

PASTILLES

are THE remedy for Loss of Voice, Hoarseness or Soreness of the Throat, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, &c. . These Pastilles have an unrivalled reputation for their wonderfully soothing qualities for all Throat troubles. Made to a formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital.

1/- and 4/6 per box of all Chemists, Stores, &c.

Write for Sample enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage to
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB, Ltd.,
Hanover Street, Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS Pastilles and refuse all imitations.

Benger's Food prepared with milk, is a complete food.

The more delicate the state of health—the greater the need for it.

When other foods fail try Benger's; but it's wisest to use Benger's in the first instance.

For Invalids and the aged.

Benger's Food is sold in Tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ITALIAN YOUNG LADY, very good family, seeks situation as companion. Willing to teach French, Italian. Speaks English. —Further particulars apply Mrs. R. C. Trevelyan, The Shiffolds, Dorking.

WHAT DO UNITARIANS BELIEVE AND TEACH?
Send name and address to the Secretary, British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and explanatory pamphlets will be forwarded, post free.

AUTHORS! Typewriting accurately and promptly executed by educated operators with best machines at standard rates: MSS. over 10,000 words 10d. per 1,000; under 10,000 1s. per 1,000. French and German MSS. 1s. 6d. per 1,000. Correspondence 1½d. per folio of 72 words. Carbon copies half price. Misses Knight & Callum, 43, Idlecombe Rd., Tooting, S. W.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

TANGYES TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.
BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

CHANCERY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb. Second Mistress: Miss ESTHERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053 Central.

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children's Lady Nurses and Kindergarten.—For full particulars apply, the Principal, Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.
COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out-door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

School re-opens September 24th.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors.
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BANKING.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is One and a-Half per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 7th October, 1909.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day advanced to 1½ per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,

5, Princes Street, Mansion House.

October 7th, 1909.

NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY

LIMITED,

Whitefriars House, Carmelite Street,
LONDON, E.C.

Printers of Pamphlets, Leaflets, - -

Magazines, Trade Papers,

And other Publications.

ELECTION AND GENERAL PRINTING

Executed at the Shortest Notice.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES
I., II. III. & IV. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.BOLTON.THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Douthwaite

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone.. 3032 Royal. 3 wires

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074

Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER."OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Proprietor

SOUTHPORT.KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOUGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages... }	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 "	6d. "

Soon will be published two delightful books which should be ordered at once from library or bookseller—

On October 21st—

Mr. W. W. JACOBS' New and Characteristic Volume of Stories :

SAILORS' KNOTS

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

On October 14th—

THE TYRANT

Crown 8vo, 6s.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

Messrs. METHUEN published yesterday a new novel by MAARTEN MAARTENS, entitled THE PRICE OF LIS DORIS. Crown, 8vo, 6s.

The Second Edition is now ready of NORTHERN LIGHTS, by Sir GILBERT PARKER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Those who desire hearty laughter must read two books—SALTHAVEN, by W. W. JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes," crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.; and THE SEARCH PARTY, by G. A. BIRMINGHAM, Author of "Spanish Gold." Crown 8vo, 6s.

Messrs. METHUEN have just commenced the publication of the new edition of the Works of Oscar Wilde in 12 volumes. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net each. Five volumes are now ready.

Messrs. METHUEN have just published HANDEL, by R. A. STREATFEILD. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net, the second volume of "The New Library of Music."

They have also published a delightful book by EDWARD HUTTON, entitled ROME. Crown 8vo, 6s. It is uniform with Mr. Hutton's other books on Italy, and is admirably illustrated by Maxwell Armfield. OLD ETRURIA AND MODERN TUSCANY, by MARY L. CAMERON, with many illustrations, is also ready. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Two volumes of the highest interest to the general reader who loves biographical history and court chronicles are A ROSE OF SAVOY, by H. NOEL WILLIAMS, with many illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net; and THE COURT OF LOUIS XIII., by Mrs. K. A. PATMORE. Illustrated, Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

GENERAL LITERATURE

TREMENDOUS TRIFLES. By G. K. CHESTERTON.

Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

"Delightful to read."—Daily News.

"What pleases in this lively and amusing volume is its agile wit."—Morning Leader.

ONE DAY AND ANOTHER. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap.

8vo, 5s.

[Second Edition.]

"The essays are inimitably refreshing."—Morning Leader.

IN THE CANARIES WITH A CAMERA. By

MARGARET D'ESTE. With many illustrations, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

DARWINISM AND MODERN SOCIALISM. By F. W.

HEADLEY. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE LAST KING OF POLAND AND HIS CON-

TEMPORARIES. By R. NISBET BAIN. With 16 illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A most able and painstaking study."—Observer. [Morning Post.

"The ground is covered with really exhaustive scholarship."

"A model work of intelligent historical biography."—Morning Leader.

NAPOLEON'S BROTHERS. By A. H. ATTERIDGE.

With 24 illustrations, demy 8vo, 18s. net.

The story of Napoleon's brothers, who, with their sons, played various parts in many lands, is little known to English readers. They are overshadowed by his greatness, and one has only glimpses of them here and there in the popular histories of his career.

MICHELANGELO. By GERALD S. DAVIES, Master of the Charterhouse. With 126 Plates, wide royal 8vo, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

[Classics of Art.]

THE DECAY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME. By

JOSEPH McCABE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"The book is well and agreeably written, and the tone is always moderate and courteous."—Spectator.

"A singularly impressive and penetrating volume."—Daily

A WANDERER IN PARIS. By E. V. LUCAS. With

16 illustrations in colour by WALTER DEXTER, and 32 from Photographs after Old Masters, crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"Wholly enjoyable from first page to last."—Globe.

"We do not hesitate to pronounce this fascinating volume a perfect model of its class."—Daily Telegraph.

ST. TERESA OF SPAIN. By HELEN H. COLVILL.

With 20 illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A fascinating book."—Illustrated London News.

"Her present biographer defines St. Teresa's position with rare skill."—Daily Graphic.

"A most sympathetic study of Teresa."—Daily Chronicle.

MESMERISM AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE: A Short

History of Mental Healing. By FRANK PODMORE. Demy 8vo,

10s. 6d. net.

"An admirable account.....lucid exposition and scholarly writing."—Times.

"One of the most interesting and valuable pieces of work recently done in the historiography of ideas."—Outlook.

FICTION

THE SEVERINS. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK, Author of "The Kinsman." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The charm, ease, and freshness of the book are altogether delightful."—Morning Leader.

IN AMBUSH. By MARIE VAN VORST, Author of "The Sentimental Adventures of Jimmy Bulstrode." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A story which will assuredly hold the reader."—Edinburgh Evening News.

SPLENDID BROTHER. By W. PETT RIDGE, Author of

"Erb," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Third Edition.]

"There could not be a better proof of Mr. Pett Ridge's literary power than is given by this novel."—Spectator.

"It is a beautiful book."—Liverpool Post.

"He is surpassed by none of his contemporaries."—Standard.

DEEP SEA WARRIORS. By BASIL LUBBOCK. With

4 illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Second Edition.]

"A fascinating book, a real book of the sea."—Daily Mail.

"All those who love the sea should read this book."—World.

TOIL OF MEN. By ISRAEL QUERIDO. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A vivid, powerful, and terrible description of a year in the lives of certain Dutch peasants."—Times.

THE FIRST ROUND. By ST. JOHN LUCAS. Crown

8vo, 6s.

"The book is exceedingly rich in observation, interest and intellectual reactions."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE COLUMN OF DUST. By EVELYN UNDERHILL.

Author of "The Grey World," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is a book to set one dreaming; the style is terse, yet touched with beauty and feeling."—Evening Standard.

THE BURNT OFFERING. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN

(Mrs. Cotes), Author of "Those Delightful Americans." Crown

8vo, 6s.

THE SQUIRE'S DAUGHTER. By ARCHIBALD MAR-

SHALL. Author of "Exton Manor." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition]

"Mr. Marshall makes his characters live."—Morning Post.

"It is an admirable picture of a pleasant land; every one in it is alive, every one is English. It is a graceful, gentle, entirely charming story."—Morning Leader.

LORDS OF THE SEA. By EDWARD NOBLE, Author of

"The Edge of Circumstance." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"A great, almost tremendous drama."—Daily Chronicle.

"Here there is strength and feminine grace and a broad issue.

A fine novel indeed."—Pall Mall Gazette.

WATCHERS BY THE SHORE. By J. E. PATTERSON,

Author of "Fishers of the Sea." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"A strong, moving, and refreshing book."—Scotsman.

"An exceptionally fine and dramatic novel."—Daily News.

THIS DAY'S MADNESS. By MAUDE ANNESLEY, Author of "The Wine of Life." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"A vastly entertaining novel."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Miss Annesley writes with a great freshness, buoyancy, and vigour. From the first she grips the reader."—Liverpool Courier.

HAPPINESS. By MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON, Author of

"The Enchanted Garden." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A really fine book, largely conceived and admirably written."

—Times.

LOVE AND THE WISE MEN. By PERCY WHITE,

Author of "The West End." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"It is not the first time that Mr. White has treated this theme, but no one has ever written about it with such intimate skill and insight."—Daily Graphic.

"This book is a comedy such as only Mr. White could write."

—Bystander.

GIANNELLA. By Mrs. HUGH FRASER, Author of

"The Slaking of the Sword." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"The descriptions of life in Rome and the handling of situations are all carried through with sympathetic insight and knowledge."

—Liverpool Post.

AVENGING CHILDREN. By MARY E. MANN, Author of "The Parish of Hilby." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The book is strangely attractive."—Standard.

"It is a charming story, excellent in design and execution."—

Pall Mall Gazette.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA. By H. B. MARRIOTT

WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"A splendid mystery, intermingled with a romantic love-story."

—World.

"Exhales the very breath of modern adventure. The most jaded lover of romance can hardly fail to fall a victim to its fascinations."

—Daily Telegraph.

THE BRIDE. By GRACE RHYS, Author of "The Wooing of Sheila." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This fine, delicate, moving novel is a real book."—Daily News.

"Altogether a fascinating work."—Manchester Courier.

A ROYAL INDISCRETION. By RICHARD MARSH.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Replete with a most delightful humour."—Manchester Courier.

"An ingenious idea, used freshly and amusingly."

—Morning Leader.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

The Nation

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1909.

A SELECTION FROM MACMILLAN'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

COMPLETE LIST POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

RUDYARD KIPLING'S NEW BOOK. ACTIONS AND REACTIONS.

IN THREE EDITIONS.

1. Uniform Edition. Scarlet Cloth. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.
2. Pocket Edition, on India Paper, limp leather, Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.
3. Edition de luxe (limited to 775 copies), hand-made paper, in sateen cloth, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THREE BEAUTIFUL COLOUR BOOKS.

The French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century; their Lives, their Times, their Art, and their Significance. By Haldane Macfall. Edited by T. Leman Hare. With 40 Examples in Colour and 12 in Black. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

The Water Babies. By Charles Kingsley. With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble. Crown 4to, 15s. net. Also an Edition de luxe, printed on Hand-Made Paper and limited to 250 copies. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

The Forest Lovers. By Maurice Hewlett. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by A. S. Hartrick. 8vo, 5s. net. Tuesday.

BISHOP WESTCOTT.

The Two Empires: the Church and the World. Being Lectures on Early Church History. By Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., late Bishop of Durham. Crown 8vo, 6s. Ready.

Early Church History to A.D. 313.

By Henry Melville Gwatkin, Dixie Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Cambridge, Author of "Selections from Early Writers Illustrative of Church History to the time of Constantine." 2 vols. 8vo, 17s. net. Ready.

DR. H. B. SWETE.

The Holy Spirit in the New Testament. A Study of Primitive Christian Teaching. By Henry Barclay Swete, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. Ready.

Essays on Some Biblical Questions of the Day. By Members of the University of Cambridge. Edited by Henry Barclay Swete, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity. 8vo, 12s. net. Tuesday.

This volume forms a sequel to the Cambridge Theological Essays published in 1905. It contains contributions from sixteen Cambridge men, who write from different standpoints, but with a common interest in the study of the Bible.

Æsthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic. Translated from the Italian of Benedetto Croce, by Douglas Ainslie, B.A. (Oxon.) 8vo, 10s. net. October 15th.

Handbook of Marks on Pottery and Porcelain. By W. Burton, M.A., and R. L. Hobson, B.A. Illustrated, Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. Ready.

Dr. SVEN HEDIN.

Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Dr. Sven Hedin. With a Map, 8 Coloured Plates and about 400 other Illustrations, 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

COLONEL PATTERSON.

In the Grip of the Nyika. Further Adventures in British East Africa. By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. Patterson, D.S.O., Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

LORD ACTON.

Lectures on the French Revolution. By the late Right Hon. John Emerich Edward Dalberg, First Baron Acton, D.C.L., LL.D., &c. Edited with an Introduction, by John Neville Figgis, M.A., and Reginald Vere Laurence, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

RALPH NEVILL.

Light Come, Light Go. Gaming—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By Ralph Nevill. With 8 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations. 15s. net.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES.

Highways and Byways in Middlesex. By Walter Jerrold. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson, and a Map. Extra Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. Tuesday.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Open Country. By MAURICE HEWLETT. Ready.

Stradella: an Old Italian Love Tale. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Ready.

The Key of the Unknown. By ROSA N. CAREY. Ready.

THOMAS HARDY.

Time's Laughing-Stocks, and other Poems. By Thomas Hardy. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.

A Latin Anthology. With Photogravure Frontispiece, Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, full gilt back and gilt edge, 3s. 6d. net. Ready.

The Little Mermaid. A Story for Children, By Ethel Reader. With 8 Illustrations by Frank C. Papé. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD., LONDON.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S LIST OF NEW WORKS IN THEOLOGICAL AND RELIGIOUS LITERATURE WILL BE SENT POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

HODDER & STOUGHTON

A SELECTION FROM HODDER & STOUGHTON'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS

Fiction.

- H. RIDER HAGGARD. THE LADY OF BLOSSHOLME. 6s.
RALPH CONNOR. THE SETTLER. 6s.
C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. THE MOTOR MAID. 6s.
MAX PEMBERTON. THE FORTUNATE PRISONER. 6s.
CHARLES GARVICE. THE FATAL RUBY. 6s.
KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN. SUSANNA AND SUE. 3s. 6d.
THE OLD PEABODY PEW. New Edition. 3s. 6d.
ROSE O' THE RIVER. New Edition. 3s. 6d.
JOHN OXENHAM. GREAT-HEART GILLIAN. 6s.
HAROLD BEGBIE. THE GATEWAY. 6s.
BY THE AUTHOR OF "LADY OF THE DECORATION." LITTLE SISTER SNOW. 5s.
MORICE GERARD. THE KING'S SIGNET. 6s.
E. NESBIT. HARDING'S LUCK. Illustrated. 6s.
HON. SYLVIA BRETT. THE STREET WITH SEVEN HOUSES. 6s.
HAROLD BELL WRIGHT. THE SHEPHERD OF THE HILLS. 6s.
MRS. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY. OLD FRIENDS AND NEW. 6s.
A HUMAN CYPHER. By E. L. HAVERFIELD. 6s.
ANNIE S. SWAN. THE INHERITANCE. 3s. 6d.

Illustrated Art Books.

- A SONG OF THE ENGLISH. By RUDYARD KIPLING. With 30 Plates in Colour and many other Drawings by W. HEATH ROBINSON. Edition de Luxe, limited to 500 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist, bound in Vellum, £2 2s. net; Popular edition, cloth, 15s. net.
RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM. With Plates in Colour and Decorative Designs by EDMUND DULAC. Edition de Luxe, limited to 750 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist, bound in Vellum, £2 2s. net; Popular edition, cloth, 15s. net.
Shakespeare's Comedy of AS YOU LIKE IT. With 40 Plates in Colour by HUGH THOMSON, R.I. Edition de Luxe, limited to 350 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist, bound in Vellum, £2 2s. net; Popular edition, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.
Shakespeare's Comedy of THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. With 36 Plates in Colour by Sir JAMES LINTON, P.R.I. Edition de Luxe, limited to 350 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist, bound in Vellum, £2 2s. net; Popular edition, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.
BRITISH SPORT: PAST AND PRESENT. By E. D. CUMING. With 31 Plates in Colour by G. DENHOLM ARMOUR. Edition de Luxe, limited to 500 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist, bound in Vellum, £2 2s. net; Popular edition, cloth, 20s. net.

Belles-Lettres, Biography, etc.

- A VOLUME OF SPEECHES. By the Right Hon. WINSTON CHURCHILL, M.P. 3s. 6d. net.
THE LIFE OF PRINCIPAL RAINY. By PATRICK CARNEGIE SIMPSON, M.A. 2 vols. With Photogravure Portraits. 21s. net.
CONSTANTINOPLE AND TURKEY IN 1909. By Prof. Sir W. M. RAMSAY, D.C.L. With Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
THE TRIUMPH OF LIFE. By WILLIAM BARRY D.D. 7s. 6d. net.
HERALDS OF REVOLT. By the same Author. New and Cheaper Edition. 6s.
THE NEW SOCIALISM. An Impartial Inquiry. By JANE T. STODDART. 5s. net.
THE REFORMATION IN SCOTLAND. By D. HAY FLEMING, LL.D. 10s. 6d. net.
IMPERIAL UNITY. By Viscount MILNER, G.C.B., LL.D. 2s. 6d.
GEORGE MEREDITH. An Introduction to his Novels. By the Rev. JAMES MOFFATT, D.D. 5s.
THE SCOT OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By the Rev. JOHN WATSON, D.D. New and Cheaper Edition. 5s.
VICENZA: The Home of "The Saint." By Mrs PRICHARD AGNETTI. With a Preface by Antonio Fogazzaro. Illustrated. 12s.
ITALIAN HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS FROM A MOTOR CAR. By FRANCIS MILTOUN. Illustrated. 10s. 6d.
MENTONE AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD PAST AND PRESENT. By Dr. GEORGE MÜLLER. Edited by the Rev. J. E. SOMERVILLE, B.D. Illustrated. 12s.
CAMPS AND CRUISES OF AN ORNITHOLOGIST. By FRANK M. CHAPMAN. Illustrated. 12s. net.
LETTERS FROM CHINA. By SARAH PIKE CONGER. Illustrated. 12s.
OUR HOMES, AND HOW TO MAKE THE BEST OF THEM. By W. SHAW SPARROW. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
THE MIRACLE OF A LIFE. THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF HELEN KELLER. 1s. net.
THE PRACTICE OF OPTIMISM. A New Edition of "My Key of Life." By HELEN KELLER. Paper, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

The Nation

The Pick of the Publishing Season.

The following is a selection of the more interesting Books appearing in the Publishers' Spring Lists, grouped under different subject headings.

ART AND ARCHÆOLOGY.

- The National Gallery: Lewis Bequest. By Maurice W. Brockwell. Preface by Sir Charles Holroyd. (Allen. 5s. net.)
- The Works of John Hoppner. By William McKay and W. Roberts. (Bell. £5 5s. net.)
- Memoirs of Benvenuto Cellini. Translated by R. H. Hobart Cust. 2 vols. (Bell.)
- Gainsborough. By Mortimer Menpes. Text by James Greig. (Black. £3 3s. net.)
- Oriental Carpets, Runners and Rugs, and some Jacquard Reproductions. By Sydney Humphries. (Black. £2 2s. net.)
- The Sculptures of Chartres Cathedral. By Margaret and Ernest Marriage. (Cambridge University Press.)
- The World's Great Pictures. (Cassell. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Pottery. By Richard Lunn. Volume II. Pottery Decoration. (Chapman & Hall.)
- The Art and Letters Library—
- Stories of the French Artists from Clouet to Ingres. Collected by P. M. Turner and C. H. Collins Baker. (Chatto & Windus.)
- Stories of the Spanish Artists until Goya. Collected by Luis Carreño. (Chatto & Windus.)
- The Mind of the Artist: Thoughts and Sayings of Artists on their Art. Collected by Mrs. Laurence Binyon.
- The Painters of Vicenza. By Tancred Borenius. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- An Introduction to the Architectures of European Religions. By Ian B. S. Holborn. (T. & T. Clark. 6s. net.)
- The Deserted Village. By Oliver Goldsmith. Illustrated by W. Lee Hankey. (Constable. 15s. net.)
- The Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. (Constable. 15s. net.)
- Historical Roman Coins: From the Earliest Times to the Reign of Augustus. By G. F. Hill. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Modes and Manners of the Nineteenth Century. By Dr. Oskar Fischel and Max von Boehm. Translated by Marian Edwardes. 3 vols. (Dent. 21s. net.)
- Hogarth's Marriage à la Mode. Six coloured reproductions in a portfolio. (Dent. 21s. net.)
- London. A Portfolio of 20 Photogravures. By Alvin L. Coburn. With introduction by Hilaire Belloc. (Duckworth. 25s. net.)
- A History of Aquatint Engraving. By S. T. Prideaux. (Duckworth. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Library of Art—
- Six Greek Sculptors. By Ernest Gardner. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Lives of the British Architects. By E. Beresford Chancellor. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A Handbook of Modern French Painting. By D. Cady Eaton. (Gay & Hancock. 8s. 6d. net.)

- Romance of Symbolism. By Sidney Heath. (Griffiths. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Lombardic Architecture. By Commandatore G. T. Rivoira. 2 vols. (Heinemann. About £3 3s.)
- The History of Art Throughout the Ages—
- I. Art in Great Britain and Ireland. By Sir Walter Armstrong.
- II. Art in Northern Italy. By Dr. Corrado Ricci. (Heinemann. 6s. net per vol.)
- The Great Artist Series—
- Botticelli. By Richard Davey.
- Constable's Sketches. By Sir James D. Linton.
- Reynolds. By A. Lys Baldry. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net each vol.)
- The Song of the English. By Rudyard Kipling. With Illustrations by W. Heath Robinson. (Hodder & Stoughton. 15s. net.)
- Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. With Illustrations by Edmund Dulac. (Hodder & Stoughton. 15s. net.)
- Shakespeare's Comedy of As You Like It. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Shakespeare's Comedy of The Merchant of Venice. With Illustrations by Sir James Linton. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Fables of Æsop. With Illustrations by Edward J. Detmold. (Hodder & Stoughton. £2 2s. net.)
- Beautiful Children Immortalised by the Masters. By C. Haldane Macfall. (Jack. 21s. net.)
- The National Gallery. One Hundred Colored Plates. By P. G. Konody, F. W. Lippman, and M. W. Brockwell. 2 vols. (Jack. £1 1s. net.)
- Masterpieces in Color—
- Constable. By C. Lewis Hind.
- Memlinc. By W. H. J. Weale.
- Sargent. By T. Martin Wood.
- Raeburn. By James L. Caw. (Jack. 1s. 6d. net each.)
- Old China. By Egan Mew. First six vols. (Jack. 2s. 6d. net each.)
- A Book of Satyrs. By Austin Osman Spare. (Lane. 21s. net.)
- Stained Glass Tours in England. By C. H. Sherrill. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century. By Haldane Macfall. Edited by T. Leman Hare. (Macmillan. 42s. net.)
- The Marks of Pottery and Porcelain. By William Burton and R. L. Hobson. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Athletics and Athletic Festivals of Greece. By E. Norman Gardiner. (Macmillan.)
- Art and Life. By T. Sturge Moore. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- Rubens. By Edward Dillon. (Methuen. 25s. net.)
- Titian. By Charles Ricketts. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

- George Romney. By Arthur B. Chamberlain. Methuen. 15s. net.)
- Michelangelo. By Gerald S. Davies. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Raphael. By A. P. Oppé. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Schools of Painting. By Mary Innes. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- One Hundred Masterpieces of Sculpture. By George Francis Hill. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Guide to the Antiquities of Upper Egypt. From Abydos to the Soudan Frontier. By Arthur E. P. Weigall. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Arts of the Church—
Gothic Architecture in England. By the Rev. Dr. Hermitage Day.
Church Music. By the Rev. Maurice Bell. (Mowbray.)
- The Evolution of Italian Sculpture. By Lord Balcarras. (Murray.)
- A History of Indian and Eastern Architecture. By the late James Fergusson. (Murray.)
- The Stone and Bronze Ages in Italy and Sicily. By T. E. Peet. (Oxford University Press.)
- Decorative Design. By A. H. Christie. (Oxford University Press.)
- Bushman Paintings. Drawn by M. W. Tongue and D. Bleek. (Oxford University Press.)
- Armour and Weapons. By C. Foulkes. (Oxford University Press.)
- History of the Fan. By G. Wooliscroft Rhead. (Kegan Paul. £4 4s. net.)
- The Artistic Side of Photography. By A. J. Anderson. (Paul. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Modern Artists. By Christian Brinton. (Stanley Paul. 25s. net.)
- Oxford and Cambridge. By Hanslip Fletcher. (Pitman. 21s. net.)
- Roodcreens and Roodlofts. By Frederick Bligh Bond and the Rev. Dom Bede Camm. 2 vols. (Pitman. 32s. net.)
- Great Painters of the Nineteenth Century and Their Paintings. From the French of Léonce Bénédite. In 12 parts. (Pitman. 7d. net each part.)
- Oxford, Its Buildings and Gardens. By R. A. Durand. (Richards. 21s. net.)
- Manet and the French Impressionists. By Theodore Duret. Translated by J. E. C. Fitch. (Richards. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Relics and Memorials of London City. Painted and Described by James S. Ogilvy. (Routledge. 25s. net.)
- French Cathedrals, Monasteries, and Abbeys, and Sacred Sites of France. By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. (Unwin. 20s. net.)
- Pre-Historic Rhodesia. By R. N. Hall. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
- International Art Series—
William Hogarth. By Edward Hutton.
Edgar Degas. By Georges Grappe.
The Great English Masters. By Fritz Stahl.
Eugène Delacroix. By Camille Manclair.
Fritz Boehle. By Rudolf Klein.
Auguste Rodin. By Gustave Kahn. (Unwin. 5s. net per vol.)
- The Higher Life in Art. Lectures on the Barbizon School in France. By John La Farge. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)
- Chats on Old Silver. By E. L. Lowes. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- South African Memories. By the Lady Sarah Wilson. (Arnold. 15s. net.)
- Edmund Garrett: A Memoir. By E. T. Cook. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Sir Sidney Waterlow, Bart. By George Smalley. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Ten Great and Good Men. Lectures by Henry Montagu Butler. (Arnold. 6s. net.)
- A Great Bishop of One Hundred Years Ago: Being a Sketch of the Life of Bishop Horsley. By the Rev. H. H. Jebb. (Arnold. 5s. net.)
- The Letters of John Stuart Blackie to his Wife. With a Few Earlier Ones to his Parents. Edited by A. Stodart Walker. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Work and Play of a Government Inspector. By Herbert Preston-Thomas. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Sir Walter Scott's Friends. By Florence MacCunn. (Blackwood. 10s. net.)
- Lady Wake's Reminiscences. Edited by Lucy Wake. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Charles Dickens and his Friends. By W. Teignmouth Shore. (Cassell. 6s. net.)
- Chateaubriand and his Court of Women. By Francis Gribble. (Chapman & Hall. 15s. net.)
- Lives of the Medicis: From their Letters. By Janet Ross. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Melba: An Authorised Biography. By Agnes M. Murphy. (Chatto & Windus. 16s. net.)
- J. B. Paton, M.A., D.D., Educational and Social Pioneer. By James Marchant. (James Clarke. 4s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. By Walter Sichel. (Constable. 31s. 6d. net.)
- Princess Helene von Racowitza: An Autobiography. (Constable.)
- The Life of John Dee: An Elizabethan Crystal Gazer. By Charlotte Fell Smith. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Autobiography. By Anna Robeson Burr. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Emerson's Journals. Edited by Edward W. Emerson and Waldo Emerson Forbes. (Constable.)
- Autobiography of Nathaniel Southgate Shaler. (Constable. 16s. net.)
- Charles W. Eliot: President of Harvard University, 1869-1909. By Dr. Eugen Kuhnemann. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)
- Francesco Petrarca, Poet and Humanist. By Maud Jerrold. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Life and Times of Master John Hus. By the Count Lütow. (Dent. 12s. 6d. net.)
- An Editor's Chair. By Ernest Foster. (Everett. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Henry Hudson. By Thomas A. Janvier. (Harper.)
- The Memoirs of the Duchesse de Dino, afterwards Duchesse de Talleyrand and de Sagan, 1831-1835. Edited by Princesse Radziwill. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
- A Cotswold Family—Hicks and Hicks-Beach. By Mrs. William Hicks-Beach. (Heinemann. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Life and Letters of James Wolfe. By Beckles Willson. (Heinemann. About 18s. net.)
- The Life of Principal Rainy. By Patrick Simpson. 2 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton. 21s. net.)
- The Aberdeen Doctors. By the Rev. D. Macmillan. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- J. Bevan Braithwaite: A "Friend" of the Nineteenth Century. By his Children. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A Queen at Bay: The Story of Maria Cristina and Don Carlos. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- Mr. Pope. By George Paston. 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Memories of Fifty Years. By Mary Jeune (Lady St. Helier). (Arnold. 15s. net.)

- Cleopatra of Egypt. By Philip W. Sergeant. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- Queen Christina of Sweden. By I. A. Taylor. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- Louis the XVIIIth. By Mary F. Sandars. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- Men of Fame Series—
- John Milton. By W. Grinton Berry. (Jarrold. 2s.)
- The Story of Edison. By Frank A. Mundell. (Jarrold. 2s.)
- William Makepeace Thackeray. By Lewis Melville. (Lane. 25s. net.)
- The Life of Joan of Arc. By Anatole France. Translated by Winifred Stephens. 2 vols. (Lane. 25s. net.)
- Maria Edgeworth and Her Circle in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon. By Constance Hill. (Lane. 21s. net.)
- The Life of W. J. Fox: Public Teacher and Social Reformer, 1786-1864. By the late Richard Garnett, concluded by Edward Garnett. (Lane. 16s. net.)
- Giovanni Boccaccio: A Biographical Study. By Edward Hutton. (Lane. 16s. net.)
- Madame de Maintenon: Her Life and Times, 1635-1719. By C. C. Dyson. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale. By A. M. Broadley. Introduction by Thomas Seecombe. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Carlyle's First Love: Margaret Gordon—Lady Bannerman. By R. C. Archibald. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- George Bernard Shaw. By G. K. Chesterton. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Gilbert White and Selborne. By Henry C. Shelley. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Life of George Morland. By George Dowe. (Laurie. £3 3s. net.)
- Le Duc de Morny. By Frédéric Loliée. English Version by Bryan O'Donnell. (Long. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Marie Amélie, Last Queen of the French, 1782-1866. By C. C. Dyson. (Long. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Ups and Downs of a Wandering Life. By Walter Seymour. (Long. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Memoir of the Rt. Hon. William Edward Hartpole Lecky. By his Wife. (Longmans.)
- *Life of James Green, D.D., Rector and Dean of Maritzburg, Natal, from February, 1849, to January, 1906. By A. Theodore Wirgman. (Longmans. 2 vols.)
- The Life of William Thomson, Baron Kelvin of Largs. By Silvanus D. Thompson. 2 vols. (Macmillan.)
- Lord Kelvin's Early Home. Being the Recollections of his Sister, the late Mrs. Elizabeth King. (Macmillan.)
- Life of Robert Machray, D.D., Archbishop of Rupert's Land. By his Nephew, Robert Machray. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)
- Antonio Stradivari. His Life and Work (1644-1737). By W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill and Alfred E. Hill. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Drama of Saint Helena. By Paul Freméaux. Translated by Alfred Rieu and the Author. (Melrose. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Austrian Court in the Nineteenth Century. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Horace Rumbold. (Methuen. 18s. net.)
- Reminiscences of a K.C. By T. E. Crispe. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Rose of Savoy: Marie Adélaïde of Savoy, Duchesse de Bourgoyne, Mother of Louis XV. By H. Noel Williams. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- Napoleon's Brothers. By A. H. Atteridge. (Methuen. 18s. net.)
- Marie Antoinette. By H. Belloc. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- The Incomparable Siddons. By Mrs. Clement Parsons. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Nine Days' Queen. By Richard Davey. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Court of Louis XIII. By K. A. Patmore. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Last King of Poland and his Contemporaries. By R. Nisbet Bain. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Matilda of Tuscany. By Nora Duff. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- St. Teresa of Spain. By Helen H. Colvill. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Sir Philip Sidney. By Percy Addleshaw. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Court of a Saint. By Winifred F. Knox. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Handel. By R. A. Streatfeild. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- An Art Student's Reminiscences of Paris in the Eighties. By Shirley Fox. (Mills & Boon. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Leaders of the Church Series—
- John Keble. By the Hon. Edward L. Wood. (Mowbray.)
- Byron: The Last Phase. By Richard Edgcumbe. (Murray. 10s. 6d.)
- The Correspondence of Lord Westmorland. Edited by her daughter, Lady Rose Weigall. (Murray.)
- The Life of Mrs. Norton. By Jane Grey Perkins. (Murray.)
- The Life of Sir William Broadbent. Edited by his Daughter. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Reminiscences of Carl Schurz. 3 vols. (Murray. 36s. net.)
- Lady Hester Stanhope. By Mrs. Charles Roundell. (Murray.)
- The Religious Life of William Ewart Gladstone. By D. C. Lathbury. (Murray. 2 vols.)
- The Skene Papers: Memories of Sir Walter Scott. By James Skene. Edited by Basil Thomson. (Murray.)
- Letters from the Peninsula (1808-1812). By Lieut.-General Sir William Warre. Edited by the Rev. Edmund Warre. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Rise of Louis Napoleon. By F. A. Simpson. (Murray.)
- The Life of Sir William Russell. By J. B. Atkins. (Murray.)
- My Recollections. By The Countess of Cardigan and Lancastre. (Nash. 10s. net.)
- Reginald Bosworth Smith. By his daughter, Lady Grogan. (Nisbet. 10s. 6d. net.)
- My Recollections. By Eugene Stock. (Nisbet. 6s. net.)
- My Life Among the Bluejackets. By Agnes Weston. (Nisbet. 6s. net.)
- Thomas Shepard: Pilgrim Father and Founder of Harvard. By Alexander Whyte. (Oliphant, Anderson. 2s. 6d.)
- Memoirs and Letters of Francis W. Newman. By I. Giberne Sieveking. (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Sir Joseph Banks, the Father of Australia. By J. H. Maiden. (Kegan Paul. 6s. net.)
- Francis Atterbury. By H. C. Beeching. (Pitman.)
- Makers of National History Series—
- Edward IV. By Laurence Stratford. (Pitman.)
- The Letters of Percy Bysshe Shelley. Edited by Roger Ingpen. In 2 vols. (Pitman. 25s. net.)
- Life of Johann Sebastian Bach. By Sir C. Hubert H. Parry. (Putman. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Heroes of the Nations Series—
- King Canute the Great. By Lawrence M. Larson.
- Fernando Cortes and His Conquest of Mexico, 1485-1547. By Francis A. MacNutt. (Putnam. 5s. each.)
- The Life and Letters of Susan Warner ("Elizabeth Wetherell"). Edited by her sister, Anna B. Warner. (Putnam.)

- Fifty Years in Camp and Field. Diary of Ethan Allen Hitchcock, Major-General, U.S.A. Edited by W. A. Croffut. (Putnam.)
- Madame, Mother of the Regent. By Arvède Barine. (Putnam. 12s. 6d.)
- W. G. Lawes, of Savage Island and New Guinea. By the Rev. Joseph King. (Religious Tract Society. 5s. net.)
- The Apostle of Alaska. By John W. Arctander. (Revell. 5s. net.)
- Balzac. By Frederick Lawton. (Richards. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Life of Edward Bulwer, First Baron Lytton of Knebworth. By T. H. S. Escott. (Routledge. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Standard Library—
- Mrs. Thrale: Afterwards Mrs. Piozzi. By L. B. Seeley. (Seeley. 2s. 6d. net.)
- A Memoir of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. By the Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Pascal. By Viscount St. Cyres. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Gambetta. By W. Grinton Berry. (Sonnen-schein.)
- A Beau Sabreur: Maurice de Saxe, Marshal of France. His Loves, His Laurels, and His Times. (1696-1750.) By W. R. H. Trowbridge. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
- Gambetta. Life and Letters. By P. B. Gheusi. Translated by V. M. Montagu. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
- In Three Legations: Turin, Florence, The Hague, 1856-1872. By Madame Charles de Bunsen. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The French Revolution Series—
- I. Mirabeau and the French Revolution. By Charles F. Warwick.
- II. Danton and the French Revolution. By Charles F. Warwick.
- III. Robespierre and the French Revolution. By C. F. Warwick. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net each volume.)
- Sir Randal Cremer: A Biography. By Howard Evans. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- Life and Times of Mrs. Sherwood. Compiled from the Diaries of Mrs. and Captain Sherwood. (Wells, Gardner.)
- Blaise Pascal: A Study in Religious Psychology. By H. R. Jordan. (Williams & Norgate. About 4s. 6d. net.)

CLASSICAL LITERATURE AND PHILOLOGY

- The Iliad of Homer. Translated by E. H. Blakeney. 2 vols. Vol. I. (Bell. 3s. 6d.)
- The Tragedies of Aeschylus. Translated by Walter Headlam and C. E. S. Headlam. (Bell. 3s. 6d.)
- The Knights of Aristophanes. Translated by Benjamin B. Rogers. (Bell. 10s. 6d.)
- The Acharnians of Aristophanes. Translated by B. B. Rogers. (Bell. 7s. 6d.)
- The Elegies of Theognis. A Revised Text, by T. Hudson Williams. (Bell.)
- Hector and Achilles: A Tale of Troy. Rendered into English after the Chronicle of Homer. By Richard Sheepshanks. (Blackwood.)
- Homer and the Iliad: An Essay. By F. Melian Stawell. (Dent. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Literatures of the World. Edited by Edmund Gosse.
- A History of Latin Literature. By Marcus Dimsdale. (Heinemann. 6s.)
- Orationes et Epistolae Cantabrigienses. By J. E. Sandys. (Macmillan.)
- Sophocles in English Verse. Part I. Oedipus the King, Oedipus at Kolonus, Antigone. Translated by Arthur S. Way. (Macmillan.)

- Studies in Greek Literature. By R. Y. Tyrrell. (Macmillan.)
- The Acharnians of Aristophanes. With Introduction and English Prose Translation. By W. J. M. Starkie. (Macmillan.)
- Dionysius of Halicarnassus on Literary Composition. Greek Text, with Commentary. By Prof. W. Rhys Roberts. (Macmillan.)
- Aristophanes and the Political Parties at Athens. By Maurice Croiset. Translated by James Loeb. (Macmillan.)
- Physical Science in the Time of Nero. Being a Translation of Seneca's "Quæstiones Naturales." By John Clarke. (Macmillan.)
- Scripta Minoa. By A. T. Evans. Vol. I. (Oxford University Press.)
- The Cults of the Greek States. Vol. V., completing the work. By L. R. Farnell. (Oxford University Press.)
- Oxford Classical Texts—
- Euripides. Vol. III. Edited by G. A. Murray.
- Xenophon: Cyropaedia. Edited by E. C. Marchant. (Oxford University Press.)
- Aristotle's Works—
- Historia Animalium. Translated by D'Arcy W. Thompson. (Oxford University Press.)
- Oxford Library of Translations—
- The Apologia and Florida of Apuleius. Translated by H. E. Butler. (Oxford University Press.)
- Aristophanes and Others. By Herbert Richards. (Richards. 6s. net.)

COUNTRY LIFE.

- A Fifth Series of Memories of the Months. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. (Arnold. 7s. 6d.)
- The Cottage Homes of England. Drawn by Helen Allingham and Described by Stewart Dick. (Arnold. 21s. net.)
- Ten Years of Game-keeping. By Owen Jones. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)
- In a Yorkshire Garden. By Reginald Farrer. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Nature Book. With Introduction by Walter Crane. 3 vols. (Cassell. 12s. net each.)
- Trees and Their Life Histories. By Percy Groom. (Cassell. 25s. net.)
- Heart of England Series—
- I. The South Country. By Edward Thomas. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Hills and the Vale. Collected Essays. By Richard Jefferies. Introduction by Edward Thomas. (Duckworth. 6s.)
- Around the Camp Fire. By Charles G. D. Roberts. (Harrop. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Eggs and Nests of British Birds. By Frank Finn. (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)
- The British Bird Book. Edited by F. B. Kirkman. In 12 Sections. (Jack. 7s. 6d. net per section.)
- Beautiful Flowers and How to Grow them. By Horace J. Wright and Walter P. Wright. 2 vols. (Jack. £1 1s. net.)
- Wild Nature Wood and Won. By Oliver C. Pike and Magdalen F. P. Tuck. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d. net.)
- By the Deep Sea. By Edward Step. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Bird Life. By W. P. Pyecraft. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Man and Nature on Tidal Waters. By A. H. Patterson. (Methuen. 6s.)

MESSRS. BELL'S FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

NOW READY. Crown 4to, 15s. net.

SAVOY OPERAS.

By W. S. GILBERT.

With a new introduction by the Author, 32 Illustrations in Colour by W. RUSSELL FLINT, and Title-page and binding designed by the same artist.

This volume contains the libretti of Patience, The Pirates of Penzance, Princess Ida, and The Yeoman of the Guard, which have been revised by the Author for the purpose. Sir W. S. GILBERT has also contributed an Introduction to the Volume. Write for Illustrated Prospectus.

READY NOW.

Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA.

By PERCY F. HONE, B.A. (Cantab.)
(of Salisbury, Rhodesia).

The aim of this book, which is the first history of Southern Rhodesia, is to give an accurate account of the country, its inhabitants, and its resources.

Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

His Art, His Writings, and His Public Life: A Record.
By AYMER VALLANCE.

Fourth and Cheaper Edition with a reproduction in Colours of Arras Tapestry "The Woodpecker," Photogravure Portrait, and about 50 Illustrations, half tone and line.

— THE —

QUEEN'S TREASURES SERIES.

Small crown 8vo. With 8 coloured plates and decorated title-page, covers, and end papers. 2s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

- Cranford. By Mrs. GASKELL. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. October.
Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. Ready.
Lob-Lie-by-the-Fire, or, the Luck of Lingborough, and other Stories. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by ALICE B. WOODWARD. Ready immediately.
Little Women. By LOUISA M. ALCOTT. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. Ready.

BELL'S MINIATURE SERIES OF MUSICIANS.

Pott 8vo, bound in cloth, with 8 Illustrations, 1s. net; or in limp leather, with Photogravure Frontispiece, 2s. net.

NEW VOLUME.

Purcell. By J. F. RUNCIMAN. Wednesday next.

Mr. Frank Hird's New Novel. Ready Oct. 8th. 6s.

THE DEEPER STAIN.

By FRANK HIRD, Author of "King Fitz's A.D.C."
Mr. Hird's new novel concerns itself with questions of modern social life, and will fascinate readers as much by the brilliance of the character studies as by the restraint and dignity with which the Author has described the terrible problem which confronts his heroine.

MASTERS OF LITERATURE.

A Series of handy Single volumes containing Representative Passages from the Works of the Greatest Writers, with full Biographical and Critical Introduction and Editorial Connections. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net each.

FIRST LIST OF VOLUMES.

NOW READY.

- | | | |
|-------------------|--------------------------|--------------|
| SCOTT. | By Professor GRANT. | Ready |
| FIELDING. | By Professor SAINTSBURY. | Ready |
| DEFOE. | By John MASEFIELD. | Oct. |
| CARLYLE. | By A. W. EVANS. | Oct. |
| THACKERAY. | By G. K. CHESTERTON. | |
| | OTHERS TO FOLLOW. | |

VOL. 1 NOW READY.

Demy 8vo, with 2 Photogravure Portraits, 10s. 6d. net.

THE HANOVERIAN QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

By ALICE GREENWOOD.

"It is a pleasure to read a book of memoirs so well done as that of Miss Greenwood. Miss Greenwood has not 'read-up' her subject; she has written because she cares and knows—with an ample margin of knowledge which lends a sense of space and atmosphere to her work."

Fcap. 8vo, 6s.

A HANDBOOK TO DANTE.

By F. J. SNELL, M.A.

Author of "The Age of Transition," &c.

This volume will be uniform with Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR's well-known "Handbook to Browning," and Mr. MORTON LUCE's "Handbook to Tennyson" and "Handbook to Shakespeare."

Vol. V., completing the Works. Small 4to.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND.

Newly edited from the MSS.

By LUCY TOULMIN SMITH.

This edition will be completed in five volumes, of which Vol. I. (containing Parts I-III.), price 18s. net, Vol. II. (Parts IV. and V.), price 12s. net, Vol. III. (the "Itinerary in Wales"), price 10s. 6d. net, and Vol. IV. (Parts VII. and VIII.), 12s. net, are already published.

UNIFORM WITH BELL'S CATHEDRAL SERIES.

Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

CHURCHES OF COVENTRY.

By FREDERICK W. WOODHOUSE. Ready.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious bookbuyers have long learned to keep a careful eye."—Athenæum.

Complete Catalogue of nearly 800 volumes will be sent on application.

FORTHCOMING VOLUMES TO BE ISSUED IMMEDIATELY.

IN THE PRESS. 2 vols., small post 8vo, 5s. each.

THE POEMS OF JONATHAN SWIFT.

Edited by W. ERNST BROWNING.

MORE'S UTOPIA.

ROBINSON'S Translations of the "Utopia"; together with Roper's Life of Sir Thomas More, and More's Letters to Margaret Roper and others. Edited with Notes by GEORGE SAMPSON. 3s. 6d.

DANTE. The Divine Comedy.

Translated by the REV. HENRY CAREY. New Edition by MARIE LOUISE EGERTON CASTLE. 3s. 6d.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER.

Newly Translated into English Prose by F. H. BLAKENEY, M.A., Head Master of the King's School, Ely. In 2 vols. 3s. 6d. Vol. I., containing Books I.-XII.

THE TRAGEDIES OF ÆSCHYLUS.

A New Prose Translation from a Revised Text by WALTER HEADLAM, Litt. D., and C. E. S. HEADLAM, M.A. 3s. 6d.

Cheap Re-Issue of "V.R.I."

THE LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

By the DUKE OF ARGYLL, K.T. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, and many other portraits and illustrations. 3s. 6d.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

- The Young Naturalist: A Guide to British Animal Life. By W. Percival Westell. (Methuen. 6s.)
- British Mountain Climbs. By George D. Abraham. (Mills and Boon. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Gardener's Companion. By Selina Randolph. Introduction by Lady Alwyne Compton. (Mills & Boon. 2s. net.)
- The Six Handicap Golfer. By "Two of His Kind." With chapters by H. S. Colt and H. H. Hilton. (Mills & Boon. 2s. 6d. net.)
- In Wind and Wild. By Eric Parker. (Pitman. 5s. net.)
- The Complete Wild-Fowler Ashore and Afloat. By Guy Thorne and Stanley Duncan. (Richards. 15s. net.)
- The Small Garden Useful. By A. C. Curtis. (Smith, Elder. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Common Weeds of the Farm and Garden. By Harold C. Long and John Percival. (Smith, Elder. 5s. net.)
- Monthly Gleanings in a Scottish Garden. By L. H. Soutar. (Unwin. 6s. net.)
- Leisure Hours with Nature. By E. P. Larken. (Unwin. 5s.)

CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

- A Handbook of English Literature. By C. E. Baines. (Arnold.)
- A Handbook to Dante. By F. J. Snell. (Bell. 6s.)
- The Cambridge History of English Literature—
Vol. IV. Poetry and Prose from Sir Thomas North to Michael Drayton. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Yet Again. By Max Beerbohm. (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)
- Moretum Alterum. By James B. Winterbotham. (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)
- George Meredith: Some Early Appreciations. Selected by Maurice Buxton Forman. (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)
- Ceres' Runaway and Other Essays. By Alice Meynell. (Constable. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Romantic Movement in English Poetry. By Arthur Symons. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Century of French Poets. By F. Y. Eccles. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- G. K. Chesterton's Appreciations and Criticisms of the Novels of Charles Dickens. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Triumph of Life. By William Barry. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)
- George Meredith. A Primer to the Novels. By James Moffatt. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.)
- A History of Story-telling. By Arthur Ransome. (Jack. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Renaissance Fancies and Studies. By Vernon Lee. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- A History of English Prosody from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day. By George Saintsbury. 3 vols. Vol. III. (Macmillan.)
- Shakespeare's Roman Plays and their Background. By M. W. MacCallum. (Macmillan.)
- A History of English Poetry. By William John Courthope. Vol. VI. (Macmillan.)
- Modern Novelists and their Styles. By Prof. William Lyon Phelps. (Macmillan.)
- The American Spirit in Literature. By Hamilton W. Mabie. (Macmillan.)
- The Day's Burden. Studies Political and Literary. By T. M. Kettle. (Maunsel.)
- Rosemary's Letter Book. By W. L. Courtney. (Melrose. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Shakespeare Folios and Quartos. By Alfred W. Pollard. (Methuen. £1 1s. net.)

- The Clerk of Oxford in Fiction. By Samuel F. Hulton. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- On Everything. By H. Belloc. (Methuen. 5s.)
- Tremendous Trifles. By G. K. Chesterton. (Methuen. 5s.)
- One Day and Another: A Volume of Essays. By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen. 5s.)
- Shelley: The Man and The Poet. By A. Clutton Brock. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Jane Austen and her Country House Comedy. By W. H. Helm. (Nash. 7s. 6d. net.)
- New Universal Library—
Sainte-Beuve: Causeries du Lundi. Translated by Prof. E. J. Trechmann. (Routledge. 1s. net each volume.)
- The French Procession: A Pageant of Great Writers. By Madame Duclaux. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

DRAMA.

- Savoy Operas. By W. S. Gilbert. Illustrated by W. Russell Flint. (Bell. 15s. net.)
- A History of English Dramatic Companies. By J. Tucker Murray. 2 vols. (Constable. 31s. 6d. net.)
- The Doctor's Dilemma and Getting Married. With two Prefaces. By Bernard Shaw. (Constable. 6s.)
- Three Plays—Hamilton's Second Marriage. Thomas and the Princess. The Modern Way. By Mrs. W. K. Clifford. (Duckworth. 6s.)
- Three Plays. By Brieux. (Maternity. Translated by Mrs. Bernard Shaw. The Three Daughters of Monsieur Dupont. Translated by St. John Hankin. Damaged Goods. Translated by John Pollock.) With a Preface By G. Bernard Shaw. (Fifield.)
- Makeshifts. By Gertrude Robins. (Laurie. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Abbey Theatre Series—
The Cross Roads. A Play by S. L. Robinson. (Maunsel. 1s. net.)
- The Drone. A Play by Rutherford Mayne. (Maunsel. 1s. net.)
- The Shuiler's Child. A Play by Seumas O'Kelly. (Maunsel. 1s. net.)
- Votes for Women. A Play in Three Acts. By Elizabeth Robins. (Mills & Boon. 1s.)
- The Appreciation of the Drama. By Charles and Caroline A. Ciffin. (Stanley Paul. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Three Plays by Granville Barker. The Marrying of Ann Leete, The Voysey Inheritance, and Waste. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 5s. net.)

EDUCATIONAL.

- Latin of the Empire. Selected by W. King Gillies and A. R. Cumming. (Bell. 4s. 6d.)
- An Introduction to Poetry. By Raymond M. Alden. (Bell. 5s.)
- Regional Geography of Africa and Australasia. By J. B. Reynolds. (Black. 2s.)
- Descriptive Geography of the British Isles. By F. D. Herbertson. (Black. 2s. 6d.)
- The Story of Hampshire. By Rev Telford Varley. (Black. 1s. 6d.)
- English Exercises. By J. Logie Robertson. (Blackwood. 1s.)
- Outlines of Chemistry. With Practical Work. By H. J. H. Fenton. (Cambridge University Press.)

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.

New Books Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM.

LAMB'S TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE. Medium 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

GULLIVER'S TRAVELS, By JONATHAN SWIFT. Medium 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

These books contain Numerous Coloured Drawings Finely Reproduced. Many Illustrations in Black and White. Specially Designed End-Papers and other Decorations.

There will also be a Large-Paper Edition of each Volume, at the Subscription Price of 21s. net, which will be raised on publication to 25s. net. This Edition contains a Coloured Illustration which does not appear in the 7s. 6d. Editions, and will be strictly LIMITED TO 750 COPIES, ALL NUMBERED AND SIGNED BY THE ARTIST.

New Edition Illustrated by AUBREY BEARDSLEY.

LE MORTE D'ARTHUR.

A New Edition in One Volume which contains 300 designs by AUBREY BEARDSLEY. Photogravure Frontispiece, 46 Full-Page Illustrations, bordered pages, &c. Crown quarto, 25s. net. 1,000 Copies only were printed for England, and the type is now distributed.

This Edition contains all Beardsley's Original Designs and Illustrations, and is reprinted word for word from Caxton's Edition of 1485, pointed and spelt in uniformity with modern usage, with an Introduction by Prof. RHYS.

MODES AND MANNERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

as represented in the Pictures and Engravings of the time. By Dr. OSCAR FISCHER and MAX VON BOEHM. Translated and revised by MARIAN EDWARDS. Square demy 8vo. Three vols. in slip board case, 21s. net. Silk Moiré, 25s. net. 600 Coloured and Half-Tone Illustrations of Old World Fashion. Of the 83 Coloured Illustrations 77 are coloured by hand.

A brilliant view of society from 1750 to 1880, with special reference to costume and social life. Besides nearly 500 half-tone reproductions of contemporary prints and paintings, the work contains no less than 85 coloured illustrations, 77 being coloured by hand; these constitute a delightful series of old fashion-plates which alone give the book a unique value. Everyone will be fascinated by the fragrance which hangs round these old portraits.

HOMER AND THE ILIAD.

An essay to determine the scope and character of the original poem. By F. MELIAN STAWELL, of Newnham College, Cambridge. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Miss Stawell makes a careful and scholarly examination, bringing much common sense and literary acumen to bear on her subject."—Daily News.

FRANCESCO PETRARCA: Poet and Humanist.

By MAUD JERROLD. Illustrated. Square demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The first complete study in English of the life and work of one of the greatest of Italian poets, who had an incalculable influence on the renaissance and on the development of English literature.

"A full and scholarly treatment of the poet, biographical and critical, with some illustrations from fifteenth century Florentine engravings and bibliography."—Times.

READY SHORTLY VOL. III OF THIS IMPORTANT WORK.

CROWE AND CAVALCASELLE'S NEW HISTORY OF PAINTING IN ITALY.

A Reprint of the Original Text Verbatim. Edited and Supplemented with Notes by EDWARD HUTTON. At least 350 Reproductions of Pictures. To be completed in 3 vols. Vols. I. and II. now ready. The Second Volume deals with the Sieneese School, and the first part of the Florentine School, and will be followed in the Autumn by Vol. III., completing the work. Demy 8vo, £3 net per set.

"With its scholarly notes and numerous illustrations the second volume of Messrs. Dent's edition of Crowe and Cavalcaselle's 'History of Painting in Italy' well maintains the high level of excellence of its predecessor. The task of bringing it into line with recent research by means of brief footnotes must have been one to daunt the most intrepid spirit, but that it has been triumphantly achieved by Mr. Hutton no one who carefully examines his annotations will deny."—Westminster Gazette.

SOCIALISM AND THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT.

By WERNER SOMBART. Translated with Notes by M. EPSTEIN, M.A., Ph.D. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The book is a clear and impartial examination of the growth and the aims of the social movement. The translator had the advantage of working with Dr. Sombart for two years."—Observer.

HUSBAND AND WIFE IN THE LAW.

By EDWARD JENKS, B.C.L., M.A., Principal and Director of Legal Studies of the Law Society, &c. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"An admirable work of reference for the general public on the English law of marriage."

—Glasgow Herald.

ENGLISH IDYLLS. Each Volume Illustrated with 24 Drawings by C. E. BROCK, reproduced in colour. Narrow crown 8vo. Cloth, 5s. net; vellum, 8s. 6d. net. Two New Volumes COMPLETING Jane Austen's Works in Six Vols. in this Series.—EMMA. By JANE AUSTEN. PERSUASION. By JANE AUSTEN. Complete set in Cloth Case, 33s. net.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY. Nine new Volumes just issued, thus completing 400 books in this famous Library. Cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net.

Full List of the whole 400 Volumes on Application,

Complete List of New Volumes or Prospectuses may be had on application to 19, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

- Elements of the Differential and Integral Calculus. By A. E. H. Love. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Elementary Projective Geometry. By A. G. Pickford. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Cambridge County Geographies—
Cambridgeshire. By Professor and Mrs. T. M'Kenny Hughes.
Dorset. By A. L. Salmon.
Gloucestershire. By H. A. Evans.
Westmorland. By J. E. Marr. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Elementary Arabic. By Reynold A. Nicholson. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Q. Horati Flacci Satirarum. Liber II. Edited by James Gow. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Livy, Book IX. Edited by W. B. Anderson. (Cambridge University Press.)
- Cassell's Atlas. (Cassell. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Schoolboys and School Work. By the Rev. the Hon. Edward Lyttelton. (Longmans.)
- A Practical Chemistry for Schools and Technical Institutes. By A. E. Dunstan. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)
- Elementary Experimental Electricity and Magnetism. By W. T. Clough. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
- English Literature for Schools. By E. E. Firth. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
- By Road and River. A Descriptive Geography of the British Isles. By E. M. Wilmot-Buxton. (Methuen. 2s.)
- A Systematic Geography of the British Isles. By George W. Webb. (Methuen. 1s.)
- Physiography. By Rollin D. Salisbury. (Murray. 6s. net.)
- A Series of Simplified Latin Texts—
Agricola. By W. L. Paine.
Camillus. By C. H. Broadbent.
Aemilius Paulus. By F. R. Dale.
Jugurthine War. By A. J. Schooling. (Murray.)
- History of Secondary Education in Scotland. By J. Strong. (Oxford University Press.)
- An Easy and Concise Guide to the Starry Heavens. By D. M'Ewan. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)
- The Scholar's Book of Travel. 4 vols. (Philip.)
- Philip's Model Geographies. (Philip.)
- New School Atlas of Comparative Geography. (Philip. 2s. 6d.)
- A Guide to Geographical Books and Appliances. By J. F. Unstead and N. E. MacMunn. (Philip.)
- English Composition and Correspondence. By J. F. Davis. (Pitman.)
- A Public School Chemistry for Beginners. By E. C. Lester. (Rivers. 3s. 6d.)
- Selections from Wordsworth: An Introduction to Romance in Literature. By Adam Fox. (Rivers. 2s. net.)
- Pliny's Natural History: Selections from Books VIII.-X. By L. D. Wainwright. (Rivers. 2s. net.)
- School History of Europe. By Professor C. Sanford Terry. (Routledge. About 4s. 6d.)
- A Series of French Texts. Edited by Prof. M. A. Gerthwohl. (Sonnenschein.)
- A Greek Grammar: Syntax. By Dr. Gustave Simonson. (Sonnenschein.)
- Elementary Chemistry. By F. B. Emery. (Williams & Norgate. 8s. 6d. net.)
- The Student's Graduated French Reader. Edited by Leon Delbos. 2 parts. (Williams & Norgate. 1s. 6d. net each.)

FICTION.

- The Pasque Flower. By Jane Warde. (Arnold. 6s.)
- A Crucial Experiment. By A. C. Farquharson. (Arnold. 6s.)
- The Beggar in the Heart. By Edith Rickert. (Arnold. 6s.)
- The Deeper Stain. By Frank Hird. (Bell. 6s.)
- Beatrice XVI.: A Romance. By Irene Clyde. (Bell. 3s. 6d.)
- Candles in the Wind. By Maud Diver. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- A Man's Man. By Ian Hay. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- The I th of Honour. By Sydney C. Grier. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- Some Everyday Folk and Dawn. By Miles Franklin. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- The Shoulder-knot. By Mrs. Henry Dudeney. (Cassell. 6s.)

- The Wrong Side of Destiny. By Edith M. Moore. (Cassell. 6s.)
- The Red Room. By William Le Queux. (Cassell. 6s.)
- A Country Corner. By Amy Le Feuvre. (Cassell. 6s.)
- Blind Hopes. By Helen Wallace. (Cassell. 6s.)
- A House of Lies. By Sidney Warwick. (Cassell. 6s.)
- The Glimpse: An Adventure of the Soul. By Arnold Bennett. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- The Sheriff of Dyke Hole. By Ridgwell Cullum. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- Paths Perilous. By Sidney Pickering. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- The Screen. By Vincent Brown. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- The Knight of the Golden Sword. By Michael Barrington. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
- Plain Brown. By Cosmo Hamilton. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
- Influences. By Paul Methven. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)
- Ordinary People. By Una L. Silberrad. (Constable. 6s.)
- The Mount. By C. F. Keary. (Constable. 6s.)
- The Oath of Allegiance. By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. (Constable. 6s.)
- Margaret Hever. By Elizabeth Martindale. (Duckworth. 6s.)
- Love Story of Don Q. By Hesketh Prichard. (Greening. 6s.)
- The Nest of the Sparrowhawk. By Baroness Orczy. (Greening. 6s.)
- The Disc. By Harris Burland. (Greening. 6s.)
- The House of Terror. By Gerald Biss. (Greening. 6s.)
- The Moccasin Ranch. By Hamlin Garland. (Harper.)
- Captain Stormfield's Visit to Heaven. By Mark Twain. (Harper.)
- Chivalry. By James B. Cabell. (Harper.)
- The Return of the Petticoat. By Warwick Deeping. (Harper.)
- Beasley's Christmas Party. By Booth Tarkington. (Harper.)
- The White Prophet. By Hall Caine. 2 vols. (Heinemann. 4s. net.)
- The Scandalous Mr. Waldo. By Ralph Straus. (Heinemann. 3s. net.)
- It Never Can Happen Again. By William De Morgan. 2 vols. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)
- Bella Donna. By Robert Hichens. 2 vols. (Heinemann. 4s. net.)
- The Lady of Blossholme. By H. Rider Haggard. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Settler. By Ralph Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Fortunate Prisoner. By Max Pemberton. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Fatal Ruby. By Charles Garvice. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- Great-Heart Gillian. By John Oxenham. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Gateway. By Harold Begbie. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The King's Signet. By Morice Gerard. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- Harding's Luck. By E. Nesbit. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- Seymour Charlton. By W. B. Maxwell. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- The Scholar Vagabond. By L. Winstanley. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- A Simple Savage. By G. B. Burgin. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- Litany Lane. By Mrs. Baillie-Saunders. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- They and I. By Jerome K. Jerome. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- Lady Elverton's Emeralds. By Dorothea Conyers. (Hutchinson. 6s.)
- The Strange Story of Rab Raby. By Maurus Jokai. (Jarrold. 6s.)
- The Holy Mountain. A Satire on Tendencies. By Stephen Reynolds. (Lane. 6s.)
- The Diverting Adventures of Maurin. By Jean Aicard. Translation by Alfred Allinson. (Lane. 6s.)
- Diana Dethroned. By W. M. Letts. (Lane. 6s.)
- The Works of Anatole France—
The White Stone. A Translation by C. E. Roche.
Jocasta and the Famished Cat. A Translation by Mrs. Farley.
Penguin Island. A Translation by A. W. Evans.
The Opinions of Jérôme Coignard. A Translation by Mrs. Wilfred S. Jackson. (Lane. 6s. each.)
- Special Messenger. By Robert W. Chambers. (Laurie. 6s.)

AUTUMN BOOKS AT THE BODLEY HEAD

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

By G. K. CHESTERTON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net
 "A fascinating study."—GEORGE BERNARD SHAW in the Nation.

THE ISLE OF MAN

By AGNES HERBERT. With 32 Colour Plates by DONALD MAXWELL. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net
 "This charming volume . . . written by one who knows the country intimately. The whole tone of the book is in the highest degree warm-hearted and communicative. . . . The book is a model of its kind, admirably written and delicately appreciative."—Daily Telegraph.

THE LAST JOURNALS OF HORACE WALPOLE

During the Reign of George III. from 1771 to 1783. With Notes by Dr. DORAN. Edited with an Introduction by A. FRANCIS STEUART, and containing numerous Portraits (2 in Photogravure) reproduced from Contemporary Pictures, Engravings, &c. 2 vols. uniform with "The Diary of a Lady-in-Waiting." Demy 8vo. 25s. net

THE SOUL OF A TURK

By Mrs. DE BUNSEN. With 8 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net

CARLYLE'S FIRST LOVE

Margaret Gordon, Lady Bannerman

By R. C. ARCHIBALD. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net

LAURUS NOBILIS:

Chapters on Art and Life

By VERNON LEE. Author of "Renaissance Fancies and Studies," &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net
 "She has written no better book."—Morning Post.

A BOOK OF SATYRS

By AUSTIN OSMAN SPARE. Large folio. 21s. net

THE ONE AND ALL RECITER

Serious, Humorous, and Dramatic Selections. Edited by MARSHALL STEELE, Editor of the "Encore Reciter." With 100 Selections. 2s. 6d. net

MADAME DE MAINTENON:

Her Life and Times, 1635-1719

By C. C. DYSON. With 1 Photogravure Plate and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MARIA EDGEWORTH AND HER CIRCLE IN THE DAYS OF BONAPARTE AND BOURBON

By CONSTANCE HILL, Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," "The House in St. Martin's Street," &c. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo. 21s. net

[Ready To-Day]

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO:

A Biographical Study

By EDWARD HUTTON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE

THACKERAY: A Biography

By LEWIS MELVILLE. With 2 Photogravures and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 25s. net

NEW POEMS

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. Crown 8vo. 5s. net
 [Just Out]

Dr. JOHNSON and Mrs. THRALE

By A. M. BROADLEY. With an Introductory Chapter by THOMAS SEECOMBE. With 24 Illustrations from rare Originals, including a Reproduction in Colours of the Fellowes Miniature of Mrs. Piozzi by Roche, and a Photogravure of Harding's Sepia Drawing of Dr. Johnson. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC

By ANATOLE FRANCE. A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 2 Photogravure Portraits, 6 Black-and-White Illustrations, and a Plan. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 25s. net

The DAYS of the DIRECTOIRE

By ALFRED ALLINSON, M.A. With 48 Full-page Illustrations, including many illustrating the Dress of the Time. Demy 8vo. 16s. net

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

By MAUDE M. HOLBACH. With 48 Illustrations by OTTO HOLBACH, and a Map. Uniform with "Dalmatia." Crown 8vo. 5s. net
 [Just Out]

LATER POEMS

By WILLIAM WATSON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net
 Also a Limited Edition on Japanese Vellum.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS

THE WAY THINGS HAPPEN

By HUGH DE SELINCOURT.

"The book has moments of grace and charm that few contemporary writers give us. Mr. de Selincourt has a great feeling for beauty, not only in externals, but also in character."—Morning Post.

"It stands out conspicuously in its sincerity, power, and literary qualities from amongst the hopeless procession of the season's novels."—Clarion.

THE EAGLE'S NEST

By ALLAN MCAULAY.

"A brilliant tour de force. The character of the young Bonaparte is deftly kept in tone with that of the Napoleon who was to be evolved from him. The love interest also is excellent and pathetic."—Athenaeum.

THE HOLY MOUNTAIN

By STEPHEN REYNOLDS.

"An extremely clever, spirited, and unfailingly entertaining work. . . . He is a writer to be reckoned with, vehement, thoughtful, quick in his perceptions, fertile in ideas."—Daily News.

THE ODD MAN:

An Odd and Budgetary Novel

By ARNOLD HOLCOMBE.

THE EARNED INCREMENT—What of that? The hero of this story owns an excellent site in a village which is on the upward grade. This piece of good fortune brings him a swarm of would-be buyers, landlords, builders, railway companies, who resent his freehold rights. The efforts to oust him create highly diverting comedy, and poetic justice is satisfied when we leave him more firmly established than ever in the home that is his.

"Mr. Holcombe is a new humorist. . . . The author writes so easily, so cheerfully, merrily, and even kindly. . . . This is a good book; it gives much pleasure."—Morning Leader.

TRIAL BY MARRIAGE: A Novel

By WILFRED SCARBOROUGH JACKSON, Author of "Nine Points of the Law."

PENGUIN ISLAND:

A Translation from the French of ANATOLE FRANCE. By A. W. EVANS. [Just Out.]

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK

Black Sheep. By Stanley Portal Hyatt. (Laurie. 6s.)
 Master John. By Shan F. Bullock. (Laurie. 6s.)
 A Legacy of the Granite Hills. By Bertram Mitford. (Long. 6s.)
 Rancher Cartaret. By Harold Bindloss. (Long. 6s.)
 Great Possessions. By Mrs. Wilfrid Ward. (Longmans. 6s.)
 The Blindness of the Reverend Dr. Gray; or, the Final Law. By the Very Rev. Canon P. A. Sheehan. (Longmans. 6s.)
 Actions and Reactions. By Rudyard Kipling. (Macmillan. 6s.)
 Robert Emmet. A Historical Romance. By Stephen Gwynn. (Macmillan. 6s.)
 The Education of Uncle Paul. By Algernon Blackwood. (Macmillan.)
 The Human Cobweb. A Story of Old Peking. By B. L. Putnam Weale. (Macmillan. 6s.)
 Open Country. A Comedy with a Sting. By Maurice Hewlett. (Macmillan. 6s.)
 The Wood Carver of 'Lympus. By Mary E. Waller. (Melrose. 6s.)
 The Tyrant. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture. (Methuen. 6s.)
 Northern Lights. By Sir Gilbert Parker. (Methuen. 6s.)
 The Search Party. By G. A. Birmingham. (Methuen. 6s.)
 Splendid Brother. By W. Pett Ridge. (Methuen. 6s.)
 Avenging Children. By Mary E. Mann. (Methuen. 6s.)
 The Castle by the Sea. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Methuen. 6s.)
 The Price of Lis Doris. By Maarten Maartens. (Methuen. 6s.)
 Happiness. By Maud Stepney Rawson. (Methuen. 6s.)
 The Prodigal Father. By J. Storer Clouston. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)
 Harm's Way. By Lloyd Osbourne. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)
 Arsène Lupin. By Edgar Jepson and Maurice Leblanc. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)
 Draw in Your Stool. By Oliver Onions. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)
 My Lady Wentworth. By Allan Fea. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)
 Orpheus in Mayfair. By the Hon. Maurice Baring. (Mills & Boon. 6s.)
 Diamond Cut Paste. By Agnes and Egerton Castle. (Murray. 6s.)
 With the Merry Austrians. By Amy McLaren. (Murray. 6s.)
 The Valley of the Kings. By Marmaduke Pickthall. (Murray. 6s.)
 The Florentine Frame. By Elizabeth Robins. (Murray. 6s.)
 The Haven. By Eden Phillpotts. (Murray. 6s.)
 The Wheatstack. By J. S. Fletcher. (Nash. 6s.)
 Chetwynd's Career. By Horace Wyndham. (Nash. 6s.)
 On the Branch. By Pierre de Coulevain. (Nash. 6s.)
 The Food of Love. By Frankfort Moore. (Nash. 6s.)
 The Rose of Dauphiny. By Philip L. Stevenson. (Stanley Paul. 6s.)
 The Ghost Pirates. By William H. Hodgson. (Stanley Paul. 6s.)
 Tropical Tales. By Dolf Wyllarde. (Stanley Paul. 6s.)
 Pretty Barbara. By Anthony Dyllington. (Stanley Paul. 6s.)
 The Glory of the Conquered. By Susan Glaspell. (Pitman. 6s.)
 Anne of Avonlea. By L. M. Montgomery. (Pitman. 6s.)
 The Wiving of Lance Cleaverage. By Alice MacGowan. (Putnam. 6s.)
 Old Rose and Silver. By Myrtle Reed. (Putnam. 6s.)
 The Prince of Destiny. By Sarath Kumar Ghosh. (Rebman.)
 The Men of the Mountain. By S. R. Crockett. (Religious Tract Society. 6s.)
 The Limit. By Ada Levenson. (Richards. 6s.)
 Arsène Lupin versus Holmlock Shears. By Maurice Leblanc. Translated by A. T. de Mattos. (Richards. 6s.)
 The Upper Hand. By Mrs. Frederick Dawson. (Richards. 6s.)
 The Adventures of a Nice Young Man. (Richards. 6s.)
 Granite. By John Trevena. (Rivers. 6s.)
 The Lonely Lovers. By Horace W. C. Newte. (Rivers. 6s.)
 The Sinking Ship. By Eva Lathbury. (Rivers. 6s.)

The Anne Queen's Chronicle. By Reginald J. Farrer. (Rivers. 6s.)
 Her Mother's Daughter. By Katharine Tynan. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
 Corporal Sam, and Other Stories. By A. T. Quiller-Couch. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
 Mr. Justice Raffles. By E. W. Hornung. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
 The Paladin. By Horace A. Vachell. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
 The Caravaners. By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
 Ann Veronica. By H. G. Wells. (Unwin. 6s.)
 Cut Off from the World. By Frank T. Bullen. (Unwin. 6s.)
 Jenny Peters. By C. H. Dudley Ward. (Unwin. 6s.)
 Two Women. By Baroness d'Anethan. (Unwin. 6s.)
 An Imperial Marriage. By A. W. Marchmont. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)
 A Woman Against the World. By L. G. Moberly. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)
 Deep Waters. By Marie Connor Leighton. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

HISTORY.

County Memorial Series—
 Memorials of Old Sussex.
 Memorials of Old Staffordshire.
 Memorials of Old Yorkshire. (Allen. 15s. net. each.)
 Britannia's Calendar of Heroes. By Kate Stanway. (Allen. 5s. net.)
 A Century of Empire, 1801-1900. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. In 3 vols. Vol I., from 1801 to 1832. (Arnold. 14s. net.)
 A History of the London Hospital. By E. W. Morris. Arnold. 6s. net.)
 Turkey in Transition. By G. F. Abbott. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)
 Eton. Painted by E. D. Brinton. Described by Christopher Stone. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
 London in the Nineteenth Century. By Sir Walter Besant. (Black. 30s. net.)
 Studies in the Teaching of History. By M. W. Keatinge. (Black. 4s. 6d. net.)
 The Life and Times of Akhnaton, Pharaoh of Egypt. By Arthur E. P. Weigall. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Passing of the Shereefian Empire. By E. Ashmead-Bartlett. (Blackwood. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Cambridge Modern History—
 Vol. VI. The Eighteenth Century.
 Vol. XII. The Latest Age. (Cambridge University Press.)
 The Story of the Roman Republic. By W. E. Heitland. (Cambridge University Press. 3 vols.)
 Saint Theresa. The History of her Foundations. Translated from the Spanish by Sister Agnes Mason. (Cambridge University Press.)
 History of Scotland. By P. Hume Brown. Vol. III. (completing the History). From the Revolution of 1689 to the Disruption, 1843. (Cambridge University Press.)
 Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral. By William Macdonald Sinclair. (Chapman & Hall. 16s. net.)
 French Vignettes. A Series of Dramatic Episodes, 1787-1871. By M. Betham-Edwards. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)
 A History of St. Paul's School. By Michael F. J. McDonnell. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)
 South Africa, From the Great Trek to the Union. By Frank R. Cana. (Chapman & Hall. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Smugglers: Picturesque Chapters in the History of an Ancient Industry. By Charles G. Harper. (Chapman & Hall. 21s. net.)
 Siena: The Story of a Mediæval Commune. By Ferdinand Schevill. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)
 Venice in the Eighteenth Century. By Philippe Monnier. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
 A History of Babylonia and Assyria, from the Earliest Times until the Persian Conquest. By Leonard W. King. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus. 18s. net per vol.)

AUTUMN BOOKS 1909

A Selection from CHAPMAN & HALL'S LIST

ARCHDEACON SINCLAIR

Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral

By WILLIAM MACDONALD SINCLAIR, D.D., Archdeacon of London, Canon of St. Paul's, and Hon. Chaplain to the King.

With numerous Illustrations by LOUIS WEIRTER, R.B.A., Plans, Diagrams, and other Pictures.
Demy 8vo. 16s. net. [Ready.]

FRANCIS GRIBBLE

Chateaubriand and His Court of Women

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE, Author of "Madame de Staël and Her Lovers," "George Sand and Her Lovers," "Rousseau and the Women he Loved," &c., &c.

With 6 Photogravure Plates.

Demy 8vo. 15s. net. [Ready.]

M. BETHAM-EDWARDS

French Vignettes

By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS, Officier de l'Instruction Publique de France.

With 12 Portraits reproduced by special permission.

Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM

The Organ and its Position in Musical Art

A Book for Musicians and Amateurs.

By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM, Author of "My Thoughts On Music and Musicians," &c.

Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

THE TOPICAL PICKWICK

The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club

By CHARLES DICKENS.

With all the original Illustrations and about 250 additional Pictures of originals of characters and places, scenes and incidents, curious and topical allusions, references and analogies reproduced from contemporary prints and pictures, collected and annotated by C. VAN NOORDEN.

Together with the original announcement of the work, dedication of the original edition, prefaces, addresses and suppressed note, &c., reprinted from the "Victoria" Edition, with the notes by CHARLES PLUMPTRE JOHNSON.

2 Volumes. Royal 8vo. 21s. net. [October.]

MICHAEL F. J. McDONNELL

A History of St. Paul's School

By MICHAEL F. J. McDONNELL, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, sometime Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge

With 48 Portraits and other Illustrations.

Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [October.]

FRANK R. CANA

South Africa

From the Great Trek to the Union.

By FRANK R. CANA. With Maps.

Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Next Week.]

FERDINAND SCHEVILL

Siena

The Story of a Mediæval Commune.

By FERDINAND SCHEVILL. With numerous Illustrations and Maps.

Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

C. W. FURLONG, F.R.G.S.

The Gateway to the Sahara

Observations and Experiences in Tripoli.

By C. W. FURLONG, F.R.G.S.

With Illustrations and Paintings in Colour, Drawings in Black and White, and Photographs by the Author.

Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

MAX BEERBOHM

Yet Again

A Volume of Essays.

By MAX BEERBOHM, Author of "More," "The Happy Hypocrite," &c.

Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [Next Week.]

A HANDSOME CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOK

Christmas Books by Charles Dickens

With 12 Plates and 54 Wood-cut Illustrations by D. MACLISE, R.A., JOHN LEECH, Sir JOHN TENNIEL, CLARKSON STANFIELD, R.A., RICHARD DOYLE, Sir EDWIN LANDSEER, R.A. Bound with a special decorative cover design and olive edges.

Large Crown 8vo. 5s.

RICHARD G. HATTON

The Craftsman's Plant-Book

Or, Figures of Plants selected from the Old Herbals

With numerous Illustrations in Colour and Black and White. Arranged with Notes and Additional Drawings, and an Essay on the Use of Plants in Decorative Design.

By RICHARD G. HATTON, Hon. A.R.C.A. (Lond.)

Demy 8vo.

RICHARD LUNN

Pottery

A Practical Handbook for Art Teachers and Students.

By RICHARD LUNN, Teacher at the Royal College of Art, South Kensington.

Volume II.—Pottery Decoration.

With about 50 Illustrations.

Demy 8vo.

Eleventh Edition Now Ready.

WILFRID J. LINEHAM

Text Book of Mechanical Engineering

By WILFRID J. LINEHAM, B.Sc. in Eng., M.Inst.C.E., M.I.Mech.E., M.I.E.E.,

Head of the Engineering Department at the Goldsmiths' College of the London University, New Cross; and Past-President of the Association of Teachers in Technical Institutions.

1,244 pages; 1,063 Illustrations; and 19 Folding Plates.

Large Crown 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Postage, 6d. inland; 1s. 2d. abroad.

NEW NOVELS

ARNOLD BENNETT

The Glimpse: An Adventure of the Soul.

By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Old Wives' Tale," &c.

Crown 8vo. 6s. [October.]

RIDGWELL CULLUM

The Sheriff of Dyke Hole:

The Story of a Legacy.

By RIDGWELL CULLUM, Author of "The Watchers of the Plains," &c.

Crown 8vo. 6s. [Ready.]

SIDNEY PICKERING

Paths Perilous

By SIDNEY PICKERING, Author of "Verity," &c.

Crown 8vo. 6s. [Ready.]

ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW

Testimony

By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW, Authors of "The Shulamite," &c.

Crown 8vo. 6s. [Ready.]

C. A. DAWSON SCOTT

The Agony Column

By C. A. DAWSON SCOTT, Author of "The Burden," "Treasure Trove."

[October.]

VINCENT BROWN

The Screen

By VINCENT BROWN, Author of "Magnificat," "The Fashionable Christians," "A Magdalen's Husband."

[Ready.]

LONDON: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

- Hogarth's London. By H. B. Wheatley. (Constable. 21s. net.)
- The London Life of Yesterday. By Arthur Compton-Rickett. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The New Europe, 1789-1889. By Reginald W. Jeffrey. (Constable.)
- The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters. (By F. A. Mumby. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Mysore and Coorg: From the Inscriptions. By B. Lewis Rice. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Mediæval Town Series. Padua. By C. Foligno. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
- The Grocery Trade: Its History and Romance. By J. Aubrey Rees. 2 vols. (Duckworth. £1 1s. net.)
- The Merry Past. By Ralph Nevill. (Duckworth. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Decisive Battles of America. By Ripley Hitchcock. (Harper.)
- The Return of Louis XVIII., 1814-15. By Gilbert Stenger. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
- The Tribunal of the Terror: A Study of Paris in 1793-95. By G. Lenôtre. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
- The Great French Revolution—1789-1793. By P. A. Kropotkin. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)
- The Reformation in Scotland. By D. Hay Fleming. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Privateers and Privateering. By Edward P. Statham. (Hutchinson.)
- Romance of Empire Series—
South Africa. By Ian D. Colvin. Illustrated by G. S. Smithard and J. R. Skelton. (Jack.)
- Romance of History Series—
Mexico. By Margaret Coxhead. Illustrated by T. Heath Robinson. (Jack.)
- The Days of the Directoire. By Alfred Allinson. (Lane. 16s. net.)
- Love Intrigues of Royal Courts. By Thornton Hall. (Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Historical Letters and Memoirs of Scottish Catholics, 1625-1793. By the Rev. W. Forbes Leith. (Longmans. 2 vols.)
- The Last Years of the Protectorate. By C. H. Firth. (Longmans. 2 vols.)
- A History of Malta, during the Period of the French and British Occupation, 1798-1815. By the late William Hardman. Edited by J. Holland Rose. (Longmans.)
- Lectures on the French Revolution. By the late Lord Acton. (Macmillan.)
- A History of the British Army. By the Hon. John W. Fortescue. Vols. V. and VI. (Macmillan.)
- A History of the English Church. Vols. VIII. and IX. The English Church in the Nineteenth Century. By F. Warre Cornish. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. each.)
- Early Church History (to A.D. 313). By Henry Melvill Gwatkin. 2 vols. (Macmillan.)
- The Two Empires: The Church and the World. By Brooke F. Westcott. (Macmillan.)
- Historical Essays. By James Ford Rhodes. (Macmillan.)
- The Roman Assemblies. By George W. Botsford. (Macmillan.)
- A Century of Spain and Portugal. By Lieut.-Col. George F. White. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- England Before the Conquest. By Professor C. W. C. Oman. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Decay of the Church of Rome. By Joseph McCabe. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Pilgrim Fathers, Their Church and Colony. By Winifred Cockshott. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Mediæval Church and the Papacy (A.D. 1135-1485). By A. C. Jennings. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Reformation Period. By Henry Gee. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Mediæval Hospitals of England. By Rotha Mary Clay. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Old Etruria and Modern Tuscany. By Mary Lovett Cameron. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A Constitutional History of England. By A. M. Chambers. (Methuen. 6s.)
- The Dawn of Mediæval Europe, 476-918. By J. H. B. Masterman. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
- The Central Period of the Middle Age, 918-1273. By Beatrice A. Lees. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)
- A Short History of the Chief Campaigns in Europe since 1792. By General A. von Horsetzky. Translated by Lieut. K. B. Ferguson. (Murray.)
- The Price of Blood. By Capt. Wladimir Semenov. Translated by Leonard J. Lewery. (Murray.)
- The Navy of Venice. By Madame Wiel. (Murray.)
- The Medici. By Col. G. F. Young. (Murray. 2 vols.)
- In the Days of the Georges. By W. B. Boulton. (Nash. 15s. net.)
- Peerage and Pedigree. By J. H. Round. (Nisbet. 25s. net. 2 vols.)
- Scotland's Work and Worth. By Charles W. Thomson. In 14 parts. (Oliphant, Anderson. 7d. net each.)
- Tudor and Stuart Proclamations, 1485-1714. Calendared and described by Robert Steele, under the direction of the Earl of Crawford. 2 vols. Vol. I.—England. Vol. II.—Scotland and Ireland. (Oxford University Press.)
- Oxford Studies in Social and Legal History—
Vol. I.—English Monasteries on the Eve of the Dissolution. By P. Savine.
Vol. II.—Patronage in the Later Empire. By F. de Zulueta.
(Oxford University Press.)
- Historical Evidence. By H. B. George. (Oxford University Press.)
- Historical Essays by the Late Henry Francis Pelham. With Introduction by F. Haverfield. (Oxford University Press.)
- Court Minutes of the East India Company. Vol. II. (1640-1643.) By E. B. Sainsbury. (Oxford University Press.)
- The Nuns of Port Royal. By M. E. Lowndes. (Oxford University Press.)
- Bologna: Its History, Antiquities, and Art. By Edith E. Coulson James. (Oxford University Press.)
- The History and Antiquities of the Parish of Darlington. By W. Hylton Dyer Longstaffe. (Kegan Paul. 15s. net.)
- History of the German People. By Johannes Janssen. Translated by A. M. Christie. Vols. 13 and 14. (Kegan Paul. £1 5s.)
- Language and Character of the Roman People. By Oscar Weise. Translated by H. A. Strong and A. Y. Campbell. (Kegan Paul. 6s. net.)
- Intimate Society Letters of the 18th Century. By His Grace the Duke of Argyll. 2 vols. (Stanley Paul. 24s. net.)
- The Dauphines of France. By Frank Hamel. (Stanley Paul. 16s. net.)
- The Conquest of the Isthmus. By Hugh C. Weir. (Putnam.)
- The Rise of the Mediæval Church. By Alexander Clarence Flick. (Putnam.)
- What Have the Greeks Done for Modern Civilisation? By Professor John Pentland Mahaffy. (Putnam. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A History of Christianity in Japan. By Otis Cary. (Revell. 15s. net. 2 vols.)
- The Bourbon Restoration. By Major John Hall. (Rivers. 21s. net.)
- Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire. Authorised Translation of the Sittengeschichte Roms of Dr. Friedländer. By J. H. Freese. Vol. III. (Routledge. 6s.)
- Family Names and Their Story. By S. Baring-Gould. (Seeley. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Story of the Thames. By J. E. Vincent. (Smith, Elder.)
- The History of the Tories. Vol. II. By C. B. Roylance Kent. (Smith, Elder. 12s. 6d. net.)
- George I. and the Northern War. By James F. Chance. (Smith, Elder. 14s. net.)
- San Celestino: An Essay in Reconstruction. By John Ayscough. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)
- Fifty Years of New Japan. Compiled by Count Shigenobu Okuma, and Others. (Smith, Elder. 2 vols. 25s. net.)
- The Windsor College Records. Arranged by the Rev. Canon Dalton. (Sonnenschein.)
- The Growth of Nations. By W. Rose Smith. (Sonnenschein.)

George Allen and Sons' New Books.

An Absolutely Unique Book on China.

CHINA: its Marvel and Mystery.

By T. HODGSON LIDDELL. [Nearly Ready.

Crown 4to, cloth, gilt top, 21s. net. 40 Full-page Illustrations in Colour, by the Author.

A number of the scenes here painted and described by the Author are quite new, as he had a special permit giving access to parts of the Imperial Palace never before entered by a European.

IRISH WAYS. By JANE BARLOW.

[Nearly Ready.

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 15s. net. 16 Full-page Illustrations in Colour by WARWICK GOBLE, and 15 Chapter Headings in Black-and-White.

Appeals to all interested in the life and character of Ireland. It takes the reader into the homes and hearths of a peasantry sociable, pleasure-loving, and witty.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY LEWIS BEQUEST.

By MAURICE W. BROCKWELL.

[Ready To-day.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net. With 32 Full-page Illustrations from the Original Pictures.

Tells in no small degree the story of the National Gallery, a special feature being a series of tables showing the relative importance of the National Gallery to all leading Public Galleries and Private Collections in the World.

BRITANNIA'S CALENDAR OF HEROES. By KATE STANWAY.

Accounts of Heroic Acts, covering a period extending over the last seventy years.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt, 5s. net. Nearly Ready.

With Portraits and Facsimiles of about 200 Autographs and Reproductions of Orders and Decorations.

NEW VOLUMES.

COUNTY MEMORIAL SERIES.

Demy 8vo, 300 pp., about 35 Plates each, and numerous Text Illustrations, cloth extra, gilt top, 15s. net each.

MEMORIALS OF OLD SUSSEX.

Edited by PERCY D. MUNDY.

CHIEF CONTENTS: Celtic Antiquities—Saxon Architecture—Monastic Remains—Historic Houses—Cottage Architecture—and an article on the Individuality of Sussex by HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P.

MEMORIALS OF OLD YORKSHIRE.

Edited by T. M. FALLOW, M.A., F.S.A.

[In the Press.

CHIEF CONTENTS: Prehistoric and Roman Yorks—Folk-lore—Isurium—Forest of Ouse and Derwent—Norman Doorways—Battle of Dettinger—York—Beverley and its Minster, &c., &c.

MEMORIALS OF OLD STAFFORDSHIRE

Edited by Rev. W. BERESFORD. [In the Press.

CHIEF CONTENTS: Families and Castles—Lichfield Cathedral—Forests—Towers and Spires—Historic Chartley—Boscobel and White-ladies—Pottery—Charles Cotton—Moorlanders, &c.

LOUIS WAIN'S ANNUAL.

Crown 4to, 1s. net.

[Next week

Contains Stories by well-known Authors, including Lady Milnes-Gaskell, Helen Mathers, John Strange Winter, Lady Ewart, Lady Bancroft, J. Hall Richardson, Elizabeth Banks, &c., &c., and over 100 Illustrations in Black-and-White and 8 Full-page Plates in Colours.

The PUBLICATIONS of Messrs. BEMROSE & SONS, are NOW issued solely by

Messrs. GEORGE ALLEN & SONS, who have Removed to 44-45, Rathbone Place, Oxford St., LONDON.

William Blackwood & Sons' Autumn Announcements, 1909.

A NOTABLE LIST.

TRAVELS IN THE UPPER EGYPTIAN DESERTS.

By ARTHUR E. P. WEIGALL, Chief Inspector of the Department of Antiquities, Upper Egypt. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

[Ready.

Five thousand years ago the Upper Egyptian Deserts were the scene of great activities. Mr. Weigall describes, in a manner far from official, the secrets he has unearthed from the sands, and the history of the Greek, Roman, and Byzantine antiquities, of which there is still plentiful and intimate evidence. Here and there may be found blocks of stone numbered and addressed to this or that Roman Emperor. He discusses also the vexed question of the site of Ophir and King Solomon's Mines. A most interesting book.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF AKHNATON, Pharaoh of Egypt.

By ARTHUR E. P. WEIGALL. 10s. 6d. net.

Akhnaton was the founder of "the New Theology" in Egypt, and the story of his life should therefore be of especial interest at the present day.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S FRIENDS.

By FLORENCE MACCUNN, Author of "Mary Stuart." With Portraits. 10s. net.

A book of the greatest interest to all lovers of the Great Magician. It contains chapters on Old Ladies of Sir Walter's Youth—Parliament House Friends—Makers of the Minstrelsy—Buccluch Group—Literary Ladies—Abbotsford Household—Scott's Relation to other Poets. [October 12th.

LADY WAKE'S REMINISCENCES.

Edited by LUCY WAKE. Illustrated with Portrait. 12s. 6d. net.

Like Archbishop Tait and her other brother, Sheriff Tait, Lady Wake possessed force of character and intellectual ability, and to the end of her long life she preserved her great interest in the world around her. Of her young days she retained the liveliest recollection, and in her "Reminiscences" she gives a very graphic and amusing and often touching account of life in Scotland in the beginning of the nineteenth century. During the Revolution of 1830 she was close to Paris, and her recollections of these days are particularly vivid. [October 12th.

THE PASSING OF THE SHEREFFIAN EMPIRE.

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Author of "The Siege and Capitulation of Port Arthur," &c. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett knows Morocco well, having been special correspondent in that country in 1907 and 1908, when he had interviews with both Abdul Aziz and Moulay el Hafid. Readers of his other books will know with what vividness and interest Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett can write of those events with which he has become familiar.

THE LETTERS OF JOHN STUART BLACKIE TO HIS WIFE. With a Few Earlier Ones to his Parents.

Selected and Edited by his Nephew, A. STODART WALKER. 12s. 6d. net.

This year is the centenary of the birth of one of the most picturesque personalities that Scotland has produced, and in these Letters may be found the secret of Professor Blackie's amiable characteristics, the story of his love for all things Celtic, and his fellowship with the greatest scholars and notable men of his day. Among these last were HUXLEY, TYNDALL, CARLYLE, RUSKIN, BROWNING, TENNYSON, BISMARCK, MANNING, NEWMAN, IRVING, and GLADSTONE.

THE WORK AND PLAY OF A GOVERNMENT INSPECTOR.

By HERBERT PRESTON-THOMAS, C.B. With a Preface by the Right Hon. JOHN BURNS, M.P. 10s. 6d. net.

It may safely be said that no one has a better opportunity for a wide observation of life than a Government Inspector. Mr. Preston-Thomas, late Local Government Board Inspector for the South-Western District, has collected in a book many varied experiences and humorous situations, which he has lit up by wise counsel and a good understanding.

A HISTORY OF MEDIAEVAL POLITICAL THEORY IN THE WEST.

By R. W. CARLYLE, C.I.E., Balliol College, Oxford; and A. J. CARLYLE, M.A., Chaplain and Lecturer (late Fellow) of University College, Oxford. Vol. II. 15s. net.

THE ENCHANTED ISLAND: and other Poems.

By ALFRED NOYES, Author of "Drake: an English Epic," "Forty Singing Seamen," "The Forest of Wild Thyme," &c. 5s. net.

HECTOR AND ACHILLES: a Tale of Troy.

Rendered into English after the Chronicle of Homer. By RICHARD SHEEPSHANKS, of the Indian Civil Service, sometime Senior Classical Scholar, St. John's College, Cambridge; and Bell Scholar, Cambridge University. Illustrated by J. FINNEMORE.

ROUND ABOUT INDIA.

By EDMUND CANDLER, Author of "The Unveiling of Lhasa," "A Vagabond in Asia." Illustrated. 6s. net.

Messrs. Blackwood have an interesting list of Fiction, and Novels that will be found well worth reading are the following:

Price 6s. each.

THE PATH TO HONOUR By SYDNEY C. GRIER, Author of "The Warden of the Marches," &c.

A MAN'S MAN By IAN HAY,

Author of "The Right Stuff," &c.

BLACK MARK By "A WHISPER,"

A brilliant New Author.

THE BACKGROUND By W. J. ECCOTT,

Author of "His Indolence of Arras," &c.

SOME EVERYDAY FOLK AND DAWN

By MILES FRANKLIN,

Author of "My Brilliant Career."

AND IMMEDIATELY—

CANDLES IN THE WIND By MAUD DIVER,

Author of "Captain Desmond, V.C.," &c.

W. BLACKWOOD and SONS, Edinburgh and London.

- History and Ethnography of South Africa, 1505-1795—
 Vol. II.—Formation of the Cape Colony by the Dutch.
 Vol. III.—Account of the Dutch, Portuguese, Hottentots, and Bantu. By Dr. G. M. Theal. (Sonnenschein.)
 Special Campaign Series—
 The Ulm Campaign, 1800. By Col. F. N. Maude.
 The Shenandoah Valley Campaign, 1861-1862.
 By Major Redway. (Sonnenschein.)
 The Wars of Religion in France: The Huguenots, Catherine, de Medici, and Philip the Second, 1559-76. By James Westfall Thompson. (Unwin. £1 1s. net.)
 Men and Maners of Old Florence. By Guido Biagi. (Unwin.
 15s. net.)
 A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. Part II. By J. J.
 Jusserand. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
 The Birth of Modern Italy. The Posthumous Papers of Jessie White Mario. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Irish Ways. By Jane Barlow. (Allen. 15s. net.)
 Egyptian Birds. By Charles Whymper. (Black. 20s. net.)
 From Sketch-Book and Diary. By Lady Elizabeth Butler.
 (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Art of Theatrical Make-up. By Cavendish Morton.
 (Black. About 5s. net.)
 Stokes' Cyclopædia of Music and Musicians. By L. J. de Bekker. (Chambers. About 6s. net.)
 The Organ and Its Position in Musical Art. By H. Heathcote Statham. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Powder-Puff: A Ladies' Breviary. By Franz Blei.
 (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d.)
 The Bargain Book. By Charles Edward Jerningham.
 (Chatto & Windus. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Choosing a Vocation. By Frank Parsons. (Gay & Hancock. 4s. 6d. net.)
 Myths and Legends of the Middle Ages. By H. A. Guerber.
 (Harrap. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Round of the Clock. By Claudius Clear. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)
 Women as Letter Writers. Edited by Ada M. Ingpen.
 (Hutchinson. 5s. net.)
 The Book of Friendship. Arranged by Arthur Ransome.
 (Jack. 6s. net.)
 My Friends the French. By Robert Harborough Sherard.
 (Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
 The Nightside of Paris. By E. B. d'Auvergne. (Laurie.
 12s. 6d. net.)
 My Summer in London. By James Milne. (Laurie. 6s.
 net.)
 Chronicles of Pharmacy. By A. C. Wootton. (Macmillan.)
 Light Come, Light Go. Gaming—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By Ralph Nevill. (Macmillan.)
 The Rhythm of Modern Music. By C. F. Abdy-Williams.
 (Macmillan.)
 Maxims of Marmaduke. By Charles Edward Jerningham.
 (Methuen. 5s.)
 Town Planning: Past, Present, and Possible. By H. Inigo
 Triggs. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
 The Complete Aeronaut. By H. Massac Buist. (Methuen.
 12s. 6d. net.)
 The Young Carpenter. By Cyril Hall. (Methuen. 5s.)
 Home Life in Ireland. By Robert Lynd. (Mills & Boon.
 8s. net.)
 Auction Bridge. By Archibald Dunn. (Mills & Boon. 5s.
 net.)
 Pure Folly. By "The Follies." (Mills & Boon. 2s. 6d. net.)
 On the Forgotten Road. A Chronicle of the Crusade of Children, which happened in the year 1212. By Henry Baerlein. (Murray. 6s.)
 Some Haunted Houses of London. By Elliott O'Donnell.
 (Nash. 2s. 6d. net.)
 Standard Concert Repertory. By George P. Upton. (Stanley
 Paul. 5s. net.)
 Chess Openings: Ancient and Modern. By E. Freeborough.
 (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d. net.)

- Practical Library Administration. By W. S. C. Rae.
 (Routledge. 2s. 6d.)
 The Scott Dictionary. By M. F. Husband. (Routledge.
 About 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Unmasking of Robert Houdin: Including a History of Magic, and a New Treatise entitled Handcuff Secrets.
 By Harry Houdini. (Routledge. 5s.)
 Sailing Ships: The Story of their Development from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By E. Keble
 Chatterton. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 16s. net.)
 Modern Journalism: A Practical Guide for Beginners.
 (Sidgwick & Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.)
 The Second Problems Book. Edited by N. G. Royde Smith.
 (Sidgwick & Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.)
 The Book of Flowers. By Mrs. Hinkson and Miss Fuller
 Maitland. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)
 Sketches and Snapshots. By the Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell.
 (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
 London at Prayer. By Charles Morley. (Smith, Elder.
 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Cat: In History, Legend, and Art. By Anne Marks.
 (Stock. 6s. net.)
 Inns, Ales, and Drinking Customs of Old England. By F. W. Hackwood. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Town Planning in Practice. By Raymond Unwin. (Unwin.
 £1 1s. net.)
 London Library Subject Catalogue. (Williams & Norgate.
 About 31s. 6d. net.)

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

- Masters of Literature—
 Scott. By Professor A. J. Grant.
 Fielding. By Prof. Saintsbury.
 Carlyle. By A. W. Evans.
 Defoe. By John Masefield.
 Thackeray. By G. K. Chesterton.
 Dickens. By Thomas Seecombe.
 (Bell. 3s. 6d. net each.)
 The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift. Edited by F.
 Elrington Ball. Vol. I. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Poems of Jonathan Swift. Edited by W. Ernst Browning. (Bell. 2 vols. 5s. each.)
 Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. Translated by Edward Fitzgerald. Edited by Reynold Alleyne Nicholson. (Black.
 7s. 6d. net.)
 Montaigne and Shakespeare, and Other Essays on Cognate
 Subjects. By John M. Robertson. (Black. 7s. 6d. net, Cambridge English Classics—
 Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher. Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by Arnold Glover and A. R.
 Waller. Vol. VII. (Cambridge University Press.)
 George Gascoigne. Works. Edited by J. W. Cunliffe.
 Vol. II. (Cambridge University Press.)
 The Journal of George Fox, reprinted verbatim for the first time from the original manuscript. Edited by Norman Penney. Introduction by T. E. Harvey. (Cambridge University Press.)
 Cassell's Little Classics. The First 25 vols. (Cassell. 7d.
 net each vol.)
 The Earth's Beginning. By Sir Robert S. Ball. (Cassell.
 7s. 6d.)
 Christmas Books. By Charles Dickens. Illustrations by
 D. Maclise, John Leech, Sir John Tenniel, Clarkson
 Stanfield, Richard Doyle, and Sir Edwin Landseer.
 (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)
 The Master of Game: the Oldest Book on Hunting. By Edward, Second Duke of York. (Chatto & Windus.
 7s. 6d. net.)
 St. Martin's Illustrated Library—
 The Cloister and the Hearth. By Charles Reade.
 (Chatto & Windus. 12s. 6d.)
 The Confessions of Saint Augustine. Translated by Dr.
 E. B. Pusey. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
 Dramatis Personæ; and Dramatic Romances and Lyrics. By Robert Browning. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)
 The Florence Press Books—
 The Fioretti or Little Flowers of S. Francis. Translated by T. W. Arnold. (Chatto & Windus. 30s. net.)

DUCKWORTH & CO.'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A SELECTION.

Life, Sport and Pleasure.

The Merry Past. By RALPH NEVILL, part Author of "Piccadilly to Pall Mall." With a Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Just Published]

A racy volume of anecdotes, abounding in quips and stories of town and country life.

London. A Portfolio of 20 Photogravures. By ALVIN LANGDON COBURN. With an introduction by HILARE BELLOC, M.P. 25s. net.

The Grocery Trade: Its History and Romance. By J. AUBREY REES, M.J.I., Secretary of Institute of the Certificated Grocers. In 2 vols., with a number of Illustrations. Demy 8vo, £1 1s. net.

A History of Aquatint Engraving. By S. T. PRIDEAUX. Illustrated with Reproductions by the Collotype process and numerous Half-Tone Plates. Royal 8vo, 15s. net.

The Hills and the Vale. Collected Essays. By RICHARD JEFFERIES. With an Introduction by EDWARD THOMAS. Author of "The Life of Richard Jefferies." Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE LIBRARY OF ART. New Volumes.
"THE EXCELLENT 'RED SERIES.'"—Times.

Six Greek Sculptors. (Myron, Pheidios, Polykleitos, Skopas, Praxites, and Lysippos.) By ERNEST GARDNER. With 80 Half-Tone Illustrations. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

The Lives of the British Architects. By E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR. With 45 Illustrations. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

Auguste Rodin. By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR. With very many Illustrations and Photogravures Frontispiece. A new and cheaper edition. Small 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

Science and Religion in Contemporary Philosophy. By PROF. E. BOUTROUX. Translated by JONATHAN NIELD. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

The Unfinished Symphony: Or, Eternal Life Begun. By the Rev. HUGH FALCONER, B.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Three Plays. By Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD.

HAMILTON'S SECOND MARRIAGE.
THOMAS AND THE PRINCESS. THE MODERN WAY.
Uniform with Plays by JOHN GALSWORTHY. Square post 8vo, 6s.

Beggars. By W. H. DAVIES, Author of "The Autobiography of a Super Tramp." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A book about beggars and their characteristics, West and East. It contains a great many personal experiences, and is worth reading."—The Times.

"Abounds in good stories and reflections. One mingles with strange company under Mr. Davies's guidance."—Birmingham Post.

Wrack. A Tale of the Sea. By MAURICE DRAKE. 6s.

The Trader. By CECIL ROSS JOHNSON. 6s.

"The Heart of a Woman."

Margaret Hever. A Novel. By ELIZABETH MARTINDALE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The subject of Margaret Hever is the struggle in a girl's nature when invaded and hypnotised by the passion of a man whom she fears and strives to repulse."—The Nation.

DUCKWORTH & CO., Covent Garden, London, W.C.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S New Books.

MEMOIRS OF THE DUCHESS DE DINO, 1831-1835.

Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

"Niece of Prince Talleyrand and hostess for him when he was French Ambassador in London, she played an important part in the social and political life of the early 'thirties. She knew everybody worth knowing on the Continent and in England, including Napoleon, Queen Louise of Prussia, the leading figures of the Emigration at the Court of Memel, and Louis Philippe. There are amusing anecdotes of d'Orsay and of Lord Brougham, and vivid impressions of the great houses of the period and their owners, while the whole is interspersed with comments, no doubt inspired by Talleyrand himself, on contemporary politics and literature."

THE RETURN OF LOUIS XVIII., 1814-15.

By GILBERT STENGER. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

THE LIFE & LETTERS OF JAMES WOLFE

By BECKLES WILLSON. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 18s. net.

THE CONQUEST OF THE AIR

By ALPHONSE BERGET.

Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

CATHEDRAL CITIES OF SPAIN

By W. W. COLLINS, R.I.

With 60 Water-Colour Drawings by the Author.
Demy 8vo, 16s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

Illustrated in Colour & Black-and-White by ARTHUR RACKHAM.
Crown 4to, 15s. net. [Next Week.]

ART IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

By Sir WALTER ARMSTRONG.

With 4 Coloured Plates and over 600 Half-tone Illustrations, limp cloth, 6s. net.

THE POETRY OF NATURE.

Selected by Dr. HENRY VAN DYKE.

Illustrated with Photographs from Nature, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

HEINEMANN'S LIBRARY OF MODERN FICTION.

In 2 vols., 4s. net.

BELLA DONNA.

By ROBERT HICHENS. [Wednesday.]

THE WHITE PROPHET.

By HALL CAINE.

In 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE STREET OF ADVENTURE.

By PHILIP GIBBS.

"'The Street of Adventure' is a long novel, a new novel, and a good novel, and it is published at 3s. in a small, neat volume of which the size, print, and binding materially add to the pleasure the reader finds in the novel itself."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

HEDWIG IN ENGLAND.

By the Author of "Marcia in Germany."

THE SCANDALOUS MR. WALDO.

By RALPH STRAUS.

LORD KENTWELL'S LOVE AFFAIR.

By F. C. PRICE. [Next Week.]

Mr. Heinemann's Illustrated Autumn Announcement
List, Post Free.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

- Songs Before Sunrise. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus. 26s. net.)
- The New Medieval Library—
IX. The Cell of Self-Knowledge. Edited by Edmund G. Gardner. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)
X. Ancient English Christmas Carols, 1400-1700. Collected by Edith Rickert. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The King's Classics—
The Four Last Things. By Sir Thomas More. Together with A Spiritual Consolation and other Treatises by John Fisher. Edited by Daniel O'Connor.
Pearl. An English Poem of the Fourteenth Century. Edited by Prof. I. Gollancz.
King's Letters. Volumes III. and IV. Edited by Robert Steele. (Chatto & Windus. 1s. 6d. net each.)
- Gulliver's Travels into Several Remote Nations of the World. By Jonathan Swift. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Le Morte D'Arthur. With Introduction by Prof. Rhys. Illustrated by Aubrey Beardsley. (Dent. 25s. net.)
- A New History of Painting in Italy. By J. A. Crowe and G. B. Cavalcaselle. 3 vols. (Dent. £3 net.)
- Milton's Comus. From the Original MS. at Bridgewater House. (Dent. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Renaissance Library—
Hero and Leander. By Christopher Marlowe. (Dent. 10s. 6d. net.)
Le Poesie di Lorenzo De' Medici. 2 vols. (Dent. 21s net.)
- Everyman's Library. Nine new vols. (Dent. 1s. net each.)
- Auguste Rodin. By Camille Manclair. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Diary of an Old Soul. By George MacDonald. (Fifield.)
- Fabian Socialist Series—
The Basis and Policy of Socialism. Socialism and Religion. (Fifield.)
- The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. By S. T. Coleridge. (Gay & Hancock. 1s. net.)
- Lays of Ancient Rome. By Lord Macaulay. (Gay & Hancock. 1s. net.)
- The Fitzgerald Centenary Edition of Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. (Harrap. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Harrap Library—
Emerson's Essays. First Series.
Emerson's Essays. Second Series.
The Poetry of Earth. A Nature Anthology. (Harrap. 2s. 6d. net each.)
- Undine. By De la Motte Fouqué. Adapted from German by W. L. Courtney. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. (Heinemann. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Collected Works of Fiona Macleod (William Sharp). In 7 vols. (Heinemann. 5s. net per vol.)
- The Last Journals of Horace Walpole. During the Reign of George III., from 1771 to 1783. Edited by A. Francis Stewart. (Lane. 25s. net.)
- The Arabian Nights. Re-written by Kate Douglas Wiggin. (Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Dream of Gerontius. By John Henry, Cardinal Newman. (Longmans.)
- The Water Babies. By Charles Kingsley. Illustrations by Warwick Goble. (Macmillan. 15s. net.)
- Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland. In 5 vols. Vol V., T—Z. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)
- Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Charlotte Grace O'Brien. Introduction by Stephen Gwynn. (Maunsel.)
- The Works of Oscar Wilde. In 12 vols. (Methuen. 5s. net each vol.)
- The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By Edward Gibbon. Edited by J. B. Bury. In 7 vols. Vols. I., II., and III. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net each.)
- The Story of the Tweed. By the Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. (Nisbet. 6s. net.)
- Oxford English Texts—
Campion's Complete Works. Edited by P. Vivian.
Spenser's Poetical Works. Vols. II. and III. Edited by J. C. Smith.
- The Marquis of Halifax's Complete Works. Edited by W. A. Raleigh. (Oxford University Press.)
- Tudor and Stuart Library—
Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici and Digby's Observations.
Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor. Printed from the Quarto of 1602. (Oxford University Press.)
- Marlowe's Works. Edited by C. F. T. Brooke. (Oxford University Press.)
- Keats's Poems. A Reprint of the 1820 Edition. Edited by Margaret Robertson. (Oxford University Press.)
- Hobbes's Leviathan. Reprinted from the Edition of 1651. With an Essay by the late W. G. Pogson Smith. (Oxford University Press.)
- Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century. Vol. III. (1685-1700.) Edited by J. E. Springarn. (Oxford University Press.)
- Shelley's Literary and Philosophical Criticism. Edited by J. Shawcross. (Oxford University Press.)
- Peacock's Memoirs of Shelley (with Shelley's Letters to Peacock). Edited by H. F. B. Brett-Smith. (Oxford University Press.)
- T. Russell Lowell's Fireside Travels. With an Introduction by E. V. Lucas. (Oxford University Press.)
- Oxford Poets and Standard Authors Series—
Matthew Arnold. With Introduction by A. T. Quiller-Couch.
Southey. With Introduction by M. H. Fitzgerald. (Oxford University Press.)
- Sonnets from the Portuguese. By Elizabeth Barrett Brown ing. (Putnam.)
- The Hand of God. By Grant Allen. (Rationalist Press Association. 6d.)
- Encyclopædia Biblica. In 58 parts. (Rationalist Press Association. 7d. net each.)
- Wayfaring Books—
The Wayfarer. By Claude Benson.
The Voice of the Mountains. By Dr. E. A. Baker and F. E. Ross.
The Voice of the Sea. By Ingram Swale.
The Pocket Plato. Jowett's Translations. Edited by S. C. Woodhouse.
The Pocket Ruskin. By Rose Gardner.
And Others. (Routledge. 3s. 6d. net each.)
- Photogravure Series—
Omar Khayyám. Illustrated by Gilbert James.
Aucassin and Nicolette. By Andrew Lang. Illustrated by Gilbert James.
Comus. By John Milton. Illustrated by Jessie King.
And Others. (Routledge. 7s. 6d. net each.)
- Broadway Booklets—
Sohrab and Rustum. By Matthew Arnold.
Adonais. By Shelley.
Elegy in Country Churchyard. By Gray.
Eve of St. Agnes. By Keats.
And Others. (Routledge. 2s. net each.)
- Sir John Suckling. Complete Works. Edited by A. Hamilton Thompson. (Routledge. About 6s.)
- William Chapman: Complete Dramatic Works. Edited by T. F. Parrott. 3 vols. (Routledge. 5s. each.)
- Dumas's Novels. The Aramis Edition. In 23 uniform vols. (Routledge. 3s. 6d. each.)
- Selected Tales of Mystery. By Edgar Allan Poe. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Waterloo Library—
Peter's Mother. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture.
The Amateur Poacher. By Richard Jefferies. (Smith, Elder. 3s. 6d. each.)
- H. S. Merriman's Novels. In 14 vols. (Smith, Elder. 2s. net. each.)
- Mrs. Humphry Ward's Novels. In 14 vols. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net each.)
- The Dictionary of National Biography. Edited by Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee. In 22 vols. (Smith, Elder. 15s. net each.)

WERNER LAURIE'S NEW BOOKS.

The big Novel of 1909.

SPECIAL MESSENGER:
A Romance of Love and War. By Robert W. Chambers. Author of "The Fighting Chance," "Cardigan." Crown
8vo, 6s.

MY SUMMER IN LONDON.
With excursions in Memory elsewhere among people and places all set in a relish of anecdote and illustrated from special photographs by W. J. Roberts.
By James Milne, Author of "The Romance of a Pro-Consul," "The Epistles of Atkins," etc. Fully Illustrated. 6s. net.

MY FRIENDS THE FRENCH.
By Robert Harborough Sherard, Author of "The Life of Oscar Wilde." Very fully Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

THE GRIZZLY BEAR. The Narrative of a Hunter—Historical,
Scientific and Adventurous. By William
H. Wright. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

PSYCHICAL SCIENCE and CHRISTIANITY. By E. Katharine
Bates, Author of "Seen and Unseen,"
"Do the Dead Depart?" 6s.

CHATS ON ELECTRICITY.
By Frank Broadbent, M.I.E.E. Crown
8vo. Fully Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

GILBERT WHITE AND SEL-BORNE. By Henry C. Shelley. Illustrated. 6s. net.

WHERE THE FISHERS GO
(The Story of Labrador). By P. W.
Browne. With nearly 200 Illustrations.
6s. net.

OLD ENGLISH TOWNS. By William Andrews. Fully Illustrated.
Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

LOVE INTRIGUES OF ROYAL COURTS. By Thornton Hall.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE LOVE STORY OF EMPRESS JOSEPHINE. By James
Endell. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

THE GARDEN BOOKLETS.
Velvet calf, Coloured Frontispieces to each vol. 1s. 6d. net. 6 vols. ready.

LOLA MONTEZ: An Adven-turess of the 'Forties. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WILL. A Guide to the Development of Will Power. By T. Sharper Knowlson.
6s. net.

STORIES FROM THE GREEK LEGENDS. By C. Gasquoine
Hartley. Fully illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

WERNER LAURIE, CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

COMPLETION OF VOL. VII. (O.P.) Price £3 5s. 0d.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY

Edited by SIR JAMES MURRAY. Just published.
A part, PREMISAL—PYXIS. 15s. Treble Section,
PROPHECY—PYXIS. 7s. 6d.

Already published: A—ROMANITE, S—SAUCE.

Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century.

Edited by J. E. SPINGARN. Vol. I. (1605-1650). Vol. II. (1650-1685). and Vol. III. (1685-1700), including Index to the complete work. Crown 8vo, 5s. net each.

Miracle Plays, Moralities and Interludes, being specimens of the pre-Elizabethan drama. Edited, with introduction, notes, and glossary, by A. W. POLLARD. Fifth edition revised. With illustrations.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Hobbes's Leviathan.

Reprinted from the edition of 1651. With an Essay by the late W. G. POGSON-SMITH. With a Facsimile Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The Centenary of Tennyson, 1809-1909.

A Lecture given to the University
Extension Students in the Sheldonian Theatre. By H.
WARREN. 8vo, 1s. net.

The Stone and Bronze Ages in Italy and Sicily.

By T. E. PEET.
8vo, 16s. net.

Bushman Paintings Copied.

By M. HELEN TONGUE, with a preface by H. BALFOUR.
Quarto, with two chromo collotypes (one double), fifty-four coloured plates, eight half-tone illustrations and a Map.
£3 3s. net.

Armour and Weapons.

By CHARLES
FFOULKES. With a Preface by VISCOUNT DILLON.
Royal 8vo, with 12 full page plates and 52 illustrations in the text. 6s. 6d. net.

The Story of the Comets.

Simply
told for General Readers. By G. F. CHAMBERS. 8vo, with numerous Plates and other Illustrations (more than 100 in all), 6s. net.

The Last Days of Charles II.

By R. CRAWFURD. With a Drawing from the Effigy in Westminster Abbey reproduced in Collotype, and 4 other illustrations. Medium 8vo, 5s. net.

The Disappearance of the Small Landowner.

The Ford Lectures, 1909.
By A. H. JOHNSON. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Short History of English Agriculture.

By W. H. R. CURTLER. Crown
8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

The Study of Religion in the Italian Universities.

By L. H. JORDAN, in collaboration with B. LABANCA, Crown 8vo, 6s. net.
[Immediately

Modernism in Italy.

An Appreciation. By the same authors. 2s. net. [Immediately Nation—"A singularly well-informed inquiry into contemporary religious tendencies in Italy"]

Clarendon Press Catalogue (160 pages) post free on application.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press,
Amen Corner, E.C.

- Economic Sophisms, or Fallacies of Protection. By Frederic Bastiat. Translated by Patrick James Stirling. (Unwin. 3s. 6d.)
- Studies in Logical Theory. Edited by John Dewey. (Unwin. 7s. net.)

POETRY.

- The Shepherd: A Book of Ballads and Songs. By Herbert A. Morrah. (Allen. 5s.)
- A Dinka Story, and Other Sudan Poems. By S. Lyle. (Allen. 2s. net.)
- A Woodland Story: A Phantasy in Verse. By Eva Dobell. (Allen. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Enchanted Island: And Other Poems. By Alfred Noyes. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
- Poems Written in Early Youth by George Meredith, including Poems, 1851. Poems omitted from the later editions of "Modern Love" and Scattered Poems. (Constable. 6s. net.)
- Last Poems. Those hitherto unpublished in book form. By George Meredith. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)
- Poems Lyrical and Romantic. By J. Barnard James. (Constable. 3s. 6d. net.)
- New Poems. By Richard Le Gallienne. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Later Poems. By William Watson. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- A Vision of Life. By Darrell Figgis. With an Introduction by G. K. Chesterton. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Time's Laughing-Stocks and Other Poems. By Thomas Hardy. (Macmillan.)
- Versions and Perversions of Heine and Others. By George Tyrrell. (Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
- England, and Other Poems. By Laurence Binyon. (Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Exultations of Ezra Pound. (Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Pilgrimage: A Book of Poems. By Yone Noguchi. (Mathews. 8s. net.)
- Vigo Cabinet Series—
- Baudelaire: The Flowers of Evil. Translated into English Verse by Cyril Scott. (Mathews. 1s. net.)
- Songs of Memory and Hope. By Henry Newbolt. (Murray.)
- The Dublin Book of Irish Verse. Edited by J. Cooke. (Oxford University Press.)
- Sonnets. By William Dowsing. (Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Thomas of Kempen. By James Williams. (Kegan Paul. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Angelus Silesius: A Selection from the Rhymes of a German Mystic. Translated by Paul Carus. (Kegan Paul. 4s. 6d. net.)
- Bermuda Verses. By Larry Chittenden. (Putnam. 6s.)
- The Port o' Dreams, and Other Poems. By Emily Pratt Dickins. (Putnam.)
- Ad Miriam and Other Poems. By Frederick Honk Law. (Putnam.)
- Songs of Action. By A. Conan Doyle. (Smith, Elder. 5s.)
- The Romance of the Twisted Spear, and Other Tales in Verse. By Herbert Sherring. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)

SCIENCE.

- The Theory of Structures. By R. J. Woods. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Geology of Ore-Deposits. By H. H. Thomas and D. A. Macalister. (Arnold. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A Text-Book of Electrical Engineering. By Dr. Adolf Thomälen. Translated by G. W. O. Howe. (Arnold. 15s. net.)
- Fifty Years of Darwinism. Addresses given before the American Association for the Advancement of Science. (Bell. 8s. net.)
- Astronomical Curiosities. By J. Ellard Gore. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)
- Preventable Diseases. By Dr. Woods Hutchinson. (Constable. 6s. net.)
- The Birds of the World. By Frank H. Knowlton. With a Chapter on the Anatomy of Birds by Frederick A. Lucas. (Constable. 30s. net.)

- Electricity. By H. M. Hobart. (Constable. 6s. net.)
- Hydro-electric Developments and Engineering. By Frank Koester. (Constable. 21s. net.)
- The Encyclopædia of Municipal and Sanitary Engineering. Edited by W. H. Maxwell and J. T. Brown. (Constable. 42s. net.)
- Dent's Scientific Primers—
- Astronomy. By Prof. F. W. Dyson.
- Geology. By Prof. J. W. Gregory.
- Physiology. By Prof. Sherrington.
- Zoology. By Prof. Herdman. (Dent. 1s. net each vol.)
- Ant Communities. By Dr. Henry C. McCook. (Harper.)
- The Conquest of the Air. By Alphonse Berget. (Heinemann. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Camps and Cruises of an Ornithologist. By Frank M. Chapman. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
- The Making of Species. By Douglas Dewar and Frank Finn. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Chats on Electricity. By Frank Broadbent. (Laurie. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Chats on Astronomy. By H. P. Hollis. (Laurie. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Natural History of British Game Birds. By J. G. Millais. (Longmans. £8 8s. net.)
- Domestic Sanitary Engineering and Plumbing. By F. W. Raynes. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Aviation. By Dr. G. H. Bryan. (Macmillan.)
- Ancient Eclipses; and the Lengths of the Day, Month, and Year. By P. H. Cowell. (Macmillan.)
- The Origin of Ore Deposits and the Extent of Future Supplies. By Dr. J. W. Gregory. (Macmillan.)
- Climates of British Possessions. By Dr. W. N. Shaw. (Macmillan.)
- Improvement of Wheat and Other Cereals. By R. H. Biffen. (Macmillan.)
- Science from an Easy Chair. By Sir E. Ray Lankester. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Air and Health. By Ronald C. Macfie. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Hygiene of School Life. By Ralph H. Crowley. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Fungi and How to Know Them. By E. W. Swanton. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- Aviation. Written from materials supplied by Henri Farman. By D. Farman. (Mills & Boon. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Cancer Clinically Considered. By J. Bland-Sutton. (Nisbet. 2s. 6d. net.)
- History of Botany. By J. Reynolds Green. (Oxford University Press.)
- Elementary Biology. By J. W. Kirkaldy and I. M. Drummond. (Oxford University Press.)
- The Face of the Earth. By E. Suess. Translated by Hertha B. C. Sollas. Vol. IV. (Oxford University Press.)
- Zinc Oxide and Its Uses. By J. Cruickshank Smith. (Stanley Paul. 3s. net.)
- The Periodic Law. By A. E. Garrett. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)
- Mutation Theory. By Dr. Hugo de Vries. (Kegan Paul. 2 vols. £1 16s. net.)
- Nautical Science in Its Relation to Practical Navigation. Together with a Study of the Tides and Tidal Currents. By Charles Lane Poor. (Putnam.)
- The History of Astronomy. By Professor G. Forbes. (Rationalist Press Association. 1s. net.)
- The History of Chemistry. Part I., from 3000 B.C. to 1850 A.D. By Sir Edward Thorpe. (Rationalist Press Association. 1s. net.)
- A Textbook of Mental Diseases. By Eugenio Tanzi. Translated by W. Ford Robertson and T. C. Mackenzie. (Rebman. 24s. net.)
- Naval Hygiene. By James D. Gatewood. (Rebman. 25s. net.)
- Meteorology—Practical and Applied. By Sir John W. Moore. (Rebman.)
- Science of To-day Series—
- Botany of To-day. By Professor G. F. Scott Elliot. (Seeley. 5s. net.)
- Aerial Navigation of To-day. By Charles C. Turner. (Seeley. 5s. net.)

From . . .
SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS' LIST
ANNE OF AVONLEA

BY THE AUTHOR OF
ANNE OF GREEN GABLES

With Coloured Frontispiece, 6/-

THE GLORY OF THE CONQUERED

THE STORY OF A GREAT LOVE.

By SUSAN GLASPELL, 6/-

"A remarkable book. . . . In this great love there is nothing sentimental. It is essentially human, but clean and fresh and vital. Miss Glaspell has a pleasant sense of humour, which is of great advantage to her work. Her men and women are no mere personified emotions, but finely modelled figures, in the proportion to one another and their surroundings."—Westminster Gazette.

THE LETTERS OF PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY

COLLECTED AND EDITED BY ROGER INGPEN,

Containing 480 Letters. With 42 Illustrations.

Two Vols., 25/- net. Edition de Luxe, 42/- net.

"In this collection of letters it is not too much to say Mr. Ingpen has made Shelley real, alive for us."—Daily Mail.

ROODSCREENS AND ROODLOFTS.

By F. BLIGH BOND, F.R.I.B.A., and DOM BEDE CAMM, O.S.B.

Containing nearly 90 Collotype Plates and upwards of 300 other Illustrations. Two Vols., demy 4to, cloth gilt, gilt top. 32/- net

"A magnificent work."—Evening Standard.

MAKERS OF NATIONAL HISTORY SERIES.

Edited by W. H. HUTTON.

FRANCIS ATTERBURY.

By H. C. BEECHING, M.A., D.Litt.

In Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with Illustrations, 3/6 net.

"Full of interest, of zeal, and enthusiasm."—Times.
 (Uniform with "Cardinal Beaufort," by L. B. RADFORD, D.D.;
 "Viscount Castlereagh," by A. HASSALL, M.A.; "Archbishop Parker," by W. M. KENNEDY, B.A.; and "General Wolfe," by EDWARD SALMON.)

THE ALL RED SERIES.

THE DOMINION OF NEW ZEALAND

By SIR ARTHUR P. DOUGLAS, Bt.

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with 16 full-page plate Illustrations, and Map. 7/6 net.

(Uniform with "The Commonwealth of Australia," by the Hon. B. R. WISE.)

"A most enticing impression of the country."—Evening Standard.
 "Nothing seems to have been left out."—Westminster Gazette.

SPAIN OF THE SPANISH.

By Mrs. VILLIERS-WARDELL.

In imperial 16mo, cloth gilt, gilt top, with 32 full-page plate illustrations. 6/- net.

(Uniform with "Italy of the Italians" and "France of the French.")
 "This covers in a bright popular way every side of Spanish life."
 —Times.

LIGHTER STUDIES OF A COUNTRY RECTOR.

By the Rev. JOHN VAUGHAN, M.A., Canon of Winchester

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, silk register. 5/- net.

"Simplicity and kindliness, a love of beauty, and a keen eye are the features of these amiable and engaging 'Lighter Studies.'"
 —Morning Leader.

IN WIND AND WILD.

By ERIC PARKER.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, silk register. 5/- net.

"A collection of nature essays which have a singularly varied charm, and an irresistible attraction."—Evening Standard.

LAY SERMONS FROM THE "SPECTATOR."

By M.C.E. With an Introduction by J. ST. LOE STRACHEY.

In Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, silk register, 5/- net.

" . . . Informing and stimulating . . . marked by a robust commonsense and a lofty spirit . . . they make for clearer thinking. . . . The themes are pleasantly varied, and all the essays have the virtues of brevity, freshness, and directness."
 —Aberdeen Free Press.

Write for Pitman's Complete Illustrated Autumn List, now ready.

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD.,
 1, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

Mr. Edward Arnold's
 Autumn Announcements

1909.

LADY ST. HELIER'S MEMORIES OF FIFTY YEARS.
 By MARY JEUNE (Lady St. Helier). With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Oct. 21]

LADY SARAH WILSON'S SOUTH AFRICAN MEMORIES. By Lady SARAH WILSON. With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Oct. 28]

EDMUND GARRET: a Memoir. By E. T. COOK, Author of "The Rights and Wrongs of the Transvaal War." &c. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Oct. 14]

THE LIFE OF SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW, Bart. By GEORGE SMALLEY, M.A., Author of "Studies of Men." &c. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready]

A CENTURY OF EMPIRE (1801-1900). By the Rt. Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., P.C., Author of "The Life of Wellington." &c. Vol. I., 1801-1832. With Photogravure Portraits, demy 8vo, 14s. net. (The work will be completed in 3 volumes, which will be issued at intervals of 6 months.) [Oct. 21]

SIKHIM AND BHUTAN: Experiences of Twenty Years on the North-Eastern Frontier of India. By JOHN CLAUDE WHITE, C.I.E., lately Political Agent in Sikhim. With magnificent Illustrations and a Map, 1 vol. royal 8vo, 21s. net. [Nov. 4]

TURKEY IN TRANSITION. By G. F. ABBOTT, Author of "The Tale of a Tour in Macedonia." &c. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Oct. 21]

HIGH ALBANIA. By M. EDITH DURHAM, Author of "The Burden of the Balkans." &c. Fully Illustrated, with Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net. [Oct. 28]

A SCAMPER THROUGH THE FAR EAST. Including a Visit to the Manchurian Battlefields, By Major H. H. AUSTIN, C.M.G., D.S.O., R.E., Author of "With Macdonald in Uganda." With Illustrations and Maps, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Ready]

HOUSEBOAT DAYS IN CHINA. By J. O. P. BLAND. Illustrated with numerous Pen-and-Ink Drawings by W. D. STRAIGHT, and a Map, 1 vol. medium 8vo, 15s. net. [Oct. 14]

WITH A PRE-HISTORIC PEOPLE. The A-ki-ku-yu of British East Africa. By W. SCORESBY ROUTLEDGE and KATHARINE ROUTLEDGE. With many Illustrations, medium 8vo, 18s. net. [Nov.]

THE COTTAGE HOMES OF ENGLAND. Drawn by HELEN ALLINGHAM and Described by STEWART DICK. With 64 Coloured Plates from Pictures never before Reproduced, 1 vol. 8vo, 21s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe, limited to 500 copies for the British Empire, £2 2s. net. [Oct. 14]

THE SALMON RIVERS AND LOCHS OF SCOTLAND. By W. L. CALDERWOOD, Inspector of Fisheries to the Fishery Board for Scotland, Author of "The Life of a Salmon." With Illustrations and Maps of Principal Rivers, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 21s. net. Also a Large-Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, £2 2s. net. [Oct.]

TEN YEARS OF GAME-KEEPING. By OWEN JONES. With numerous Illustrations from the Author's Photographs, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready]

IN A YORKSHIRE GARDEN. By REGINALD FARRER, Author of "My Rock Garden." &c. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Oct. 14]

A FIFTH SERIES OF MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS. By the Rt. Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., Author of "Scottish Gardens." &c. With Photogravure Plates, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. (Uniform with Series I., II., III. and IV.) [Oct. 28]

TEN GREAT AND GOOD MEN. Lectures by HENRY MONTAGU BUTLER, D.D., D.C.L., Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 6s. net. [Ready]

A GREAT BISHOP OF ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO. Being a Sketch of the Life of Bishop Horsley. By the Rev. H. H. JEBB, Rector of Streatham. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Oct. 28]

ORPHEUS WITH HIS LUTE. Stories of the World's Spring-time. By W. M. L. HUTCHINSON, Author of "The Golden Porch." &c. Illustrated, crown 8vo, 5s. [Oct. 28]

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A CRUCIAL EXPERIMENT. By A. C. FARQUHARSON, Author of "St. Nazarius." &c. [Oct. 7]

THE BEGGAR IN THE HEART. By EDITH RICKERT. Author of "The Golden Hawk." &c. [Oct.]

THE PASQUE FLOWER. By JANE WARDLE, Author of "Margery Pigeon." &c. [Oct. 14]

THE MYSTERY OF THE YELLOW ROOM. By GASTON LEROUX. [Oct. 14]

 Please write for Prospectuses giving further particulars of the above publications.

EDWARD ARNOLD,
 London: 41 and 43 Maddox Street, W.

- Nature. By the Rev. J. H. Crawford. (Sonnenschein.)
 Plant Life. By Professor E. Warning. (Sonnenschein.)
 The Evolution of the Sciences. By L. Houllévié. (Unwin. 6s. 6d. net.)
 How to Study the Stars. By L. Rudaux. Translated by A. H. Keane. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
 A History of Hindu Chemistry from the Earliest Times to the Middle of the Sixteenth Century, A.D. By Professor P. C. Ray. Vol. II. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Introduction to the Preparation of Organic Compounds. By Professor E. Fischer. Translated by R. V. Stanford. (Williams & Norgate. 4s. net.)
 Reinforced Concrete in Europe. By Albert Ladd Colby. (Williams & Norgate. 14s. 6d. net.)

SOCIOLOGY AND POLITICS.

- The Birth and Growth of Toleration. By the Rev. J. O. Bevan. (Allen. 5s. net.)
 With a Pre-Historic People. The A-ki-ku-yu of British East Africa. By W. Scoresby Routledge and Katharine Routledge. (Arnold. 18s. net.)
 Primer of Statistics. By W. Palin Elderton and Ethel M. Elderton. With a preface by Sir Francis Galton. (Black. About 2s. 6d.)
 A History of Mediæval Political Theory in the West. By R. W. Carlyle and A. J. Carlyle. Vol. II. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)
 Britain at Bay. By Spenser Wilkinson. (Constable. 5s. net.)
 State Insurance: A Social and Industrial Need. By Frank W. Lewis. (Constable. 5s. net.)
 Ship Subsidies: An Economic Study of the Policy of Subsidising Merchant Marines. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)
 India and the Tariff Problem. By H. Lees Smith. (Constable.)
 Socialism and the Social Movement. By Werner Sombart. Translated by M. Epstein. (Dent. 3s. 6d. net.)
 The American People. An Essay. By H. G. Wells. (Fifield.)
 The Significance of Indian Nationalism. By H. M. Howsin. (Fifield.)
 A Volume of Speeches. By the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, M.P. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.)
 The New Socialism. By Jane T. Stoddart. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net.)
 Administrative Problems of British India. By Joseph Chailley. Translated by Sir William Meyer. (Macmillan.)
 Totemism and Exogamy: A Treatise on Certain Ancient Forms of Superstition and Society. By J. G. Frazer. (Macmillan. 3 vols.)
 A Project of Empire. By J. Shield Nicholson. (Macmillan.)
 The Working Faith of the Social Reformer, and Other Essays. By Henry Jones. (Macmillan.)
 The Common Sense of Political Economy. By Philip H. Wicksteed. (Macmillan.)
 Land and Labour: Lessons from Belgium. By B. Seebohm Rowntree. (Macmillan.)
 Charity and Social Life. By C. S. Loch. (Macmillan.)
 The Approach to the Social Question. By F. G. Peabody. (Macmillan.)
 The Economic Annals of the Nineteenth Century. By William Smart. Part I. 1801-1820. (Macmillan.)
 Darwinism and Modern Socialism. By F. W. Headley. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
 The Terror in Russia: An Appeal to the Nation. By Prince Kropotkin. (Methuen. 2d. net.)
 Proportional Representation. By John H. Humphreys. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
 Ancient and Modern Imperialism. By Lord Cromer. (Murray.)
 International Law. By T. Baty. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Our National Drink Bill. By John Newton. (Nisbet. 1s. net.)
 Is the Regeneration of Turkey Possible? By Demetrius Georgiades. (Kegan Paul.)

- Police Administration. A Critical Study of Police Organisations in the United States and Abroad. By Leonhard Felix Fuld. (Putnam.)
 The Negro Problem—Abraham Lincoln's Solution. By William P. Pickett. (Putnam. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Women of a State University. An Illustration of the Working of Co-education in the Middle West. By Helen R. Olin. (Putnam.)
 Britain for the Briton. By Sir W. Earnshaw Cooper. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d.)
 Great and Greater Britain. By J. Ellis Barker. (Smith, Elder. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Coming Englishman. By Prof. James Long. (Smith, Elder. 5s. net.)
 Great Britain and the Congo. By E. D. Morel. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)
 The Far Eastern Question. By Thomas F. Millard. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
 New Zealand in Evolution: Industrial, Economic, and Political. By Guy H. Scholefield. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
 An Empire in Pawn. Being Lectures and Essays on Indian, Colonial, and Domestic Finance, Preference, Free Trade, &c. By A. J. Wilson. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Life in an English Village. By Maud F. Davies. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Sovereignty of Society. By Hugh E. M. Stutfield. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

THEOLOGY AND PHILOSOPHY.

- Spinoza's Short Treatise on God, Man, and his Well-being. Translated by Professor A. Wolf. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
 Natural and Social Morals. By Professor Carveth Read. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Idea of the Soul. By A. E. Crawley. (Black. 6s. net.)
 The Meaning and Value of Life. By Professor Rudolf Eucken. Translated by Boyce Gibson and Lucy Gibson. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
 The Psalter of the Church. With Introduction by J. G. Carleton. (Cambridge University Press.)
 The Gospels as Historical Documents. Part II. By V. L. Stanton. (Cambridge University Press.)
 The Odes and Psalms of Solomon. Edited by J. Rendel Harris. (Cambridge University Press.)
 The Son of Man. By the Rev. Edwin A. Abbott. (Cambridge University Press.)
 Introduction to the New Testament. By Professor Theodor Zahn. (T. & T. Clark. 3 vols. 36s. net.)
 The Divine Worker in Creation and Providence. By J. Oswald Dykes. (T. & T. Clark.)
 Genesis: A Critical and Exegetical Commentary. By Principal J. Skinner. (T. & T. Clark.)
 The Gospel of Reconciliation. By Rev. W. L. Walker. (T. & T. Clark.)
 Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics. Edited by James Hastings. Vol. II. (T. & T. Clark.)
 Aspects of the Spiritual. By J. Brierley. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
 Modern Theories of Sin. By W. E. Orchard. (James Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
 Problems of Immanence. Studies Critical and Constructive. By J. Warschauer. (James Clarke. 2s. 6d. net.)
 The Church and the Next Generation. By Richard Roberts. (James Clarke. 2s. net.)
 The Eternal Values. By Hugo Münsterberg. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Studies in Christianity. By Borden Parker Bowne. (Constable. 6s. net.)
 Philosophies: Ancient and Modern. Schopenhauer. By T. W. Whittaker. (Constable. 1s. net.)
 The Temple Dictionary of the Bible. Written by the Rev. W. Ewing and the Rev. J. E. H. Thomson. (Dent. 10s. 6d. net.)
 Science and Religion in Contemporary Philosophy. By Professor E. Boutroux. Translated by J. Neild. (Duckworth. 8s. net.)
 A Critical Introduction to the New Testament. By Professor A. S. Peake. (Duckworth.)

INVALUABLE TO THE BIBLIOPHILE

BOOK PRICES CURRENT
VOLUME XXIII for 1908-9.

Edited by J. H. SLATER.

Demy 8vo, Buckram Gilt, £1 7s. 6d. net.

¶ The New Volume of Book-Prices Current commences with the sale at Messrs. Hodgson's on October 6 last year, and is carried down to the miscellaneous sale held at Sotheby's July 28-9, 1909.

PRINCE MADOG, or the Welshman who discovered America, A.D. 1170.

By JOAN DANE.

Large post 8vo. Quarter parchment, cloth gilt, gilt top, silk register. Printed on hand-made paper. Illustrated with 3 plates in colour from drawings by Mr. A. S. Boyd. Price 6s. net (by post 6s. 4d.).

The author has founded her story on extracts taken from the manuscripts of the Abbeys of Strata Florida and Conway, where are kept the records of the chief historical events of the Welsh nation.

FOLK-LORE AND FOLK STORIES OF WALES.

By MARIE TREVELYAN.

Preface by E. SIDNEY HARTLAND, F.S.A.

Foolscap 4to. Cloth gilt. 10s. 6d. net (by post 10s. 11d.).

"Amazingly rich in material, valuable to students, and delightful to others, whether they are Welsh or not."—Daily Chronicle.

THE HISTORY OF PEMBROKESHIRE.

By Rev. JAMES PHILLIPS.

Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt. 12s. 6d. net (by post 12s. 11d.).

"Full of interesting details, ecclesiastical as well as secular."—Spectator.

THE CAT IN HISTORY, LEGEND, AND ART.

Written and Illustrated by ANNIE MARKS.

Crown 4to. Cloth gilt. 6s. net (by post 6s. 4d.).

The cult of the cat must prove of interest even to those who are not professed lovers of the animal.

HOUSE MOTTOES AND INSCRIPTIONS,
Old and New, Drawn from many Lands.

By S. F. A. CAULFEILD.

Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, Illustrated, 5s.

"This excellent little volume is well and fully illustrated. It should prove of much value to the Antiquarian, both professional and amateur."—St. James's Gazette.

BALKANIA. A Short History of the Balkan States.

By WILLIAM HOWARD FLANDERS.

Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

"The story of the Balkan States from somewhere about 500 B.C. down to the present day. A clearly written and lucid account of the whole period."—Daily News.

VERSES IN TWILIGHT.

By the Rev. PHILLIP WINTER DE QUETTEVILLE.

Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

A volume of secular and religious verse, the sweet melody of which will charm the reader.

THE HARP AND THE ROSE.

By "CARITAS."

Cloth gilt, 3s. net (by post 3s. 3d.).

A collection of Poems which, like harp songs and wild roses, may help and cheer weary travellers on the dusty paths of this everyday world.

SOME EVERY-DAY SONGS IN WOMAN'S LIFE.

By HELEN F. L. TURNBULL.

Royal 16mo. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

WHAT IS A PICTURE?

By G. G. MILLAR.

Fcap 4to. Cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

"A book I want to recommend to all who are interested in aesthetics."—T. P.'s Weekly.

THE LIFE OF ROGER LANGDON.

Told by Himself. With additions by his daughter, ELLEN. Crown 4to. cloth gilt. 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

"The story of a really remarkable life and career."

—Evening Standard.

Write for Catalogue (No. 102) of Theological, General, and Antiquarian Literature, free by post.

LONDON:

ELLIOTT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH,
TRÜBNER & Co., Ltd.

HISTORY OF THE FAN, By G. WOOLISCROFT

RHEAD, R.E., Hon. A.R.C.A. Lond. With twenty-seven full-page plates in colour, 100 in half-tone, and numerous illustrations in the text. Dedicated by gracious permission to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, one of whose fans is reproduced as a frontispiece to the book. Super-Royal Quarto (13½ by 10½). Strictly limited to 450 numbered copies for sale in England. £4 4s. net.

FRANCIA'S MASTERPIECE. By MONTGOMERY

CARMICHAEL. Illustrated. Imperial 16mo. 5s. net.

"No student of sacred art should fail to read this admirable little book, the record of painstaking work carried to a triumphant conclusion."—Daily Telegraph.

A GERMAN STAFF OFFICER IN INDIA.

Being impressions of the Travels of an Officer of the German General Staff through the Peninsula. By COUNT HANS VON KOENIGSMARCK, Major in the Dragons of Bredow and Captain on the General Staff of the German Army. With numerous full-page illustrations and a map. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

BURMA THROUGH THE CENTURIES. By

JOHN STUART, Managing Proprietor Rangoon Gazette, and Delegate to the Imperial Press Conference. With fifteen illustrations. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

INDIA IN EARLY CHRISTIANITY. By A. S.

LILLEY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 15s.

MEDIÆVAL RESEARCHES FROM EASTERN

ASIATIC SOURCES. Fragments towards the Knowledge of the Geography and History of Central and Western Asia from the Thirteenth to the Seventeenth Century. By E. BRETSCHEIDER, M.D., late Physician to the Russian Legation at Peking. With two Maps. In two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 21s.

MEMOIRS AND LETTERS OF FRANCIS W.

NEWMAN. By I. GIBERNE STEVERING. With twenty-eight illustrations and two articles (one unpublished MS.). Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By E. WINWOOD

READE. New edition revised, with introduction and life of the author by F. Legge. Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE PERIODIC LAW. By A. E. GARRETT, B.Sc.

(By Research). Illustrated by tables and diagrams. Crown 8vo. 5s.

COLOUR BLINDNESS AND COLOUR PER-

CEPTION. By C. W. EDRIDGE-GREEN, M.D., F.G.S. With coloured plates. New and revised edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE BOOK OF THE DEAD. An English Translation of the Chapters, Hymns, &c., of the Theban Recension. With Introduction, Notes, and Numerous Illustrations. By E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, Litt.D., Keeper of the Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities in the British Museum. New and Enlarged Edition with Additional Illustrations and three coloured plates. In three volumes. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. per vol. net.

THE BOOK OF THE DEAD. Text by E. A.

WALLIS BUDGE, Litt.D. In three volumes. Crown 8vo. 5s. net each.

THE LITURGY OF FUNERAL OFFERINGS.

By E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, Litt.D. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

THE BOOK OF OPENING THE MOUTH. By

E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, Litt.D. In two volumes. Crown 8vo. 6s. net each.

CHESS OPENINGS: Ancient and Modern. By

E. FREEBOROUGH, with the co-operation of the Rev. C. E. Ranken, G. B. Fraser, Esq., and the Rev. W. Wayte. Corrected up to the present time by Messrs. H. E. Atkins (Champion) and J. H. Blake, joint winners of the first prize in the Championship Tourney at the recent Congress of the British Federation at Scarborough. D. J. Mills, W. T. Pierce, W. H. S. Monck, W. H. Gunston, Porterfield, Rynd, and other eminent analysts. Fourth Revised Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

WRITE FOR A COPY OF OUR AUTUMN LIST.

DRYDEN HOUSE, GERRARD ST. LONDON, W.

- Faith and Its Psychology. By the Rev. W. R. Inge. (Duckworth.)
- Philosophy and Religion. By the Rev. Hastings Rashdall. (Duckworth.)
- Revelation and Inspiration. By the Rev. James Orr. (Duckworth.)
- History of Christian Thought Since Kant. By the Rev. E. C. Moore. (Duckworth.)
- The Wisdom of Confucius. With an Introduction by R. Dimsdale Stocker. (Gay & Hancock. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Soul of St. Paul. By A. L. Lilley. (Griffiths. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Library of Living Thought—
Revelation and Inspiration. By Dr. Reinhold Seeberg. (Harper.)
- Paul and Jesus. By Professor J. Weiss. (Harper.)
- Christianity and the New Idealism. By Professor R. Eucken. (Harper.)
- Orpheus. An Universal History of Religions. By Dr. Salomon Reinach. (Heinemann. 8s. 6d. net.)
- The Ethic of Jesus According to the Synoptic Gospels. By the Rev. James Stalker. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)
- Studies in Religion and Theology. By the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
- The Expositor's Greek Testament. Edited by the Rev. W. R. Nicoll. 5 vols. Vols. IV. and V. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
- Christ and Man. Sermons by the late Rev. Principal M. Dods. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- Modern Substitutes for Christianity. By the Rev. P. M. Muir. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- The Person and Place of Jesus Christ. By the Rev. Principal P. T. Forsyth. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Thousand and One Churches. By Prof. Sir W. M. Ramsay and Gertrude L. Bell. (Hodder & Stoughton. 20s. net.)
- Light from Anatolia. By Adolf Deissmann. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
- The Problem of Theology in Modern Life and Thought. By the Rev. Andrew Miller. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.)
- Expositions of Holy Scripture. By the Rev. A. Maclaren. The Fifth Series. 8 vols. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
- The Christian Belief. By Prof. Haering. Translated by the Rev. John Dickie. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
- The Student's Old Testament. Translated by Prof. C. F. Kent. 6 vols. Vol. III. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
- The Historical Bible. By Prof. C. F. Kent. 6 vols. Vol. III. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s. net.)
- Spirit and Matter Before the Bar of Modern Science. By Dr. I. Heysinger. (Laurie. 15s. net.)
- Psychical Science and Christianity. By E. Katharine Bates. (Laurie. 6s.)
- Practical Hypnotism. Theories and Experiments. Compiled by Comte C. de Saint-Germain. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- New Ideals in Healing. By Ray Stannard Baker. (Laurie. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Quintessence of Nietzsche. By J. M. Kennedy. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Harvest Within. By A. T. Mahan. (Longmans. 6s. net.)
- The Nature of Truth. By William James. (Longmans.)
- Essays. By Father Ignatius Ryder. (Longmans.)
- Christian Ideas and Ideals. By Robert L. Ottley. (Longmans.)
- Perfect through Suffering. By the late Prebendary H. Montagu Villiers. (Longmans.)
- Essays in Politics. By Andrew Macphail. (Longmans. 6s. net.)
- Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic. Translated from the Italian of Benedetto Croce, by Douglas Ainslie. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)
- The Law and the Prophets. Translated from Professor Westphal's "Jehovah," by Clement du Pontet. (Macmillan.)
- The Holy Spirit in the New Testament. By Henry Barclay Swete. (Macmillan.)
- Cambridge Biblical Essays. By Members of the University. (Macmillan.)
- Confirmation in the Age of the Apostles. By the Rt. Rev. F. H. Chase. (Macmillan.)
- The Epistle of St. James. By the late F. J. A. Hort. (Macmillan.)
- The Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians. By the Rev. G. H. Rendall. (Macmillan.)
- Ritschlianism. By the Rev. E. A. Edghill. (Macmillan.)
- The Church and the World in Idea and in History. Bampton Lectures, 1900. By the Rev. Walter Hobhouse. (Macmillan.)
- Consciousness. By Henry Rutgers Marshall. (Macmillan.)
- The Principles of Religious Development. A Psychological and Philosophical Study. By George Galloway. (Macmillan.)
- Mesmerism and Christian Science: A Short History of Mental Healing. By Frank Podmore. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Survival of Man: A Study of Unrecognised Human Faculty. By Sir Oliver Lodge. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Jesus According to St. Mark. By the Rev. J. M. Thomson. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- Devotions from the Apocrypha. Edited by Herbert Pentin. (Methuen. 2s.)
- The Spiritual Combat. By Dom Lorenzo Scupoli. Translated by Thomas Barns. (Methuen. 2s.)
- The Heavenly Vision. Sermons preached by the late George Howard Wilkinson. (Mowbray.)
- Mowbray's Devotional Library—
Fénelon's "Maxims of the Mystics." Translated by the Rev. Watkin W. Williams. (Mowbray.)
- The English Churchman's Library—
The Atonement. By the Rev. J. A. V. Magee.
The Three Creeds of the Church. By the Rev. Charles Knapp.
The Book of Common Prayer. Sermons. By the Rev. W. C. E. Newbolt. (Mowbray.)
- History, Authority, and Theology. By A. C. Headlam. (Murray. 6s. net.)
- Orders and Unity. By the Right Rev. Charles Gore. (Murray.)
- The Apocalypse. By the Rev. J. J. Scott. (Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Papal Infallibility and its Roman Catholic Opponents. By the Rev. W. J. Sparrow Simpson. (Murray.)
- The Antecedents of the Christian Heresy. By J. H. A. Hart. (Nisbet.)
- Ritschlianism. An Essay by John Kenneth Mozley. (Nisbet. 5s. net.)
- The Living Forces of the Gospel. By J. Warneck. Translated by the Rev. Neil Buchanan. (Oliphant, Anderson. 5s. net.)
- The Claim of God on Art, Commerce, and Industry. By John Kelman. (Oliphant, Anderson. About 1s. 6d. net.)
- The Original Religion of China. By John Ross. (Oliphant, Anderson. About 5s. net.)
- The Samaritan Liturgy. Edited by A. E. Cowley. (Oxford University Press.)
- The Hebrew Prophets for English Readers. Edited by F. H. Woods and F. E. Powell. Vol. II. (Oxford University Press.)
- Vitae Sanctorum Hiberniae. Edited by C. Plummer. 2 vols. (Oxford University Press.)
- Opera hactenus inedita Rogeri Baconi. Edited by R. Steele. (Oxford University Press.)
- The Problem of Evil. By Marion Leroy Burton. (Kegan Paul. 6s. 6d. net.)
- Lay Sermons from the "Spectator." With Introduction by J. St. Loe Strachey. (Pitman. 5s. net.)
- Function, Feeling, and Conduct. An Attempt to Find a Natural Basis for Ethical Law. By Frederick Meakin. (Putnam.)
- American Lectures on the History of Religions.—The Religion of Islam. By Ignaz Goldziher. (Putnam. 6s.)
- Revaluations: Historical and Ideal. By A. W. Benn. (Rationalist Press Association. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Progressive Redemption. By the Rev. H. E. Sampson. (Rebman.)

A Selection from OLIPHANT ANDERSON'S AND FERRIER'S Latest List.

Dr. Alexandra Whyte's New Book.

THOMAS SHEPARD: Pilgrim Father and Founder of Harvard. His Spiritual Experience and Experimental Preaching. By ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D., Principal of the New College, Edinburgh. price 2s. 6d., post free.

THE ORIGINAL RELIGION OF CHINA. By JOHN ROSS, D.D., Author of "Mission Methods in Manchuria." With Diagrams from Original Plans, and other Illustrations. Price 5s. net; postage 4d.

A satisfactory account of the Earliest Religion of China can be found nowhere at present except in a voluminous work by De GROOT. Students of Comparative Religion will undoubtedly be grateful for the publication of this exceedingly valuable book.

THE LIVING FORCES OF THE GOSPEL: Experiences of a Missionary in Animistic Heathendom. By JOH. WARNECK, Lic. Theol. Superintendent of Missions. Authorised Translation from the Third German Edition by Rev. NEIL BUCHANAN. Price 5s. net; postage 4d.

THE COURTS OF THE TEMPLE: An Aspect of Art, Commerce and Industry.

By JOHN KELMAN, M.A., D.D., Author of "The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson," &c. Price 1s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

THE SONS OF STRENGTH. By J. R. P. SCLATER, M.A., Minister of New North Church, Edinburgh. In dainty binding, price 1s. net; postage 2d.

"And why the Sons of Strength have been

Her cherished offspring ever perusing love will show."—MEREDITH.

SCOTLAND'S WORK AND WORTH.

By CHARLES W. THOMSON, M.A., F.E.I.S., Rector of Larkhall Academy. With upwards of Sixty Illustrations, some of which are in colour. To be issued in Fourteen Parts at 7d. net.

The book aims at giving a connected account of Scottish History from Roman times to the present. Its distinctive feature is that the Scottish aspect of British history since the union of the Parliament is dealt with in fuller proportion than in any previous publication.

TRUTHS OF TO-DAY: A Young Man's Creed.

By the Rev. ALBERT G. MACKINNON, M.A., Author of "Spiritually Fit: A Young Man's Equipment," and "Tangible Tests for a Young Man's Faith." Price 2s. 6d. net; postage 3d. The idea of the book is to interest the Young Man who is adverse to creeds, and lead him on step by step until he has been taught the essential doctrines of our Faith.

21, Paternoster Square, E.C., and Edinburgh.

.. T. & T. CLARK'S BOOKS ..

Edited by Dr. James Hastings.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGION AND ETHICS.

Vol. I. ready. Vol. II. nearly ready.
In Cloth 28s. net per volume.
In Half-morocco 34s. net
"The editor has risen to the height of his great undertaking. The work deserves the fullest and the best encouragement which the world of readers and investigators can give it."—Athenæum.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

In Five Volumes.
In Cloth 28s. per volume.
In Half-morocco 34s.
SETS may be had in other elegant half-morocco bindings from 34s. per Vol.
"The standard authority for Biblical students of the present generation."—Times.

DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS

In Two Volumes.
In Cloth 21s. net per volume.
In Half-morocco 26s. net
"A unique work. The articles are rich in instruction and helpfulness to preachers and teachers."
—London Quarterly Review.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

Complete in One Volume.
In Cloth 20s. net.
In Half-leather 25s. net.
"By far the most scholarly yet produced in one volume in English-speaking countries—perhaps it may be said in the world."—Christian World.

THE EXPOSITORY TIMES. FIRST NO., NEW VOLUME.

Contents of October Number.

Notes on Recent Exposition. In the Study.
The Faith of Jesus. Principal P. T. FORSYTH
The Vital Energies of the Gospel. Prof. W. P. PATERSON
Great Text Commentary. Literature
Clauda or Cauda. Dr. J. RENDEL HARRIS
Studies in Pauline Vocabulary. Rev. R. MARTIN POPE
The Ideals of the Prophets. Canon S. R. DRIVER
The Law of Purification. Principal BUECHLER

Other Contributions by

Prof. Denney, Prof. Law, Dr. J. Moffatt, Dr. Keane, Prof. Nestle, Mrs. Gibson, and Prof. Sayce.

Price 6d. monthly,

Annual Subscription 6/-

Prof. THEODORE ZAHN'S great work

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Translated from the latest German Edition.
This Authorised Translation has been revised by Prof. Zahn himself, and contains his very latest emendations. The Three Volumes include full Notes, Chronological Table, and Complete Indexes. Price 36s. net.

PROF. W. SANDAY says:—"Every shred and scrap of the evidence is at his command, and he handles it in a masterly fashion."

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE ARCHITECTURES

OF EUROPEAN RELIGIONS. By IAN B. STOUGHTON HOLBORN, M.A., F.R.G.S., University Extension Lecturer in Art and Archaeology to the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London. Just published, 6s. net.

THE TESTS OF LIFE. A Study of the First Epistle of St. John. By Prof. ROBERT LAW, B.D., Toronto. 7s. 6d. net.

THE PAULINE EPISTLES. A Critical Study. By ROBERT SCOTT, D.D., Bombay. 6s. net.

BIBLICAL CRITICISM AND MODERN THOUGHT; or, The Place of the Old Testament Documents in the Life of To-Day. By Prof. W. G. JORDAN, D.D., Queen's University, Kingston. 7s. 6d. net.

THE GOSPEL OF RECONCILIATION OR AT-ONE-MENT. By Rev. W. L. WALKER, Author of "The Spirit and the Incarnation," &c., &c. 5s.

OUTLINES OF INTRODUCTION TO THE HEBREW BIBLE. By A. S. GEDEN, D.D., Richmond. With Illustrations. 8s. 6d. net.

THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE OF GOD. By Prof. W. N. CLARKE, D.D., Author of "An Outline of Christian Theology," &c. New Vol., "International Theological Library." 10s. 6d.

THE BACKGROUND OF THE GOSPELS; or, Judaism in the Period between the Old and New Testaments. By W. FAIRWEATHER, D.D., Kircaldy. 8s. net.

THE AUTHORITY OF CHRIST. By DAVID W. FORREST, D.D., Edinburgh. Third Edition, 6s.

THE BIBLE OF NATURE. By Prof. J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A., Aberdeen. 4s. 6d. net.

T. & T. CLARK 38, George St., Edinburgh.
14, Paternoster Sq., London

London Agents: Simpkin, Marshall Hamilton, Kent, & Co., Ltd.

REVELL'S LATEST LIST.

A HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN JAPAN.

By OTIS CARY. In 2 vols. Price 15s. net; postage 1d.
Vol. I. A History of Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox Missions in Japan.

Vol. II. A History of Protestant Missions in Japan.
Dr. Cary's thoroughness and his intimate knowledge of the facts are derived from more than 30 years' residence in Japan. There is not a book on the subject that can begin to compare with it in English, and, as for French and German works, the only ones that approach it are descriptive of Roman Missions only. It should be in all libraries that contain standard works along such lines.

TOLSTOY, THE MAN AND HIS MESSAGE.

A Biographical Interpretation. By EDWARD A. STEINER. With Illustrations. Price 5s. net; postage 5d.

CALVIN AND THE REFORMATION. Four

Studies. Price 5s. net; postage 4d.

Calvin, an Epigone of the Middle Ages, or an Initiator of Modern Times. By Prof. E. DOUMERGUE. Translated by the Rev. J. H. DULLES, A.M.

Calvin and Common Grace. By Dr. HERMAN BAVINCH. Translated by Prof. G. VOS, Ph.D., D.D.

The Reformation and the Natural Law. By LIC. A. LANG. Translated by J. GRESHAM MACHEN, B.D.

Calvin's Doctrine of the Knowledge of God. By Prof. B. B. WARFIELD, D.D., LL.D.

THE KNACK OF IT. Some Essays in Optimism.

By CHARLES BATTIE LLOOMIS, Author of "A Holiday Touch." Price 2s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

NEARLY READY.

COURT LIFE IN CHINA: The Capital, its

Officials and People. By ISAAC TAN OR BEADLAND. Author Chinese Mother Goose Rhymes, Chinese Boy and Girl, &c. 5s. net; postage 5d.

THE APOSTLE OF ALASKA. The Wonderful

Story of Metlakatla. By JOHN W. ARCTANDER, LL.D. Illustrated. Price 5s. net; postage 5d.

DRUGGING A NATION. The Story of China and the Opium Curse. By SAMUEL MERWIN. Illustrated, cloth, price 3s. 6d. net.

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY,
21, Paternoster Square, E.C., and Edinburgh.

- The Crown of Individuality. By William George Jordan. (Revell. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Man's Survival After Death. By the Rev. C. L. Tweedale. (Richards. 6s. net.)
- The Validity of English Ordinations. By Chrestos Adroutsos. Translated by F. W. Groves Campbell. (Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)
- On Freedom. By G. Locker Lampson. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)
- The Signs and Symbols of Primordial Man. By Dr. Albert Churchward. (Sonnenschein.)
- In the Abstract. By Norman Alliston. (Sonnenschein.)
- Library of Philosophy—
- Hegel's "Phenomenology of Mind." Translated by J. B. Baillie. (Sonnenschein.)
- Thought and Things. By James M. Baldwin. 3 vols. Vol. III. Real Logic. (Sonnenschein.)
- Les Données Immédiates de la Conscience. By Professor Bergson. Translated by F. L. Pogson. (Sonnenschein.)
- Physiological Psychology. By W. Wundt. Translated by Professor E. B. Titchener. Vol. II. (Sonnenschein. 3 vols.)
- The Aristocracy of Grace. By the Rev. R. Ballantine. (Stock. 3s. net.)
- A Re-statement of the Atonement. By Dr. T. P. Lucas. (Stock. 5s.)
- An Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to S. Matthew. By the Rev. A. Plummer. (Stock. 12s.)
- After Death—What? Spiritistic Phenomena and Their Interpretation. By Cesare Lombroso. (Unwin. 10s. net.)
- Psychotherapy. By Hugo Münsterberg. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)
- The Teaching of Jesus About the Future. By Henry Burton Sharman. (Unwin. 13s. 6d. net.)
- The Problem of Human Life. As viewed by the Great Thinkers, from Plato to the Present Time. By Rudolph Eucken. Translated by W. S. Hough and W. R. Boyce-Gibson. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Great Issues. By the Rev. R. F. Horton. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Function of Religion in Man's Struggle for Existence. By George Burman Foster. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- The Religion of H. G. Wells, and Other Essays. By the Rev. Alexander H. Crawford. (Unwin. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Into the Fighting Line. By the Rt. Rev. A. F. Winnington Ingram. (Wells, Gardner. 3s. 6d.)
- The Ball and the Cross. By G. K. Chesterton. (Wells, Gardner. 6s.)
- Half Hours with Busy Men. By Prebendary Loraine. (Wells, Gardner. 1s. 6d.)
- Theological Translation Library—
- The Old Testament in the Light of the East. By Alfred Jeremias. (Williams & Norgate. 2 vols.)
- Science, Matter, and Immortality. By Ronald C. Macfie. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)
- Ethics of Progress. By Charles F. Dole. (Williams & Norgate. 6s. net.)
- Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society. Vol. 9. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Jesus or Christ? Hibbert Journal Supplement, 1909. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)
- Crown Theological Library—
- Monasticism and Confessions of St. Augustine. By Dr. A. Harnack. (Williams & Norgate. 4s.)
- The Old Egyptian Faith. By Professor Edward Neville. (Williams & Norgate.)
- The Salmon Rivers and Lochs of Scotland. By W. L. Calderwood. (Arnold. 21s. net.)
- High Albania. By M. Edith Durham. (Arnold. 14s. net.)
- A Scamper Through the Far East. Including a Visit to the Manchurian Battlefields. By Major H. H. Austin. (Arnold. 15s. net.)
- Southern Rhodesia. By Percy F. Hone. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Sicily, the Garden of the Mediterranean. By Will S. Monroe. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Rivers and Streams of England. Painted by Sutton Palmer. Described by A. G. Bradley. (Black. 20s. net.)
- Kashmir. Described by Sir Francis Edward Younghusband. Painted by Major E. Molyneux. (Black. 20s. net.)
- Hungary. Painted by Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Stokes. Described by Adrian Stokes. (Black. 20s. net.)
- The Lake of Geneva. Painted by J. Hardwicke Lewis and Miss May Hardwicke Lewis. Described by Francis Gribble. (Black. 20s. net.)
- Flowers and Gardens of Madeira. Painted by Ella du Cane. Described by Florence du Cane. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Isle of Man. Painted by A. Heaton Cooper. Text by W. Ralph Hall Caine. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Motor Routes of England. Southern Section (South of the Thames). By Gordon Home. (Black. 5s. net.)
- China. Painted by Mortimer Menpes. Text by the Hon. Sir Henry Arthur Blake. (Black. 5s. net.)
- Travels in the Upper Egyptian Deserts. By Arthur E. P. Weigall. (Blackwood. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Round About India. By Edmund Candler. (Blackwood. 6s. net.)
- London Town, Past and Present. By W. W. Hutchings. (Cassell. 2 vols. 10s. net each.)
- The Gateway to the Sahara. By C. W. Furlong. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Face of China. Travels in East, North, Central, and Western China. By E. G. Kemp. (Chatto & Windus.)
- The Colour of Rome. By Olave M. Potter. (Chatto & Windus.)
- From the Thames to the Seine. By Charles Pears. (Chatto & Windus. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Wanderings in the Roman Campagna. By Rodolfo Lanciani. (Constable. 21s. net.)
- Peaks and Glaciers of Nun Kun. A Record of Pioneer Exploration and Mountaineering in the Punjab Himalaya. By Fanny Bullock Workman and William Hunter Workman. (Constable. 18s. net.)
- Travels in Spain. By Philip Sanford Marden. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Wild Life on the Rockies. By E. A. Mills. (Constable. 6s. net.)
- Seven English Cities. By William D. Howells. (Harper.)
- The Heart of the Antarctic. The Story of the British Antarctic Expedition, 1907-1909. By E. H. Shackleton. 2 vols. (Heinemann. 36s. net.)
- With a Camera in East Africa. By A. Radclyffe Dugmore. (Heinemann. 20s. net.)
- Christians at Mecca. By Augustus Ralli. (Heinemann. 5s. net.)
- Italian Hours. By Henry James. (Heinemann. 20s. net.)
- Constantinople and Turkey in 1909: A Diary of Travelling. By Prof. Sir W. M. Ramsay. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Vicenza: The Home of the Saint. By Mrs. Agnetti Pritchard. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)
- Italian Highways and Byways from a Motor Car. By Francis Miltoun. (Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d.)
- Mentone and its Neighbourhood: Past and Present. By Dr. George Muller. Translated by the Rev. J. E. Somerville. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
- Letters from China: With Particular Reference to the Empress Dowager and the Women of China. By Sarah P. Conger. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s.)
- The Basutos: The Mountaineers and their Country. By Sir Godfrey Lagden. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)
- The American Egypt. By Channing Arnold and F. J. Tabor Frost. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)
- Afoot in England. By W. H. Hudson. (Hutchinson. 10s. 6d. net.)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- China: Its Marvel and Mystery. By T. Hodgson Liddell. (Allen. 21s. net.)
- Houseboat Days in China. By J. O. P. Bland. (Arnold. 15s. net.)
- Sikhim and Bhutan. Experiences of Twenty Years on the North-Eastern Frontier of India. By John Claude White. (Arnold. 21s. net.)

FROM
Messrs. GREENING'S LIST

Three Remarkable Stories.

1. THE WITCH QUEEN OF KHEM

A Story of Egypt.

By ENA FITZGERALD.

Miss Fitzgerald is well known as the author of PATCOLA, which caused considerable praise as being the first work of a young girl.

2. HER SUBURBAN HIGHNESS

By GURNER GILLMAN.

Mr. Gurner Gillman has written one or two successful stories dealing with suburban life, in a fresh, original style, and his new book will be found to be as interesting as its forerunners.

3. THE SERPENT AND THE CROSS

By STEPHEN ANDREW.

The above is a powerful story by a new writer of the eternal conflict between Christianity and Materialism, and will cause much discussion in religious circles.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.
AT ALL LIBRARIES.

Four Further Novels—still in demand.

THE MARQUIS CATILINI.

By ROWLAND STRONG.

Daily Telegraph says: "This is a very remarkable novel. Brilliantly written, intensely vivid, it is that extremely rare combination of a tale of action and a perfect picture of real life and real human beings."

The Daily Telegraph continues: "We do not remember anything similar quite so good in English fiction. Wit sparkles on every page, not forced or irrelevant, but bubbling up from the vitality of the characters. 'The Marquis Catilini' is something new in novels. If freshness and genuine observation count, it will have a real success."

THE MASTER SCHEMER.

By VERE CAMPBELL.

Morning Post says: "A genuinely interesting book, and written evidently with conscientious care and often with real inspiration."

Globe says: "Mrs. Campbell's story will hold her readers enthralled by its mysteriousness."

Guardian says: "Plots and intrigues abound in Mrs. Vere Campbell's exciting narrative."

SECOND EDITION.

THE HUMAN MOLE.

By COLLIN COLLINS.

The Spectator says: "An exciting melodrama in which the reader will forget the incredibility of the means by which 'The Human Mole' attains his ends for the sake of the lively adventures that are described."

Pail Mall Gazette says: "Quite a new idea. Distinctly engrossing, and most skilfully designed to pin the reader's interest to it for hours at a time. We warn any seaside sojourner who picks up this book that he will not enjoy the sea or the scenery until he has finished it."

THIRD EDITION.

THE WANTON.

By FRANCES FORBES-ROBERTSON.

Of which M.A.P., in the issue of July 17, in the "Book of the Week" notice, said:—

"To give the story more fully would spoil the reading of the book; complication follows complication, and the love of Oesterle and Beltis keeps growing in spite of separation and imprisonment. But, as I have said above, clever and well conceived as is the plot and its development, Miss Forbes-Robertson's clear, well-chosen English, her learned comprehension of the characters and period about which she writes, and the general excellence of the handling of her materials, make her book one which cannot be passed over by lovers of sound and promising work."

OTHER RECENT NOVELS OF MERIT ARE

THE SPITFIRE	EDWARD PEPE
MOON OF THE VALLEYS	DAVID WHITELAW
REBIRTH	RATHMELL WILSON
ADVENTURES OF SUSAN	CYRUS BRADY
HENRY OF NAVARRE	MAY WYNNE

At all Libraries and Booksellers, Six Shillings each.

NOW READY.

SAM

By NORMAN ROE.

"Sam" is a delightful village idyll, full of humour and pathos, and can be had at all booksellers and railway book-stalls, price sixpence.

GREENING AND CO., LTD., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

MAUNSEL'S
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

J. M. SYNGE

Poems and Translations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

*. Will contain several Poems not included in the Index Press Edition.

The Will of the Saints. A new edition uniform with "The Playboy" 2s. 6d. net.

LADY GREGORY

A Kiltartan History Book. With Illustrations in colour, by Robert Gregory. Paper 1s. net, board 1s. 6d. net.

STEPHEN GROVNN, M.P.

Selections from the Prose and Poetry of Charlotte Grace O'Brien. With an Introductory Memoir. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

T. M. KETTLE, M.P.

The Day's Burden, Studies Literary and Political. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

SHANE LESLIE

Lough Dery in Ulster. The Story of St Patrick's Purgatory. Boards 1s. net.

PADRAIC COLUM

Wild Earth. A new edition with several poems added. 1s. net.

ROBERT ELLIOTT

Matthew Johnson, Poet, 1888-1898. With Introduction and Notes. 2s. 6d. net.

RUTHERFORD MAYNE

The Drone. A Comedy in three acts, and The Troth. Paper 1s. net.

S. L. ROBINSON

The Cross Roads. A Play in two acts, and a Prologue. 1s. net.

SEUMAN O'KELLY

The Shuiler's Child. A Play in three acts. 1s. net.

L. M. LITTLE

Poems. Royal 16mo, cover design by Beatrice Elvery. 2s. net.

ELLA YOUNG

The Coming of Lugh. A Celtic Wonder Tale, with Illustrations by Maude Gonne. Paper 6d. net.

MAUNSEL & CO., LTD., 96, MID ABBEY ST., DUBLIN.

FROM SEELEY & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY.

A MILITARY CONSUL IN TURKEY. By Captain A. F. TOWNSEND, lately British Military Consul at Adrianople. With 29 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

FAMILY NAMES AND THEIR STORY. By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," etc. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

BOTANY OF TO-DAY. By G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT, M.A., B.Sc., Author of "The Romance of Savage Life," etc. Extra Crown 8vo, with 27 Illustrations, 5s. net.

"One of the books that turn botany from a dry-as-dust into a fascinating study."—Evening Standard.

AERIAL NAVIGATION OF TO-DAY. By CHARLES C. TURNER. Extra crown 8vo, with 70 Illustrations, 5s. net.

"Sets forth the principles of flight in plain, non-technical language, for all to read and understand."—Daily Graphic.

THINGS SEEN IN HOLLAND. By C. E. ROCHE.

With 50 Illustrations, 16mo, cloth, 2s. net; lambskin, 3s. net.

"A very charming picture of life in Holland."—Liverpool Courier.

THINGS SEEN IN EGYPT. By E. L. BUTCHER.

With 50 Illustrations, 16mo, cloth, 2s. net; lambskin, 3s. net.

"Excellent writing."—Globe.

ASPECTS OF MODERN OXFORD. By A. D. GODLEY, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Magdalen College, Oxford. New and Cheaper Edition. Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; velvet leather, in box, 5s. net.

"The charm of Mr. Godley's book remains with its passages of humour and quiet satire and its excellent illustrations."—The Field.

"THE LIBRARY OF ROMANCE."—NEW VOLUMES.

With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. each.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN CHEMISTRY. By Professor JAMES C. PHILIP, D.Sc.

"Well written, interesting and accurate."—Standard.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN MANUFACTURE. By CHARLES R. GIBSON, Author of "Scientific Ideas of To-day," etc.

"A book everyone ought to read."—Queen.

LONDON: SEELEY & Co., LTD., 38, Great Russell Street.

- Lake Victoria to Khartoum with Rifle and Camera. By Captain F. A. Dickinson. Introduction by the Rt. Hon. Winston Spencer Churchill. (Lane. 12s. 6d.)
- The Isle of Man. By Agnes Herbert. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Soul of a Turk. By Mrs. de Bunsen. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Walks and People in Tuscany. By Sir Francis Vane. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Bosnia and Herzegovina. By Maude M. Holbach. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Egypt (La Mort de Philae). By Pierre Loti. (Laurie. 15s. net.)
- Where the Fishers Go. The Story of Labrador. By Rev. P. W. Browne. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- Old English Towns. By William Andrews. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Cathedrals and Churches of Belgium. By T. Francis Bumpus. (Laurie. 6s. net.)
- With the Flagship in the South. By C. E. W. Bean. (Laurie. 2s. 6d. net.)
- A Little Tour in India. By Beatrice Rundle. (Laurie. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Glimpses of East Africa and Zanzibar. By Ethel Young-husband. (Long. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Sicilian Ways and Days. By Signora Louise Caico. (Long. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Quetta to Queenborough: My Overland Trek from India, by Side-Saddle, Camel, and Rail. By Edith Fraser Benn. (Longmans.)
- Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Dr. Sven Hedin. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 30s. net.)
- In the Grip of the Nyika. Further Adventures in British East Africa. By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. Patterson. (Macmillan.)
- The Gates of India. By Colonel Sir Thomas H. Holdrich. (Macmillan.)
- Highways and Byways in Middlesex. By Walter Jerrold. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson. (Macmillan. 6s.)
- The Northward Trek. The Making of Rhodesia. By Stanley P. Hyatt. (Melrose. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Wanderer in Paris. By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Tyrol and Its People. By Clive Holland. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Rome. By Edward Hutton. (Methuen. 6s.)
- The Autocar Road-Book. By Charles G. Harper. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Among the Danes. By F. M. Butlin. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- By the Waters of Egypt. By Norma Lorimer. (Methuen. 16s. net.)
- In the Canaries with a Camera. By Margaret d'Este. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Essex. By J. Charles Cox. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
- In the Torrid Sudan. By H. Lincoln Tangye. (Murray.)
- Zambezia. By R. C. F. Maugham. (Murray.)
- The Great Wall of China. By Dr. W. E. Geil. (Murray.)
- Italy To-day. By Thomas Okey and Bolton King. (Nisbet. 6s. net.)
- A German Staff Officer in India. By Count Hans von Koenigsmarck. (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Spain of the Spanish. By Mrs. Villiers-Wardell. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
- Switzerland of the Swiss. By Frank Webb. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
- Germany of the Germans. By R. Berry. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
- Castles and Châteaux of Old Burgundy. Including those of Dauphiny and Savoy. By Francis Miltoun and Blanche McManus. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Dominion of New Zealand. By Sir Arthur P. Douglas. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Spain of To-day from Within. By Manuel Andujar. (Revell. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Snapshots from Sunny Africa. By Helen E. Springer. (Revell. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Empires of the Far East. By Lancelot Lawton. (Richards. 2 vols. 24s. net.)
- The Great Pacific Coast. By C. Reginald Enock. (Richards. 16s. net.)
- Spain: A Study of her Life and Arts. By Royall Tyler. (Richards. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Portugal. By Ernest Oldmeadow. (Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Labrador: Its Discovery, Exploration, and Development. By W. G. Gosling. (Rivers. 21s. net.)

A SELECTION FROM JAMES CLARKE & CO.'S NEW LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

AN EXCEPTIONALLY STRONG NEW NOVEL.

FACES IN THE MIST By J. A. STEUART

Author of "The Minister of State," "Wine on the Lees," "A Son of Gad," &c. With Four Illustrations by T. H. ROBINSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

The plot of this story is laid in the Highlands and is full of dramatic interest.

J. B. PATON, M.A., D.D., Educational and Social Pioneer. By JAMES MARCHANT. Photogravure Portrait and Illustrations on art paper. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

ASPECTS OF THE SPIRITUAL. By J. BRIERLEY, B.A. Author of "Sidelights on Religion," "Ourselves and the Universe," &c. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

LIFE IN HIS NAME. A Devotional Volume. By DAVID M. M'INTYRE, Author of "The Hidden Life of Prayer," &c. Handsomely bound in cloth boards, gilt edges, with headband and marker, 3s. 6d. net.

INTERLUDES IN A TIME OF CHANCE: Ethical, Social, Theological. By JAMES MORRIS WHITON, Ph.D. (Yale), Author of "Divine Satisfaction," &c. Cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

MODERN THEORIES OF SIN. By W. E. ORCHARD, D.D. Thesis approved for the Degree of Doctor of Divinity in the University of London. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

EVANGELICAL HETERODOXY. By J. MORGAN GIBBON, Author of "The Epistle to the Galatians." Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

A CHALLENGE TO MONISM.

PROBLEMS OF IMMANENCE. Studies Critical and Constructive. By J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., D.Phil., Author of "The New Evangel," "Jesus: Seven Questions," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

SCULPTORS OF LIFE. A Book for Young Men and Women. By THOMAS YATES. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

THE EDUCATION OF A SOUL. By CHARLES H. BETTS, Author of "Fragments of Thought." Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

SONGS OF JOY AND FAITH. Poems by MARIANNE FARNINGHAM. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

THE CHURCH AND THE NEXT GENERATION. By RICHARD ROBERTS, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. net.

THE FAITH OF A WAYFARER. By ARTHUR PRINGLE. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d. net.

LONDON: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 & 14, FLEET STREET, E.C., and all Booksellers.

GRANT RICHARDS'S Announcements

A SELECTION

OXFORD: ITS BUILDINGS AND GARDENS. By R. A. DURAND. With thirty-two reproductions from drawings in colour by W. A. WILDMAN. Large post 4to, cloth gilt. 21s. net. Large paper edition, limited to 100 copies, £2 2s. net.

THE GREAT PACIFIC COAST. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S., author of "The Andes and the Amazon," "Mexico," &c. With thirty-two illustrations and a map. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 16s. net.

BALZAC. By FREDERICK LAWTON, M.A., author of "Rodin," "The Third French Republic," &c. With thirty-two illustrations in half-tone. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 12s. 6d. net.

MANET AND THE FRENCH IMPRESSIONISTS. By THEODORE DURET. Translated by J. E. Crawford Flitch. Illustrated with etchings and wood engravings, and with thirty-two reproductions in half-tone. Crown 4to, cloth gilt. 12s. 6d. net.

EGYPT OF YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY. By PERCY WITHERS, M.B., B.S. With thirty-two reproductions from photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

MAN'S SURVIVAL AFTER DEATH. By the Rev. C. L. TWEEDALE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THE TRAGEDY OF NAN, &c. By JOHN MASEFIELD. Large post 8vo, paper boards, 3s. 6d. net.

THE VALIDITY OF ENGLISH ORDINATIONS. By CHRISTOS ADROUTSOS. Translated and Edited by F. W. Groves Campbell, LL.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

FICTION

ARSENE LUPIN VERSUS HOLMLOCK SHEARS. By MAURICE LEBLANC. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Ready.]

THE UPPER HAND. By Mrs. FREDERICK DAWSON. 6s. [Ready.]

THE ADVENTURES OF A NICE YOUNG MAN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Ready.]

THE LIMIT. By ADA LEVERSON, author of "Love's Shadow," &c. 6s. [November.]

GRANT RICHARDS, 7, Carlton Street, London, S.W.

Mr. Elkin Mathews' List.

THE LATE FATHER TYRRELL'S LAST BOOK.

VERSIONS AND PERVERSIONS OF HEINE AND OTHERS. With a Preface. By GEORGE TYRRELL. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

ENGLAND AND OTHER POEMS. By LAURENCE BINYON. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [In the Press.]

SHADOW-SHAPES (Short Stories and Nature Sketches). By ELLA ERSKINE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE 'BROTHER LUIZ DE SOUSA' OF VISCONT DE ALMEIDA GARRETT. Now for the first time done into English, with a Memorial Introduction by EDGAR PRESTAGE. Royal 16mo, 3s. net.

ROSE AND VINE. By RACHEL ANNAND TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Immediately.]

EXULTATIONS OF EZRA POUND. Author of "Personal." Printed at the Chiswick Press. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

MARIONETTES. By FRANCIS MACNAMARA. 8vo, 5s. net. [Immediately.]

A SUMMER GARDEN. By ANNETTE FURNESS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

ARTEMISON: IDYLLS AND SONGS. By MAURICE HEWLETT. Royal 16mo, 3s. 6d. net. Also a limited edition uniform with Mr. Hewlett's romances. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

DAMIEN OF MOLOKAI: Poems. By WILBUR UNDERWOOD. Royal 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

A LITTLE FLEET. One of JACK B. YEATS'S Books for Children. With 12 illustrations. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net. [Immediately.]

MEADOWS OF PLAY (Verses for Children). By MARGARET ARNDT. With an Introductory Letter by G. K. CHESTERTON. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

GOODCHILD'S GARLAND. By HENRY NEMO. Royal 16mo, Wrappers, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

LETO SUPPLIANT. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 2s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

IN THE NET OF THE STARS. By F. S. FLINT. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [In the Press.]

"SATCHEL" SERIES—New Volume.

AIRY NOTHINGS: Humorous Verse. By JESSIE POPE. Author of "Paper Pellets." Fcap. 8vo, Wrapper, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]

London: Elkin Mathews, Vigo Street, W.

READY OCTOBER 26th.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF HENRY M. STANLEY.

Compiled from Material left for the purpose. By the Great African Explorer. Edited by his Wife, LADY STANLEY. With 16 Illustrations in photogravure and map. Medium 8vo, buckram gilt, gilt top. Price 21s. net. Large paper Edition de Luxe, Imperial 8vo, handsomely bound, printed on English hand-made paper, limited to 250 copies, each numbered and signed by Lady Stanley, 3 Guineas net.

NEW AND SUPERB EDITION.

Pictures in Colour by C. E. Brittan and C. E. Brock.

LORNA DOONE: A Romance of Exmoor.

By the late R. D. BLACKMORE. New Dulverton Edition, crown 4to, best cloth, extra gilt, gilt top. Price 21s. net. Large paper Edition de Luxe, limited to 250 copies. Demy 4to, full Morocco gilt, British hand-made paper, deckle edges. Each copy numbered. Price £3 3s. net.

UNTRAVELLED BERKSHIRE.

By Miss L. SALMON. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net. Illustrated.

Reading Mercury: "Miss Salmon's style is easy and graceful, imparting a great deal of information."

A TIMELY BOOK ON ANTI-SUFFRAGE.

THE ENGLISHWOMAN'S HOME.

The Working Woman's Plea for Exemption from Political Responsibility.

By M. E. S. CR. 8vo, neat paper boards, 1s. net; cloth, 2s. net. The Times: "A sane and useful exposition of the case against woman's suffrage."

FROM THE FOUR WINDS.

By FRANCIS SINCLAIR. Author of "Ballads and Poems from the Pacific," "Where the Sun Sets," "Under the North Star and Southern Cross," &c., &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. Price 6s.

AN APPROPRIATE HUNTING PRESENT
READY SHORTLY.

BRITISH HUNTING.

A complete History of the National Sport of Great Britain and Ireland from earliest records. Compiled and edited for "The Sportsman" by ARTHUR W. COATEN. Imperial 4to (15 by 11). Fully illustrated by photogravures, colour prints, and photographic reproductions. Splendidly printed from new type on highly finished art paper, handsomely bound in full Morocco leather. Appropriate design. Gilt edges. Price £15 15s. net. Also in half leather, price £10 10s. net. The work is limited to 500 copies.

LONDON:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., 100, Southwark St., S.E.

GAY & HANCOCK'S LIST.

The "Art of Life" Series

Edited by EDWARD HOWARD GRIGGS.

The Use of the Margin

By E. H. GRIGGS.

Things Worth While

By T. W. HIGGINSON.

Where Knowledge Fails

By EARL BARNES.

Self Measurement

By W. DE WITTE HYDE.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 1/- net each.

The Wisdom of Confucius

With an Introduction.

By R. DIMSDALE STOCKER. Cloth, Gilt top, 2/6 net. Velvet Calf, Boxed, 5/- net.

Choosing a Vocation

By FRANK PARSONS, Ph.D.

Size: 8½ in. by 5½ in. 176 pp., Cloth, 4/6 net.

A Handbook of Modern French Painting

By D. CADY EATON, M.A. Size: 8 by 5½ in. 400 pp. with 250 Full Page Illustrations, Cloth Gilt, 8/6 net.

Fairy Tales from Folk-Lore

By HERSCHEL WILLIAMS.

Crown 8vo, 300 pp. 24 Illustrations. Cloth Gilt, 5/-

GAY & HANCOCK, Ltd., Publishers, London.

- A Military Consul in Turkey. By Captain A. F. Townshend. (Seeley. 16s. net.)
 The Miniature Portfolio Monographs. The Isle of Wight. By C. J. Cornish. (Seeley. 2s. net.)
 Through Persia, from the Gulf to the Caspian. By F. B. Bradley-Birt. (Smith, Elder. 12s. 6d. net.)
 Romantic Corsica. Wanderings in Napoleon's Isle. By George Renwick. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
 The Journal of an Expedition across Venezuela and Columbia, 1906-1907. By Hiram Bingham. (Unwin. 10s. net.)
 Handbook of Alaska: Its Resources, Products, and Attractions. By Major-General A. W. Greely. (Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)

YOUNG PEOPLE'S BOOKS.

- Historical Plays for Children. By Amice Macdonnell. (Allen. 6d. net each.)
 The Children's Book of Gardening. By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick and Mrs. Paynter. (Black. 6s.)
 The Children's Book of Art. By Agnes Ethel Conway and Sir Martin Conway. (Black. 6s.)
 Children's Tales of English Minsters. By Elizabeth Grier-son. (Black. 6s.)
 Beasts of Business. By Ascott R. Hope. (Black. 3s. 6d.)
 The Story of Robin Hood and His Merry Men. By John Finnemore. (Black. 3s. 6d.)
 The Child's World in Pictures. By Clotilde von Wyss. (Black. 1s. 4d.)
 The Arabian Nights. Selected and Retold by Gladys Davidson. (Blackie. 5s.)
 A Hero of Sedan. By Captain F. S. Brereton. (Blackie. 6s.)
 Ford of H.M.S. Vigilant. By Staff-Surgeon T. T. Jeans. (Blackie. 5s.)
 Through the Heart of Tibet. By Alexander Macdonald. (Blackie. 6s.)
 Saturday's Children. By Winifred James. (Blackie. 6s.)
 The Nicest Girl in the School. By Angela Brazil. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)
 The Islanders. By Theodora W. Wilson. (Blackie. 2s. 6d.)
 Cassell's Annual for Boys and Girls. (Cassell. 3s. 6d.)
 Aylwyn's Friends. By L. T. Meade. (Chambers. 6s.)
 Muriel and Her Aunt Lu. By May Baldwin. (Chambers. 5s.)
 His First Term. By J. Finnemore. (Chambers. 5s.)
 The Rainbow Book. By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham and others. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)
 Camping in the Forest. (Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d. net.)
 Kings and Queens of England. By Ewing G. Ritchie and Basil Procter. (Chatto & Windus. 1s. net.)
 Dick's Angel. By Mrs. Edwin Hohler. (Constable. 2s.)
 Heidi. By Johanna Spyri. Translated from the German by Marian Edwardes. (Dent. 5s. net.)
 Old Man's Beard and Other Tales. By G. M. Faulding. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
 The Lion of de Montfort. By Roland Horne. (Dent. 4s.)
 The Child of the Air. By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann. (Duckworth. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Forest Foundling. By S. H. Hamer. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.)
 The Castle of Four Towers. By Netta Syrett. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.)
 The Pond and Other Stories. By Carl Ewald. Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. (Everett. 6s. net.)
 Jack the Rascal. By George Manville Fenn. (Everett. 5s.)
 Fairy Tales from Folk Lore. By Herschel Williams. (Gay & Hancock. 5s.)
 The Story of Hereward. Retold by Douglas C. Stedman. (Harrap. 5s. net.)
 Stories from the Faerie Queene. Retold by Lawrence H. Dawson. (Harrap. 5s. net.)
 Cuchulain, the Hound of Ulster. Retold from Celtic MSS. by Eleanor Hull. (Harrap. 5s. net.)
 Stories from English History Series—
 French History. By Lena Dalkeith. (Jack. 1s. 6d. net.)
 The Child's English Literature. By H. E. Marshall. (Jack. 7s. 6d. net.)

- Legends and Stories of Italy for Children. By Amy Steedman. (Jack. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "Told to the Children" Series—
 Stories from Dante. By Mary Macgregor.
 Stories from Wagner. By C. E. Smith. (Jack. 1s. 6d. net each.)
 Mokey: The Autobiography of a Donkey. By the Comtesse de Ségur. Translated by Kathleen C. Watson. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.)
 Boys of the Brigade. By Ernest Protheroe. (Jarrold. 3s. 6d.)
 The League of Life. By Morice Gerrard. (Jarrold. 1s. net.)
 The Grizzly Bear. By William H. Wright. (Laurie. 7s. 6d. net.)
 The Red Book of Heroes. By Mrs. Lang. (Longmans. 6s.)
 Golliwogg in the African Jungle. By Florence K. Upton and Bertha Upton. (Longmans. 6s.)
 A Little Fleet. By Jack B. Yeats. (Mathews. 1s. net.)
 Meadows of Play. By Margaret Arndt. With Introductory Letter by G. K. Chesterton. (Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)
 The Fairy Ring: A Children's Play in Four Acts. By Gertrude H. Witherby. (Mathews. 1s. net.)
 Miss Manners. By Aileen Orr. (Melrose. 6s.)
 The Children's Story of Westminster Abbey. By Miss G. E. Troutbeck. (Mills & Boon. 5s. net.)
 The Children's Story of the Bee. By S. L. Bensusan. (Mills & Boon. 5s. net.)
 A Book of Golden Deeds. (Nelson. 6s. net.)
 Gateway to Romance. (Nelson. 5s. net.)
 Britain Overseas. (Nelson. 4s. net.)
 Famous Men and Women. (Nelson. 4s. net.)
 The Coming of Navarre. By O. V. Caine. (Nisbet. 5s.)
 Kitty Aubrey. By Katharine Tynan. (Nisbet. 6s.)
 The Story of Little Black Bobtail. (Nisbet. 1s. net.)
 Children of India. By Janet H. Kelman. (Oliphant, Anderson. 1s. 6d. net.)
 Children of China. By C. Campbell Brown. (Oliphant, Anderson. 1s. 6d. net.)
 "Not Out!": A Public School Story. By Kent Carr. (Partridge. 5s.)
 Trapper Dan. A Story of the Backwoods. By George Manville Fenn. (Partridge. 5s.)
 The Boy's Book of the Sea. By W. H. Simmonds. (Partridge. 3s. 6d.)
 A Child's Guide to Mythology. By Helen A. Clarke. (Stanley Paul. 5s. net.)
 A Child's Guide to Pictures. By Charles H. Caffin. (Stanley Paul. 5s. net.)
 A Book of Brave Boys all the World Over. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Stanley Paul. 5s.)
 A Book of Brave Girls at Home and Abroad. Edited by Alfred H. Miles. (Stanley Paul. 5s.)
 The Empire Annual for Boys. Edited by A. R. Buckland. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)
 The Empire Annual for Girls. Edited by A. R. Buckland. (Religious Tract Society. 3s. 6d.)
 The Boys' Book of Railways. By J. R. Howden. (Richards. 6s.)
 The Boys' Book of Airships. By Harry Delacombe. (Richards. 6s.)
 The Sunken Submarine. By Captain Danvit. (Richards. 5s.)
 Plays for Schools—
 Cinderella. By E. Nesbit.
 Thackeray's The Rose and the Ring. By Ethel Sidgwick. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 6d. net each.)
 Prince Madog; or the Welshman who Discovered America, A.D. 1170. By Joan Dane. (Stock. 6s. net.)
 The Irish Fairy Book. By Alfred Perceval Graves. (Unwin. 6s.)
 The Ivory Hunters. By Dr. Gordon Stables. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)
 Fugitives from Fortune. By Ethel Turner. (Ward, Lock. 3s. 6d.)
 A Wonder-Book of Beasts. Edited by F. J. Harvey Darton. (Wells, Gardner. 6s.)
 The Animal Why Book. By W. P. Pycraft. (Wells, Gardner. 5s. net.)
 Robin Hood and His Merry Men. By Mary Macleod. (Wells, Gardner. 1s. 6d. net.)
 Old English Stories. By F. J. Harvey Darton. (Wells, Gardner. 1s. net.)

THE "R.T.S." NEW LIST.

W. G. LAWES, OF SAVAGE ISLAND AND NEW GUINEA.

By JOSEPH KING. With Preface by Dr. WARDLAW THOMPSON. Map, Portrait, and many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net. [Ready, Oct. 11.]

GEORGE GRENFELL: CONGO MISSIONARY & EXPLORER.

By Rev. GEORGE HAWKER. With Photogravure Portrait, Maps, and 32 pages of Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

Depicted in 24 Original Coloured Pictures by HAROLD COPPING. Described by the Right Rev. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE, D.D., Lord Bishop of Durham. Handsome folio (16½ by 12½), artistically bound in white cloth, gilt, 16s. net. Second Edition.

THE TEMPLE, ITS MINISTRY, AND SERVICES,

as they were at the time of Jesus Christ. By the Rev. Dr. EDERSHEIM. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. New Edition.

SCENES FROM THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL.

By the Rev. J. HOWSON, D.D., late Dean of Chester. New Edition, with 8 new Coloured Plates by HAROLD COPPING. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE HANDY NATURAL HISTORY. — MAMMALS.

By ERNEST PROTHEROE, F.Z.S. With Coloured Frontispiece and Title-page, 32 Plates in Colour, 48 Black-and-White Plates and 114 Illustrations in Text. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

S. R. CROCKETT'S NEW STORY — THE MEN OF THE MOUNTAIN.

A Stirring Story of the Franco-German War. By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "The White Plumes of Navarre," "The Lilac Sunbonnet," &c. With 16 Illustrations by HAROLD COPPING. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

HELEN H. WATSON'S NEW STORY — LOVE THE INTRUDER:

A Modern Romance. By HELEN H. WATSON, Author of "Andrew Goodfellow," &c. Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

OUT OF THE DARKNESS.

Illustrations of Adventure, Suffering, Progress, and Blessing in the Mission-field. By ANDREW D. STEWART, a Director of the London Missionary Society. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE PRINTED ENGLISH BIBLE. (1525-1885.)

By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A. With Portraits and Facsimiles. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

CUR DEUS HOMO? Why did God become Man?

By ANSELM ARCH-BISHOP OF CANTERBURY. Translated from the Original Latin. Foolscape 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 1s. net. Also in sheepskin, 1s. 6d. net.

BEZA'S ICONES. — Contemporary Portraits of Reformers of Religion and Letters.

Being Facsimile Reproductions of the Portraits in Beza's "Icones" (1580) and in Goulard's Edition (1851). With Introduction and Biographies by C. G. MCCRIE, D.D.; and 51 Portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Cheaper Edition.

CHRIST INVISIBLE OUR GAIN.

"Early Bible Songs," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

By the Rev. A. H. DRYSDALE, D.D., Author of "A Devotional Commentary on the Epistle to Philemon," CALVIN: The Man and his Work.

cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

By the Rev. C. H. IRWIN, M.A. With Portraits and numerous other Illustrations. Second Edition, crown 8vo,

RECORDS OF MERCY.

The Mercy of God Illustrated by Narratives of Divine Grace, Collected and Edited by the Rev. C. S. ISAACSON, M.A. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE TRIUMPHS OF THE CROSS.

Brief Counsels on Faith and Duty. By Dr R. F. HORTON. 1s. net.

AMY LE FEUVRE'S NEW STORY FOR BOYS AND GIRLS—

"US, AND OUR DONKEY." By AMY LE FEUVRE, Author of "Probable Songs," "Teddy's Button," &c. With four Illustrations by W. H. C. GROOMK. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.

FOR QUEEN AND EMPEROR.

A Story of Valour and Adventure. By ERNEST PROTHEROE, Author of "From Scapegrace to Hero," "Bob Marchant's Scholarship," &c. With Coloured Frontispiece and Title-page, and 8 Illustrations in Black-and-White, by J. FINNEMORE, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

NEW ANNUAL GIFT-BOOKS.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL.

First Volume of New Series.

768 large pages, 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates and hundreds of other Illustrations, handsome cloth gilt, 8s.

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL.

832 pages, with 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates and hundreds of other pictures, handsome cloth gilt, 8s.

THE EMPIRE ANNUAL FOR GIRLS.

Edited by A. R. BUCKLAND, M.A., 384 pages, demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with Coloured and other Pictures, 3s. 6d.

THE EMPIRE ANNUAL FOR BOYS.

Edited by A. R. BUCKLAND, M.A., 384 pages, demy 8vo cloth gilt, with coloured and other Pictures, 3s. 6d.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME ANNUAL.

Imperial 8vo, 960 pages, with 12 Coloured or Tinted Plates, and over 500 other Illustrations, handsome cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, London, E.C.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's Announcements

Full particulars of the following and many other interesting New Books are given in Mr. FISHER UNWIN'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENT LIST, a copy of which will be sent post free to any address on application.

Town Planning in Practice.—An Introduction to the Art of Designing Cities and Suburbs. By RAYMOND UNWIN. With 300 Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Crown 4to, cloth. 21s. net; post free, 21s. 6d.

The Record of the University Boat Race, 1829-1909, and Register of those who have taken part in it. Revised and completed to date by C. M. PITMAN, O.U.B.C. With a Frontispiece. Medium 8vo, cloth. (Edition limited to 550 Copies, of which 500 are for sale.) 21s. net; post free, 21s. 4d.

French Cathedrals, Monasteries, and Abbeys, and Sacred Sights of France. By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. With 183 Illustrations from Drawings by JOSEPH PENNELL, and Plans and Diagrams. Royal 8vo, cloth, 20s. net. (Uniform with "English Cathedrals.") 20s. net; post free, 20s. 6d.

Men and Manners of Old Florence.—By GUIDO BIAGI, Librarian of the Laurentian and Riccardi Libraries, Florence. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 48 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 15s. net; post free, 15s. 5d.

A Beau Sabreur.—Maurice de Saxe, Marshal of France, His Loves, His Laurels, and his Times (1696-1750). By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE, Author of "Seven Splendid Sinners," &c. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 38 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 15s. net; post free, 15s. 5d.

The French Procession.—A Pageant of Great Writers. By Madame DUCLAUX (Mary Robinson). With 6 Photogravure Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth. 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 10d.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. JUSSERAND. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth. 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 11d.

The Far Eastern Question.—By THOMAS F. MILLARD. Demy 8vo, cloth. 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 10d.

The Birth of Modern Italy.—The Posthumous Papers of Jesse White Mario. Edited, with Introduction, Notes and Epilogue, by the Duke LITTA-VISCONTI-ARESE. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 40 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 11d.

In Three Legations: Turin, Florence, The Hague, 1856-1872. By Madame CHARLES DE BUNSEN (née WADDINGTON). With 2 Photogravure Plates and 48 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 10d.

Inns, Ales, and Drinking Customs of Old England.—By F. W. HACKWOOD, Author of "Old English Sports." With a Coloured Frontispiece and 53 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net; post free, 10s. 11d.

New Zealand in Evolution: Industrial, Economic, and Political.—By GUY H. SCHOLEFIELD. With 49 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net; post free, 10s. 11d.

Romantic Corsica. Wanderings in Napoleon's Isle.—By GEORGE RENWICK. With 56 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net; post free, 10s. 11d.

Life in an English Village.—A Study of the History and Economic Conditions of the Parish of Corsley in Wiltshire. By MAUD F. DAVIES. With a Map and 6 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. 6d. net; post free, 10s. 11d.

After Death—What? Spiritistic Phenomena and their Interpretation.—By CESARE LOMBROSO, Alienist Professor of Psychiatry in the University of Turin, Author of "The Female Offender," &c. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth. 10s. net; post free, 10s. 6d.

Psychotherapy.—By HUGO MUNSTERBERG, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D., LL.D., Professor of Psychology in Harvard University. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d. net; post free, 8s. 11d.

Great Issues.—By the REV. R. F. HORTON, D.D. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Medium 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d. net; post free, 7s. 11d.

The Evolution of the Sciences.—By L. HOULLEVIGUE, Professor in the University of Marseilles. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. 6d. net; post free, 6s. 10d.

Monthly Cleanings in a Scottish Garden.—By L. H. SOUTAR, Author of "A Highland Web," &c. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 24 Half-Tone Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. net; post free, 6s. 4d.

The Rosebud and Other Tales.—By ARTHUR KELLY. With 20 Coloured Illustrations by WALTER CRANE. Crown 4to, cloth. 6s. net; post free, 6s. 4d.

A New Novel by H. C. WELLS

"ANN VERONICA." 6s., post free.

OTHER SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

GOD'S CLAY. By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW.

CRICKET HERON. By IRVING BACHELLER.

CUT OFF FROM THE WORLD. By FRANK T. BULLEN.

THE MAN WHO STOLE THE EARTH. By W. HOLT WHITE.

THE POOLS OF SILENCE. By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

JENNY PETERS. By C. H. DUDLEY WARD.

TWO WOMEN. By BARONESS D'ANETHAN.

The International Art Series.—Monographs by Well-Known Art Critics, elaborately illustrated with Reproductions in Colour, Photogravure, and Half-Tone. Vol. I. WILLIAM HOGARTH. By EDWARD HUTTON. 5s. net each; postage 4d. extra.

The Irish Fairy Book.—By ALFRED PERCIVAL GRAVES. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 100 Illustrations in Red and Black by GEORGE P. DENHAM. Small demy 8vo, cloth. 6s., post free.

Tanglewood Tales.—A Wonder Book for Boys and Girls. By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE. With 4 Coloured Plates and 90 Illustrations in Black and Red by WILLY FOGANY. Small demy 8vo, cloth. 6s., post free.

How to be Happy though Civil; a Book of Manners.—By the Rev. E. J. HARDY, Author of "How to be Happy Though Married." Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net; post free, 5s. 5d.

Greece in Evolution.—Studies Prepared under the Auspices of the French League for the Defence of the Rights of Hellenism. By TH. HOMOLLE, HENRY HOUSSAYE, TH. REINACH, ED. THERY, G. DESCHAMPS, CH. DIEHL, G. FOUGERES, J. PSICHARI, A. BELL, M. PAILLARES. With a Preface by the Right Hon. Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, M.P. Translated from the French under the Editorship of G. F. ABBOTT. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d.

Chats on Old Silver.—By E. L. LOWES, Author of "Chats on Old Lace." With a Coloured Frontispiece and 64 other Full-Page Plates. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d. [Unwin's "Chats" Series.]

How to Study the Stars.—Astronomy with Small Telescopes and the Naked Eye, and Notes on Celestial Photography. By L. RUDAUX. Translated by A. H. KEANE, LL.D., F.R.G.S. With 79 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d.

The Secret of the Sargasso.—By ROBERT M. MACDONALD. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 16 other Illustrations by ARCHIBALD WEBB. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 5s., post free.

Chillagoe Charlie.—By ROBERT M. MACDONALD. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 16 other Illustrations by ARCHIBALD WEBB. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 5s., post free.

Leisure Hours with Nature.—By E. P. LARKEN. With 71 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 5s., post free.

No Refuge but in Truth.—By GOLDWIN SMITH. Revised and Enlarged Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth. 4s. 6d. net; post free, 4s. 9d.

Wireless Telegraphy and Wireless Telephony.—By A. E. KENNELLY, Professor of Electrical Engineering in Harvard University. With 84 Illustrations. 4s. net; post free, 4s. 4d.

The Religion of H. C. Wells, and other Essays.—By the Rev. ALEXANDER H. CRAWFORD, M.A., Author of "Recollections of James Martineau," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d. net; post free, 3s. 10d.

The Fairies' Fountain, and other Stories.—By the COUNTESS EVELYN MARTINENGO CESARESCO. With 16 Full-page Illustrations and many other Decorations by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d. net; post free, 3s. 10d.

Success Secrets.—By O. S. MARDEN, Author of "Peace, Power, and Plenty." Pott 8vo, 3s. 6d. net; post free, 3s. 8d.

Ballads of a Cheechako.—By ROBERT W. SERVICE, Author of "Songs of a Sourdough." Cloth. 3s. 6d. net; post free, 3s. 9d.

These books are on sale at all Booksellers, Libraries, and Bookstalls.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 3.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. 3d. Abroad. 1d.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	105	The Government and the Suffragettes. By "How it Strikes a Contemporary" ...	124
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		The Psychology of the Militant Suffrage Movement. By Mrs. A. Amy Brooke ...	124
Misplaced Magnanimity ...	108	The Death of Ferrer. By Mrs. Cobden Sickett ...	124
The Office of the Budget ...	109	"Revaluations." By A.W. Benn ...	124
The Spanish Peril ...	110	The Church Congress and Socialism. By the Rev. John A. Grant ...	125
The Grounds of Anglo-German Peace ...	111	Compulsory Purchase in Ireland. By Edward Greir, B.L. ...	125
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Elections on Sunday. By Albert Raphael ...	125
American Ambassadors ...	113	"Smith." By Boyle Lawrence ...	126
The "Tommy" of Old ...	114	A Request for Information. By A. Thirion ...	126
Chateaubriand ...	115	An Experiment in Rural Housing. By Legal ...	126
Co-Partnership in Nature. By J.A.H. ...	116	POETRY:—
CONTEMPORARIES:—		Simplicity. By F.S. Flint ...	126
A French Chamberlain. By R.E.D. ...	117	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	127
THE DRAMA:—		Books to be Read ...	127
"One of God's Dandies." By William Archer ...	118	REVIEWS:—
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		The Christian Renaissance. By Herbert Paul ...	128
Young Turkey as a Military Power. By Your Balkan Correspondent ...	119	Eighteenth Century Advertisers ...	129
COMMUNICATIONS:—		The Place of Grieg ...	129
Government by Bureaucracy. By E. Belfort Bax ...	121	The Soul of St. Paul ...	131
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Classic and Romantic ...	131
The People's Suffrage Federation. By Emily Hobhouse ...	121	The World Invisible ...	132
The Period of the Dissolution. By a Liberal M.P. ...	122	BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
The House of Lords as a Senate. By Herbert John Doree ...	122	Tremendous Trifles ...	134
Suffragists and Suffragettes. By J. Rankine Finlayson ...	123	One Day and Another ...	134
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Lucellum ...	136

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Prime Minister had an audience with the King early on Tuesday afternoon, his visit to Buckingham Palace closely following a summons to Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour. These visits, which seem to be the sequel of Mr. Asquith's journey to Balmoral and the King's interview with Lord Cawdor, a member of the "wild peer" section, have caused much comment, and, under the guise of rebuking the Ministry and their spokesmen, the Opposition Press has hardly concealed its dislike of the King's intervention, such as it is. For our part, we do not suppose that it has gone, either on his Majesty's part or that of the Prime Minister, an inch beyond the proprieties of the case. We can understand that those who are proposing to burn a man's house down have obvious reasons for desiring its master to abstain from making inquiries. But if the King has been informed by Lord Cawdor or another that the Constitution is to be put in the melting-pot, it seems both proper and timely to ask Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne to confirm or deny this account, and to inform his chief adviser that he has consulted these gentlemen. We do not know whether this has taken place, but we are quite sure that nothing more has occurred. Least of all do we imagine that the Prime Minister has either been asked to make proposals on the situation, or has made them. The King, we suppose, has inquired about it. Does anyone suggest that he has not a perfect right to do so?

* * *

AT Newcastle, on Saturday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a series of spirited and brilliantly successful speeches in defence of the Budget, which woke great enthusiasm in his audiences and moved the "Daily Telegraph" to a vein of personal abuse almost worthy of the Duke of Rutland. The chief argumentative feature of these speeches was a graphic recital of the processes under which the Yorkshire and South Wales Coalfields were made to yield the most enormous fines by way of rents and royalties paid to the men who owned the land by all classes and grades of men who worked it. In all, South Wales had paid one and a-half million in royalties and hundreds of thousands in ground rents. As for the railways, every railway train, goods or passenger, contained at least one truck carrying interest on the excessive prices paid to the landlords. The Chancellor was very firm on the Constitutional question. The taxes would go up to the Lords and must be passed—all or none. (Great cheering.) The Commons alone had control of supplies, and they would stand to the rights their fathers had won with blood. The Constitution was sacred as long as it protected wealth. When it threw its mantle over the people it was to be torn to pieces. But if the Lords forced a Revolution the people would direct it, and then issues should be raised of which the Peers little dreamed.

* * *

As for the wrath against the Budget, it came from two classes, the Protectionists, who wanted to tax food, and the landlords. The latter hated it because of the valuation, which would end their power to get from four to forty times the agricultural value of their land when it was wanted for industrial or public purposes, and because of the expanding character of these taxes. The Budget was no attack on property, as was shown by the signs of trade recovery. There had, indeed, been a slump in Dukes, who were as costly as "Dreadnoughts," and quite as great a terror. It was against landlords and not against tariffs that the people wanted the protection which the Budget would give. Money was wanted for national defence and for pensions, and public-spirited wealth ought to be honored by the chance of putting "a little money into the poor-box." The speech, with its popular vein and power of illustration, will be read, like the Limehouse oration, by the hundred thousand.

* * *

ON Thursday the second reading of the Development Bill, persuasively commended by Lord Carrington as a measure for the relief of agriculture and even of righteous landlords, was passed by the House of Lords without a division. Moreover, Lord Onslow took occasion to remark that the financial provision for the Bill was "the affair" of the Government, an obiter dictum probably intended for the wrecking peers. But the threats of amendment were ominous. Thus Lord Lansdowne plainly hinted that the House would have nothing to do with the very moderate proposal (which embodies the practice of dozens of local councils) to have regard to the state of the labor market in setting up work under the Bill. He was also for stiffening the Parliamentary control of the expenditure, which points to an infringement of privilege, for assimilating the Road Board to the Development Commission, and for eliminating the power to acquire land bordering on motor roads.

THE execution of Señor Ferrer is the last and, perhaps, the worst crime of the Spanish Clericals against their country. The Government can hardly have believed the political charges against him. The only evidence of his complicity with the Barcelona rising was a document placed in his house by the police—a trick that Hébert used to be fond of; all the other evidence related to alleged incidents in Ferrer's past life on which he had already stood his trial. His real crime was that he had founded the "Modern" School and had worked to free education in Spain from the tyranny of the priest; and, in consenting to mask clerical persecutions behind a trumped-up political charge, the Spanish Government gave a painful exhibition of moral cowardice and of its subservience to the priest-politicians who are ruining the country.

* * *

THE execution of Ferrer led to serious rioting in Paris outside the Spanish Embassy; all over Italy there have been violent popular demonstrations against Spain; and this crime is certain to weaken her position in Europe just at the time when she can least afford it. Sir Edward Grey was formally correct when he said that we could make no official representations to Spain about Ferrer's case, but we think it was distinctly due to the dynastic ties between this country and Spain to point out, informally, the dangers of doing violence to popular sentiment. But if the object of the Spanish Government had been to shock the conscience of Europe, it could not have acted differently. It has done its best to prevent the facts from getting out; it has tried Ferrer by court-martial; after the condemnation it spread a rumor that the sentence would not be carried out immediately, and then, as though to leave no opportunity for repentance, it executed the sentence with indecent haste.

* * *

THE Irish Land Bill passed the Committee in the House of Lords on Tuesday, and will re-appear next week in the Commons in a form which, we imagine, neither the Government nor the Nationalist Party will accept. On Tuesday the Lords struck out the Government's scheme of compulsory purchase, carefully guarded as it was, and inserted instead Lord Atkinson's proposal, which even Lord Lansdowne declared to be surrounded with a "zareba of precautions." The Atkinson plan proposes that a scheme of compulsory purchase for the relief of congestion must first come before two Estates Commissioners, and then be referred to a tribunal consisting of a Judge from the Superior Courts and two Commissioners. The price of the land was to be fixed by an independent person. There is to be a further reference to the Court of Appeal on questions of law or mixed questions of law and fact. The Government's clause was struck out by 111 to 29, and Lord Atkinson's clause substituted.

* * *

WE much regret to see that the issue in the Bermondsey election is to be obscured by a triangular contest between Mr. Hughes, the Liberal candidate, Dr. Salter, the Labor candidate, and Mr. Dumphreys, the Protectionist. Mr. Hughes is a brilliant journalist and no man can better represent the feeling of his party over the Budget. Dr. Salter's qualifications are that he was first in the field, that he is a man of character and ability, and that he continues the progressive traditions in local politics with which Dr. Cooper, the late member, was identified. He is, we suppose, a Socialist, but he is of the stamp of Mr. Graham Wallas, who for years has been a chief stand-by of the Progressive Party. We should have thought that, as Dr. Salter's programme, though advanced, is moderately expressed, the electors might have been left to make their choice between him and Mr. Dumphreys. Many Liberals would have liked to see a junction between the more and the less advanced forces on the practical issue which happens to unite them.

* * *

WE are very glad to announce the formation of the People's Suffrage Federation, the basis of whose appeal is a general demand for the vote for men and women on a short residential qualification and independent of property or tenancy. This movement seems to us to bring the question of women's suffrage into line with democracy, and to associate it far more closely with the purpose and meaning of Liberalism than any of the sister agitations. Liberals have been compelled to quarrel not only with the methods of the Women's Social and Political Union but with its purpose. No such quarrel can arise on the claim of the new Federation, which aims at crowning the general political movement of democracy with a final measure of enfranchisement. The Federation appears to be strong in its personnel and in the body of opinion already identified with it.

* * *

LADY CONSTANCE LYTTON and Mrs. Brailsford, who were sentenced to a month's imprisonment at Newcastle on their refusal to be bound over to keep the peace after small breaches of public order, have both been released, on medical grounds, after two days' imprisonment. We are informed, however, that forcible feeding has been resorted to in the case of the women left in gaol. We regret so early a resort to this practice, and we do not see the need for it. The offences for which these women were convicted at Newcastle were trifling and almost formal. If they insist on going to prison and on starving themselves there, a few hours' confinement ought to suffice. In such cases we greatly dislike the resort to forcible feeding, and do not see the necessity for it, however humane the intention of the authorities may be, and however indefensible the tactics that have brought this method into practice. Of course, if the suffragettes proceed to serious bodily assaults, the case will be altered. In such cases trifling sentences, followed by early release from prison, could not be defended. But we hope that, in their own interests, the suffragettes will abstain from such practices. If they do, the Government, we think, will be wise to withdraw their consent to forcible feeding.

* * *

THE concluding words of the Beresford Committee's Report had led one to expect that a Naval General Staff would be formed on which all high executive officers would have served in their turn. The Committee evidently felt that something of the kind was advisable in view of the marked differences of opinion that existed in the Navy on some fundamental questions of strategy and tactics. But the new War Council, the formation of which has been announced this week, is not a General Staff nor is there any obvious connection of idea between them. This multiplication of Boards may be a serious matter, and there are several difficulties about the new War Councils that need clearing up. At present, the First Sea Lord is responsible (amongst other matters) for preparedness for war mobilisation, and for the efficiency of the Intelligence Department. His work is now transferred to a Board sitting under the presidency of the First Sea Lord. How will this change affect the responsibility of the First Sea Lord for the advice that he offers on these questions? What, again, is meant by the preparation of "war plans" which is assigned to the new Board? And how, again, is the new arrangement likely to affect the efficiency of the Intelligence Department? It is obviously left in some need of improvement when one remembers how grossly at fault was its information about German shipbuilding in the spring. But to divide the work of the department into halves and to give one half to a new Board does not seem the natural way to improvement.

* * *

A VIGOROUS campaign of public meetings in the towns of England and Scotland has been arranged by the National Committee for the Break-up of the Poor Law. The first of these meetings was held in St. James's Hall last Tuesday, with the Bishop of Southwark in the chair, and Mrs. Webb, the Dean of Norwich, and Mr. Bernard Shaw as the chief speakers. A large and earnest audience listened to the eloquent appeal of Mrs. Webb in favor of a constructive scheme, upon the lines of the Minority Report, for draining the "morass of destitution," and for stopping the sources of poverty and unemployment which visibly and unceasingly feed that morass anew. Though the absorption of the public mind in other aspects of current politics may confine this educative work within rather narrow channels for the present, the Minority Report is very widely sold and read, and the Committee is receiving large accessions to its ranks, having increased since last July from about nine hundred to nine thousand.

* * *

A REMARKABLE situation has arisen between the State Department in Washington, President Taft, and Mr. Crane, the newly appointed Minister to China. Just as Mr. Crane was on the point of departure for Peking, an article appeared in a Chicago newspaper—Mr. Crane is the head of a Chicago firm—stating that the United States Government was about to protest vigorously against the clauses in the recent Sino-Japanese agreement, which gave certain mining concessions in Manchuria wholly into the hands of Japan, and, in regard to all those on the main Manchurian and the Antung-Mukden lines, gave Japan the right of exploitation jointly with China. Mr. Knox, the Secretary of State, summoned Mr. Crane to Washington and asked him to resign, on the ground that he had betrayed confidential information to a newspaper; the offence was aggravated, it appears, by the fact that the deliberations of the State Department were still in progress. Mr. Crane, however, retorts that he was only carrying out instructions given him by President Taft, who had told him that anything which he said to the newspapers should be "red-hot." The President, whatever his responsibility, leaves the matter to the State Department, and, of course, Mr. Crane becomes doubly impossible as a Minister to China after dragging in Mr. Taft.

* * *

THE personal question, however, is unimportant compared with the certain information that the United States is dissatisfied with the latest Japanese proceeding in Manchuria. The fact is that Japan, by constant pressure on China, is squeezing out of her every railway and mining concession possible in Manchuria; she permits China to share in the development of some of these concessions, but other Powers are practically barred out. The United States, which took a firm stand some time since against Russian and Japanese pretensions with regard to Chinese sovereign rights in the railway zones, is not minded to see the principle of the Open Door infringed to the possible injury of American interests. The question may easily give rise to serious friction.

THE powerful, subtle, and rather enigmatical man who succeeded M. Clemenceau as French Premier made an important speech at Périgueux on Sunday. For an ex-Socialist, indeed, an ex-organiser of Socialists, M. Briand went far in the direction of continuing and confirming M. Clemenceau's policy of Republican "concentration." He pleaded for a Republic which would "attract" all Frenchmen and make "fundamental" opposition absurd. He spoke tolerantly of the Church, said that social reform must be conditioned by the country's resources, looked forward to profit-sharing as a method of industrial appeasement, hinted very vaguely at a modification of scrutin d'arrondissement, and called for peace and the development of national as against petty local spirit. The Moderate French Press applauds the speech, but it will be curious to see whether M. Briand develops these "middle" sentiments on Radical or on Conservative lines.

* * *

A PATHETIC and far from untruthful communiqué has been sent to the "Times" on behalf of the King of Greece, who claims, with justice, the great diplomatic services his house has rendered to its adopted country. The article adds the definite statement that in addition to general assurances of support from the four protecting Powers in the matter of Crete, the King received from one of them a definite promise that the matter should be settled in accordance with the wishes of the Greek people. This is a rather scandalous example of the weakness which besets European diplomacy when it acts in concert. We devoutly hope that the Power was not England. If not, who was it?

* * *

THE great work of constitutional government in China was formally inaugurated on Thursday by the election of provincial deliberative assemblies for the twenty-two provinces. The average number of voters for each representative is said to be 1,000. The central part of the Constitution—the setting up of a Parliament without power over the Executive—will be complete within eight years, following the plan adopted by the Constitution-makers of Japan.

* * *

SOME interesting correspondence has passed between Herr Hauszmann, a Radical deputy, and Bebel on the possibility of co-operation between the German Radicals and Socialists, the latter of whom have just won a dramatic victory at Coburg. On ultimate principles the two agreed to differ, but Bebel promised his support to any genuinely progressive measure brought forward by the Radicals. The correspondence carries the tendencies shown at the Leipzig Conference a step further, and shows how Marxian tactics are giving way to the opportunism of the English Labor Party. Unfortunately there is no indication that the German Radicals are disposed to take advantage of so favorable a turn. Dr. Barth, who preached, in and out of season, a working alliance between the Social Democrats and the Radicals (one cannot say Liberals, for the German National Liberal Party has long since ceased to be either Liberal or National), has died without leaving a leader capable of effecting a union of forces, so much in the interest of German politics. The Radical papers, with few exceptions, still incline to a renewal of that working arrangement with the Conservatives which has completely destroyed their influence in the present Parliament. United, the Social Democrats and Radicals might attain a majority in the Reichstag; if they remain divided the balance of power remains with the Clericals.

Politics and Affairs.

MISPLACED MAGNANIMITY.

THE Unionist Press is apparently unable to divest itself of the illusion that the control of public affairs is in the hands of its leaders advised by itself. Possessed with this conceit of plenary power, it adopts an attitude of beneficent patronage towards the Government, which has its humorous side. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Lloyd-George are, in its view, rash men who have got themselves into an impossible position; in which, moreover, they have in a degree entangled Lords and Commons and the entire Constitution, including therein as an integral element the prospects of Tariff Reform. Under these circumstances the Unionist workers are prepared to show great magnanimity. They prepare plan upon plan whereby the Government is to be enabled to extricate itself from this impossible situation. The latest of these proposals with which the "Times" amused clubland on Tuesday is that a Bill should be prepared to put the Budget to a popular vote. This is, in the first place, to recognise the right of the Lords to appeal to the people on the Budget, and to throw out that which has been for more than two hundred years the keystone of our Constitution, the absolute control of finance by the House of Commons. For this surrender the only motive suggested is that of saving a constitutional crisis, but as that crisis will never arise if the Lords act constitutionally, one would say that an appeal to them might be tried in the first instance by their friends. One might suppose, further, that for this immense sacrifice some valuable consideration might be expected. It might be supposed at least that the popular vote would be taken as settling the matter. Not at all. The condescension of the "Times" does not go so far as this. It may be expected, it thinks, that the House of Lords would bow to the popular voice, but if not, a dissolution would follow. Having sacrificed the main principles of the Constitution in order to secure the Budget and avoid a crisis, Liberals are to find themselves without their Budget and with the crisis full upon them. We know the view taken in the Unionist Press of their political morality and seriousness, but really our contemporaries might give them credit for some sparks of political intelligence.

The matter would not be worth discussing if it were not for a confusion on the subject of the Referendum which it involves, and which may mislead many who would not for a moment be impressed by the suggestion of the "Times." When the Referendum is spoken of, as it is by some Liberals, as a possible solvent of the Constitutional difficulty, what is contemplated is always a Referendum on legislative questions alone. No Liberal of the smallest influence or authority, so far as we are aware, has ever advocated disturbance of the existing well-recognised supremacy of the House of Commons in finance. This authority we have called the keystone of our Constitution. On it depends the control of the Executive by the representatives of the people, and to take away the control of finance would be to take away the responsibility of Ministers to the Commons and their absolute dependence on a Parliamentary majority. For any such change there is, from the democratic point of view, no shadow of reason. With regard to legislation the case is different. The Commons have in this sphere not won that complete control which they obtained long since over supply, and it is here, and here only, that a change is required. It is in this connection, and this connection only, that Liberals have so much as discussed the Referendum as a possible alternative to the existing veto of the House of Lords. With regard to finance no change is required, and none is admissible. The situation is one admitting of no compromise. So much we have no doubt Mr. Asquith has told the King. Not only does it admit of no compromise, but, we may explain to our Unionist contemporaries, it is a situation in which all the difficulty and all the danger is for their side. Their kindness to us is really misplaced. We have neither anxiety nor doubt. We are confident of absolute constitutional right and of solid public support. We are sorry that they should disturb constitutional precedent, because any rash action of the kind will tend to extinguish our traditional belief in an unwritten Constitution, because we dislike violent changes and shocks to public security. But our own position in this case we believe to be as impregnable as it is certainly immovable. They will do well to exercise, in setting their own house in order, the ingenuity and inventiveness which they are at present devoting to our supposed benefit.

So far as the immediate crisis is concerned, negotiations and rumors of negotiations leave Liberals unmoved. They know that whatever Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour may say to the King, Mr. Asquith has only one thing to say. If they have any anxiety, it is that nothing should be done in the crisis of the moment to militate against the success of the entire campaign against the veto, to which more than ever the party now stands committed. From this point of view it seems to us a singularly ill-considered suggestion that Mr. Asquith should obtain the King's consent to the creation of peers for the purpose of carrying the Budget. There can in future be one and only one object for which the wholesale creation of peers can be legitimately employed, and that is one which shall make any subsequent creation for ever unnecessary. The battle against the veto is joined all along the line. At one point in the battle the creation of peers, or the King's assent to their creation, may become a necessary though deplorable step. That point will be reached when the Bill for the removal of the present veto on legislation exercised by the Lords has been sent to them by the House of Commons, and rejected by them. To carry that Bill it may be necessary to make a large batch of peers, and this will be justified, because those created will be pledged to destroy their own power. No other occasion would excuse any such course, for on any other occasion it would be fraught with dangers and absurdities. As to the present crisis, it needs no such remedy. If the Budget is thrown out, the appeal to the people follows, and it will be an appeal not only on finance, but on legislation; not only on this year's work, but on all that the Lords have done and can do to mutilate and destroy democratic legislation. It is not we who have to fear such an appeal, or who need the kindness of our opponents to build us golden bridges by which we may escape the encounter.

THE OFFENCE OF THE BUDGET.

THOSE who write the history of the Budget of 1909 will not fail to note how all the license of procedure and nearly all the violence of speech which that instrument has excited have proceeded from its Conservative opponents and not from its Radical supporters. The Budget itself has been debated at unprecedented length, and has been conducted through the House of Commons by its author with a moderation of language and method for which, under the modern rule of closure, only its predecessor of 1894 affords a precedent. No great progressive measure has ever been so freely amended in the interests of its opponents; we may add that no large new scheme of taxes has ever been so mildly and tentatively—we had almost said so timidly—initiated. Never has a Government thrown a powerful and deliberately conceived measure more open to all kinds of criticism, or allowed a weak Opposition, unable to create the slightest schism in the firmly arrayed ranks of the Ministry, or to produce any impression of popular authority behind it, so large a share in amending it. Doubtless when the Chancellor has gone to the people, he has made clear the full significance of the land taxes, and the great social and economic grievances which lie behind them. He has given hard instances, not one of which has been shaken, of the way in which the landlords have "held up" the various associations and interests—town councils, railroad companies, mine exploiters, housing committees, water boards, retail traders, and the countless smaller efforts of laboring folk—in their business of developing and ministering to industrial and social needs.

But in this process Mr. Lloyd George has shown little or nothing of the sharp, cold bitterness with which Mr. Chamberlain expounded the unauthorised programme. To any close observer of the character of men and the effect of words he has appeared little less placable on the platform than on the Treasury Bench. He has indeed "chafed" the abusive dukes, and he has certainly treated them with no more respect than their language and spirit require. But the characteristic mark of the Limehouse and Newcastle speeches is that he has addressed the masses in language which they understand, using the simple, vivid, concrete lines of illustration and argument in which for centuries their religious leaders have expounded the Bible to them. The result has been to impart a reality to certain important and deep-lying facts of our social life which they have never acquired before. The Limehouse and Newcastle speeches are going "like wildfire," not because of their extreme doctrine or their class bitterness, but because they give our people the two things of which they stand most in need, hope and a vital interest in affairs—because they have quickened and illumined their sense of politics.

What therefore explains the grotesque anger of the Opposition Press? In the imagination of the "Daily Telegraph," this fresh, lively, acute, essentially good-tempered personality, is hideously magnified till it becomes a monster of coarse and revolutionary violence. The Chancellor is "a Jacobin," a "fustian Cleon," a "Communist"; he resembles the "semi-barbarian leader of a horde of brigands." When he asks if the scheme of things requires that while one man receives while he sleeps as much as one year's labor of another will produce, his working brother is only to obtain a pittance of eightence a day after a life of toil, and that by means of a revolution, he is told that he speaks after the manner of Marat and Couthon and St. Just. He is not like M. Briand, a "civilised man"; he is "a reviler and a demagogue," with "a mountebank manner"; a "political gamin," who revels in the "slang of the gutter," and, in the eyes of the chaste logician of the "Telegraph," never uses argument, and employs only the "incendiary levity" of an "inconsequential mind." Oh, that England were once more in the hands of a Gladstone!

It may be some support for Mr. Lloyd George to remember, as he seeks shelter from this storm of outraged snobbery, that the organ which once plied Gladstone with the flattery of the sycophant quickly proceeded to pelt him with the venom of the renegade. No public man in this country, especially if he does not come from the classes who think that both political power and private amenities of the more exclusive kind are their special perquisite, escapes the last salutation. The first he can always obtain by going over to the party of privilege. To desert that sacred caste is indeed a kind of lèse-majesté in British statesmanship. When Gladstone left "the classes" on Home Rule, the Duke of Westminster solemnly cast out his portrait from the tainted halls of Eaton. Shall it be permitted to a mere "Welshman," an "attorney," to tread the unhallowed ground where the great leader defied the Whig aristocracy, and cast himself on the support of "the masses"? But, indeed, there is a body of substantial public as well as personal causes for the hatred thus felt and expressed for the Budget and its author. The first is, no doubt, that it has not only ripped up a great social and economic abuse, but, as soon as its machinery of taxation is in full working order, will put an end to it. Under our British land system, the public has been at the mercy of the landlords. Under the valuation established by the Budget, the landlords will be, not, indeed, at the mercy, but under the control of the public. No more of those arbitrary accumulations of bloated values with which every commercial arbitrator is familiar. No more of that quiet, easily worked, almost unconscious, conspiracy of social forces which enables people like the Duke of Northumberland and Mr. Walter Long, without lifting their fingers, to secure "increments" against the public purchaser, not of tens, but of scores per cent. This, and the fact that, as the Budget expands, it creates an increasing and permanent claim on "social wealth," and makes it, in fact, the bulwark of democratic finance, and the purse into which the social reformer will dip automatically for the wherewithal of social progress, are enough to explain the hostility to the land taxes.

But there is a further reason. There is no need to disguise the fact that the picture which Mr. George and Mr. Churchill have drawn of the state of industrial England is an avowed appeal to social discontent. So was Mr. Chamberlain's programme. So was the social writing of Ruskin and Carlyle. So was much of the economic teaching of John Stuart Mill. If it be added that the Socialist movement has given force and direction to this widespread conviction that the extremes of modern poverty are incompatible with Christianity and civilisation, we have only to say that such a force was bound to arrive, and must be reckoned with. It is not identical with Liberalism, and never can be. Liberalism is a method of politics adapted to the modern State, and accepting the institution of private property, with the implication that, as Mr. Churchill well said at Leicester, it must be based on "reason and justice." Socialism is still an attempt to reconstruct society from the bottom on the basis of complete public ownership of the means of production and distribution. Its full analysis of the sources of wealth is not true, and cannot be accepted. But from its emotional picture of the worst results of the industrial system as we have applied it in England, and from its investigation of the nature of rent and profit, valuable lessons have long been drawn by orthodox statesmen and economists; and, in turn, Socialism has accepted large modifications of its earlier theories. The land question, in particular, is one on which all forces of advanced thought, Socialist, non-Socialist, and even anti-Socialist, Radical and Liberal, here, in Europe, in the Colonies, in the United States, have long had a measure of agreement. The Budget simply stamps and seals that concordat. It does not, as Mr. F. W. Hirst, the editor of the "Economist" and a strong anti-Socialist, shows in the "Contemporary Review," tax capital. It taxes certain forms of wealth, great masses of which are never likely to become industrial capital. It is designed to add to the working "stock" of a nation's "capital," and to diminish the more luxurious and non-effective use of its "wealth." It creates—and here is its signal offence in the eyes of the Dukes—a real and truthful moral and economic distinction between use and superfluity—between wealth that goes to classes who live on the community, however ornamentally and plausibly, and to those who work for it. And that is a "new fact" in working British politics.

But the final cause for the explosion of hatred over the Budget is that we have in England the seeds of a reaction which for sheer violence of pretension is also a fresh phenomenon in the State. It is high time for Liberalism to cease the defensive and to begin the attack, for the enemy is at the gate. During the last twenty years the House of Lords has dared to assume a function in public policy which, save for the futile demonstration of 1860, it never claimed since the Revolution. From the theory of the right to revise Liberal Bills to that of destroying them, from the theory of destroying Bills to that of crushing a Government and forcing a Dissolution, from that usurpation to the crowning audacity of meddling with Supplies and shattering the Constitution at the centre of its authority and regulative force, this House has advanced as rapidly as it has declined in representative character and on its right to speak for any party but the most reactionary forms of Toryism. It has to-day formed the fantastic notion that these are its rights, and that to it every form of aggrieved monopoly shall look as its saviour. The Budget campaign has not only raised against this pretension forces of unexpected magnitude, but it has revealed a man of the people who can give them the sharpest meaning and the clearest purpose. Hence these tears.

THE SPANISH PERIL.

THE execution of Señor Ferrer is a crime, and a stupid crime. It bears an ominously close resemblance to those deeds of blind and unscrupulous panic that history has marked as the forerunners of revolution. The Parisian mob that attempted to sack the Spanish Embassy, the Genoese workmen who declared a general strike, registered the instinctive judgment of Europe. Spain is a land curiously impervious to foreign opinion, but the Spanish Government can hardly in this case be unaffected by the unanimous verdict of civilisation. The personality of Señor Ferrer, his life-long labors for the liberation of the Spanish mind from the shackles of Clericalism, the unusual, secret, tainted procedure adopted at his trial by a military court, and the still more tainted evidence that he declared to have been drummed up against him, the cause for which he fought and the forces which fought him—all this lent to the enormity of his execution a significance and a poignancy that have horrified mankind. If there is one tribunal which the experience and instincts of all peoples have long since condemned it is a court-martial for the trial of political offences. If there is one power that is held universally suspect it is the power of Clericalism as it exists in Spain. Both these agencies joined hands to compass Señor Ferrer's death. Political tyranny, rendered doubly tyrannical by the influence of fear, conspired with a theocracy still permeated with the views and passions of the sixteenth century to make an end of a brilliant and disinterested worker in the cause of intellectual enfranchisement. Their triumph may well prove their doom. It may have needed Señor Ferrer's death to complete the work to which his life was devoted. For no one can doubt that from now onwards every healthy element of revolt in Spain will derive from what has happened a new and sustained impetus. No one can doubt that the social and political system of the Peninsula is about to be assailed as never before. Spain has been often convulsed but never reorganised. She is the only country in Europe that has escaped the transforming effects of the Reformation and the French Revolution. Republics, military dictatorships, and flabby dynasties have changed again and again the decorative externals of the State. But there has been no revolution from the bottom up. Now, however, the tokens multiply of a genuine risorgimento; and Señor Ferrer's grave may yet prove, as he would have wished it to prove, the grave of oppression.

Canovas several years ago declared that there were in Spain many, if not most, of the signs of an impending upheaval. Except superficially things have not improved since then. Freed from the drain of her oversea dependencies, Spain has, no doubt, been more prosperous and more pacific during the past ten years than in any decade of the nineteenth century. But a rising credit, an expanding commerce, and the influx of foreign capital cannot touch the deeper sources of social and political disease. The country is "run" by a few thousands of professional politicians, who are "in politics" for what they can make out of it. Spanish politics begin and end with the question of spoils. The parties that call themselves "Liberals" and "Conservatives" have no principles except the principle of allowing one another a reasonable turn in office. The elections, so far from being a test of public opinion, are the nullification of it. The average Spaniard rarely takes the trouble to vote at all. If a man of education and breeding, he looks down on the politicians much as a New York Mugwump regards a Tammany Alderman. If a peasant or small trader, he is apt, like the Italian peasant, to think of the suffrage as a trick invented by the police to get him into trouble. Government is merely a matter of arrangement. No Spanish Ministry has yet failed in its appeal to the country, and none ever will so long as the wire-pullers stuff ballot-boxes and marshal "repeaters," and bring dead men up to vote on a hint from headquarters. The Premier of the moment controls not only all the great offices of State, but every mayoralty, prefecture, and collectorship in the land. The country, in consequence, is flooded with carpet-baggers from Madrid, whose notion of official duty is the making of hay while the sun shines. Their tenure is precarious at best; none of them knows when another "Ministerial crisis" may not supervene; their salaries are small and, as a rule, in arrears; they must plunder to live. And plunder they do. It is mainly their depredations that have given point to the Catalonian cry for Home Rule. Not only is Spain a congeries of races and provinces that have never really fused, not only do the Catalans look down on the Castilians as mere talkers, but all provincial industries and institutions are plundered or repressed by the spoilers of Madrid.

What adds to the peril of the situation is that the idea of reform by argument and popular agitation is one that bitter experience has almost driven out of the Peninsula. Seven-tenths of the people of Spain can neither read nor write, and illiteracy in revolt knows of no weapon but force. A profound scepticism of their public men and institutions, such as one notices among the Italian peasants, and to some extent among the middle classes of France, pervades and demoralises the Spanish people. They believe, and it is the sort of belief that makes for revolution, that no Spaniard can honestly become rich. The idea of even-handed justice between man and man, rich and poor, has almost vanished from their consciousness. The well-to-do can pay and bribe to escape military service and taxation, and the burden of the national revenue falls on the earnings of the poor. Stupid regulations strangle commercial development, and it is the petty trader, the small farmer and artisan, who feels them most. Taxation grows heavier and more obnoxious, and yet the income of the State little more than suffices to cover the annual interest on the debt. The peasantry are struggling under a system of latifundia which makes the agrarian problem in Andalusia probably more acute than in any other part of Europe. The hope that the King might yet "find himself" and lead the nation against the politicians grows daily less tenable. He means well, we believe, but he is vapid, inexperienced, without strength of will, and absorbed in pleasure; and the short-lived enthusiasm evoked by the English marriage has already given way to the traditional Spanish jealousy of the foreigner. Moreover, the dynasty has made the political mistake of allying itself with Clericalism. Reactionary where it is not revolutionary, the Church in Spain is equally the foe of progress, order, and intelligence. The immunities it now enjoys, collectively and individually, from the operation of the civil law and from the taxes that fall all the more heavily on the lay majority, its control of education, the rapid multiplication of monasteries, convents, and Jesuit seminaries, which elsewhere are disappearing from the Catholic world, its influence at the Court, in politics, and over the domestic life of the people, its non-economic and anti-economic tendencies, its corruptions and irregularities, and especially its immense holdings of property, and the increasing pressure of its industrial competition, are hurrying on a crisis that will be both violent and prolonged. On the top of all these elements of disaffection, Spain finds herself plunged into a harassing war in Morocco from which there is neither credit nor profit to be reaped, and which may yet lead her to some such disaster as overwhelmed the Italians at Adowa. A many-sided crisis is visibly closing in upon her. In what form she will emerge from it really matters less than that she should have to face no crisis at all. The reason is simple. There is some hope in revolution; there is none whatever in the pessimism of a people and the stagnation of their national life.

THE GROUNDS OF ANGLO-GERMAN PEACE.

We hope that our statesmen are not too busy to heed the opening of Lord Courtney's series of articles on "Peace and War," in the "Contemporary Review," and Professor Delbrück's interesting, though unconscious, application of some at least of their principles to the Anglo-German situation. Lord Courtney, indeed, is plainly leading up to that situation, which constitutes the one plain danger to European peace. It has been greatly ameliorated. Our own war-scare has passed away, and the ground for it cannot be re-occupied, because in a few months Mr. Balfour will not be able to open his mouth without convicting himself of the falsity of his statements as to the prospect of Germany possessing twenty-one or twenty-five completed "Dreadnoughts" in 1912. We know now that about eleven or twelve constitute the limits within which we may approximately fix the German strength in "Dreadnoughts" in that year. Other aids and fortifications to the cause of peace have appeared. The apparition of Austrian "Dreadnoughts" is already discredited, and within Germany itself, with the advent of a new Chancellor, a powerful backing has been found for the protest against any enlargement of the revised Naval Act, and in favor of a reversion to the earlier policy of strictly subordinating naval to military armaments. If these influences gain ground, and are not defeated by an extreme naval programme on this side and by the anti-German propaganda which gave the German Navy League much of its original hold on public opinion, Germany will, we hope, swing gradually back to her natural orbit as a land rather than a sea Power, and the way will be clear for an Anglo-German understanding.

It is, however, of great importance that the friends of peace should concern themselves not merely with the passing phases of Anglo-German politics, but with its governing considerations. Lord Courtney founds his parable of peace on the saying that while every past war was made "inevitable" by the "temper, traditions, and historic circumstances" of the men and nations who brought it about, no war is "inevitable" till it has actually broken out. The two cases which he examines in support of this theory are those of the United States and France, in their more recent relations to our Government. Both were much worse, all through the period of disturbance, than the Anglo-German embroilment has ever been. In each instance there was the memory of past conflict. In regard to France, this conflict had been of the most embittering and humiliating kind, and, with respect to the States, the memories of the past were aggravated by our gross partisanship in the matter of the Civil War. For long years the diplomacy of both countries was vexed by direct battles of policy, and even by incidents approaching actual bloodshed. The seizure of Mason and Slidell, the Confederate envoys, on board the "Trent," brought the two countries to the verge of hostilities, while the doings of the "Alabama" and the attempt to atone for them by way of arbitration made even the great Minister who negotiated the terms of settlement despair of a peaceful issue. The most urgent efforts on both sides of the Atlantic were necessary to keep the peace during the controversy over Venezuela, and Lord Courtney recalls the story of a distinguished American lady who at that time was on the point of leaving her English home and husband rather than endure the habitual tone of English society towards America. And yet in a few short years the character of our relations to the States has changed so completely that it is possible to look over a wide horizon and reduce to a very small compass even the remoter possibilities of war between the two countries.

Much the same may be said of the Victorian relations between France and Great Britain. Cobden describes the gathering and dispersal of three French panics within the limits of his own career. Others occurred before and after. There was Egypt, which arose under almost every form of French Government since 1815. There was Tahiti, there were Louis Philippe's Spanish marriages, which caused such a swift and passionate revulsion in Queen Victoria's mind from her warm friendship with the Orleans family. Relations were not less critical under the third Napoleon and the third Republic. There was the Orsini outrage and the annexation of Savoy. There was the perilous and imminent confrontation of Fashoda, and there was Siam, as to which Lord Rosebery has himself informed us that the two countries stood within a few hours of war. Not only have England and France survived all these incidents; their power for mischief has practically been extinguished by the entente.

As to Germany, it is not necessary even to perform this act of oblivion. There is nothing to forget. We have never gone to war with her, and Prussia, the State out of which she grew, was an English ally. We have not even had a direct "incident," for at Casablanca we merely acted as buffers to stay the shock of French and German diplomacy. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the wider field of world-ambitions in order to discover on what the theory of an inevitable Anglo-German war rests. Professor Delbrück is an excellent witness on this point, because he is very far from being a pacifist, and supports the conventional claim of British and German statesmen that the two Powers should maintain a balance of power by means of "strenuous armaments." But he strongly denies the special German pretensions on which our "inevitabilists" build their case. Germany is no longer an emigrating but an immigrating Power, and therefore the vision of the 200,000 German babies who must expand at the expense of British territory and power need not distress us. She does not dream of invading England, and treats our ideas on this subject as "illusions or party politics," nor does she aim at a parity of strength with our Navy. She is willing to remain a secondary maritime Power, and to accept the implications of that position. She knows that a policy of anti-English aggression would be her ruin, for no Power desires the disappearance or the humiliation of the British Empire, and all would regard such an attempt as a signal of German world-domination, to be at once resisted by arms. What she does envisage about us is practically what we contemplate about her. She thinks, with our new possessions in the Mediterranean, in Africa, and elsewhere, that the world in which she is most interested is in danger of becoming English. So she desires to be strong enough to protect her commerce, thinking that the idea of an English seizure of the German fleet is far more real than that of a German invasion of England, and also to impose a measure of "caution" on British diplomacy. In a word she thinks that, considering her progress as an industrial and world-Power, she cannot gain her proper weight in the sphere of diplomacy unless she has a fleet strong enough to make us regard her susceptibilities and interests.

This seems to us a highly simple, manageable position, which, when we have made due allowance for the fanfares of the popular Press, is compatible with a hundred years of peace between the two countries. British Liberalism does not, of course, acknowledge the ambitions with which Germany credits us, and would not permit its leaders to foster them.

Even our neo-Imperialism is rather a thing of nerves, and the self-conscious timidity of an over-rich nation, than a method of world-conquest. What does appear from Professor Delbrück's analysis is that if the two nations are willing to accept each other's very conservative definitions of their external ambitions, there is no good reason why the ring of ententes which governs the European system should not be closed by a union between the two Powers which have the greatest power of blessing the world by their friendship and cursing it by their enmity.

Life and Letters.

AMERICAN AMBASSADORS.

THE Press may not have abolished diplomacy, but it has certainly made it more difficult. But for the Press Mr. Crane would now be on his way to the American Legation at Peking. As it is, he remains in America, is re-absorbed once more into his manufacturing business in Chicago, and finds his diplomatic life ended before it had really begun. The Press, however, is not to be exclusively blamed for this catastrophe. Mr. Crane's artlessness is at least partly responsible. The President, greatly concerned with the problem of how best to extend American influence, and especially American commerce, in the Far East, had appointed Mr. Crane to represent his country in China, mainly on the strength of his reputation and success as a man of business. But he had not reckoned with Mr. Crane's innocence of diplomatic usages, or with the possibility that he might share the common American belief that official affairs should be transacted in a glass house, with all the electric lights turned on, and a reporter at each window. Calling at the State Department in Washington for his final instructions, Mr. Crane learned that the Secretary of State had been closely examining the recent Agreement between China and Japan in regard to Manchuria, with a view to determining if it contained anything adverse to American interests or inconsistent with the principle of the "Open Door." With an ingenuousness that has not been equalled since the Sackville-West episode, Mr. Crane at once communicated the news to a journalist for publication, and departed for San Francisco. It was thus announced to the world that the United States Government was formulating a protest against the Manchurian Agreement, and that it would be Mr. Crane's first business on his arrival to bring the views of the Administration before the Chinese officials. The Chinese and Japanese Press, naturally enough, reproduced the telegram; some formal inquiries were made by the Japanese Ambassador in Washington; and Mr. Crane was met on the San Francisco wharf by a telegram ordering his return to the capital. He went back, not only with an untroubled conscience, but in a state of complete mystification as to the reasons for his sudden recall, engagingly confiding to the reporters that he could not make head or tail of it. It was, however, eventually made clear to him that his indiscreet "interview" had caused the Administration much embarrassment, and that the interests of the country and of the service required his resignation.

Incidents such as these are bound from time to time to occur in a country which regards diplomacy rather as a diversion than a career. Two or three years ago, Mr. Root, at that time the Secretary of State, attempted a thorough reorganisation of the American diplomatic and consular services. Among other things he insisted that the United States should lease or purchase a permanent Embassy in each of the world's capitals and should pay its Ambassadors a living wage. When Mr. Choate returned home after his six years' Ambassadorship in London, the first thing he did was to urge precisely these reforms. No one could do so with greater propriety or with a stronger claim to have his opinion deferred to, because no one had produced such excellent results from the present system. Mr. Roosevelt several times over-entreated Congress to carry out the suggested improvements, and a Bill giving effect to them was actually introduced in the House of Representatives. But it failed to become law, and matters are still as they always have been. That is to say, an American Ambassador's first business on arriving in London or any other capital is to find a house to live in. No official residence being provided for him, he has to turn house-hunter; and the sort of house he will choose depends upon his private means. All Government officials in America from the President downwards are amazingly underpaid, but American Ambassadors can scarcely be said to be paid at all. Their fixed and inclusive salary is £3,500 a year, but of this they have to pay their own house rent as well as all living and entertainment expenses. The consequence is that only very wealthy men, who are prepared to spend from £10,000 a year upwards out of their own pockets, can afford to accept a first-class Embassy and keep up the style that the diplomacy of to-day insists upon. For though the American Republic is officially devoted to Jeffersonian simplicity, its citizens who annually come over to Europe are something more than disappointed if they find that their representative in London, Paris, Berlin, or Rome is not resplendently housed and maintaining a generous social state. They may, when in America, deride the trappings of diplomacy, but at the same time, and especially in Europe, they like their Ambassador to play an elegant, conspicuous, and, if possible, a brilliant part in the life of the Court to which he is accredited. If the Americans in Berlin, for instance, had been polled eighteen months ago, they would certainly have voted to make Mr. Charlemagne Tower Ambassador for life; and they were just as much non-plussed as the Kaiser himself when Mr. Tower's successor turned out to be a gentleman whose tastes were those of a student and a scholar, and whose resources made it impossible for him to follow in Mr. Tower's footsteps with the same assurance and éclat.

One result of all this is that the American diplomatic service lends itself to some strange incongruities. In one capital you will find the American Ambassador inhabiting a palace, the rent of which exceeds his official salary; in another he is worse housed than the average representative of a Balkan State. It is becoming rarer and rarer for the United States to send abroad men like Bancroft, Lowell, Motley, and Washington Irving, men, that is to say, of comparatively moderate means, who were appointed and welcomed as litterateurs of distinction, and from whom nothing in the way of a grand establishment was expected. Material standards have altered a good deal since the scholar-diplomat was the typical, the delightfully typical, representative of America in Europe. For one thing, the American Legations have themselves been turned into Embassies, and, for another, the scale of expenditure and of expectations has enormously risen. The most coveted prizes in the service tend more and more to fall into the hands of millionaires, and a nation which is nothing if not a democracy at home tends more and more to be represented by a plutocracy abroad. In London we have no right whatever to complain of the results of this system. It has given us a long line of distinguished men whom it has been a pleasure to treat rather as guests of the nation than as diplomatists accredited to the Court of St. James. But other capitals have not at all times fared so well as London, and the difficulty Mr. Taft is experiencing in choosing a successor to Mr. Whitelaw Reid shows that even in the case of London there may have to be some lowering of the almost miraculous standard of the past fifty years. When Embassies are restricted to men of wealth, who have had no training in diplomacy, and who are merely anxious to round off their career by a new and pleasant experience, it is inevitable that there should be occasional misfits. Mr. Crane's indiscretion was an extreme, but by no means a unique, instance of the pitfalls that lie in the way of a diplomatist who has never served his apprenticeship to the craft. In their purely business and bargaining hours American Ambassadors, through the exercise of sheer native ability, have, as a rule, been eminently successful. There are, indeed, few countries that can show such a record of skilful diplomacy as the United States. But in the smaller conventions American Ambassadors are frequently to seek. They have rarely had a cosmopolitan experience, and they enter the service too late in life to adapt themselves readily to usages and an environment so far removed from the normal round of American life.

Possibly, as time goes on, the American Congress will gradually do away with the present system. But it will not, necessarily, put a better one in its place. It seems, and undoubtedly it is, an anomaly that there should be no examinations to pass before entering the diplomatic service in America, no security of tenure, no regular and recognised system of promotion, either by merit or seniority, or in any other way, and no pensions. It is an anomaly that all appointments in the service should be made by the President—usually, of course, from men of his own party—and should be liable to terminate at a moment's notice when the other side comes in. But these conditions, if they necessarily restrict the higher posts to men of wealth, have the virtue of saving the service, as a whole, from being over-run by undesirables. To establish permanent Embassies in the leading capitals and to pay Ambassadors a handsome salary is in itself a very desirable thing. But it may, and in America it would, have the effect of making an Embassy a prize for the professional politicians and their hangers-on to compete for, and the chief qualifications of an Ambassador would come in time to be measured by the amount of his political "pull." So long as every man is heavily fined for becoming an Ambassador, there is at least a guarantee that the mere political adventurer will devote himself to other and more lucrative careers.

THE "TOMMY" OF OLD.

WITH all our talk of progress, and all our restless endeavors to hurry the millennium, we constantly look back on the past with a certain tenderness and regretful admiration. A golden haze envelops those departed centuries till they gleam through it like the reminiscences of childhood; and it is a commonplace that the heroic ages always lie behind. Especially is this true of prowess, whether in sport or upon the ensanguined field. No hunter's lie, and hardly any fisherman's, can approach in splendor the traditions of the boys who captained our school before us. Certainly there was one Homeric hero who boasted his generation better than their fathers, but he stands alone among all the sons of Mars. True courage, heroism, and military skill have always been the attributes of the ancestral past. From primal ages and long-forgotten battles our army has continued steadily to decline, and the paths of glory have led but to the dogs.

If ever there was a heroic period in the British soldier's history, we should have thought it was Wolfe's. During the elder Pitt's brief years of supremacy it was the British soldier who stood firm against the French cavalry at Minden, gave us India at Plassy, and Canada at Quebec. Was it not in the very year of Wolfe's greatest achievement that Horace Walpole wrote he had to ask every morning what new victory there was for fear of missing one? When we speak of Old England, perhaps it is those bluff days we think of most. The whole nation then was surely of the bull-dog breed, while army and navy alike shouted "Rule, Britannia," in a unison of heroes. Those were the times to which our dismal prophets point backward as evidences of a sturdiness and grit beyond the reach of latter-day degeneracy. Since that happy and glorious age, it is but too clear that each generation ranks below its fathers and will produce in our descendants a progeny more vicious.

No dismal prophet likes to lose his fixed ideals of ancient virtue, or to be disenchanted of the growing corruption he sees around him. And that being so, we should strongly advise none of the class to read a new "Life and Letters of Wolfe," which Mr. Beccles Willson has edited for Mr. Heinemann. The work has been admirably done, and it is all the better because the editor for the most part allows Wolfe to tell the story himself in his very numerous letters—we had nearly called them epistles, for they are touched with solemnity. The most are written to his father or mother, with an old-fashioned respect and unemotional precision belonging to the century; but as the father was himself a retired officer of an excellent and modest type, Wolfe is very explicit in describing to him the military situation and the condition of the army. As to Wolfe himself, the letters only confirm the estimate one had formed before. He was the type of the good British officer, raised to a higher power and illuminated by intellect. He had the average officer's love of sport, honesty in money affairs, politeness of manner, and personal consideration for his men. But in his case all these common and excellent qualities were multiplied or raised to a higher power. In sport, for instance, Wolfe is constantly speaking about his horses, his fishing, his dogs—"Romp," "Flurry," and the rest; and of one pointer he writes, "that is my happiness, my very existence." England excels in regimental officers. As Ruskin used to say, we are a nation of captains. But Wolfe evidently surpassed all the regimental officers of his time in that magnetic influence over men which the sternest discipline can never replace. Colonel of his regiment before he was thirty, he soon made it famous as the best-drilled unit in the army, and the confidence felt in him was so secure that the soldiers' wives appealed for his judgment and assistance even in domestic affairs. One such petition has been preserved, and is worth remembering, if only for one little feminine touch:—

"Colonel,—Being a True Noble-heart'd Pityful gentleman and Officer, your Worship will excuse these few Lines concerning the husband of ye undersigned, Sergt. White, who, not from his own fault, is not behaving as Hee should towards me and his family, although good and faithfull until the middle of November last. Petition of Anne White."

An excellent regimental officer, he was also a man of strong intellectual needs, and that is a much rarer character in our army. Always on the look-out for opportunities of knowledge, he deliberately went to France for self-improvement, he read widely of the best, and admitted that one of his most successful tactics was borrowed from Xenophon—a thing that few British officers would admit, even if we could imagine it true. All his letters are those of an intellectual, or even literary, mind, and sometimes they display a flush of rhetoric, a certain conscious superiority that reminds one of the Nelson touch; for, indeed, Wolfe might almost be called our Nelson on land. But it is quite evident that, among the ruck of his fellow-officers, he stood almost alone, both in competence and intellect. At twenty-two he writes to his mother:—

"Few of my companions surpass me in common knowledge, but most of them in vice. . . . I dread their habits and behaviour, and am forced to an eternal watch upon myself, that I may avoid the very manner which I most condemn in them."

Three years later he writes to his father from Inverness: "We are allowed to be the most religious foot officers that have been seen in the North for many a day," and yet in most of their quarters they had been looked upon as "no better than the sons of darkness, and given up unto Satan." He admits that even his own language would shock a father's ears. Drunkenness after mess was the accepted thing, and the chief interest in an officer's existence was debauchery with one class of woman or another.

But if this was the character of the officers, the character of the men was even worse. On one occasion Wolfe writes:—

"Nothing, I think, can hurt their discipline—it is at its worst. They shall drink and swear, plunder and massacre with any troops in Europe, the Cossacks and Calmucks themselves not excepted."

The meaning of such words is realised if we remember that in those days, as for long after, it was a law of war that a city taken by assault should be handed over to the soldiers to kill, plunder, and ravish as they pleased.

In writing of the surrender of Louisbourg, for instance, Wolfe remarks:—

"The poor women have been heartily frightened, as well they might; but no real harm, either during the siege or after it, has befallen any. A day or two more (i.e., if the place had not surrendered) they would have been entirely at our disposal."

But there are two passages especially which show the condition of the ranks in that heroic age, when regiments were still called after the officers or gentlemen who had contracted to raise them, and were recruited in war time from any debtors, criminals, paupers, and vagrants who would join. The first is written to Wolfe's father, on Braddock's defeat upon the Canadian frontier in 1755:—

"I do myself believe," writes Wolfe, "that the cowardice and ill-behaviour of the men far exceeded the ignorance of the chief. I have but a very mean opinion of the infantry in courage. I know their discipline to be bad, and their valor precarious. They are easily put into disorder, and hard to recover out of it. They frequently kill their officers through fear, and murder one another in their confusion. . . . Our military education is by far the worst in Europe, and all our concerns are treated with contempt or totally neglected. It will cost us very dear some time hence."

Again, writing from Portsmouth the very year before his own famous expedition to America, he says to Lord George Sackville:—

"The condition of the troops that compose this garrison (or rather vagabonds that stroll about in dirty red clothes from one gin shop to another) exceeds all belief. There is not the least shadow of discipline, care, or attention. Disorderly soldiers of different regiments are collected here; some from the ships, others from the hospital, some waiting to embark—dirty, drunken, insolent rascals, improved by the hellish nature of the place, where every kind of corruption, immorality, and looseness is carried to excess; it is a sink of the lowest and most abominable of vices."

When Wolfe reached America, he wrote of "sergeants drunk upon duty, two sentries (drunk) upon their posts, and the rest wallowing in the dirt. I believe no nation ever paid so many bad soldiers at so high a rate." Similarly, in his letters, he complains of the bad food and clothing of the men, and of the everlasting scoundrelism of army contractors, who then, as now, regarded their country's necessity as their own opportunity, and were eager to sell the lives of their defenders for a filthy half-crown.

Yet with these men, and under these conditions, Wolfe, at the age of thirty-two, seized the Heights of Abraham, and in the battle held his line silent and immovable till the enemy had advanced within forty yards. It was a supreme triumph of character and personal genius. "Mad, is he?" cried George II., in answer to complaints about Wolfe; "then I hope he will bite some of my other generals!" It is one of the immortal jests of history, almost recompensing us for all the dulness of the Hanoverian dynasty; and sometimes, as we watch our generals to-day, we wish that the virus of that bite had been hereditary.

No one would care to detract from the glories of the past, or to scorn the poor drunken and blaspheming outcasts who died for us, unknown and unremembered, at Plassy or Quebec. But for twenty-five years the present writer has enjoyed unusual opportunities of associating with British soldiers of all ranks, and he knows that Wolfe's descriptions of his men would be foul libels upon regulars or auxiliaries now. Within his own experience he has beheld an improvement in the private soldier's manner, habits, and intelligence, which inspires hope for the country as a whole.

It is true that, even in war-time, recruits are no longer drawn from criminals and wastrels; but, except in war-time, the enormous majority of recruits come from the "out-of-works," who usually stand low down in the orders of population. If among them, even the board-school lessons, the board-school games, and the slowly rising standard of human happiness have produced so great a change within only a quarter of a century, is it not encouraging even for those who find hope difficult? And may we not respectfully invite our dismal prophets, in the midst of their sweet lamentations over the decline of pristine virtue, to "pause and reflect," as the poetic Robert Montgomery once called upon Omnipotence to do? They do not wish to be cheerful, but if they did, they could hardly find a better corrective to their melancholy than a comparison between the "Tommies" of to-day and Wolfe's account of his heroes.

CHATEAUBRIAND.

DISRAELI defined the "most desirable life" as "a continued grand procession from childhood to the tomb." "Tameless and swift and proud," Shelley describes himself, chained by the heavy weight of the hours. Imagine a blend of Disraeli with a grown-up Shelley, and add something of magic and majesty in prose which neither possessed—you have something of the spirit of Chateaubriand. Mr. Gribble, in "Chateaubriand and his Court of Women" (Chapman and Hall), attempts to reveal to English audiences the frequency and transitory nature of his affections, the neglect of truth in his statements of fact. Both these seem somehow irrelevant to the author of the "Memoirs d'Outre-tombe." Disraeli was frequently indifferent to veracity. Shelley was wooed and won by many women while he lived, and would have been wooed and won by many more had he lived longer. When "Le Génie du Christianisme" first revealed to a light-hearted generation how "perfectly delightful Christianity was," there were those who mocked the new discovery and its author. Madame de Staël was moved to laughter by the chapter upon "Virginity in its poetical aspects." Other writers declared that it was incumbent upon those who preached the Gospel to keep a watchful eye upon "their own hearts and reins." Chateaubriand, like the "most Christian Kings" of many centuries, found no difficulty in reconciling the warmth of women's love with the championship of a faith which denounced such waywardness. He was married by his family, without affection, the bridegroom feeling "that he possessed none of the qualifications of a husband." The marriage was arranged in order to obtain funds for fighting with the émigré forces on the frontier—"in order to furnish me," in his cynical commenting, "with the means of going to get killed in defence of a cause to which I was indifferent." He sees nothing of his wife for ten years. She makes phantom appearances all through that astonishing adventure which was the life of Chateaubriand. Sometimes—though rarely—she is alone with him; in which case, if he declares himself cold, she opens the window; if he complains of the heat, she throws more logs on the fire. More often there is another woman in company: that particular "other woman" for whom he feels (at the moment) the world well lost! Two old women—his wife and another; so—towards the end—Hortense Allart dismisses Mesdames de Chateaubriand and Récamier. But then Hortense was only twenty-seven; and Chateaubriand is asking of Providence only one boon—"Ah me! How I wish I were only fifty! She suggested twenty-five is still better. No! No! If I could go back to fifty that would be far enough." He could not go back to fifty. By the banks of the Rhone he conjured up the memory of "those years so painful and so bitterly regretted, when the passions of our youth were at once our happiness and our torture." The end is always a tragedy—especially amongst the great actors. Maxime du Camp has left an unforgettable picture of the dusty fifth act of so long and splendid a drama of life: Chateaubriand's wandering in the streets of Paris, "the very image of ennui—a man bowed down beneath the burden of an intolerable weariness." But the friendship of Madame Récamier remained the one thing prominent at the last: he praying only "in so far as he was capable of prayer, that he might die before her, and that she might be with him when he died." And his prayer was granted. At an hour when the noise of the cannon was already sounding in the streets of Paris, and he was witnessing—although unconscious—another end of another world.

And as with his affections so with his veracity. No one would read Chateaubriand's religious works for theology. No one would read the record of his life for history. Laborious pedants—quoted with some gusto by Mr. Gribble—have proved that his record of his American tour is a fiction, or an exaggeration: that he described the Ohio as the Mississippi, that he dragged in and placed upon its banks monkeys and parrots from the "Orinoco" of a forgotten Mr. Bartram, that he had perhaps never visited Washington and made the Wabash run uphill. What does it matter whether he visited Washington or made the Wabash run uphill? He has given in "Ouvre-tombe" one of the imperishable books of the world. He has revealed in the actual, incontestable events of his own life such an Adventure as comes to but few men on this planet. He stood and stands to-day as a personality, fascinating, elusive, baffling, irresistible.

He had to record the most wonderful story in the world; and he found himself playing no mean part in that "explosion of miracles." "I was writing ancient history," he declares, "and modern history was knocking at my door. In vain I cried, 'Wait, I am coming to you.' It passed on, to the sound of the cannon, carrying with it three generations of kings." He saw it all through a life prolonged beyond the natural limits of mankind. In the gloomy woods surrounding Combours at the beginning he is cherishing the ineffable melancholy of the Celt, the poet's promise that its children shall inherit the unrest of the wind and ever seek some face elusive in some land they cannot find. And a Breton he remained to the end, despising opponents of the faith, moved—and sincerely—by its emotional appeal, filled with alternate moods of gaiety and profound sadness, vain, contemptuous of worldly success, yet driven forward to achievement by a torturing ambition, reminding himself always that he was but pacing in a funeral procession towards the inexorable grave. He set out from this remote and hidden home into the sudden vast upheaval of all the universe, into the death and birth of an age. He is wandering penniless in England, sleeping a night in Westminster Abbey—"the English Saint Denis." He is in Paris after the Terror, watching the acrobats in a church which the Jacobins had turned into a place of entertainment, compelled to retire when the waiter demanded orders. "I had not a penny," he confessed, "to pay for refreshments." Again, he is the idol of literary France, offered high office under Napoleon, but refusing service under the murderer of the Duc d'Enghien; making large fortunes and squandering them; an effective journalist and pamphleteer. He is listening to the sound of the cannon at Waterloo, outside the Brussels gate at Ghent, tortured by the realisation that "the Powers were casting lots for the robe of Christ!" "If the allies triumphed, was not our glory lost? But if Napoleon won, where was our freedom?" Later he is ambassador at Rome, Berlin, London; fêted and honored at the summit of society in a city where he had once starved and suffered. For one crowning moment he is Foreign Minister of France, making war with Spain, appearing at the Congress of Verona as Disraeli at the Congress of Berlin. And afterwards again there is Revolution, and Chateaubriand bankrupt and later a wanderer, doing faithful service for an impossible Charles X. and the child who was the last hope of a dying cause. "And I, too, have tried to nurse a child King," he could declare, "but I found ten centuries lying with him in his cradle—a weight too heavy for my arms." Yesterday he was receiving almost Royal worship, with the sick, in the little towns he visited, brought to touch the garment of the great defender of religion. To-day he is driven, at the age of sixty-five, to earn his bread by working as a publishers' hack, translating "Paradise Lost" at so much a yard. To-morrow he will be the recognised hero of letters, reading his memoirs to a select circle of the men of genius of Paris—the memoirs which were to endow him with immortal fame.

For many have written the story of those amazing years. He alone has set it to music: a kind of solemn marching organ melody, not inadequate to that "wind of the spirit" in which worlds were perishing and worlds reborn. He set the pageant as it passed in the background of the Eternities. He saw its pathetic wild enthusiasms and resistances, its terrors and laughter, with something of the grandeur and significance which rightly belongs to them, as one of humanity's great efforts to scale the walls of heaven, and effect by mortal efforts more than is permitted to mortal hands. Into all he infused the quality of magic; so that the nightly pacing of his father up and down the old, dim-lighted hall at Combours after dinner; the Miserère in the Sistine Chapel with the yellow candles; the "little smoke" which is the natural image of man's life; the Mediterranean night, filled with memories of Napoleon, "the mightiest spirit that ever animated human clay"—all these and a thousand incidents in that remote century of such restless, aspiring life, now all dead and silent—stand in an earthly immortality, charged with the light which never was on sea or land. His vision of the future was darkened: but he saw something of the great changes which were coming—which are coming—on this world. He knew that the end is not yet. He knew that the end would come. Watching, at the last, the sunset gilding the Cross on the Invalides, he could affirm that society will perish unless Liberty, which could save the world, can make terms with religion. He saw that the Revolution, far from being complete, was only beginning. "Given a political state of things," was his challenge, "in which individuals have so many millions a year while others are dying of hunger: can that state of things subsist when religion is no longer there with its hopes beyond the world to explain the sacrifice?" It is the challenge of M. Brioux in "La Foi," of M. Viviani, of the inexorable logic of things as they are. "Re-compose the aristocratic fictions, if you can: try to persuade the poor man, when he shall have learnt to read correctly, and ceased to believe, try to persuade him that he must submit to every sort of privation, while his neighbor possesses superfluity a thousand times told. As a last resource you will have to kill him."

CO-PARTNERSHIP IN NATURE.

I AM the legal owner of an acre of garden land in Surrey in which stands my cottage. I cannot dig, nor have I skill to tend the things that grow upon my little plot. A hired gardener works the soil, sowing seeds and putting in the tender plants, caring for their food and watching them in health and sickness, so that they may yield timely flowers or fruit. When he speaks, as he always does, of "our" roses or "our" apples, he evidently feels, as I do, that the real right of property in this produce, as in the ground on which it grows, is his, not mine; he feels the true pride of ownership, not I, for he has mixed his mind and muscle with the land. I own it by deed, he by deeds. In any court of really human equity, I fear my parchment case would easily be set aside.

But what about the rabbits and the moles which we both denounce as trespassers, waging war on them with wire fencing or with trap? Have they no vested rights in the land which was theirs before I fenced it in? Neither my gardener nor I gets his living from the land; they do, and in so doing get into more intimate relations with the soil than any human cultivator. Surely they think and feel the land is theirs, and that they are wrongfully dispossessed by our predatory cunning. If they could get before a court not packed by "humans," justice might lean heavily to their claim. But they would not have it all their own way. There is a thrush, whose confident demeanor as he stalks the lawn the whole summer long, has won from us the sobriquet of "the proprietor." It is his hunting ground, from which he tugs his wriggling food with unerring grip; or he watches small intruders seize their quarry, and, chasing them, takes it away, true landlord fashion. But he is little better than a robber baron, after all, a greedy monopolist, and as summer advances whole flocks of common little birds contest his supremacy. Crowds of sparrows and starlings watch our planting, watering, and tending of fruits and vegetables with interest, for they have engaged us to grow them a large stock of food upon their land.

But some doubt attaches to the titles of all these birds and beasts who live upon the soil; one has a feeling that those that live in the earth must have an even better right of property. No one else practises the virtues of an occupying owner so well as the earth-worm, his intensive culture alone is gründlich, he alone gets to close grips with the details of the land question. If the suit went up to animate Nature's final court of appeal, his patient, unceasing trituration would surely establish "nine points of the law." Or, quitting the earth and again coming above ground, one encounters the respective claims of all the insect world of bees and grubs and beetles. Think what a case such a counsel as M. Maeterlinck could construct for the bees, their skilled, laborious services in the critical work of fertilising plants, the manifest intention of Nature to make the world of flowers conform to their needs and capacities, their just grievances against the parasitic force and cunning of human exploitation. As man, arrogating to himself the central place in Nature, records in his Bible how that all these others, beasts, birds, and insects have been created for his comfort and enjoyment, mere ζῶα ὄψα, so each other species in this animate Nature makes its appropriate political economy. The avi-central or the api-central economy will be quite as specious, perhaps as valid, from the standpoint of disinterested Nature, as the anthropocentric: the undivided cloth, lifted in a different way, will fall in different folds, that is all.

But why stop short at animal species? it will be said. Intertwined with their needs and labors and their rights are those of the various vegetable world. In the elaborate harmony and conflict of organic species and their individuals, animal and vegetable continually co-operate and compete. Nor can the crude and arbitrary attempt to rule out plant rights by denying animate life or even consciousness to vegetable organisms satisfy the demands of organic justice. One might even appeal to the feelings of the interested party man against so peremptory an exclusion. Who does not feel as he walks amid the majestic oaks or beeches in some great forest, that the earth, which feeds these strong and beautiful creatures, "belongs" to them by some truly "natural right," and that the man who treats them as mere "timber" wrongs them and outrages the wider social economy of Nature? You plead "Man alone has clear conscious purposes, he alone is continually adjusting 'the environment,' all these other organic species belong to this environment of his which he has a supreme right to dispose of for his advantage: he is the sole owner of the earth." But may not the rabbit, the thrush, the bee, the worm, the cabbage, the rose, demur at this arrogant humanism, and appeal to the wider cosmic order? Are the higher consciousness of man, the greater complexity of his activities and purposes, a sufficient ground for ruling out the claims of all lower forms of Nature, and for dismissing as merely "fantastic" the demand for an extension of the feelings and obligations of "right" outside the limits of humanity? May it not be the case that just as "egoism" in its numberless subtle forms is the besetting sin of the individual man, so "anthropocentrism" is the besetting sin of humanity.

The fuller study of Nature shows my garden as the area of numberless superimposed layers of ownership. Some of these rights of property do not conflict but harmonise: I may enjoy the flowers which furnish food for the bees; the currant trees and the birds have a common interest in keeping down the slugs or fly. But on my lawn there is perpetual war between the grass and dandelions. Everywhere my gardener is engaged in expelling the aboriginal inhabitants which he calls weeds, securing an unfair preference for his delicate interlopers. Such is the familiar economy of animate Nature, which one can carry further into the dimmest recesses of that Nature invidiously dubbed "inanimate," probably because our senses are too crude to find its finer animation. Everywhere a conjunction of competition and of mutual aid, yielding some result which in its turn has friendly and hostile relations with other happenings of Nature! The net outcome of all this complicated activity we judge too exclusively from the standpoint of human welfare. I suggest that it is not really good for man to take so tightly human a view of such things as "property" and "rights." The organic view of Nature to which that freer, more disinterested, thought and feeling, termed philosophy, inclines, should lead us to reflect that the Universe is not made for man alone, and that for man to think it is and to act upon this thought is a form of insolence for which he pays a heavy penalty. The narrow, parasitic view of property in land which we are now engaged in fighting on the field of human politics is, perhaps, an offshoot of a wider fallacy, the persistent substitution of a distinctively human economy for the larger economy of Nature. My "right" to an absolute property in my acre only holds good in the narrow confines of a conventional interpretation of certain documents constructed to express the interests of a little clique of men endowed with legislative powers in this country. Investigate my "right," even by application of distinctively human rules of equity and reason, it grows progressively weaker as you extend more broadly the area of investigation, until at last it stands as the weakest of a long series of rights of property vested in an endless variety of co-partners in the land.

J. A. H.

Contemporaries.

A FRENCH CHAMBERLAIN.

THE London correspondent of the "Matin" on Tuesday contrasted the speech which M. Briand delivered at Périgueux on Sunday with Mr. Lloyd George's speech on the previous day—to the advantage of the former. As befits the correspondent of a journal which represents la haute finance, he preferred the "moderation" of M. Briand, and his appeal for the union of toutes les bonnes volontés, to Mr. Lloyd George's incitements "to class war." There is no doubt about the contrast, whatever may be one's personal preferences. The Périgueux speech reads like a bid for the support of the Moderates; a brilliant exposition of opportunism. It was a plea for the formation of a "National Party"—that is to say, a centre bloc, from which only the extremists on both sides are to be excluded; they are not "bonnes volontés."

You have heard this plea in England from the lips of a politician whose career has had many points of resemblance with that of M. Briand. Mr. Chamberlain started from a less advanced point on the Left than M. Briand, and he has ended at a point much further to the Right (perhaps M. Briand's evolution has not yet ended), but there is a good deal of similarity between the two careers, allowing for the difference between English and French politics. There is not much similarity between the two. M. Briand is by far the abler man. His intellect is more profound, more subtle, and far more clear; his perception finer, and his ideas more lucid; his temperament at once colder and more severely and closely trained. M. Briand would be incapable of such speeches as those which Mr. Chamberlain delivered on the subject of Tariff Reform, in which he effectively answered himself. And M. Briand is a statesman; of that there can be no doubt, whether one likes or dislikes his policy.

It has been a strange career, that of the small republican's son who is now Prime Minister of France at little more than forty years of age. The revolutionary Socialist, the anti-militarist, the apostle of a general strike, is now the hope of the vested interests and the darling of the "Temps" and the "Figaro." The evolution has been somewhat rapid, and even the writers of the solemn leaders in which the Périgueux speech was hailed as the charter of moderation, must have felt a certain incongruity between the honeyed appeals of that speech to the wealthy bourgeoisie and certain other speeches whose date is not very remote.

The speech was indeed a remarkable one. It was not a mere brilliant piece of oratory, although it displayed all the talents of a subtle master of speech; it was the skilful exposition of a clearly thought out policy by a man who knows exactly what he is aiming at and how he proposes to attain his object. M. Briand appealed to all "sincere Republicans," but he knows as well as anyone that the union of all Republicans is a dream impossible of realisation. There is no more reason that all those who agree in accepting the Republican form of Government should act together in politics than that all who accept the monarchy in England should do so. If and when the Republic is attacked all Republicans ought and do combine to defend it. But a party which required nothing but the profession of Republican principles would be doomed to sterility, for it would be unable to agree on any advance. M. Briand knows this as well as anyone else; the only possible meaning that can be attached to his appeal is that he aims at the organisation of a great Centre party to combat the Socialists and advanced Socialist-Radicals on the one hand, and the Clericals on the other. That is the sense in which his speech has been taken by the Conservative, as distinct from the reactionary or clerical, Press, which approves the speech with little reserve. According to the London correspondent of the "Matin," it has also met with approval from the Conservative Press in England.

It is possible that this skilfully presented policy will, for a time at any rate, attain a certain success. M. Briand will not repeat the mistakes of M. Clemenceau. He is more tactful, and less impulsive. We shall have no more prosecutions of anti-militarists on the one hand and bishops on the other. M. Briand evidently intends to ménager his opponents; he prefers the manière douce to the manière forte, and he will cause less irritation than his predecessor. On Sunday he was as polite to the Catholics as to every one else. Naturally, his verbal smoothness had no effect; it is unlikely that he expected it to have any. The organs of the Vatican retorted with vitriol, and they were right. The sympathetic reception of the Périgueux speech by the "Figaro," the special organ of the wealthy Catholic bourgeoisie, is of no good omen for the Vatican. The wealthy Catholic bourgeoisie were glad enough to turn to the Church when it seemed to be the only possible barrier against social change, but they would sacrifice the Pope to-morrow to escape the income-tax. The passage in M. Briand's speech in regard to the income-tax is extremely vague, and his remark that it is necessary to have "une large part de consentement" among those who are to bear the additional burden is calculated to re-assure the possessors of large incomes. If the income-tax is to wait for this "consentement," it will wait till the Greek Kalends.

It seems probable that M. Briand will have to draw very largely on Conservative forces if he is to secure the stable majority for which he asks. His speech does not fit in very well with the opinions expressed at the recent Congress of the Radical and Socialist-Radical Parties. The Congress was somewhat incoherent and chaotic, and the discussions showed very clearly the marked divergence between the two different currents in the party. But there was no inclination to make common cause with Conservative Republicans, and many of the resolutions carried are not calculated to secure that union of all Republicans for which M. Briand appeals. The Congress, for instance, was by no means disposed to ignore the aggressive campaign which the bishops have been compelled by Rome to inaugurate against the schools of the nation; on this subject M. Briand said not a word. There are many other questions which must inevitably cause a division, in which the Government will have to take one side or the other.

Nevertheless, M. Briand has a bonne presse even as regards the Radical newspapers, most of which emphasise his declaration of the resolve of the Government to realise the Radical programme of reform, without attempting to explain how it is to be realised by a Republican Party satisfactory to the "Temps" and the "Figaro."

The "Rappel" is mildly ironical and reminds M. Briand that it was at Périgueux that Gambetta made a similar appeal on September 28th, 1873, for the union of all Frenchmen. The most trenchant criticism of the speech is naturally that of M. Jaurès in the "Humanité." Up to the present the "Humanité" has refrained from criticism of the new Government, but Socialists can hardly be expected to welcome the prospect of what M. Jaurès describes as "une sorte d'Union plus qu'à demi—Conservatrice." If by a policy of détente M. Briand means greater liberty of speech and action for all citizens, M. Jaurès welcomes such a policy. But he scorns the idea of a "national party" which, he says, means a universal acceptance of the status quo which can only result in universal stagnation. It is impossible to contest the common sense of this view; conflict is a necessary condition of progress. M. Jaurès, like many other Frenchmen of all shades of opinion, believes that the scrutin de liste with proportional representation would clear the air in French politics, and he is amazed that M. Briand, who points out so clearly the disadvantages of the present system, should be opposed to this reform. M. Jaurès, too, like the London correspondent of the "Matin," compares M. Briand's speech with those of Mr. Lloyd George—but to the advantage of the latter.

To sum up, it is plain that M. Briand cannot achieve the ostensible aim of his speech; the political union of all Frenchmen, or even of all Republicans, is impossible. But he may succeed in grouping round his Government a strong Centre bloc, including all the Conservative section of the Radical Party. Whether such a bloc would survive the General Election next May is another matter. Meanwhile the enthusiasm of all the financial interests in the Press for the Briand Ministry is one of the most interesting symptoms of the hour. One contrasts the opposition of the same papers, notably the "Matin," to M. Combes's Government, which did not contain three "Independent Socialists."

R. E. D.

The Drama.

"ONE OF GOD'S DANDIES."

If the essence of drama be conflict, the wrestle of will with will, then "Don," by Mr. Rudolf Besier, comes as near as any play I know to essential drama. It is a sparring match, in heaven knows how many rounds. Not only is the hero all the time at war with his environment, but his environment is all the time at war with itself. When I read the play, several months ago, I feared this incessant wrangling would get on the nerves of the audience; but my fears were groundless. The play interested, entertained, and moved us. It is a thoroughly good comedy of an original and quite legitimate type. Not that the element of danger which I foresaw in it was entirely non-existent. The character of General Sinclair, never departing for a moment—or only for one rather improbable moment—from his attitude of snappish pigheadedness, might easily have produced on the audience the effect I feared. But Providence watched over Mr. Besier in the casting of the part. Mr. Dawson Milward was not in the least "the man for it." An actor manager, with all London to choose from, would not have dreamt of selecting him. But the Haymarket, though not a repertory theatre, has something like a stock company, and Mr. Milward happened to be the man that came ready to Mr. Trench's hand. By playing the part with quiet discretion and distinction, he literally unconventionalised it, and carried it off with perfect success. Had it been played "for all it was worth" by the fussy and blustering type of comedian for whom it seemed predestined, it might seriously have endangered the play. This is not the first time that the policy of giving a part to a good actor, rather than to the man who seemed born to play it, has vindicated itself.

We are not bound to inquire too rigorously whether such a character as Stephen Bonington, otherwise known as "Don," actually exists. He might exist, and that is enough. It is perfectly legitimate, for purposes of comedy, to illustrate and criticise a type of character or a moral tendency by taking an extreme instance of it. And who shall say that "Don" does not exist? We are apt to salve our self-complacency by declaring impossible manifestations of idealistic kindness and courage which are, in fact, impossible—to us. We have all known extremely unpractical persons; and if unpracticality is not always combined with an excess of chivalry, there is no reason why it should not be. If a dramatist had drawn the character of Shelley before Shelley existed, or even while Shelley existed, but before he was revealed to the world, critics would have declared him wildly impossible. For my part, if I must quarrel with "Don," it should not be for anything that he actually does, but for the imperturbable lightness, not to say levity, with which he takes the consequences of his action, as they threaten to develop. When it seems highly probable that he may lose Ann through his championship of Mrs. Thompson, one would welcome a little greater display of feeling, some sign of his perception of a divided duty. No doubt his inability to perceive a divided duty, his utter absorption in the one enthusiasm of the moment, is the very trait which the author is presenting—and satirising. But I think he is guilty of a little overdraw. Stephen might quite well be unshaken in his sense of duty towards Elizabeth Thompson, and yet keenly sensible of the pain he was inflicting upon Ann, and of the danger to their future happiness. Again, I find it hard to believe that he would face Thompson's pistol with such absolute serenity. Fanatics of the Thompson type are nasty customers to play with. We see every day that a pistol with a passion behind it is no laughing matter; and though, doubtless, Stephen's show of intrepidity is the best possible policy under the circumstances, we would feel more confidence in its possibility if we were suffered to divine a little more effort in the matter. As it is, we feel that Stephen never for a moment believed himself in any danger; in which case he was not only foolish, but scarcely human. I think it would be both truer and more dramatic if he showed, not fear, but realisation of danger—if only, perhaps, in the form of a marked reaction when the strain was over. But these are trifling matters. Perhaps, after all, Mr. Besier's more daring psychology is justified. It may be that I am pleading for obvious plausibility rather than for essential truth. In the main, at any rate, "Don" illustrates, with excellent vivacity and ingenuity, the eternal conflict between the ideal and the practical in life. Stephen Bonington is one of the persons (rare, but, nevertheless, real), who, in working out problems of conduct, are congenitally apt to "neglect the weight of the elephant"—to ignore the potency in human affairs of prejudice, convention, pusillanimity. The much commoner tendency is to reinforce the weight of the elephant by adding our own personal pusillanimity to that of our neighbors. But a study of the rarer bias is an admirable theme for comedy: and Mr. Besier was quite justified, I think, in letting his hero's Quixotism work out to what may be called a happy ending. An excess of chivalry is so infrequent a foible that the modern Cervantes who should seek to "smile it away" would do a poor service to society.

No one can reproach Mr. Besier, as Ibsen used to be reproached, with laying too much stress upon heredity. He has, I think, left rather too wide a gap between the two generations of his characters. How Mrs. Bonington ever came to have such a son as Stephen, how the daughter of General and Mrs. Sinclair ever grew into so delightful a character as Ann, seems to me something of a puzzle. But, heredity apart, Mr. Besier has a light and deft hand at character-drawing. Mrs. Bonington is a very effective variety of the genus goose, and there is a distinct idea in Mrs. Sinclair, with her paroxysms of mirthless laughter, though I do not think Miss Granville made the intention of the part quite clear. The General, as above indicated, is the most conventional character in the play, and something of a libel, one hopes, upon the British Army. On the other hand, the old Rector is very pleasantly drawn, and shows that Mr. Besier can make a character live, while keeping him strictly within the limits of a commonplace type. But the most original figure in the play is doubtless Thompson, who assures its success by giving a new tone and color to the last act. He is an admirable study of fierce egoism and sensuality, expressing itself in terms of religion. This is even a deep psychological truth in his artless confession of the analogy between his spiritual and his erotic experiences. One cannot put much confidence in the amenity of the reconstituted family life under the Thompson roof-tree; but Mrs. Thompson is so essentially (and rightly) a colorless character, that our apprehensions for her future do not greatly weigh upon our spirit. The comedy remains a comedy, even though this darker strand in its texture is left at a loose end.

Mr. Charles Quartermaine's performance of Stephen was safe rather than brilliant. The poetic impulsiveness, even the mere unpracticality of the character, were almost entirely left to the spectator's imagination. There was nothing whatever of Shelley or of Mr. Shaw's Eugene about Mr. Quartermaine, who seemed a headstrong and inconsiderate, but otherwise rather commonplace, young man. Even his dress did not suggest the character. The razor-edged crease down the front of his trousers was wholly inconsistent with Ann's anecdote of his appearance at a dinner-party in correct attire down to his waist, but with nether garments of blue serge. Surely he ought to have worn those baggy blue serge trousers and no others. Was it Mr. Quartermaine's fault, or the author's, or the producer's—or perhaps the fault of all three—that the end of the second act seemed quite unduly farcical? On the whole, I fancy the actor must be acquitted. The fault lay in the very idea of restraining Stephen by physical force from rushing to the encounter of Thompson. In the part of Thompson Mr. Norman McKinnell was quite admirable, and Miss Christine Silver was most happily chosen for Mrs. Thompson. Mr. James Hearn and Miss Frances Ivor were very good as the elder Boningtons, and Miss Ellen O'Malley played the part of Ann with her unfailing sincerity and charm. By the way, I have not said enough of this original and well-drawn character. It is one of Mr. Besier's happiest inspirations.

Mr. Charles McEvoy's one-act play, "Gentlemen of the Road," was placed in a very beautiful woodland scene; but the sole merit of the production lay with the scenic artist. Mr. Trench really ought not to encourage Mr. McEvoy to waste his talent on such unworthy trifles.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

YOUNG TURKEY AS A MILITARY POWER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—To an English mind—at least to the mind of an Englishman brought up in the old Whig distrust of great armies—one of the most disquieting features in the Turkish outlook is militarism.

In the first place, the internal political situation in Turkey is so much the reverse of all we are accustomed to in England that one feels instinctively suspicious of it. The army is Liberal, and is maintaining Liberal institutions. The country is mostly reactionary, and would overthrow the Parliament if it could. When the despot does overthrow the Chamber it is the army that rushes to the assistance of the latter, not the commonalty.

When we come to consider the matter more closely, we find that the July revolution was caused by army officers who were ashamed of the weak condition into which the armed forces of the Empire had fallen under the Absolutist régime. They said: "Only the other day we were at the gates of Vienna and all Europe trembled before us. To-day we are nothing. Let us abolish the system which has brought our glorious arms so low. Let us establish a Parliament in order that our army may be reorganised and that Europe may again have to take us into account."

As far as I could see, the military leaders of the Committee went no further than this, unless incidentally. All their reforms, all their new-found tolerance, originated in their regard for Turkey's military strength. In July last they fraternised with the Greek and Bulgarian brigands in Macedonia, because these brigands might help them in the march on Constantinople which the Young Turks then thought unavoidable. Ahmed Riza Bey and some of the civilians had broader views than this, but they did not and do not count. It was the military leaders who made the revolution of July and of April and who are maintaining the Constitution. And though the military chiefs act but never speak or write, they are the only good statesmen and politicians in Turkey. The civilians make endless blunders. Their journalistic controversies did much to bring about the April reaction. But—save, perhaps, when he threatened to march on Athens—Shefket Pasha has invariably done the right thing.

The army, therefore, has all the brains, all the power, and all the discretion. And, as its one great object is to improve itself, to increase its size and its efficiency, it has progressed enormously in every direction since July, 1908. True, the April mutiny lost it a whole army corps, but that misfortune only gave it an opportunity to show its power, for the rapidity with which Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha got together a new army corps and licked the recruits into shape before the end of July, was very remarkable.

The War Office (as I observed during a visit I paid to the commander of the First Army Corps there a couple of months ago) is now by far the busiest and most efficient of the Government departments. Filled with able Generals, hard-working chiefs of staff and staff officers, it would do credit to the headquarters of a German army corps. More money is spent on it than on any other department. Even the ludicrously inadequate Budget of the Minister of Education was recently cut down in order that the army might have more money to spend.

In the Chamber, the army has the control and means to keep it. Recently a motion was made to the effect that officers on active service could not sit as deputies without forfeiting their pay as officers. A civilian member pointed out that the popularity of the army and the attraction of double pay will lead to the Chamber being filled exclusively with officers, but the military members protested against the motion and it failed to pass.

The tone of all the Turks is, I deeply regret to say, not that of a constitutional people. It is, as a rule, that of an army. The "Yeni Gazette" recently drew a parallel between Japan and Turkey, but it failed to see the extremely important rôle which Japan's attention to commerce, industry, and finance has played in the uplifting of Dai-Nippon; all it saw was, first, that Japan devoted all her energies to building up her military and naval forces and, second, that, having done this, she turned her attention to the contraction of an alliance.

Enver Bey, the Turkish military attaché in Berlin, speaks in a warlike tone about Turkey stationing an army-corps on the Russo-Turkish frontier in Asia Minor; and Hussein Hilmi Bey, the comparatively peaceful Grand Vizier, says, in speaking of Turkey's future:—

"We must try to make of Turkey a military Power of the first order, to have a well-organised and instructed army, a powerful fleet," &c., &c., afterwards, going on to speak of secondary things, such as railways, industry, and commerce, and—last of all—schools.

To a certain extent this military spirit is natural and excusable in the Turks, but I am afraid that it will make them too proud, too Chauvinistic, and, at the same time (for, after all, they are a simple people), too likely to become the tool of European Powers which may seek to excite them on the subject of Egypt, India, Persia, Crete, or Mahommedanism generally.

The "Seman" of Salonica recently published, apropos of the murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie, a ferocious article, entitled "Peoples of Asia, to arms!" in which it preached the solidarity of all the Asiatic Peoples in the face of Europe's mania for expansion at their expense, and painted the wrongs of Asia in glaring colors. In the same way a leading and very able Turkish deputy, who edits a paper called "Le Courier D'Orient," said (July 23rd), that Turkey also must have her "point of view on the Polish, Scandinavian, and even on the Irish question."

The army, of course, goes even further than this in its martial pride. When the Cretan question was acute, Mahmud Shefket spoke of a march on Athens, and the 4th Army Corps wired to Constantinople, offering its services against Greece "in case the 2nd and 3rd Army Corps are too tired after their exertions of April 24th." On the same occasion a Turkish paper, addressing itself menacingly to the Government, said that "the Cabinet must not think that the sceptre of power is a stick to lean on idly," meaning that the sceptre is, in its opinion, a "big stick" wherewith a Government should be forever laying about it, and which is in fact intended for no other purpose.

This is the naïve and martial temper of the Turk—how different, by the way, to the restrained and diplomatic Japanese temper, how similar in some respects to the tone of the foolish young Chinese who talked so loudly some time ago of abolishing extra-territoriality and who have now, under the reactionary régime of Prince Ching, subsided so suddenly and so completely.

Russian Publicists are already expressing apprehensions that Germany may make a cat's-paw of the Ottomans. A Constantinopolitan Russian, writing in the "Novoe Vremya" of August 5th, points to the extraordinary reception given to von der Goltz Pasha on his return to Turkey (a reception which would never be given by the Turks to Tolstoy or to the greatest leaders of European thought), when at the railway station all the officers of higher rank than Generals publicly kissed von der Goltz's hand. This German instructor was soon after made Vice-President of the Higher Military Council, and, at his instance, seventeen more German officers are to come to Turkey to teach, while twenty-nine Turkish officers are to go to Germany to learn. Moreover, at the instance of General von der Goltz, the Higher Military Council has decided, in spite of Turkey's serious financial weakness, soon to re-arm the whole army with Mausers and to order 460 quick-firing batteries. All these things, as well as vast quantities of ammunition, will be bought in Germany.

The Russian writer whom I quote is somewhat afraid of a Turkey which is only the puppet of Germany, for such a Turkey could be used to bring pressure on St. Petersburg. In 1877-1878 the Russians found it very hard to overcome the resistance of 350,000 Turks, "badly armed, half naked, and hungry, commanded by an infinitesimal number of educated officers—nine per cent. of the whole." At present the Turkish army numbers about one million. "On our Caucasian frontier we would have now against us, not 50,000 bayonets, as was the case thirty-two years ago, but 185,000 bayonets, and 50,000 sabres"—all the men being well organised, well armed, and well officered.

I shall not follow the Russian writer into his descriptions of how Germany worked up the Turks on the subject of Russia's proceedings in Persia, and how she got the Grand Vizier to invite many Germanophile Bulgarian students and officers to visit Constantinople by way of reply to Russia's invitation of a number of Russophile Bulgarian officers to St. Petersburg.

The broad fact remains, however, that Germany—not philosophic, poetical, literary, or scientific Germany, but military Germany alone—seems to have hypnotised the Turks. It may be a passing phase, but it bodes ill for the general development of Young Turkey.

Germany, of course, is not to be blamed for this, since wherever they go—whether to Tokio or to Stamboul—her military instructors do their work extraordinarily well; and, as a matter of fact, we ourselves, the peaceful, anti-militarist nation of Europe, have lent Turkey an admiral in order to carry out a most unnecessary and expensive task—the re-organisation of her fleet.

The whole evil lies in Turkey's inability at present really to admire or understand anything European save military efficiency, and in her coming just at this moment under the influence of a Power where militarism plays such an important rôle that it must seem to the simple-minded Turks to be the unique cause of Germany's greatness.

Turkey it is hard to blame, and I certainly do not mean this letter to be an attack on the new régime. It cannot, of course, be expected to change in a day that military character for which the Osmanli have been noted ever since they first appeared in history.

I strongly approve of almost everything the Young Turks have done so far, and I am proud to be able to claim some of the Committee leaders as my personal friends, but I think that their intensely martial spirit is an historical fact that should be noted even by a sincere friend. European observers have shut their eyes to it, so far, but that does not improve matters in the least.—Yours, &c.,

YOUR BALKAN CORRESPONDENT.

Communications.

GOVERNMENT BY BUREAUCRACY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems strange that amidst all the panaceas—extensions of franchise, payment of members, proportional representation, referendum, abolition of the House of Lords, &c.—designed for democratising legislative and administrative machinery, no democratic politician should yet have been found to lay his hand on the mainspring of the real government of this country. Few free and independent electors realise that they are really dominated by a clique of gentlemen whose names are to be read in Whitaker and other places where lists of Government functionaries are recorded. Each Government Department is presided over by a permanent Under-Secretary and a Parliamentary Secretary, besides a staff of assistant secretaries of various grades. These gentlemen it is who really “run” the country. In the view of the average elector, and even of many persons who consider themselves democratic politicians, the Government staff of the departments is a necessity in order to give “continuity” to policy. This specious and sweetly reasonable sounding word, when translated into practice, discloses itself as meaning the maintenance of policy along the strictly reactionary grooves of official red tape and official solidarity. As regards the latter point, it is interesting to note that there are two classes at the opposite ends of the scale in modern civilised society that are remarkable for the strength of cohesion of their members amongst themselves and the strength of their resistance to any interference from outside—the criminal class and the official class. The professional criminal, as is well known, holds it his first point of honor to back up a brother professional when in trouble; an official personage also regards it as the first point of professional etiquette to back up his colleagues, right or wrong, against the outside world. Yet that the possession of the whole power of administration, besides a large share in the initiative of legislation, by bodies of officials or, in other words, by a bureaucracy, is radically incompatible with democratic progress and control of the affairs of the community, is realised, as already said, by few persons in the present day. Is it not the Ministers representing the Parliamentary majority of the time whose behests the permanent Secretaries and their departments and their staffs are constrained to obey? Are they not there to carry out the mandates of the party in power? This sancta simplicitas of the average man as to the working of the system under which he lives would be incredible did we not have continual experience of it, and it subsists, so to say, in the teeth of the daily evidence afforded by Ministerial answers to questions in Parliament concerning their respective departments.

If the omnipotence of the permanent official in matters of administration is inadequately realised by the ordinary politician, who gets his politics from his newspaper, this same person probably does not realise at all the power of the official hierarchy in matters of legislation.

He does not know, probably, that the drafting of every Government Bill is the work, not of the Minister, but of the heads of the department in the domain of which its subject-matter lies. The Minister communicates the general scheme of his Bill to his “office,” whose secretaries then prepare the draft of the measure proposed. This draft may go backwards and forwards several times, but it is rare, indeed, when its final shape is not given to it by the bureaucrats of the department—a shape in which the original and avowed intention of the measure is invariably watered down and not seldom practically nullified. However this may be, the permanent staff upon whom devolves the work of superintending the administration of the measure can always whittle down the practical efficiency of the measure in the direction of and to the proportions approved by its bureaucratic traditions.

As a general rule, the Minister of the day is only too willing to allow himself to be “bossed” by his permanent staff. But, even should this not be the case, it would require a veritable Napoleon or Cromwell to bear down the pressure exercised on the nominal mandatory of Parliament by the bureaucracy of his department. The organised officialdom of the Government offices regards its right to “run” the affairs of the nation as a kind of vested interest, to lay hands on which is sacrilege. The Minister, should such a one be found, who resolutely set his face to carry through any considerable change unacceptable to his departmental secretaries, would soon find his life intolerable and his position untenable. Intrenching themselves behind their assumed experience of the routine of their department, they have found the way to making themselves masters in effect of the British people.

Now, government by bureaucracy, by a ring of gentlemen, that is, for the most part belonging to, or connected with, certain high social and official circles in this country, may be, of course, all right. Opinion as to this will be largely determined by class interest and political association. But, in the name of common political intelligence, let us recognise how we stand. So long as the present bureaucratic oligarchy has the lion's share in controlling the immediate destinies of the country, to talk of the democratic character of the British Constitution partakes of the nature of a sorry joke. There is no element in the existing machinery of government of Great Britain, not even the House of Lords itself, that stands so much in the way of all democratic change, legislative and administrative, as the permanent bureaucracy of the State Departments. And yet this is a point which seems to strike no one. It is none the less certain that until this bureaucratic oligarchy is broken down, together with the kind of “continuity” for which it stands, the belief in Great Britain being even half-way a politically democratic State will remain little better than a delusion.—Yours, &c.,

E. BELFORT BAX.

October 12th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE PEOPLE'S SUFFRAGE FEDERATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A new suffrage society, the People's Suffrage Federation, has been formed this week. It asks for the vote for every man and woman on a short residential qualification. If the House of Commons is to represent the people truly, every man and woman must have the vote independently of property and tenancy.

The Prime Minister announced last year that he intended to bring in a Reform Bill, and would accept the decision of the House of Commons and the country on an amendment giving votes to women. At this critical time, with a general election expected, all who value representation should rally without a moment's delay, and do their best to obtain a definite promise before the election, that if the present Government returns to power, the Reform Bill shall be made a part of its immediate programme and shall give votes to all men and women.

Women's enfranchisement is urgent. They are as much concerned in law and government as men. A large proportion of the wage-earners are women, and women control the greater part of the people's consumption. Their personal rights need protection as much as men's, and only through full citizenship will justice be done to their claims.

Property and tenancy qualifications would place women of the working class, whether married or single, at a great disadvantage on account of their relatively low earnings, and because the working housewife, though economically self-supporting, is unpaid.

In the case of men, the present qualifications give too much weight to the propertied class and make representation unstable through its dependence on transient conditions. Depression of trade, for instance, disfranchises men at the very time when their state most requires public consideration; unemployment extinguishes votes by the thousand in many a great manufacturing centre, through inability to pay rates punctually, through the necessity of moving from houses to lodgings, and through taking temporary work at the Poor Law stoneyard. In the interests of the whole nation, and especially of women and of the workers, Parliament should give the people true representation instead of the present unjust and arbitrary electoral system.

Some preliminary work has shown that the country is riper for adult suffrage than was supposed. The Parliamentary Labor Party has passed a special resolution of sympathy with the object of the Federation, and our Parliamentary Council already numbers eighty-three, including thirty-five Labor members, among whom are Mr. A. Henderson, Mr. D. J. Shackleton, Mr. F. W. Jowett, Mr. J. R. Clynes, Mr. G. H. Roberts, Mr. C. Duncan, Mr. T. Burt, Mr. Charles Fenwick, Mr. W. Brace, and Mr. Abrahams ("Mabon"). We have also the support of many Liberals, including Sir William Collins, Mr. W. H. Dickinson, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Geoffrey Howard, Mr. Norman Lamont, Sir Charles Maclean, Mr. A. Ponsonby, Mr. J. M. Robertson, Sir Charles Rose, Mr. Russell Rea, and Mr. W. F. Roch.

Among our first group of supporters were officials of Women's Trade Unions, the Women's Co-operative Guild, the Women's Labor League, and the Railway Women's Guild, and we begin active work with nearly 500 members, among whom are Miss Bondfield, Miss Florence Balgarnie, Mr. W. Barefoot, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Middleton, Miss Janet Case, Miss M. M. A. Ward, Mr. A. F. Peterson, K.C., Prof. L. T. Hobhouse, Miss Tuckwell, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Roden Buxton, Mrs. Russell Rea, the Hon. Mrs. Bertrand Russell, Mr. Aneurin Williams, Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mr. George Lansbury, Mr. and Mrs. George Trevelyan, Mr. Arthur Peters, Mr. W. A. Appleton, Mr. Crompton Llewelyn Davies, Mrs. Josiah Wedgwood, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Fels, Mr. E. Richard Cross, Dr. Salter, L.C.C., Mr. A. N. Whitehead, Sc.D., F.R.S., Mr. H. W. Massingham, Mr. A. G. Gardiner, Mr. Robert Donald, Miss Margaret McMillan, Miss Millicent Murby, Mrs. H. J. Tennant, Lady Mary Murray, Miss Jane Harrison, Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Sir William Wedderburn, Mr. Arnold Rowntree, Sir Charles Radford, Dr. Lawson Dodd, Hon. Bertrand Russell. The first twenty-eight are on our General Committee.

Work in the country has scarcely begun, but already over seventy local societies, representing a membership of several thousands, have affiliated. They include executives and branches of working women's societies, branches of the Independent Labor Party, Women's Liberal Associations, Trade Unions, and Trades Councils. It is well known that the Labor Party Congress, the Trade Union Congress, and the London Liberal Federation support Adult Suffrage; and the People's Suffrage Federation looks forward with confidence to bringing together in a national movement very strong forces hitherto too scattered and too little organised to take effect. May we through your columns invite all adult suffragists to join funds and forces with us? We do not ask those who become members of the Federation to leave other suffrage societies, but we offer a new opportunity for men and women to work together for complete political freedom.—Yours, &c.,

EMILY HOBHOUSE,
Chairman of Executive Committee.
MARGARET LLEWELYN DAVIES,
MARY R. MACARTHUR,
Hon. Secs.

October 14th, 1909.

THE PERIOD OF THE DISSOLUTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I, as a constant reader, claim some of your valuable space to give the reasons why, in case the Lords pass the Budget, the Government ought not to dissolve Parliament until the end of the year 1911?

(1) The sufficiency of a Free Trade Budget for both naval and military armaments and for social amelioration will be demonstrated in the next two years.

(2) The Tariffers will have two years more of a costly and hopeless drain on their resources.

(3) In 1900 the Government can pass (because the Lords will not reject it) their Labor Assurance Bill, which will greatly mitigate the hardships of the unemployed and take away one of the most effective arguments of the Tariffers.

(4) In 1910 and 1911 a Welsh Disestablishment Bill and a Registration Reform Bill can be passed through the Commons and rejected by the Lords, so filling up the cup.

(5) We have the certainty of two years more of peace with foreign nations.

(6) Trade is improving, and we had better dissolve in a time of extra good trade.

(7) Elections are very costly. Many a hard-working member of Parliament can afford an election once in six years, who would be ruined by elections once every three years. An average county election costs £1,500 (on the top of the annual expenses of the constituency at least £500 a year). Only a very rich man, or one whose expenses are paid for him by some trade union or other association, can afford such a sum of money very often. With the veto of the House of Lords and Irish Home Rule in front of us, elections, "notwithstanding the septennial Act," may follow fast after this Parliament ends. Frequent elections imply a Parliament composed for the most part of very rich men—delegates of associations, and seekers after place. Already good men are declining re-election, and candidates are scarce because of the cost.

(8) If the Lords force upon us a constitutional crisis, there are many members of Parliament and candidates who will be ready to make sacrifices of hardly-earned savings to save their country. But it is not wise to force such a sacrifice just because some people think the moment opportune for a party gain at the election: such opportunism will be disappointed. If the Lords have "climbed down" it will have taken all the steam out of our boiler, and it will be necessary to seek other causes of quarrel.

(9) It is always possible that, during the next two years, the Lord Chancellor may resign or may decide that the benches of magistrates, now packed with Tories, shall have an infusion of Liberals. This would make a difference in our favor of at least twenty county seats, counting forty in a division. This chance is well worth waiting for.—Yours, &c.,

LIBERAL M.P.

October 12th, 1909.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AS A SENATE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The time cannot be far distant when the Liberal leaders will have to determine the precise nature of their appeal to the nation with respect to their proposals for the reform of the House of Lords, so that their critics cannot afterwards accuse them of obscurity. If these proposals are not clearly stated before the election, the Opposition will say that the Government have no mandate to carry out this or that reform, and yet another election might have to be fought on this very question. It is, therefore, desirable that not only the leaders should be precise, but that every Liberal candidate should state clearly in his election address the precise nature of the change he advocates in the constitution of the House of Lords, and the relations that should exist between the two Houses.

Is the appeal to the nation to be only for power to regulate the relations between the two Houses, or is it, in addition, to ask for powers to reform the constitution of the Upper House?

In the few lines which I propose to address to you, I advocate both courses, as being strictly in accordance with justice and with the spirit of the age, but especially as the more likely to rally all sections of the progressive forces to the support of the Government.

The policy of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman was directed towards limiting the veto, leaving the constitution of the House of Lords intact; but it must be remembered that Sir Henry was an old man, and he may have justly thought that the limiting of the veto was as much as he could carry in his lifetime. But even he did not necessarily regard this as the last word on the question of the Second Chamber. Sir Henry's proposition was that, within the limits of a single Parliament, the will of the House of Commons should prevail, and his method of doing this was to send a Bill up to the Lords three times, in different sessions, and, on the third time, the Bill was to pass. So that the Bills of a Liberal Government of the future, in its first session, could not be expected to pass till the third session, the Bills of the second session till the fourth session, and the Bills of the third session till the fifth session, and so on, if a Liberal Government lasted as long.

Surely this is to reduce the work of future Liberal Governments to sterility, as this course almost invites the Lords to throw out Bills they do not like, in the hope that something might turn up to upset the Liberal Government before the third session after a Bill was first presented.

To avoid reducing the work of a Liberal Government to such sterility as this, I should advocate this change, "That within the limits of a single session the will of the Commons should prevail."

Now, a word as to the constitution of the Upper House.

I consider the constitution of the Second House of Parliament, confining its membership, as it does, to one class of his Majesty's subjects—viz., the Bishops and hereditary Peers—a gross injustice to the commercial and middle classes of this country, who are really the backbone of the country, and who do all its thinking and revenue-producing. A man may be endowed with all the wisdom of a Socrates; he may possess a brain of the greatest power; he may be a great captain of industry, possessing the most intimate knowledge of commercial matters upon which the prosperity of this country depends; he may even be a great lawyer, financier, or other professional man; but under the present constitution he cannot be a member of the Second House of Parliament unless he be a Peer of the Realm.

Further, in the present constitution of the second chamber, there is not the slightest pretence at representation of the people, the peers merely representing themselves and their class. It therefore happens that this House, thus constituted, can in no sense be regarded as a revising chamber, as is claimed for it by its partisans. It is not even impartial, especially when matters connected with the land are before it.

My plan, therefore, is to turn the House of Lords into a Senate, into which every duly qualified subject of his Majesty should have a chance of entering, and, further, it should be representative of the people. I would bring this about in a very simple manner.

I would adopt a system of county conventions in which all the members elected to the House of Commons for the towns, boroughs, and county divisions of a county should form an electoral body for the purpose of electing the members to the Senate for that county, and the number of members to be elected for that county to the Senate should be one-third of the number of members of the House of Commons for that county, and should be divided as to parties proportionately to the number of members elected by that county to the Commons. For instance, if Yorkshire returned 36 Liberals, 30 Conservatives, 9 Laborites, to the Commons, the representatives of Yorkshire in the Senate should be 12 Liberals, 10 Conservatives, and 3 Laborites. I should probably be told that by this system the Senate would be of the same political complexion as the House of Commons. This would be so, and rightly so, if the representation of the people is to count for anything, only in a reduced degree. And, further, it would follow that each party would naturally put forward its very best available men for the Senate. By this method you would call into existence a body of men who would be of very real assistance in legislation, who would give the Senate the benefit of their experience—commercial, professional, or otherwise—and not as now when 500 out of the 600 peers never attend, unless whipped up for a special purpose, and whose stock of knowledge of matters political and commercial is of the slenderest. The new Senate would thus be a very valuable revising chamber, and its opinions would be held in much more respect than those of the present House of Lords.

Further, this method of indirect election, while being in every sense representative of the people, would enable a class of men to come forward who, while being good thinkers and good workers, have no liking for the rough and tumble of a contested Parliamentary election. The nation would therefore be a great gainer in thinking power, and the new Senate would become in the best sense of the word a "revising" chamber, which the present House of Lords distinctly is not.

This would be no revolution, but a very moderate and desirable change, and in accord with the system in force in our Colonies.

At the same time, the relations between the House of Commons and the Senate should be so adjusted that, in cases of disputes incapable of amicable settlement, the will of the Commons should prevail.

Having set forth what I consider a very moderate solution of the Second Chamber question, I invite the views and criticism of your readers on my plan; and if the Liberal leaders can see their way to ask the nation for a mandate, not only to adjust the relations between the two Houses, but to alter the constitution of the Upper Chamber on some such lines as I have above indicated, I believe they would have the nation with them heart and soul.

It must not be forgotten that the present electorate only represents a little more than one-half of the male population of Great Britain over the age of twenty-one.

The electorate at present numbers about six millions, while the number of males over the age of twenty-one is about eleven millions. This means that about five millions of loyal and patriotic Englishmen, Scotchmen, Welshmen, and Irishmen have no votes at all, chiefly through the present residuary qualification, although all of them would be paying the indirect taxes, and a great proportion of them paying taxes through their rent.

It is, therefore, most desirable that this great body of voiceless public opinion should be enfranchised as soon as possible to take their share in determining the future of the legislation of their country.

For all I know, all this may already have occurred to the Liberal leaders. Whether it has or not, I sincerely hope it will form their policy in their coming appeal to the nation. If it does, they may count on certain victory.—Yours, &c.,

HERBERT JOHN DOREE,

Late President of the Harrow Division Liberal Association, and C.C. for Farringdon Within.
104 and 105, Newgate Street, E.C.

October 14th, 1909.

SUFFRAGISTS AND SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Since my letter in your columns of September 18th, upon which Mr. John R. Tomlinson comments in your last issue, the constitutional suffragists have deemed it necessary to publish something like an adequate protest against the perpetration of "tactics as wicked as they are foolish."

By way of reply to Mr. Tomlinson, I would point out that Lord Crewe seized the opportunity to condemn disorder at Budget protest meetings, whereas certain of the constitutional suffragist leaders have deliberately refused to condemn the disorderly and riotous conduct of the militant women. I am quite prepared to enlarge upon this, but, as a supporter of the enfranchisement of women, I prefer to refrain from criticising past procedure now that by the issue of this recent protest the outlook has been rendered more hopeful. The Constitutionalists will, I trust, realise the necessity of seizing opportunities to emphasise their "deep and abiding disapproval of tactics of violence and disorder."—Yours, &c.,

J. RANKINE FINLAYSON.

Manchester, October 13th, 1909.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Can nothing be done to prevent the Government continuing its disastrous policy in reference to the Suffragettes? Whatever view we may hold of the suffrage movement and the provocative methods of its militant supporters, we, who are devoted to Liberalism, can feel nothing but shame and distress in thinking of the force, amounting to brutality, which is now being used to break the spirit of high-minded and devoted women. For it cannot be denied that what gives power to this movement is an earnest desire on the part of these women to raise the status of their sex, and by so doing to promote purity in public and in private life. The Government has not only ignored your remonstrance and flouted the advice given to it by the "Manchester Guardian" and the "Daily News," but it has even aggravated its repressive measures. The professed guardians of political liberty appear in the light of its deliberate persecutors, and the scenes daily enacted in our own prisons contrast strangely with the indignation in which we so freely indulge with respect to the misdeeds of other countries.

Political liberty is not only a right, but a duty, and it is surely a denial of everything hitherto connected with Liberalism to hold that those who are opposed to political liberty have precisely the same right to consideration by the Government as those who are in its favor. And yet that was Mr. Asquith's contention in his reply to the Constitutional Suffragists. Slavery would never have been abolished if the Abolitionists had admitted an argument worthy of consideration that thousands of the slaves themselves were anxious to avoid the responsibilities of freedom.

Acknowledgment of the fact that technical obstruction for political purposes is a political offence would go some way to solving the present difficulties, but such difficulties might be entirely removed if an undertaking were given by the Prime Minister on the lines of your excellent suggestion last week, namely, that if in the first session a clearly pledged majority of Suffragists returned to the next Parliament carried a resolution in favor of the removal of sex disability, the Government would allow effect to be given to this judgment in a Franchise Bill. You would certainly be conferring an immense boon upon many conscientious Liberals, and you would perhaps rescue the Government from a false position, which undoubtedly must be highly distasteful to them, if by the influence of your powerful journal you could bring about this result.—Yours, &c.,

"HOW IT STRIKES A CONTEMPORARY."

October 13th, 1909.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE MILITANT SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The militant suffrage movement has reached a stage of development at which analysis becomes possible. If we examine its features we shall see, I think, that it does not differ in essentials from other eccentric movements with which history and passing events have made us familiar. It is a striking example of hypnotic suggestion. The women whose wild actions cause such widespread dismay are themselves passive rather than active, an effect rather than a cause; for the most part they are in a semi-hypnotised condition, which has always a tendency to become more intense under the application of increased stimulus. All the features of the movement, so far as it has gone, have their parallels in medieval history—the dancing epidemics, the cataleptic seizures, the devil possessions, the children's crusade, and many another manifestation, whose cause remained hidden until the power of auto-suggestion was realised. The nervous organisation of mankind has not as yet steadied itself sufficiently to withstand these attacks, which recur from time to time. Psychologically considered, there is little to choose between the impulse that prompts the ready volunteers of the militant army to disorder and something very like outrage, and that which irresistibly impels uncultured revivalists to the penitent form. Strong suggestion is there, fomented by the crowd, and repeated more and more urgently; the excitement grows until the hypnotised ones hand out money, offer service, rush out for street brawls, and finally, as the possession becomes deeper and more complete, take to violence and indiscriminate lawlessness.

The natural centre for an enterprise of this kind is London. In London are found the over-developed nervous condition, the amenability to emotional suggestion, which have generally characterised great capitals, ancient and modern. From Teddy bears to religious fashions, new ideas are seized and transmitted with a swiftness which astonishes the slower wits of the provinces outside. No one familiar with London audiences can fail to perceive their ready suggestibility. I have seen money drawn from a London meeting by the sheer force of insistent appeal—a method which would have failed utterly with, say, a North Country audience. The ease with which funds are raised for militant suffrage campaigns, however satisfactory to the organisers, is no justification of their policy, but rather tells the other way. I have watched many social movements rise to success, and others which have failed, but I never knew a sound and well-based effort to be rewarded at once by large subscriptions from the general public. Movements which have life in them only gradually succeed in winning large public support. Those who have followed the social movements of the last twenty or thirty years will, I am sure, bear me out in this. It is the superficial appeal to unregulated emotions, the flashy expression of shallow thinking, whether in matters of religion, of sentiment, or of politics, that bring forth the instant response, open the purse-strings, drive crowds to their knees or to mischief, as the case may be.

We find, then, that there is nothing abnormal in the present manifestation, which corresponds both in features, habitat, and growth, to a large class of familiar cases. A movement of this kind may be started at any time by a small group of persons who are at once amenable to auto-suggestion and capable of communicating it to others. In its course individuals of a more thoughtful type may be drawn in, but the motive power remains the same. Its source does not lie in definite thought, but rather in a mental condition in which thought lies half dormant, and the emotion which stimulates it is abnormally active. The question remains—what is likely to be the future of an effervescence of this kind? History tells us with great plainness that there is a limit to the duration of hypnotic suggestion, and, when it passes, the crowd melts away, betaking itself to its ordinary avocations. How soon the current will cease in the present case cannot be said: either the novelty will merely fade, or some excess will frighten the wealthy supporters, in which case collapse will result. The movement has no democratic root, no organisation which could carry it over reverses. Until that moment arrives, however, more legitimate efforts for the enfranchisement of women can do little beyond marking time. The strident faction occupies, and will occupy, the field, blocking all progress and strewing obstacles along the path.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) A. AMY BROOKE.

33, Acomb Street, Whitworth Park,
Manchester,

October 14th, 1909.

THE DEATH OF FERRER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is it not conceivable that if the Tsar had not been officially received in England, Ferrer would not have been shot in Spain?

There is solidarity amongst tyrants, and to condone the crimes of one is to nullify the influence of public opinion on another.—Yours, &c.,

E. M. COBDEN SICKERT.

October 14th, 1909.

"REVALUATIONS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The kind and sympathetic reviewer of my "Revaluations" in your issue of October 9th quotes Plato as saying "that the worst of the Greeks is better than the best of the barbarians." Taken without qualifications, this might be supposed to imply that the most virtuous of contemporary Persians or Egyptians was morally inferior, say, to the tyrant Dionysius. I cannot think that Plato went so far, nor do I suppose that the reviewer means that he did. I presume the reference is to that celebrated passage in the "Protagoras" (quoted on p. 63 of my book), where the great Humanist Sophist is represented as saying that "he who appears to you to be the worst of those who have been brought up in laws and humanities would appear to be a just man . . . compared with men who had no education, or courts of justice, or laws . . . with the savages, for example, whom the poet Pherecrates exhibited on the stage." But Protagoras—or Plato, if the credit of this idea belongs to him—is obviously speaking, not of barbarians in the sense of non-Greeks, but of those primitive folk who apparently were being held up as models of virtue by Greek advocates of a return to nature and the simple life.—Yours, &c.,

A. W. BENN.

Florence, October 11th, 1909.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS AND SOCIALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The discussion referred to in your last issue on "Socialism from the Standpoint of Christianity," at the Swansea Church Congress, was significant both on the grounds you mention and for other reasons as well. Churchmen who are Socialists have good reason to complain that while two speakers who are known as keen anti-Socialists were selected by the Committee to curse Socialism, its defence was entrusted to the Bishop of Truro, who is definitely not a Socialist, as was proved by his speech at Barrow three years ago, and to the Rev. John Wakeford, a clergyman who has certainly democratic leanings, but who is not a member of any definite Socialist body. It is, perhaps, still more significant that the Chairman—doubtless from a desire that the Bishops and dignitaries present should be guarded from unbecoming intrusion—absolutely refused a hearing to the Socialist clergy present at the meeting. I happen to know that Father Adderley sent up his card five times without being called upon, and that Father Healy and Mrs. Mansell Moullin (Treasurer of the Church Socialist League) also sent up their cards with the like result. Non-Socialists were allowed the fullest opportunity of presenting their case; this was denied to Socialists.

This policy of boycott, which was begun at the Manchester Church Congress last year, has had the effect of alienating men of the type of the Rev. Conrad Noel and the Rev. Drew Roberts from the Congress, but has been less successful in its results than its promoters imagine. The Church Socialist League organised a series of meetings at Swansea during the Congress week. The halls were packed, and the enthusiasm so great that the London correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" thought the fact worthy of special comment. Socialism, in the opinion of the majority of our bishops, may be "undesirable and impracticable," but there is a growing and influential section of churchmen, both clergy and laity, who hold it to be the necessary outcome of New Testament teaching.—Yours, &c.,

(REV.) JOHN A. GRANT,

London Organiser Church Socialist League.

Holmwood, The Avenue,

Bedford Park,

October 14th, 1909.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The prominence given to the question of compulsory purchase in the recent debate in the House of Lords on the Irish Land Bill, induces me to offer some suggestions on that important subject.

As an Assistant Legal Land Commissioner from the year 1881 to the year 1896, I adjudicated on upwards of sixty thousand fair rent applications in different counties in Ireland, and in dealing with these cases I had the advantage of studying the difficulties and anomalies of the Irish land problem in all its aspects.

Twenty-eight years ago, the far-seeing Lord Beaconsfield stated "That the only solution of the Irish land question was to make every tenant a peasant proprietor," his idea being "that by doing so he would cease to be an agitator and become a Conservative."

The subsequent progress of land purchase has verified his Lordship's prophecy, as it cannot be denied that peace and prosperity have taken the place of discontent and disorder in those districts in which the tenants have purchased their holdings. Such a fact is worth a thousand arguments, and should have its due weight in the consideration of any scheme that would hasten and facilitate the accomplishment of such a desirable end.

In this connection I should like, in passing, to refer to Lord Ashbourne's Act of 1885. Of the many Land Purchase Acts passed, it has produced the most satisfactory results, both for landlord and tenant, and had the Treasury advance sanctioned by that Act been supplemented by the millions that have since been provided for Irish land purchase, a very large proportion of the holdings of Ireland would now have been well on their way to the ultimate goal of fee-simple ownership.

Compulsory purchase is not a recent creation. In State interests the principle has long been recognised in the construction of railways, and other national and public works; and safeguarded as it has been, by just and equitable conditions of procedure, no injustice has arisen, whilst inestimable advantages have followed from its operation. What, therefore, is to be feared from its application to the purchase of agricultural lands, by occupiers whose fair rents have already been fixed. Undoubtedly, in the face of increasing foreign competition and enhanced cost of labor, it is in the interest of the State, as well as of the parties themselves, that they should be placed in a position of security against future disaster.

The application of compulsion to the purchase of the agricultural holdings of Ireland is only a corollary to the Land Act of 1881, which authorised two land commissioners and a legal chairman to determine the rent a landlord was to receive for his land. Surely, it is not advancing the principle to such an extent as should cause alarm, to say what sum the landlord should be paid in cash for the purchase of that rent. The Irish Land Acts already provide that in the case of the landlord pre-empting and electing to purchase the tenant's interest in a holding, the Court shall fix the price to be paid; it is a case of dual ownership, and why should not the same principle apply to the purchase of the landlord's interest? I must not be understood as advocating that the landlord should in such circumstances receive one penny less than the market value of his rent. His Grace the late Duke of Devonshire, speaking in Belfast in November, 1893, in favor of compulsory purchase, pithily enunciated the principle upon which purchase should proceed, namely, "The basis must be—the terms of sale being safe and fair for the owner, as well as prudent for the buyer." That being so, what injustice could arise?

I should like to add one further suggestion. According to the figures given in the course of the debate, it would appear that about one-half of the lands of Ireland have been already sold under the several Land Purchase Acts for a sum of one hundred millions, and it is estimated that another hundred millions will be required to complete the purchase of the whole—that is, assuming that the remaining moiety of the landlords can be induced to sell voluntarily. Should they not, however, elect to part with their territorial rights, the inevitable result will be that one-half of the tenants of Ireland will have secured a position of independence and contentment, whilst the remainder, patchworked amongst them all over Ireland, will be obliged to remain in their present condition of unrest and uncertainty, which, it is needless to add, will be highly provocative of disorder and lawlessness. The social and political effect of such a state of things does not call for any further comment.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD GREIR, B.L.

Dalkley, October 14th, 1909.

ELECTIONS ON SUNDAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a General Election is much talked about just now, allow me, through the medium of your paper, to suggest either the extension of the present polling hours or the holding of elections on Sunday.

Closing the poll at 8 p.m. on a week-day means the disfranchisement of many.

Great political demonstrations and many public meetings are held on Sunday. Many of our public libraries and museums are open, newspapers are published on that day, we indulge in various physical recreations and excursions by rail, &c., &c.; then why should not our elections be on a Sunday, particularly as it is the only day of the week when the vast majority are free? The question of seven days' work could be arranged by giving the few officials engaged in the election a holiday the following day. In several Continental countries elections are on Sunday. Why not try the experiment here? The difficulty in the way is the breaking of our national prejudices and customs. But these are, happily, going by the run. There is nothing detrimental in the suggestion to afford electors greater facilities for polling, which is decidedly a most important factor in the eventual administration of public affairs. The better the day the better the deed.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERT RAPHAEL.

The National Liberal Club,
October 13th, 1909.

"SMITH."

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—I am afraid that Mr. William Archer is more Royalist than the King, a firmer adherent of Mr. Maugham than Mr. Maugham himself. Mr. Archer, in your last issue, castigated the reviews of "Smith," which appeared in "The Standard" and "Evening Standard," for their objections to improprieties in the dialogue of that play. Mr. Archer saw no improprieties and made a fierce onslaught upon me for being more observant.

It is a little awkward for Mr. Archer that the management of the Comedy Theatre, immediately after the production of "Smith," sent an official statement to the newspapers to the effect that Mr. Maugham had recognised that part of his dialogue was not suitable to a "mixed audience," and had already deleted all that portion to which exception had been taken. "Smith" is now performed without one of the lines to which I objected!—Yours, &c.,

BOYLE LAWRENCE.

"The Standard," 104, Shoe Lane,
Fleet Street, London, E.C.
October 11th, 1909.

[Mr. Boyle Lawrence's retort is quite justified, and I owe him an apology. At the same time I was right in protesting that there was no offence in the play I saw. The fact is, I went on the second night, and did not suspect that any change had been made in the dialogue.—W. A.]

A REQUEST FOR INFORMATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am collecting materials with a view to helping the Comité d'Initiative de Provins and the Société d'Archéologie de Seine et Marne, who wish to know dates and details when Provins was in the possession of the English, and where archival manuscripts relating to these may be consulted and copied. Such manuscripts may be under the rubric of Provins, Champagne, or la Brie, or may have become the property of a private collector. In this case, would the owner kindly help me in my quest? I shall be much obliged for any assistance that the readers of THE NATION may be able to afford, either through the medium of your paper or direct to myself.—Yours, &c.,

A. THIRION.

35, Paulton's Square, Chelsea, S.W.
October 13th, 1909.

AN EXPERIMENT IN RURAL HOUSING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It must not be accepted by your readers that the advantages set forth by "Country Vicar" in a recent issue are confined to isolated cases.

An intimate connection for forty years with freehold land, in both populous and rural districts, in the course of which I have assisted in the making of some hundreds of working men freeholders, satisfies me there is no widespread difficulty in the way of the thrifty working man living on his own freehold if he so desires, and that at a less total cost than £285, and, not merely without any charge upon the general community, but with an "unearned increment" added to the locality, in the shape of increased value of the rate assessment.

Private enterprise, combined with local building societies established on the soundest lines, and managed locally, have been the means by which these desirable results have been obtained.

Such societies have made advances on mortgage of at least 75 per cent. of the value, at a rate of interest less than $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in later years, repayable by monthly instalments amounting, with the local rates added, to little more than the usual rent, extending over a period of years.

Such has been my experience (and I doubt not the experience of many others) that scepticism invades my mind when I read of the land being "held up," and the working man's difficulty in obtaining land for house and garden at a reasonable price—a doubt which I regret you are not able to share with me.—Yours, &c.,

LEGAL

Poetry.

SIMPLICITY.

I AM a follower of Jesus Christ
To whom a lily of the field sufficed
More than the glory and gold of one
Who ruled beneath the name of Solomon.
I have the heart to be a little child,
And play among the grasses growing wild,
Gathering, gathering bright little flowers.
Men are too subtle and they waste their powers.

For life is simple to the violets,
Daisies and buttercups that Spring begets
With warmth of sun and rain on big broad earth.
There is a deep content, more deep than mirth,
Or cavil of words, or tears, or questionings,
In the slow birth and living of green things.

I have a mind to be more simple than
The twisted, racked, illusioned mind of man.

Christ walked the earth, and in his heart a rose,
And in his eyes calm stars that watched the throes
Of men embroiled and cunning. And he wept.
He gathered to Him all whom life had swept Nearer to earth—women who sold their soiled,
Poor bodies, publicans, and men who toiled
By night upon the Lake of Galilee,
Fishing and awed. He would have taken me,
I think, for I have lain, with buried head,
Sideways, among long grasses, and have said,
These buttercups that sway beneath the breeze,
And form my sole horizon, even these Small violets and bright daisies are more wise
Than upright men who cheat themselves with lies
Of good and evil. . . .

Christ's feet were weary of the earth he walked.
Mary, with ointment Judas would have hawked,
Bathed them, and wiped them on her falling hair.
O Mary Magdalene, the deed was fair.

So has my heart in its great weariness,
Found balm and comfort. . . .

F. S. FLINT.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

PROFESSOR PERCY GARDNER has just finished a collection of essays which will be published by Messrs. Williams and Norgate under the title of "Modernity and the Churches." Among the subjects dealt with are: "The Essential Nature of the Christian Faith," "The Function of Prayer," "The Divine Will," "The Basis of Christology," "The Translation of Christian Doctrine," "The Christian Church," and "Liberal Anglicanism." The book will appear in the "Crown Theological Library," a series deserving of the highest praise both for its excellent choice of volumes and the care shown in their production.

* * *

WE learn from the "New York Times" that the coming "Life and Letters of E. C. Stedman," which his daughter, Miss Laura Stedman, is preparing, will contain a large number of letters written to Stedman by many of the leaders of thought and letters during the last century. The characteristic letters written by Swinburne to his American friend, and published shortly after the English poet's death, are said to be merely representative of much similar material, so that a book of quite unusual interest may be expected.

* * *

ANOTHER volume in Mr. F. W. Bain's "Digit of the Moon" series will be published next month by Messrs. Parker. How far Mr. Bain's work is based upon the Sanskrit originals from which it professes to be a translation, or whether these Sanskrit originals are other than mythical, are points upon which it is impossible for most English readers to form a judgment, but there can be no doubt whatever in regard to Mr. Bain's grace and distinction of style. The title of the new book will be "A Mine of Faults."

* * *

MANY hitherto unpublished reminiscences of Edward Fitzgerald are promised in a biography by Mr. Morley Adams, which the Priory Press, Hampstead, will publish in a couple of weeks. The title of the book is "Omar's Interpreter," and it will contain illustrations of the Fitzgerald country, together with an essay by the late Canon Ainger on "The Letters of Edward Fitzgerald."

* * *

NEXT week Mr. Andrew Melrose will publish "Rosemary's Letter Book," a series of essays on literary, artistic, and theatrical topics, together with a number of poems, by Mr. W. L. Courtney. The book takes the form of letters to a woman with whom the writer is supposed to have had some sentimental passages, but who does not accept his advances, and wishes the correspondence to deal only with matters of general interest.

* * *

TOWARDS the end of the month Mr. Heinemann will issue a translation of M. Lenôtre's "The Tribunal of the Terror." M. Lenôtre's researches into the history of the French Revolution have brought to light a mass of graphic detail, and his pictures of some of its events are, in their human interest, almost as moving as Carlyle's. In the coming book he studies the procedure of the Tribunal which sat at the Palais de Justice between 1793 and 1795. As in the case of his former volumes, M. Lenôtre makes use of documents and other pieces of evidence that have escaped the notice of former historians.

* * *

MESSRS. VIRTUE announce, in a limited edition, a collection of ten essays, called "Some of the Moderns," on living artists of genius, by Mr. Frederick Wedmore. Mr. Wedmore is not only a distinguished art critic, but—as "Pastorals of France," "Renunciations," and "Orgeas and Miradon" are sufficient proof—one of the ablest living writers of the short story. Not a few readers regret that he has let so many years pass without publishing anything in the vein of these volumes.

* * *

THE Rev. Henry W. Clark, the author of a number of theological studies that have won attention for their independence of tone and freshness of treatment, among them a collection of sermons, "Laws of the Inner Kingdom," published last week, is at work upon a "History of Nonconformity," which will be issued next season by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

* * *

THE De La More Press will shortly issue a revised and enlarged edition of Dr. Eugene Oswald's bibliography, "Goethe in England and America," containing many new entries, and bringing the work up to date. The same publishers have in the press "The Sarum Missal in English," newly translated by Canon Warren for their "Library of Liturgiology and Ecclesiology," and "The So-Called Gutenberg Documents Critically Examined," a reprint of Dr. Hessel's articles in the "Library" dealing with the controversy.

* * *

A VOLUME of considerable interest will be Sir Horace Rumbold's "The Austrian Court in the Nineteenth Century," which Messrs. Methuen have in the press. The book gives high praise to the Emperor Francis Joseph, and touches upon the lives of most of the leading personages with whom he has been associated, though it does not deal at length with the political history of the monarchy. Those who have read Sir Horace Rumbold's articles in the "National Review" will look forward to a lively and, in some ways, unconventional chronicle.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Longmans' announcements are "A History of the Eastern Province of South Africa," by Professor G. E. Cory, of Rhodes University College, Grahamstown; "The Last Phase of the League in Provence," by Mr. Maurice Wilkinson; "Anna van Schurman: Artist, Scholar, and Poet," a book written by Miss Una Birch, and based on the autobiography and letters of a leading feminist of the seventeenth century, who was the friend of Princess Elizabeth of Bohemia, Descartes, and Huyghens; "Father Tyrrell's 'Christianity at the Cross Roads';" and "Essays Relating to Ireland: Biographical, Historical, and Topographical," by the late Mr. C. Litton Falkiner, with a Memoir of the author by Professor Dowden.

* * *

THE titles of a number of novels which happened to be ranged beside one another on our bookshelves a few days ago run as follows: "The Gift of St. Anthony," "The Woman Tempted Me," "Surrender," "The Lordship of Love," "Trial by Marriage." This series of titles, which was purely accidental in its arrangement, throws some light on the tendencies of present-day fiction.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Problem of Human Life, as Viewed by the Great Thinkers from Plato to the Present Time." By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by W. S. Hough and W. R. Royce Gibson. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Meaning of Truth." By William James. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Byron: The Last Phase." By Richard Edgecumbe. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Yet Again." By Max Beerbohm. (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)

"Maria Edgeworth and Her Circle in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon." By Constance Hill. (Lane. 21s. net.)

"Cathedral Cities of Spain." By W. W. Collins. (Heinemann. 16s. net.)

"An Overland Trek from India." By Edith Fraser Benn. (Longmans. 15s. net.)

"San Celestino: An Essay in Reconstruction." By John Ayscough. (Smith, Elder. 6s. net.)

"Great Britain and the Congo." By E. D. Morel. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

"My Summer in London." By James Milne. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)

"A Military Consul in Turkey." By Captain A. F. Townshend. (Seeley. 15s. net.)

"George Meredith: Some Early Appreciations." Selected by Maurice Buxton Forman. (Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.)

"The Two Empires: The Church and the World." By the late Bishop Brooke Foss Westcott. (Macmillan. 6s.)

"Cambridge Biblical Essays." Edited by H. B. Swete, D.D. (Macmillan. 12s. net.)

"The Merrie Tales of Jacques Tournebroke." By Anatole France. Translated by Alfred Allinson. (Lane. 6s.)

"The Tyrant." By Mrs. Henry De la Pasture. (Methuen. 6s.)

"The Haven." By Eden Phillpotts. (Murray. 6s.)

"Souvenirs et Causeries d'un Diplomate." Par le Comte Charles de Moüy. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7fr. 50.)

"Les Sentiments Esthétiques." Par Charles Lalo. (Paris: Alcan. 5fr.)

"La Croisée des Chemins" Roman. Par Henry Bordeaux. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE CHRISTIAN RENAISSANCE.*

THIS is not a book for the general reader so much as for scholars and students. It traces the authorship of famous letters which were once attributed to Erasmus, assigning them to Crotus Rubienus and Ulrik von Hutten, whose name has been long known in connexion with them. The "Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum" are an elaborate and very coarse satire upon the monastic life of the time. There is no reason to doubt the zeal or the good faith of the satirists whatever may be thought of their taste and manner. In the early part of the sixteenth century, when they appeared, the monks of Europe had lost both the learning and the piety which distinguished their medieval predecessors. It was not the object of such men as Crotus and von Hutten to repudiate the authority of Rome, still less to throw doubt upon the doctrines of the Christian religion. They directed their shafts against the corruptions and distortions to which the system of the Catholic Church had been subjected by the misuse of what was in itself pure and holy. It was not because they wrote bad Latin, but because they gloried in their ignorance, that the satirists of the Christian Renaissance assailed the monks of their time. It may, of course, be argued that the imitation showed as little reverence as the original, and that abuses of religion can only be corrected by serious reproof. But we have to consider the spirit of the time and the nature of the evil against which these satirists were contending. They had to deal with men who would not argue, who sheltered themselves from every assault by invoking the aid of authority. It was therefore necessary for them to employ weapons against which authority is powerless, and to express the faults of monasticism in the language of monasticism itself. That is the explanation of these letters, and of the mode in which the earliest school of modern thought attacked the decadent asceticism of the middle ages.

Paley said of Gibbon: "Who can refute a sneer?" Gibbon was unable or unwilling to treat Christianity fairly. The authors of these letters were perfectly honest in their attempt to dissociate the Church of which they were members from knaves and hypocrites who brought discredit upon the creed they professed. They did not think, like Luther, that the Church could only be reformed by revolution. They inclined rather to the method of Erasmus, holding only that it was too refined and delicate for the work on which they were engaged. To separate piety from ignorance was their object, as it was his. But while Erasmus proceeded by such indirect means as revising the text of the New Testament from the best Greek manuscripts, and proving by example that good Latin could be written on religious subjects, they relied upon the simple process of showing up monkish delinquencies in the language of monks themselves. Their success was immediate. They were at once accused of profanity for adopting in satire the grotesquely incongruous images employed in sober earnest by the theologians of the day. But, indeed, their victory was not merely for the time. They produced a permanent change for the better in the mental development of Catholicism. They did not, like the great scholars of the literary Renaissance, substitute Pagan for Christian ideals. They destroyed by their pungent ridicule the idea that learning and letters were incompatible with the religious life. The Church of Rome knew better than to rest upon simple denial of flagrant enormities, even when the hand of the satirist disclosed them. There is in these letters no attempt to make religion responsible for the shortcomings of its professors. On the contrary the whole argument is that religion has been degraded by association with ignorance and sloth. We should altogether fail to understand the true significance of the "Epistolae" if we did not bear in mind that they assume the absolute authority of the Christian religion as axiomatic and unassailable. To cut it adrift from practices and performances not less alien from the spirit of Christ than from the standard of the world, is the underlying purpose of the satire so ruthlessly employed. "Cucullus non facit monachum" is the motto of the whole.

* "Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum." The Latin Text with an English Rendering, Notes, and an Historical Introduction. By Francis Griffin Stokes. Chatto & Windus. 25s. net.

The literary interest of these essays is, of course, comparatively small. They are intentionally written in the worst possible Latin, and their substance is essentially trivial. They are valuable as a picture of manners, and as evidence of contemporary opinion. Steele, in the eighteenth century, was taken in by them and supposed them to be the real correspondence of actual monks. Though a graceful and charming writer, Steele was not an expert or acute critic of documentary evidence. It is the remarkable excellence of the imitation, however, that distinguishes these letters from ordinary parodies. They were intended as a mirror where the monks of the day should see their own lives and habits. Even they themselves were scarcely apt to betray with more ingenuous frankness their confidence that orthodoxy covered a multitude of sins. No ordinary artist would have ventured on such a faithful reproduction of phraseology at once so genuine and so absurd.

Mr. Stokes is perhaps too ready to assume that this kind of satire has no serious aim. If that were so, these letters would be hardly worth reproducing. Leo the Tenth certainly did not take that view of them when he pronounced against them the anathema of the Church. They were directed at abuses which brought religion into disrepute, and they were not intended to satirise anything in itself good. There is no real reverence in treating hypocritical sanctimoniousness with the same respect as saintly virtue. In reading these caustic delineations of ignorance condemning knowledge, and sloth denouncing activity, we have to remember that the weapon chosen was the only one available for the purpose. The persecutors of Reuchlin and Erasmus were not amenable to argument and persuasion. It was necessary, if any effective defence were to be made at all, that an appeal should be carried to the intellect and scholarship of Europe against the claims of blind authority. There was a definite object to be gained by showing that those who demanded recourse to persecution did not know what it was they applauded, or what it was they condemned. Whether ridicule be or be not a test of truth, it is certainly a test of presumptuous ignorance wearing the mask of theological truth. Those who do not know what can be discovered by the light of nature are obviously unfitted to sit in judgment upon men of ability and learning. If they had not set up as arbitrators in the region of logic and scholarship, the monks might have been left to themselves. The educated world rose in self-defence when learning was threatened by pedantry, and an orthodox bigot asserted the right of condemning free inquiry into matters which he did not understand himself. The satirists were not the aggressors. They employed only intellectual resources. But they naturally objected to be called heretics by men who could not be made to understand what the dispute was about. If Pope Leo had taken the trouble to ascertain the cause of monkish prejudice against Greek, he would soon have found that it had no more respectable origin than ignorance of the Greek language. He cared, of course, nothing about the matter. The guiding spirits of the Christian Renaissance had no support or encouragement except the superiority of their own knowledge and reasoning. They were driven to the use of irony and sarcasm because they were met with denunciation instead of argument.

The idea of breaking away from the Church never occurred to these satirists and reformers. They only wanted to purify that which was good from the taint of hypocrisy and false pretence. If the rulers of the Church had understood the interests placed under their charge, they would have enlisted the new learning on the side of ecclesiastical authority. They would have seen that it could not be suppressed, and that it was capable of being used for religious purposes if those who directed it were learned as well as pious. In that case the Church would have had nothing to fear from the weapons of satire, and would have been able to contend on equal terms with those who assailed its credentials. It was not ecclesiastical supremacy so much as monkish ignorance which the school of Erasmus and Reuchlin criticised and condemned. They were willing to argue in defence of their own position with any one qualified to understand it. But they would not accept the verdict of unqualified sacerdotalism. The appeal to reason did no harm to faith. What endangered the influence of Rome was the claim of incompetent persons to sit in judgment upon difficult questions of history and philosophy. Pascal long afterwards admitted that the sentence against Galileo for saying that the earth went round the sun was erroneous, and explained the error by the reason that the Church could not hope for divine guidance outside its proper sphere. Science cannot discover what is untrue, and therefore, as wiser men than the cardinals of Leo the Tenth have taught in better times, cannot be injurious to religion. Science was in a rudimentary stage when these letters were composed. But the moral is the same. In striking at men like Reuchlin and Erasmus, the exponents of orthodox belief confounded their enemies with their friends. Erasmus reconciled theology with scholarship, and taught that knowledge could not be inconsistent with the revelation of Him from whom all knowledge proceeds.

That the letters have also their social and entertaining side is undoubtedly true. They were written for the polite and learned public of the day. But it was not their primary object to amuse. They aimed at showing by example that religion was best served by associating it with qualities congenial to the taste and respected by the intelligence of man. In that way the resources of wit and fancy, of poetry and eloquence, were brought to bear upon the struggle for mental freedom, which began with the dawn of the sixteenth century. Such is the origin, and such the explanation, of these famous epistles. Polemical in a sense, because, connected with the fringe of the movement which became known as the Reformation, they are yet detached from the main stream of controversy, and literary in the sense of artistic in their form, because they reproduce, in order to ridicule, the style and doctrine of monkish dogmatism. With that clue they are neither difficult to appreciate nor hard to understand.

HERBERT PAUL.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY ADVERTISERS.*

IF life is to be studied comprehensively we must not reject its meaner truths. Advertisement is a sordid fact, but it is a fact, and what is worse, it pays. Recoil as we may from the daily and hourly insult to our higher faculties, the vendors of soap and cereals know what they are about. Man is in every age a carnal and credulous creature, and the continued existence of so much unlovely, ignoble, and unveracious matter is a proof that the lowest appeals are not the least successful. But let not the idealist sicken and faint; time is a great magician. "Graffiti scratched on stucco walls," says Mr. Lewis, "or scrawled by idlers in red chalk upon pillars in Pompeii . . . are said to afford more vivid side glimpses of the intimate everyday life of the early empire than do the histories of Tacitus"; washing lists of ancient Egypt draw tears from the eyes of the least poetic; and so we may hope that breakfast food, beef essence, and purging pill will be similarly sanctified by the mellowing influence of centuries.

Those who are curious of the intimate details of a bygone age cannot do better than consult "The Advertisements of the Spectator." In the charming little volume just issued, Mr. Lewis shows us how much we may learn from them of the history, literature, and manners of the reign of Queen Anne. The advertisements range from publishers' announcements, notices of operas, plays, sales and auctions to "Chocolate made from the best Cracco nuts," "extraordinarily fine Bohea tea," and cures for leanness, stuttering, loss of memory, and difficulties with the breeding of teeth. How history may be traced is shown by the announcement of Swift's pamphlet on "The Conduct of the Allies and the late Ministry, in beginning and carrying on the (then) present War," and the indignant denials it instantly provoked. Literature is represented by various editions of the works of Steele, Prior, Gay, Cibber, and Locke; exploration by the famous Alexander Selkirk, whose solitude Commander Peary might envy, and whose right (unlike Dr. Cook's) there was none to dispute; and religion by "neat Elzevir editions" of "Preservatives against Popery," sermons attacking dissenters, and their no less spirited retorts. Nor are man's physical needs neglected. Nowadays we suffer from "brain-fag"; in Addison's era it was called the spleen and could be cured by Mr. Bell, bookseller at the Cross Keys and Bible in Cornhill, for the sum of 3s. 6d. a bottle. It is interesting to compare the bright and breezy colloquialism of the modern advertisement with the Burtonian majesty of the following:

"Famous Drops for Hypochondriak Melancholly: Which effectually cure on the Spot, by rectifying the Stomach and Blood, cleansing them from all Impurities, and giving a new Turn to their Ferment, attenuating all viscous tenacious Humours (which make the Head heavy, clog the Spirits, confuse the Mind, and cause the deepest Melancholly with direful Views and black Reflections) comforting the Brain and Nerves, composing the hurried Thought, and introducing bright lively Ideas and pleasant Briskness, instead of dismal Apprehensions and dark Incumbrance of the Soul, setting the Intellectuals at Liberty to act with Courage, Serenity, and Steady Cheerfulness, and causing a visible diffusive Joy to reign in the Room of uneasy Doubts, Fears, &c., for which it may truly be esteem'd infallible."

Cordials and elixirs are prompt to remedy every human ill. "An incomparable pleasant tincture" will "restore the sense of smelling tho' lost for many years"; a "most excellent Chymical Balsam infallibly cures the Gout or any rheumatick Pains, though the most exquisite and sharp that were ever felt"; and a Volatile Spirit of Viper secures the instantaneous rout of that fashionable 18th century female complaint, the Vapours. Ladies fearful for the loss of charms could hie them to

"the gentlewoman who liv'd 20 Years in Racquet-Court and served most of the Quality in England, Scotland and Ireland, also the East and West Indies with the most excellent Curiosities for preserving the Face, Hands and Teeth in present Beauty; for colouring red or grey hair to a lovely brown or black, a Cosmatick that certainly takes away the Spots and Marks remaining after the Small-Pox, with many other rare secrets in Physick"; and tender mothers of puling infants could take comfort from the assurance of the grateful Raiser Maker of Gray's Inn Passage, whose child

"being almost reduced to the very Grave from the extream agony he underwent by its violent Breeding of Teeth, was thro' God's goodness restored to perfect Ease and Safety, upon the use of that truly Noble Medecine, prepared for those Cases, by Mr. Perronet, Surgeon in Dyot-street near Bloomsbury."

The most noted charlatan of the age was Sir William Reed, who was raised to knighthood by Queen Anne for a successful operation on her eyes. That Mr. Spectator printed indifferently all the advertisements of quacks and nostrums, although abusing them roundly in his pages as "Imposters and Murderers," shows, remarks Mr. Lewis, "a marked variance between editorial protestations and business policy."

The optimist should be cheered by the evidence that this book affords of so marked an advance in publishers' ethics since the reign of Queen Anne. The "Spectator" boasted of its moral and reforming tendencies; it was "to set up the Immoral Man as the Object of Derision" and to form "a new Weapon against Vice and Irreligion." Yet it did not hesitate to advertise brazen swindling schemes, notices of prurient books, and scandalous "personals." That such conduct is no longer possible nowadays should help to console us for the fact that we have neither an Addison nor a Steele to cheer our morning press, although we do not suffer from any decrease of advertisements.

THE PLACE OF GRIEG.*

MR. FINCK, the lively American critic, had the distinction of writing the first book in English on Grieg. It was published in 1906. On September 4th, 1907, Grieg died; and Mr. Finck now brings out a new edition of the book, with a quantity of new and interesting material, Grieg's death having left him free to quote largely from their correspondence. The main defect of the earlier volume was that it was enthusiastic rather than critical; Mr. Finck, when he gets an admiration into his soul, is about as torrid a hot-gospeller as one could meet with anywhere in literature. Remarks like this—"The celestial cradle song of Solvejg, which I would not give for all the songs of Brahms, Hugo

* "The Advertisements of the Spectator." By Lawrence Lewis. Constable. 6s. net.

* "Grieg and his Music." By H. T. Finck. Lane. 7s. 6d.

Wolf, and Richard Strauss put together"—showed an enthusiasm so violent and so ill-balanced as to make one suspicious, perhaps unduly suspicious, of Mr. Finck's critical faculty as a whole. Even Grieg, as we see from some of the letters that Mr. Finck very candidly quotes, shied at the thickness of the gilding that his biographer insisted on laying on him. "So far as your estimate of my works is concerned," he writes, "I must echo the words of our poet A. O. Vinje in his 'The Last Spring': 'More I got than I deserved—and everything must end.' There are certainly passages in which you have done yourself and me a questionable service by an excess of superlatives." And again, after a second reading of the book—"I still must reproach you with having placed me too high." But he was grateful to Mr. Finck for having done him two services—cleared away the current obscurities as to how much in the music was Grieg and how much was Norway, and combated the notion that he was only a miniaturist. On both these points Grieg had evidently felt very sore for many years.

Had Mr. Finck been content to correct a number of misapprehensions with regard to Grieg the man, and to show that his music was better, deeper, and more original than its superficial scorers thought, his book would have been a valuable one, for no one knows and loves Grieg's music better than he, and no one could start with a sounder case to defend. Grieg has been the butt of every pompous wind-bag who measured the value of a man's music by its quantity rather than its quality. He has been sniffed at for working, for the most part, only in the smaller forms, and because he is popular with the general public. Mr. Finck's generous advocacy of Grieg's real claims to respect, and his handsome trouncing of the academics who think more highly of a bad symphony than of a good song or piano piece, are both good to see and hear. But he overdoes his own case. We will all agree with him that it is mere snobbishness to despise the art of little things, and that many a composer who imposes his banalities upon us for half an hour at a time with the aid of an orchestra of a hundred players is not worthy to tie Grieg's shoe-lace. But it is rather a far cry from this to accepting Grieg at Mr. Finck's estimate, and calling him "a genius of the first rank." Mr. Finck would have done well to reconsider some of the extravagances of his earlier volume. A little reflection, for example, on the remark already quoted as to Solvejg's cradle song might have shown him the uncritical wildness of it. But in his second volume he is still unrepentant. He does, it is true, now say in a footnote, that reviewers of the first edition were wrong in supposing him to mean that the song in question was "worth more than all the songs of Brahms, Wolf, and Strauss." All he did was to "express a personal preference." The reader will probably ask what the difference is between the two statements. The essential point is that to prefer the "Solvejg" song to all the songs of Brahms, Wolf, and Strauss put together, shows such a narrowing of critical discernment that one becomes suspicious of every other judgment of the critic; if his palate is so insensitive to some good things and so hypersensitive to others, there is plainly no trusting any of its verdicts. So with other defiant reassertions of the more questionable dogmas of the earlier books, such as the insistence on the "superb virility" of much of Grieg's music. A sober comparison of the passages that he thinks superbly virile with the really virile work of other men would have shown Mr. Finck how overdone the description was.

The book is thus less a critical study than a rhapsody; it dwells with enthusiasm—and rightly—upon all that is good in Grieg's music, but turns a blind eye to his limitations. We cheerfully agree that he has much originality, is a charming melodist and a striking harmonist, and, in his songs especially, one of the most genuinely poetical of musicians. But there is something to be put on the other side of the account before we can admit that he is "a genius of the first rank." He is undeniably short-winded; it is not merely that he showed such an affection for the shorter forms, but that even within these he can seldom run more than a yard or two without having to stop for breath. His phrases have rarely any length or breadth of flight; they lack the power of wing to sustain themselves for more than four, or two, or even one bar at a time. Think of the far-flung melodies of some other men, which, though they may dip and rise in their flight, never really pause till the whole long distance has been covered—the E flat theme in Bach's "Wachet auf," for example, or some parts of the "Meistersinger" overture, or the love theme in Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," or the opening theme of Elgar's symphony, or that of the adagio in the same work, or any typical melody of Chopin's, or the "Countess" or the "Donna Anna" theme in Strauss's "Don Juan," and you will see at once the difference between athletes like these and the valetudinarian Grieg. Virile, indeed, he can be in a phrase here and there, but his music as a whole is assuredly not virile. The man's music was the counterpart of himself. In posing that fine head on the poor, frail little body, weakened from boyhood by the loss of one lung, Nature decreed the parallel contradiction of the big desires and the small manner of his music. He wanted to make great statues; but his strength would mostly go no further than the carving of small figures in wood or ivory. Hence the curious disparity between what he meant to do and what he actually did in things like the March in "Sigurd Jorsalfar." He wants to draw primitive heroes; but with their little legs going pit-pat, pit-pat at each bar or two of the music, they are hardly more than Viking hop-o'-my-thumbs. They are certainly not life-size. Two salient instances of the failure of his speech to rise to the height of his desires may be seen in one of his best works—the Funeral March he wrote for his friend Nordraak. How largely it begins, and how it narrows down in the piping middle section! And for cadence to his really fine first theme, we practically get again the cadence of the "Ase's Death" from "Peer Gynt"; Grieg has only one mood for the death of the simple old woman and the death of the thoughtful Norwegian musician.

There are other traits that bar him from the company of the greatest. He is a mannerist both in his melody—with its frequent falls of a third, its intermingling of rhythms of two and three, and its peculiar form of cadence—and in his harmony, the chromatic quality of which, and its habit of descending step by step in the bass, make it easy to imitate. Mr. Finck snorts at the word "mannerism"; he prefers "individuality." Well, mannerism is of course individuality, but with a difference too obvious to need analysis. Balancing these and other limitations of style and of conception against the many virtues upon which Mr. Finck does well to insist so strongly, we cannot agree that Grieg is a genius of the first rank. He is a miniaturist, however strongly he objected to being thought one; for if we except the piano concerto, written in his early manhood, the bulk of his most characteristic work is miniature in form and in idea. Mr. Finck, as we have said, rightly protests against the theory that a long work per se is necessarily better than a short work per se; a song like Grieg's "Ein Freundschaftsstück" is worth a dozen average oratorios or symphonies. But Mr. Finck, characteristically rushing to an extreme, does not see that, other things being equal, mere bulk counts for a good deal in art as in everything else. The man who carves the Lord's Prayer on a three-penny piece, however well he does it, cannot claim to stand on the same footing as the man who builds the Forth Bridge. The ability to conceive and to handle big ideas is as much the sign of the more-than-average brain as the ability to juggle with enormous weights is the sign of more-than-average muscle. Workmanship and all the rest of it being equal in both cases, we would all say that the brain that conceives the cathedral is bigger than the brain that conceives the cottage, the brain that conceives "The Ring of the Nieblung" bigger than the one that conceives "L'Après-midi d'un Faune." Mr. Finck only beats the air when he fights against these universal standards of measurement. His safest line would have been to accept frankly the estimate of Grieg as a small master, and show how precious some of the work of the small masters can be. Neither Heine nor Burns could have written "Hamlet" or the "Hippolytus"; but that does not make their lyrics any less exquisite. Chopin could not have written the B minor Mass; but neither could Bach have written the B flat minor Scherzo. And when German critics sneered at Grieg because he could not beat Beethoven and Brahms on their own ground, Mr. Finck could quite safely have retorted that neither Beethoven nor Brahms can beat Grieg on his. By so doing he would have done both himself and Grieg a greater service than he will by defying the world to mortal combat on a thesis that the doughtiest fighter could not defend.

THE SOUL OF ST. PAUL.*

THE Pauline phrase, "the foolishness of preaching," has occurred to many a weary listener in a sense other than that in which it is used by the apostle. The Duke of Wellington found himself, he tells us, "much exposed to authors." The church-goer is in the same disadvantageous position as regards preachers: he suffers many things at their hands. "Fifty minutes is his shortest" was said a generation ago of a man of light and leading. There were country parishes in Scotland where, for the convenience of worshippers from a distance, the two Sunday services were held right on end. Our three-bottle grandfathers sat them out: we, a feeblener progeny, have not their appetite either for port or prayer. Prolixity beyond a certain point would not now be tolerated. But brevity, too, may be ponderous. "I was short," said a Cambridge preacher to a famous Master of Trinity. "You were." "I did not wish to be dull." "Ah!" was the answer, "but you were dull." Ecclesiastical have taken the place of moral platitudes. "Christ said, I am the way. Therefore we must wear vestments," was a saying attributed to a well-known divine; and the writer has heard the "Great Forty Days" described with a fulness of detail which suggested a personal knowledge of the events covered by them on the part of the orator. Quorum pars magna fui seemed the burden of his discourse, which was a reminiscence rather than a commentary—the evidence of one who had been there. The decline of church-going is a frequent subject of discussion at Church Congresses and similar gatherings. Here is one at least of its causes. Vapidity in the pulpit produces vacuity in the pew.

It is probable, however, that no one whose experience of the pulpit is that of a hearer only can realise the difficulty of the preacher's task. He has to address persons on widely differing levels, intellectual and spiritual: the proverb "One man's food is another man's poison" applies. The critical sermon which saves the faith of one, undermines that of another; the dogmatic teaching which in this case gives something to lay hold of, serves in that only to irritate and repel. The position of a professional moralist is embarrassing; the personality of the speaker frames the spoken word. Again, a man's moods vary: he is not always in the mood for the pulpit, yet the pulpit must be filled irrespective of mood. Hence the value of the written sermon. Not as a habit—that means woodenness—but to fall back upon when inspiration fails. Nor is he always equal to the intellectual and spiritual strain of preaching. This, when the sermon deserves the name, is considerable, nor must it be forgotten that it demands a corresponding effort on the part of the hearers. An easy tongue is the complement of itching ears; the result is emptiness, aridity and leanness of soul. The How is as important as the What: magnetism imparts magnetism; fire kindles fire.

Perhaps the best preachers and hearers—the two go together—are found in the Church of Scotland. Those who have "sat under" such men as John Kelman or William Macgregor know what can be made of a sermon, how the idea of the preacher runs like a thread of gold through the whole service from the opening psalm to the last prayer. In the English liturgy the sermon is less central. It is an interlude, and rather comes in than pervades. From the standpoint of art the former system is preferable; for practical purposes the latter has its advantages. We may prefer, but need not exclude. In the sermons before us, Mr. Lilley represents the best traditions of the English pulpit—its thoughtfulness, its balance, its sanity, its large and spacious view of life.

The title of the book must not mislead us.

"These sermons are not studies in the theology of St. Paul. They are attempts to keep hold with my own intelligence upon certain strongly contrasted elements of common religious experience, which I see nowhere more vividly than in the soul of St. Paul."

"There is a saying of Grotius which, true as it undoubtedly is in the order of formal logic, seems to me inapplicable to the order of life and of the logic which derives from and would be equal to the interpretation of life. 'Ex duobus pugnantibus inter se destructio sequi potest, ordinata constructio sequi non potest.' I have on the contrary ventured to believe that from such conflicts, where they occur in the order of life, there will always emerge an 'ordinata constructio.' I have here made the attempt in certain instances of such conflict to seek the ordered construction which the conflict demands and to which it seems of itself to point. I cannot, at any rate, satisfy myself with an easy simplification of the religious problem, or of any phase of it, by eliminating one of the contrasted factors which constitute it. Where life pledges two apparently opposite tendencies in itself to permanent battle, it is that they may incorporate and not destroy each other."

Such words might have come from Father Tyrrell: the tongue of the wise is one. They are of no one Church, but of the experience which underlies the several Churches, which they express each in its measure, and which it is their mission to develop and enlarge.

The antitheses of experience, the One and the Many, law and liberty, tradition and change, the outward and the inward, are not for thought only, but in things. This is why they must be mediated rather than overcome. To forget this is the radical sin of faction whether in Church or State. In the fine sermon, "Revolution and Evolution," this is illustrated by St. Paul's attitude towards the old and the new in the religious crisis of which he was the embodiment—that which liberated the Christian Church from the Jewish Synagogue. Such crises recur in virtue of the laws which govern human affairs. And,

"of one thing we may be certain, that when they recur, their main features will be the same. There are not wanting signs that we ourselves are living in the midst of such a crisis. The established religious systems are losing their spontaneously religious character. Instead of nourishing their free and native faith in God through membership in a religious society, men are forcing a faith in the society in order that they may find it possible to have faith in God. The society has ceased to be the instrument of their faith, and has become its object. Ecclesiolatry is for us, as it was for the Judaism of the first Christian century, the specialised form of idolatry. . . . There is, indeed, no religious society which will admit that membership with it dispenses with personal faith, that it assures a magical salvation. But then, neither would the Judaism which St. Paul knew, and in which he had been nurtured, have admitted that it made such a claim. It, too, would have assured St. Paul that he was but travestying its real religious attitude. None the less, St. Paul was right. He exposed the real religious weakness of Judaism. Religious exclusiveness is not only harsh and unkind in itself, not only a denial of God, by shutting Him off from a part of His world. It also tends inevitably to the creation of a false security for those who are within the favored fold. It leads to the idolatrous worship of the system, to a proud and arrogant trust in it, which is always the implicit and often the explicit denial of God."

Were the English pulpit more commonly tuned to this pitch, its note would be truer and more effective. Preachers may be divided into two classes—those who preach because they have something to say, and those who preach because they have to say something. Mr. Lilley belongs to the former class.

CLASSIC AND ROMANTIC.*

MR. SYMONS's title leads us to expect an examination of the main characteristics of English romantic poetry, an account of its origin, an estimate of the forces that called it into being, and an attempt to explain its development. What Mr. Symons gives us is something quite different. His book consists of twenty pages of introduction in which some highly disputable theories regarding the nature of poetry are maintained, and three hundred pages of essays dealing in chronological order with practically every poet who was born in the eighteenth century and survived into the nineteenth, all others being excluded. The defects of this plan are so obvious that one cannot even conjecture the reasons that led Mr. Symons to adopt it. Hitherto he has treated criticism as a fine art. He has been careful, even fastidious, in his regard for form. He is, perhaps, the chief living representative of the school of criticism which, to use Carlyle's words, endeavors "to reproduce under a different shape the existing product of the poet; painting to the intellect what already lay painted to the heart and the imagination." Several of the essays in the present volume are, both in their beauty of diction and in their power of suggestion, among the best Mr. Symons has written, but this only adds to our amazement that he should have adopted a plan at once so arbitrary and so slovenly. Indeed, it almost seems as if he had prepared copious notes for a study of

* "The Soul of St. Paul." Sermons preached at St. Mary's, Paddington Green. By A. L. Lilley. Francis Griffiths. 3s. 6d.

* "The Romantic Movement in English Poetry." By Arthur Symons. Constable. 10s. 6d. net.

English romantic poetry and then presented them to the reader without troubling to work them up into a coherent and digested whole.

But, even from this point of view, there are serious defects in the volume before us. What are we to think of a book called "The English Romantic Movement" which includes writers like Wolcot, Mrs. Barbauld, John O'Keefe, Mrs. Tighe, and Robert Pollok, and which excludes Chatterton? The year 1800 has been chosen "for convenience" "as a sort of centre," but on what grounds was that particular year selected? It excludes Walpole and the Gothic revivalists; it excludes the Wartons; it excludes Gray, Collins, Thomson, Akenside, Shenstone, and the whole group of imitators of Spenser who, by the study of old authors, attempted to revive the past. Yet no definition of Romanticism can shut out that return to our older literature which Pope saw and disliked.

"Authors, like coins, grow dear as they grow old:
It is the rust we value, not the gold.
Chaucer's worst ribaldry was learn'd by rote,
And beastly Skelton heads of houses quote.
One likes no language but the Faery Queen:
A Scot will fight for Christ's Kirk o' the Green;
And each true Briton is to Ben so civil,
He swears the muses met him at the devil."

These lines show that even in Pope's lifetime the English Romantic Movement had begun.

But Romanticism is a word that covers a great deal and is used with widely different meanings by different writers. To some it stands for an attempt to reproduce the life and thought of the Middle Ages. Others think it is most appropriately used of the literary or artistic treatment of themes that are vague and mysterious or even wild and extravagant. Others, again, lay stress upon the element of individual freedom, and treat the movement as an impulse to progress, freeing the poet or artist from the shackles of antiquated rules and opening up new worlds for him to conquer.

Mr. Symons cuts the knot by identifying romanticism with poetry itself. "The great poets of every age but the eighteenth have been romantic: what are Chaucer, Shakespeare, and Coleridge, if not romantic?" One may answer the question in the affirmative, while not admitting the truth of the statement that precedes it. To regard romantics as merely classics in the making is to lose sight of a valuable distinction which lies at the root of all artistic endeavor. Mr. Symons quotes Pater's phrase about "strangeness added to beauty" as being the distinctive quality of romantic art, but the essay from which the phrase comes also tells us that "What is classical comes out of the cool and quiet of other times, as a measure of what a long experience has shown us will, at least, never displease us." And Pater goes on to say that "in the classical literature of Greece and Rome, as in the classics of the last century, the essentially classical element is that quality of order in beauty which they possess, indeed, in a pre-eminent degree." That there are romantic elements in the ancient classics, in Euripides, for instance, no one will deny, but there are periods when these qualities are for the most part held in check, and these are classical periods. There are periods, also, when they are predominant, and these are romantic periods. Moreover, certain works of art are from their very nature classical, while others are romantic. The Church of the Madeleine, a drama by Corneille, Landor's "Hellenics"—these are classical, and will remain classical as long as time exists, just as a Gothic cathedral, a painting by Delacroix, a poem by Scott, and Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame de Paris" are, and will remain, romantic. We may dislike the romantic or we may dislike the classical, but to ignore the distinction between them and to claim that the best of either belongs to the other, is simply a misuse of language.

We have hitherto dealt with what we conceive to be the fundamental weakness in Mr. Symons's plan and method. There are other points deserving of notice—for example, the almost unqualified statement in the Introduction, that it is the critic's business to regard the poet as something apart from his age and his environment. We would urge in reply that the criticism which traces the stream of thought connecting age with age, and which shows how the content of a poet's message has been affected by the ideas current in his epoch, has also its usefulness. But to confine ourselves to Mr. Symons's theory would be doing him a great injustice.

In the essays that comprise the greater part of his book he often forgets his theory and gives us a number of carefully poised and suggestive judgments. He is not always free from the decadent perversity of his early manner—witness this sentence: "In one song of four stanzas, 'Proud Maisie,' published in 1818, in the 'Heart of Midlothian,' Scott seems to me to have become a poet"—but for the most part his criticism is criticism of the centre. His treatment of Wordsworth, Byron, Coleridge, Landor, Shelley, and Keats leaves little to be desired. Few living critics have an equal gift for opening up trains of thought which the reader feels compelled to pursue further on his own account. As examples of this, what could be better than these few sentences concerning Coleridge's power of imagination?—

"It must not be forgotten that Coleridge is never fantastic. The fantastic is playing with the imagination, and Coleridge respects it. His intellect goes easily as far as the imagination will carry it, and does not stop by the way to play tricks upon its bearer. Hence the conviction which he brings with him when he tells us the impossible. And then his style, in its ardent and luminous simplicity, flexible to every bend of the spirit which it clothes with flesh, helps him in the idiomatic translation of dreams. The visions of Swedenborg are literal translations of the imagination, and need to be retranslated. Coleridge is equally faithful to the thing seen, and to the laws of that new world into which he has transported it."

Equally just and balanced is this, speaking of Shelley: "In the clamorous splendor of the odes there is sometimes rhetoric as well as poetry, but is it more than the tumult and the overflow of that poetry?"

At his best Mr. Symons is one of the freshest and most suggestive of living critics, and this book contains a great deal of his best. For a sympathetic, yet discriminating, account of the English poets who lived at the beginning of the nineteenth century, we do not know anything to which the reader can turn with more advantage. But it is far from being an adequate account of the English Romantic Movement. We regret this all the more because we believe that nothing but a perverse method of approaching his subject has prevented Mr. Symons from contributing to literary history a volume not merely engaging and brilliant, but one of permanent value.

THE WORLD INVISIBLE.*

It would be interesting to have Mr. Arnold Bennett's and Miss Underhill's opinion of each other's latest novel. "The Glimpse" is Mr. Bennett's first flight into the fringe of spiritual regions with which Miss Underhill has familiarised us in her former books, and though there is no near kinship between them in outlook, the two novels have this in common, that the attempt, in each, to pierce the veil of earthly appearances is fortified by very penetrating criticism of mundane matters. Miss Underhill is something between a poet and a metaphysician. For her heroine, Constance, the busy tangle of organic things, and a world founded on the illusion, supported by the considerations of matter, growth, and sex, are maya, and even both sides of the veil, the mortal and the immortal, only exist by "being in the Idea," which is God. It is difficult to extract from the extremely illusive, if suggestive, spiritual creed of "The Column of Dust" any particular passage which adequately conveys the author's standpoint, but we may glance hastily here at the features of the story, while premising that the novel is one that necessitates attentive study at first hand.

Constance Tyrrel, a highly educated and refined woman, has broken with her life of cultured emptiness, and, hungry for realities and for legitimate satisfaction of her womanhood, has taken the plunge and disappeared from the ken of her comfortable friends. She re-appears some years later with an ugly and unprepossessing child, Vera, and supports herself by her daily work in a London book-shop. With remarkable daring the author introduces us to the sphere of the Invisible, by making Constance possessed by an invading, familiar spirit, The Watcher, which has become accidentally entangled with the plane of earthly existence, through his passing curiosity to fathom "the absurd paradox of creation." It is proof of Miss Underhill's artistic cleverness that we accept the presence of this supernatural

* "The Column of Dust." By Evelyn Underhill. Methuen. 6s.
"The Glimpse." By Arnold Bennett. Chapman & Hall. 6s.

Messrs. Constable & Co.'s Announcements.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE.

By OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

With 40 full-page plates in colour and numerous drawings in the text,

By W. LEE HANKEY.

4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 250 copies, 42s. net.

MR. RACKHAM'S MASTERPIECE.

THE FAIRY TALES of the BROTHERS GRIMM

With 40 full-page plates in colour and 70 drawings in the text,

By ARTHUR RACKHAM.

4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 750 copies, 42s. net.

READY IMMEDIATELY. MR. WALTER SICHEL'S NEW BOOK.

The Life of Richard Brinsley Sheridan

By WALTER SICHEL, Author of "Emma, Lady Hamilton."

In two volumes. Fully illustrated. Demy 8vo, 31s. 6d. net.

Drawn largely from manuscript sources to which the author was the first to have access, this brilliant work is at once the definitive life of Sheridan and a new picture of eighteenth-century society. Much entirely new matter, including a manuscript diary by Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, and new letters from Sheridan to her and to Lady Bessborough, appear in the volumes.

The Romantic Movement in English Poetry.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"It is written throughout in that musical and crystalline English, easy without looseness, of which Mr. Symons is so fine a master.

In fact, I should be inclined to call this book the most brilliant that Mr. Symons has ever written."—Saturday Review.

Hogarth's London

By H. B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A. Profusely illustrated. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Mr. H. B. Wheatley has attempted in his new book, entitled "Hogarth's London," to gather much scattered information respecting the manners of the eighteenth century as painted by Hogarth, particularly in London. Hogarth was a thorough Londoner as well as a striking representative of the Englishman of his time, and hitherto, although much has been written about him, the special study of the wealth of detail he offers has not been definitely undertaken.

The Life of John Dee: An Elizabethan Crystal Gazer

By CHARLOTTE FELL SMITH, Author of "Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick." With Portrait and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"An interesting addition to our knowledge of Queen Elizabeth is provided by this biography of her astrologer-in-chief. . . . A pleasant picture is drawn of her informal visits to his house, when she would ride across Richmond Park, pass through the East Sheen Gates, and turning down the hill, stop at the old house between Mortlake Church and the Thames. . . . We are grateful to our author for these pleasant sidelights on the character of Queen Bess."—Evening Standard.

London Life of Yesterday

By ARTHUR COMPTON-RICKETT, M.A., LL.D. (Cantab.); Author of "The Vagabond in Literature," &c. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Ready next week.]

Wanderings in the Roman Campagna

By RODOLFO LANCIANI, Author of "The Golden Days of the Renaissance in Rome," &c. Richly illustrated. 4to, 21s. net.

The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters

By F. A. MUMBY, Editor of "The Letters of Literary Men." With an introduction by R. S. RAIT, M.A., Fellow of New College, Oxford. With numerous Portraits, Views, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

New Volumes by GEORGE MEREDITH.

POEMS WRITTEN IN EARLY YOUTH (including Poems 1851). Poems omitted from the editions of "Modern Love" and Scattered Poems. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

LAST POEMS. Those hitherto unpublished in book form. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

A READING OF LIFE, WITH OTHER POEMS. New Edition. 6s. net.

IN THE LIMITED EDITION DE LUXE

A new volume (XXXIII.), being "Poems," Vol. IV. (Sold only to Subscribers to the previous volumes.) 10s. 6d. net.

The Book of Cupid: being an Anthology from the English Poets, with an Introduction by Henry Newbolt and 25 illustrations by The Lady Hylton. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

MRS. MEYNELL'S NEW VOLUME.

Ceres' Runaway and other Essays

By ALICE MEYNELL, Author of "The Rhythm of Life," "The Children," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Peaks and Glaciers of Nun Kun

A Record of Pioneer Exploration and Mountaineering in the Punjab Himalaya. By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN. With Map and 92 Illustrations. 4to, 18s. net.

Historical Roman Coins: from the Earliest Times to the Reign of Augustus

By G. F. HILL, M.A. (of the British Museum). With 15 plates. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A NEW BOOK BY THE CHICHELE PROFESSOR OF MILITARY HISTORY AT OXFORD.

BRITAIN AT BAY. By SPENSER WILKINSON.

Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

London: CONSTABLE & CO. Ltd. 10, Orange Street Leicester Square

visitant as unquestioningly as, say, a visit from a friend who has dropped in for a chat. The achievement of "The Column of Dust" is that, whether we accept or not the existence of the supersensual plane which The Watcher superimposes upon the visible scheme of things, we are forced to see life through the eyes of Constance, who "had found a little hole in the wall of appearance, and, peeping through, had caught a glimpse of that seething pot of spiritual forces whence, now and then, a bubble rises to the surface of things." It is not that "the atmosphere of the infinite" penetrates our consciousness so much as that we are "made aware of a new angle of the universe; of an angle from which we might perceive the splendor, aliveness, and mysterious quality of natural things, the inconceivable lunacy of most man-arranged things." The thesis of the book, that our earthly life is a dream, and that the Real is the sum of the spiritual forces working within and behind the dream, may be illustrated by a quotation:—

"Constance was helpless before the misconceptions of a creature who applied the standards of the infinite to civilised daily life. The Watcher was amazed by all that he saw: by that love of the aboriginal burrow which constrains the Londoner, whenever possible, to perform the secret operations of storage, cookery, and travel underground; by the teeming streets, in which our urban dwellers are everlastingly content to fidget. He could not comprehend the incessant pouring to and fro of people by all the spacious highways and plaited alleys. Seen from his universe, they were like mercury scattered on a disc, which runs without reason in a hundred little processions and solitary drops, unites into a formless, wriggling mass, and breaks away again to an unending repetition of the process."

"But the children will die in their turn. They will all die. Then they will exist in the Real for ever and ever, without earning, or eating, or any kind of fuss. Why undertake this weariness and struggle, just to stay a few more hours within the dream? It is so ugly, miserable, and meaningless! Why do they not all try to die as soon as they can? Why do you not try to die—now, at once? Disentangle yourself from the dream?"

"She said to him suddenly, 'Go! Go! find all the wonders, look for the thread. Don't stay in this corner with me.'"

"But he answered almost in anger, 'I cannot go, for no one else will receive me; and without a habitation how am I to stay in the dream?'"

"Her eyes were opened for an instant then. The cliff of books fled far away; and she saw the tideless and everlasting sea of spiritual existence, and Life, like a little iridescent ball of foam, blown across the surface of the waves. She was an infinitesimal bubble in that formless mass. In an instant it would be dissolved, re-absorbed in the dream; with its cherished separateness for ever gone. Meanwhile the Watcher, meshed within her bubble, was blown with her over the deeps."

It is in the mingling of this "atmosphere of the infinite" with the atmosphere of the London streets that "The Column of Dust" is sui generis. The realistic scenes are undeniably enhanced by the spiritual commentary. Moreover, Miss Underhill's poetical metaphysics are backed by a most disconcerting vein of irony, and relieved by a most feminine sense of humor. A prosperous circle of aesthetic ladies who are interested in "the occult" is hit off with a quiet and discriminating malice that is absolutely delicious. Constance is introduced to the bosom of these searchers after truth by her materialistic friend, Andrew Vince, a gentleman on the Stock Exchange, who is nowhere less at home than in his own house. The Vinces are thus described by the caustic Mrs. Wetherbee: "A good, honest fellow with sound business instincts, and his living to get at his trade, shut up with a painfully unique and exquisite wife. Everyone else on their knees before her, and he feeling that attitude rather fatiguing after a hard day's work. How coarse and ugly all the ordinary little comfortable bad habits must appear in such company! Could you drink bottled stout with that sitting at the other end of the table? Would it be possible to snore in the presence of a really spiritual woman? That is Andrew's condition all over. Muriel enjoys her own virtues thoroughly; but his don't agree with the furniture, and so they have to be kept out of sight." It is impossible, here, to indicate the series of spiritual adventures and experiences that befall Constance. Naturally a novel shot with veins of mystical poetry and of high spiritual emotion, a novel that succeeds both in its ironical analysis of human pettiness and in its spiritual interpretation of human endeavor, is not without some artistic discrepancies. The character of Constance, for example, is not homogeneous. While her attitude towards her right "to dip myself into life, deep in; to touch the ground, stir the muddy depths if I chose," is fine and convincing, it is scarcely credible that a woman of so passionate a nature could take the chill-blooded and wholly negative tone she adopts towards her child, little Vera. There are, in fact, two distinct women incorporated in Constance, and the mystic has been grafted on to an individual of a more womanly type, so that the spiritual struggle may be presented to us. It would be short-sighted, however, to insist on minor defects, such as these, in the case of so original a work. Occasionally the atmosphere of spiritual ecstasy becomes strained, as in some of the latter chapters where the Graal is brought on the scene, and Constance thereby is led to snap the threads that bind her to life; but in the main the illusion of unseen supersensual forces mixing with and irradiating our ordinary consciousness is wonderfully sustained.

Mr. Bennett's novel is both an entertaining and daring piece of work. The first part describes the relations of a husband and wife, Morrice and Inez, who, after three years of married life, have fallen out of love. By accident Morrice overhears a snatch of a conversation one evening between his wife and his friend Captain Hulse, and on his casually repeating it he discovers, to his amazement, that it relates to a clandestine meeting between the pair. The wife's avowal of the truth and the husband's attitude are narrated with the frank and cynical honesty that give Mr. Bennett's analysis of character its peculiarly refreshing note. The scene ends in the husband's being attacked by a paroxysm of the heart. Most convincing are the sensations of the dying man when his wife and the doctor are hovering round his bed. In the second part the author essays a daring flight into the unknown by his highly imaginative description of the experiences of Morrice's disembodied spirit. Most authors would sink into the fantastically unreal if they failed to thrill us by the shadow of the supernatural, but Mr. Bennett steers successfully a middle course. He does not, indeed, reach the spiritual plane of "The Column of Dust," but creates for us a most plausible illusion of a supersensual universe. And, like Miss Underhill, he gets some of his happiest effects by contrasting the elastic consciousness of the enfranchised spirit with that of the "moving prison of the earthly body." The imagery is ingenious and firmly handled, and in the ambitious chapter entitled "The Glimpse," he carries us backward into the story of creation by a description of his hero's chain of past incarnations. It is true, of course, that the spiritual depths of Miss Underhill's heaven and hell are in no danger from invasion by Mr. Bennett's hero, whose soul never soars far from the plane of earth. In Part III. the author lands us again on terra firma, and there is almost a scientific precision in the details of Morrice's unwilling return to his "blighting prison of putrescent clay." Some of the artistic strokes at this stage are uncanny in their daring, such as the description of the unhappy wife returning to the chamber of death and finding that her dead husband's eyes are open, and that the coins she has placed on his eyelids have fallen to the floor. There is unflinching grimness touched with pathos in the sequel. Inez, in her outburst of grief over her dead husband, has taken poison, and Morrice's spirit has returned too late from the Unknown to save her. The remaining chapters, which analyse Morrice's relations with Captain Hulse, are full of penetration. Mr. Bennett has done more notable work than "The Glimpse," but in firmness and sureness of handling it is equal to his best.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

A COMPARISON between the manner of Mr. Chesterton and that of Mr. Lucas would be mainly a study in contrasts, and two volumes of essays just published, "Tremendous Trifles," by Mr. Chesterton, and "One Day and Another," by Mr. Lucas (Methuen, 5s. each), show that the only quality common to both writers is that each has written essays which are excellent of their kind. Mr. Lucas is urbane, polished, and a trifle sentimental. Mr. Chesterton is hearty, slapdash, and sometimes perverse. Mr. Lucas chooses a subject with deliberation, looks for its most engaging aspect, and

"..... and I find that the smoking of a pipe of

CHAIRMAN

teaches a philosophy that is well worth knowing. Its fine qualities have a pleasing and soothing effect, minimising the little troubles and difficulties of life. It never obtrudes and it never palls, but, week in and week out, is the one tobacco that gives to most men the greatest pleasure in smoking—a pleasure which only the right tobacco for their palate can give. It is cool—always cool—and burns evenly to the last shred with a rich and pleasing aroma."

BOARDMAN'S

is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER

the same but fuller flavoured.

Most tobacconists sell them at 6d. per oz. in 1 and 2 oz. packets, and $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. tins.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

Rudyard Kipling's New Book Actions and Reactions

1. Uniform Edition: Scarlet cloth, extra crown 8vo, 6s.
2. Pocket Edition: India paper, limp leather, fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.
3. Edition de Luxe (limited to 775 copies): Hand-made paper, satin cloth, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Highways and Byways in Middlesex.
By WALTER JERROLD. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson, and a Map. Extra Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic. Translated from the Italian of Benedetto Croce, by DOUGLAS AINSLIE, B.A. (Oxon). 8vo. 10s. net.

Essays on Some Biblical Questions of the Day. By Members of the University of Cambridge. Edited by HENRY BARCLAY SWETE, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity. 8vo, 12s. net.

The Forest Lovers. By MAURICE HEWLETT. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by A. S. Hartrick. 8vo, 5s. net.

The New New York. A Commentary on the Place and the People. By JOHN C. VAN DYKE. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. 8vo, 17s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Open Country. By MAURICE HEWLETT.

Stradella. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. An Old Italian Love Tale.

The Key of the Unknown. By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Daily News

North and South, East and West, "The Daily News" is on sale all over England first thing in the morning. If you have any difficulty in procuring a copy communicate with the publisher.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

Head Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

presents it to the reader dressed in as becoming a manner as he can. Mr. Chesterton is like a French fowler in that he lets fly at every bird that presents itself. The first subject he thinks of will serve his purpose. Accordingly, he takes hold of it in the oddest and most unexpected way he can imagine, tosses it about in a manner calculated to create the utmost possible bewilderment in the reader's mind, and then lays it aside with an air of calculated unconcern and assumed ingenuousness. Mr. Lucas woos his reader; Mr. Chesterton startles him. "Tous les genres sont bons, hors le genre ennuyeux," and neither Mr. Chesterton nor Mr. Lucas has yet shown any disposition to provoke boredom. Mr. Chesterton's "Tremendous Trifles," are reprinted from the "Daily News," and are described by their author as "a sort of sporadic diary—a diary recording one day in twenty which happened to stick in the fancy." The connecting thread which runs through most of them is the significance of the trivial, though several, and not the least entertaining, give us Mr. Chesterton's impressions of Continental scenes. Mr. Lucas derives most of his inspiration from books, and shows a pretty gift for presenting passages from out-of-the-way writers in a framework that sets them off to advantage. After books, cricket comes in a good second in Mr. Lucas's pages—we have a notion he would protest it ought to be first—and the two papers, "Winter Solace," and "A Rhapsodist at Lords," the latter treating of Francis Thompson's keen interest in cricket, are among the best in the volume. The reader who possesses these two little books together with Mrs. Meynell's "Ceres' Runaway," which we noticed a couple of weeks ago, will have the best of the season's output in that charming, though unhappily not very popular, literary form, the essay.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Oct. 8.	Price Friday morning, Oct. 15.
Consols 2½ per cent.	83	82½
German Threes	82½	82½
Spanish Fours	94½	93½
Union Pacific	213½	209½
Steel Common	93½	91½

THE last Stock Exchange account, concluded on Tuesday, was a remarkably prosperous one for brokers and dealers, more especially in the home industrial market, where prices have been rising in anticipation of the higher profits which should naturally follow a general improvement in trade. Home railways, however, have been unaccountably dull, and gilt-edged securities show a downward tendency in consequence of the rise in money and discounts. The increase of our Bank rate yesterday from 3 to 4 per cent. was expected, as the Directors obviously could not allow the reserve to be depleted without taking steps to attract gold. Consols fell a little in anticipation of the borrowing that will become necessary if the House of Lords throw out the Budget—a contingency which came home to the City when Lord Rothschild and his friends started their petition to the peers. Foreign bonds have also declined, the chief cause being the rise of the Berlin rate to 5 per cent. and the expectation of another big Imperial loan in Berlin. Financial conditions in Germany are unsatisfactory, and the Socialist triumph is considered to be an index of general discontent with the new taxes. The City petition to the Lords has proved a complete failure, and the opposition to the Budget is practically dead.

WHEAT, WOOL, AND RUBBER.

During the last few months the dearest important articles of commerce have been wheat, wool, and rubber. The price of wheat began to go down in August, and bread is happily already a halfpenny per quarter cheaper than it was in July. A further fall seems probable and will prove a boon to the working classes. Wool also rose during the spring and summer to prices resembling those which prevailed just before the disastrous slump of October and November, 1907. It seems to have reached its climax at the recent London sales; for telegrams from Australia, where sales are now proceeding, state that a decline of prices has occurred. This again is a favorable feature, for just as the decline of wheat is caused by the abundance of the world's harvest, so the decline in wool is caused not by any falling-off in the demand for cloth, but by the flourishing condition of the Australian sheep runs which have just yielded a record clip of wool. The price of rubber still stands at an absurd figure, and the trade is living from hand to mouth. The difficulty here is that rubber plantations take several years before they begin to produce anything, so that the price can only fall with the demand. The principal articles for which rubber is required are motor and bicycle tyres, goloshes, waterproofs, and electrical apparatus. Ceylon and the Malay peninsula appear to offer the best conditions of soil and climate for the cultivation of tame rubber, and the plantations are now being made at a great rate, as the number of new rubber companies floated in London may serve to testify. Unfortunately, the financial methods adopted by their promoters have encouraged gambling.

INDUSTRIALS.

Now that trade is improving, investors ought to be turning again to the industrial market, though whether the demand for these shares will actually revive is a point on which I should not like to be dogmatic. But it may be useful to indicate the sort of return that an investor can expect when he buys in this market. The yield, of course, varies enormously—from 3½ per cent. obtainable on J. and P. Coats, to very nearly 20 per cent., given by various motor shares that need not be considered. First-class industrial debenture stocks and preference shares yield about 4½ or 4¼ per cent. On the ordinary shares of any manufacturing company, however prosperous, one ought, I think, to ask very little less than 5½. The ordinary shares of Brunner Mond and English Sewing Cotton and Harrod's Stores all yield about 5¼ per cent. at their present prices. Such companies as these have the possibility of greater development and higher dividends in the future, but with industrials one can never be quite certain. So much depends on the personality of the managers that there is a very appreciable element of speculation in buying even the soundest of the ordinary shares. Many people would prefer a railway stock like Buenos Ayres and Pacific second preference, which gives very nearly 5 per cent. to an industrial giving 5¼. Investors who like fishing in troubled waters may be interested in a few high yields to be had from the shares of rather unsuccessful companies. Calico Printers preference give nearly 6½ per cent. at present, and it is not so long since the company was paying an ordinary dividend of 6¼. British Aluminium preference yield 8¾ per cent., and in this case, too, there have in the past been good ordinary dividends, though at present the company is very unsuccessful. Associated Cement preference yield between 8½ and 9, while Savoy Hotel ordinary give 10 per cent., and it is reported that a champagne lunch is thrown in with the annual meeting. Investors with a taste for high yields may like to consider some of these shares, but they should be careful.

JAPANESE RAILWAYS.

The nationalisation of the railways in Japan is not proving a financial success. According to an estimate of the Railway Bureau, the revenue for next year is estimated at 90,000,000 yen in round figures, and the expenditure about 51,500,000 yen, leaving a balance of 38,500,000 yen. Of this sum about 32,500,000 yen must be deducted for interest on railway bonds and money borrowed from the Deposit Bureau in the Finance Department, leaving a net profit of not more than 6,000,000 yen (£600,000). This is the total amount available to be added to the capital account for the cost of improving the existing lines and constructing the proposed lines, for which it is estimated 29,470,000 yen will be required next year. The authorities are accordingly straining every nerve to devise ways and means for raising the money to cover the deficit. Moreover, the railway authorities have to balance an outstanding deficit for the last two years, amounting to 7,000,000 yen. The Railway Bureau, according to the "Hochi," proposes to increase the passenger fares in order to obtain additional revenue. Yet a socialistic parson told the Church Conference that if we nationalised our railways we should be able to increase wages 30 per cent. and lower freights by the same amount! On the Mexican lines, which have also been recently nationalised, the highly-paid foreign employees are being turned off to make way for cheaper Mexican hands. The change adds to the risks of travelling.

LUCILLUM.

Rowntree's Cocoa

The flavour of Rowntree's Elect Cocoa is a flavour that is remembered. It lingers on the palate long after the delightfully fragrant beverage has been ——— enjoyed. ———

Rowntree's Elect
Cocoa is delicious.

Makers to His Majesty the King.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£16 10s. GREECE, HAIFA (FOR GALILEE AND FOR DAMASCUS), JAFFA (FOR JERUSALEM AND BETH-LEHEM), ALEXANDRIA (FOR CAIRO), NAPLES AND MARSEILLES, October 22nd.

Full particulars from the Secretary,
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

ALPINE SPORTS LIMITED beg to announce that they have secured the entire accommodation in the following hotels for the winter season for SKATING, TOBOGGANNING, CURLING, SKI-ING and SLEIGHING:—MONTANA PALACE, VILLARS-SUR-OLLON, the seven principal hotels; MORGINS-LES-BAINS, two hotels; ST. BEATENBERG, two hotels; KANDERSTEG, Hotel VICTORIA, WENGEN, four hotels; LENZERHEIDE, Kurhaus; BALLAIGUES, GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE, &c. For illustrated handbook apply to The Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WHAT DO UNITARIANS BELIEVE AND TEACH?
Send name and address to the Secretary, British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and explanatory pamphlets will be forwarded, post free.

AUTHORS! Typewriting accurately and promptly executed by educated operators with best machines at standard rates: MSS. over 10,000 words 10d. per 1,000; under 10,000 1s. per 1,000. French and German MSS. 1s. 6d. per 1,000. Correspondence 1½d. per folio of 72 words. Carbon copies half price. Misses Knight & Callum, 43, Idelcombe Rd., Tooting, S.W.

CAVASSER in the provinces wanted for high-class London Weekly Sales and Advertisements. Salary and Commission. Write Box 6598, Willings, 125, Strand, W.C.

AUTHORS AND ARTISTS. Special facilities for placing work of every description. Particulars from Manager, Literary Department, WIENER AGENCY, LTD., 64, STRAND, LONDON, and Tribune Buildings, New York.

KENDAL (Westmorland). FURNISHED HOUSE to Let Monthly. Ten Beds, Wide Views, Golf Close. T. Wilson Wilson, Kendal.

Colman's mustard

for the Bath

The "tingle" of a cold bath: that indescribable feeling of refreshment from head to foot —you can get it with better and more invigorating effect from a hot or tepid bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. It refreshes and never fails.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

LISTS SENT POST FREE. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

The 1s. Illustrated Bible, 1s. 3d. post free. The Red Letter Bible, from 5s. 4d. The Indexed Salvation New Testament, 1s. 6d. post free. [post free]
The Red Letter New Testament, 1s., 1s. 6d. post free.
The Sunday School Prize Bible, with Coloured Illustration, 1s. 6d. post free.
Wide Margin Reference Bibles, from 3s. 9d. post free.
The Self-Explanatory Teachers' Bible, 12s. 6d., 15s., and 21s. post free.

Catalogue No. 366. 144 Pages.

GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE OF SELECTED PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

NOW READY. REDUCED PRICES. IMMENSE VARIETY
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
Remainder and Discount Booksellers,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER."

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School. G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out-door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP. School re-opens September 24th.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children's Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply, the Principal, Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BANKING.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Two and a-Half per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C. 14th October, 1909.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day advanced to 2½ per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,

5, Princes Street, Mansion House. 14th October, 1909.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday
Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the Kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.BOLTON.THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Douthwaite

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones. 3032 Royal, 3 wires

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER."OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Proprietor

SOUTHPORT.KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illu-
minations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOUGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages... ..	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 "	6d. "

From CHATTO and WINDUS'S LIST.

NEW

From CHATTO and WINDUS'S LIST.

FLORENCE PRESS BOOKS.

Printed from a new fount of type specially designed by Mr. HERBERT P. HORNE after the finest examples of the Italian Masters.

THE FIORETTI, OR LITTLE FLOWERS OF S. FRANCIS.

A newly revised and in parts augmented Version of the Translation by Prof T. W. ARNOLD. The Illustrations are reproduced in Collotype after the unique Drawings by an Unknown Hand contained in the MS. of the "Fioretti" and "Life" preserved in the Laurentian Library. The edition is limited to 500 Copies on Hand-Made Paper, size about 9 by 11 in., bound in paper boards, 30s. net; or in limp vellum, 42s. net. Also 10 Vellum Copies (sold), bound in limp vellum, eight guineas net each.

SONGS BEFORE SUNRISE. By Algernon Charles Swinburne.

English Edition limited to 500 Copies on Hand-Made Paper, about 7½ by 9½ in., bound in paper boards, 26s. net; or in limp vellum, 36s. net. Also 10 Vellum Copies (all sold), bound in limp vellum, Ten Guineas net each.

MELBA

An Authorized Biography by AGNES G. MURPHY. With Chapters by MADAME MELBA on The Art of Singing and on The Selection of Music as a Profession. Also an Introductory Note by J. A. FULLER MAITLAND.

With Photogravure Frontispiece, 37 Portraits, Views and Facsimiles, 16s. net.

THE FACE OF CHINA.

By E. G. KEMP, F.R.S.G.S. Travels in East, North, Central, and Western China. With some Account of the New Schools, Universities, and Missions, and the old Religious Sacred Places of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism, and a Map of China. With 64 Illustrations after Water-Colours and Sepia Drawings by the Author. 20s. net. Large paper, 42s. net.

THE COLOUR OF ROME.

By OLAVE M. POTTER. With 60 Illustrations in Colours and Sepia by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARTINO, who also contributes an introductory chapter. Fcap. 4to. 20s. net. Large paper parchment, 42s. net.

STORIES OF THE FRENCH ARTISTS FROM CLOUET TO INGRES.

Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and arranged by P. M. TURNER and C. H. COLLINS BAKER. With 8 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-tone. Cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, with 5 additional coloured plates, crown 4to, parchment, 15s. net.

TRAVELS WITH A DONKEY.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Newly set in special large type, with 12 Coloured Plates and 12 Facsimile Drawings by NOEL ROOKE. 7s. 6d. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE.

Translated by Dr. E. P. FUSEY. Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. Introduction by Mrs. MEYNELL. 12 Coloured Illustrations by MAXWELL ARMFIELD. 7s. 6d. net.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH.

By CHARLES READE. With 30 Plates in Colour and 10 in Line by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Title, End Papers, and Cover Designed by the Artist. 12s. 6d.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ AND DRAMATIC ROMANCES AND LYRICS.

By ROBERT BROWNING. With 10 full-page Coloured Plates by BLEANOR BRICKDALE. 6s. net.

SHAKESPEARE'S PLUTARCH.

The Sources of "Julius Cæsar," "Antony and Cleopatra," "Coriolanus," and "Timon of Athens." Edited by C. F. TUCKER BROOKE, M.A. Two New Volumes in "The Shakespeare Classics." 2s. 6d. net each.

THE MASTER OF GAME.

THE OLDEST ENGLISH BOOK ON HUNTING. By EDWARD, Second DUKE OF YORK. Edited by W. A. and F. BAILLIE-GROHMAN. With Introduction by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Photogravure Frontispiece and 23 Full-Page Illustrations after the Illuminations in the Original MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM (1515-1517).

The Latin Text of the Editiones Principes with an English rendering, Copious Notes, and an Historical Introduction, by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES. English Edition limited to 500 Numbered Copies. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and Facsimile Title-Page. Royal 8vo, buckram, 25s. net.
No English translation, or edition with English annotations, of this famous work has previously appeared, and it may safely be said that the light it throws upon the Religious, Social, and Political conditions of Western Europe during the early years of the Sixteenth Century cannot be neglected by serious students of the Renaissance.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING.

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A., Slade Professor of Fine Arts, University of Oxford. NEW EDITION, REVISED. 7s. 6d. net.

THE MIND OF THE ARTIST.

Thoughts and Sayings of Artists on their Art. Collected and Arranged by Mrs. LAURANCE BINYON. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

THE PAINTERS OF VICENZA.

By TANCRED BORENIUS. With 15 Full-Page Plates. 7s. 6d. net.

THE UNLUCKY MARK. By F. E. PENNY. Editor of the "Inevitable Law," &c.

"Through all . . . runs Mrs. Penny's fine sense of character and drama."—The Times.

INFLUENCES. By PAUL METHVEN. A brilliant story by a new writer. First Review:—"Mr. Paul Methven is a skilful deviser of plots, and has a vivacious way of writing. The story is sure to interest, for it has most of the qualities which go to make popularity."—Daily Telegraph.

THE SON OF MARY BETHEL. By ELSA BARKER. The story of The Christ in a modern setting. "There is clearly sincerity and a great amount of power . . . many beautiful passages . . . for the author has been really stirred to the depths by the Gospel narrative."—Morning Post.

THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN SWORD. By MICHAEL BARRINGTON.

"A vigorous story."—The Times.

"Mr. Barrington has an easy grace in the manner of his writing."—Daily Chronicle.

"Extremely good to read."—Morning Leader.

"A splendid story."—Pall Mall.

"Extremely well written."—Globe.

KING HAL OF HERONSEA. By W. WILLMOTT DIXON.

PLAIN BROWN. By COSMO HAMILTON. Author of "The Blindness of Virtue," &c.

"Full of crisp and humorous vivacity."—The Times.

FAME'S PATHWAY. By W. C. CHATFIELD TAYLOR.

New
6s.
Novels.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.THE ROSE AND THE RING.

By W. M. THACKERAY. With Coloured Frontispiece and 44 Illustrations (12 in Two Tints) and Decorated End-Papers by GORDON BROWNE. 3s. 6d. net.

THE RAINBOW BOOK.

By Mrs. H. M. SPIELMANN. Coloured Frontispiece and 15 Illustrations by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S., and 21 in Black and White by other well-known Artists. 5s. net.

CAMPING IN THE FOREST.

With 12 Coloured Illustrations, many in Black and White, and Decorative End-Papers by MARGARET CLAYTON. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 4.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	141	The Tactics with the Lords.
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		By Alfred Dennis ...	158
Through Reaction to Revolution ...	144	The Death of Ferrer. By the
The Case of Ferrer ...	145	Rev. R. L. Gales and C. S. ...	159
The Budget and the Growth of Trade ...	146	"Government by Bureaucracy."
The Independence of the Press 148		By H. G. Wood and Alfred Marks ...	159
A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-MAN ON THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION NOW PENDING, FROM THE THREAT OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.—		How Habeas Corpus passed the Lords. By Cantab ...	160
I. By H. W. V. Temperley ...	149	The World Went Very Well Then. By Militant ...	160
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Lord Curzon's Economics By Tripos ...	160
The "Idea" of Hellenism ...	150	The Government and the Country. By Lex ...	160
The Sacred Rage of the People 151		The Budget and Snobbery. By C. E. Maurice ...	161
Foreign Poetry and English Readers ...	153	POETRY:—
"Toadstools" ...	154	Dread Nought. By Guy Kendall 161
COMMUNICATIONS:—		THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	162
The New Censorship. By Sydney Brooks... ..	155	Books to be Read ...	162
The Ultramontanism of Lord Hugh Cecil. By A Nationalist Churchman ...	156	REVIEWS:—
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Meredith's Last Poems. By G. M. Trevelyan ...	163
The Late Mr. Hofmeyr. By Georgiana M. Solomon ...	157	The Plainness of Rome. ...	164
The Grounds of Anglo-German Peace. By John H. Skrine ...	157	Our New Patriot ...	165
The Budget and Women's Suffrage. By Holford Knight 158		"Max" ...	166
Agrarian Policy in Hungary. By St. Bernoit ...	158	Edmund Garrett ...	166
The Anti-Budget Petition. By Budget ...	158	Modernism ...	167
		Ann Veronica ...	167
		Six Novels ...	170
		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
		The Life of Dr. John Dee ...	170
		A Woman of No Importance and Lady Windermere's Fan 172
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Lucellum ...	172

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

NEXT week's number of THE NATION will contain an article on the Budget from the pen of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

* * *

THE most careful and authoritative observers of the political situation feel themselves unable to predict the course of the Lords in regard to the Budget. The most significant fact is that two forces are working with energy to secure its rejection. Lord Milner and Lord Curzon, the latter of whom has completely thrown over his Free Trade theories, are constructing a visionary constitutional case for such action, and the liquor interest threatens to withdraw its forces from the electoral field unless the licensing duties are destroyed. If these counsels prevail the Lords and the Trade between them will have incidentally perpetrated something like a fraud upon the public. The Trade have for months been collecting from them, in the shape of increased prices (with a profit superadded), the licence duties which they only began to pay this October. They will also be entitled to get back from the Treasury the spirit duties they will have paid since the spring. In the event of rejection, the public, even if the price of spirits be reduced, will still be hundreds of thousands of pounds out of pocket, and the Lords will thus be parties to one of the most iniquitous private speculations we have ever heard of. While these activities are in progress Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne abstain from every indication of their opinions, thus discharging themselves of all the functions of leadership. These statesmen perfectly embody Ledru-Rollin's pathetic cry to the friend who met him toiling after the Paris mob which had just tumbled him in the gutter, "Je suis leur chef; il fallait bien les suivre."

* * *

LORD CURZON's attempt to build up a case for rejection was more argumentative and more cautious than Lord Milner's. The gist of it was that the Constitution being unwritten, the question of the privileges of the Commons rested merely on their resolutions, which the Lords had in terms declined to accept. He quoted Gladstone as admitting in 1861 that the House of Lords had never given up the power of amending a Budget and were right in declining to record against themselves such a limitation of their power. Lord Curzon forgot to add, first, that Gladstone's action in 1861 made not only amendments but rejection out of the question to all but deliberate Constitution-breakers, and, secondly, that the Lords for hundreds of years allowed judgment to go against them by default.

* * *

HAVING re-affirmed the Lords' general right of rejection, Lord Curzon went on to suggest that its assertion was fully justified by the tacking on to a Money Bill of matters "not exclusively financial." He suggested the licensing duties were such material, and also the land taxes, for they contained the "germ" of land nationalisation. The House of Lords were also free to reject on the ground that they regarded the passage of the Budget, on their conscience, as injurious to the State, and that the Government had no "mandate" for such legislation. Why do not these gentlemen say frankly that they are going to kill the Budget, Constitution or no Constitution, because they hate and fear it? Finally, Lord Curzon, while denouncing Mr. Lloyd George's demagoguery, suggested that £150,000,000 of manufactured goods were pouring into this country and depriving the people of employment.

* * *

ON Tuesday Lord Curzon was reinforced by Lord Milner, who admitted that he had abandoned all his Liberal doctrine, including Free Trade. According to Lord Milner there was no question as to the right of the Lords to reject the Finance Bill, especially if the Budget contained four or five other Bills. It was wild claptrap to say that the Lords represented no one but themselves, that they were thwarting the will of the people, and that it was high time to sweep them away. The Budget might make some rich men poorer, but it could not make any poor man richer, while Tariff Reform was fair as between rich and poor, because rich people consumed food as well as poor ones. This profound argument was followed by the suggestion that, so far from chaos following the rejection of the Finance Bill, it would merely—if the Government behaved nicely and meekly—give the revenue officials some extra work and cause "a certain amount of disturbance in the money market." If a General Election went against the Government it would prove that they were wrong, but if it went for them it would not prove that the Lords had not been right. Our politics would seem to have found a brilliant recruit in Lord Milner.

* * *

ON the other hand, the "Edinburgh Review" joins the "Quarterly" in an impressive and evidently much disturbed warning to the Conservative leaders against revolutionary tactics on the Budget. The "Edinburgh," while hostile to the Budget, admits that it has been greatly improved during its passage through the Commons, and will have nothing to say to the attempt of the wild peers "to establish for the House of Lords control over the supplies of the year." Such a step would be entirely beyond the "usual and recognised functions" of the peers, already suspect through their extreme Tory partizanship. They were, in fact, claiming the right to "make Liberal administration impossible. The right and power to reject the Budget means the right and power to dismiss the Ministers." This, we need not say, is a power which all Constitutional authorities declare to be denied to the House of Lords. If this revolutionary design is consummated, large changes in the Constitution will, thinks the "Edinburgh," be inevitable.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the Lords are making hay while the sun shines. In the intervals of abusive rhetoric, the caste of Vere de Vere are turning the Development Bill into a scheme for subsidising rates. Among other changes infringing the privileges of the Commons, they passed, on Thursday, an amendment enabling the Road Board to make advances for the maintenance of existing roads, i.e., for the relief of rates. This purpose is directly at issue with the object of the Bill, and interferes with the character and disposition of a money grant. The Speaker will unquestionably treat the amendment as a breach of privilege

* * *

MR. CHURCHILL made a powerful argumentative defence of the Budget at Abernethy on Saturday, in which he exhibited, in striking form, the enormous growth of the capital wealth of the country. The Government asked for a further contribution from direct taxation of less than six millions a year. That was less than a thirtieth of the increased income assessable for income-tax. Wealth or wages must be taxed, for he would decline to discuss "the gospel of quacks and the creed of gulls," which preached the taxation of the foreigner. And it was fair to look to revenues which in ten years had increased ten or twelve times more than wages. A Christian country could only build on the one foundation of social reform; namely, a healthy family life for all. As for the action of the Lords, who ever heard of its leader proposing to decide whether he would tear up the British Constitution after he had consulted the drink trade? It was only necessary for Mr. Balfour to say now what he said last October, that it was the House of Commons and not the House of Lords which settled uncontrolled our financial system, for these crazy threats of rejection to cease.

* * *

On Monday Mr. Churchill met a deputation of suffragettes, and gave them some direct and sound advice. He told them that their cause was marching backwards, that it was childish to think of converting a great community by irritating crowds, breaking up public meetings, and appealing to women's worst enemy, violence. He thought there was now no chance of a Government or a party considering the suffrage, a forecast which we hope and think is over-wide. But we are bound to say that we do not know one Conservative or Liberal leader, and we are aware of only one Labor leader, who is now prepared to advance a cause which some months ago had certainly a majority of the Cabinet in its favor. Thus, in the world as we know it, do bad tactics prejudice good causes.

THE movement of indignant protest against the execution of Señor Ferrer has spread to two continents. As far as Uruguay there has been a sympathetic strike, and in Germany some of the foremost men of letters, science, and art, have protested as vehemently as the proletariat. Perhaps the most significant demonstration of all was something new in the history of Paris—a peaceful procession through the streets of some 100,000 men. In this country there have been indignant meetings in London and most large towns, and an effort was made to move the adjournment of the House of Commons. The motion, however, failed to secure the support of more than fifteen members, doubtless because it was initiated by Mr. Grayson.

* * *

DESPITE the activity of the censorship, the people of Spain have become aware of this universal indignation, and it has already had a profound influence on Spanish politics. The Government has naturally tried to identify the attack upon itself with an attack upon the nation, but it has failed, and Señor Maura has resigned after a plain hint from the Liberal leader, Señor Moret, that his maintenance in office threatened the Monarchy. Señor Moret has formed his Administration, and though the Liberal leader is not altogether trusted by his party, he will probably aim at internal appeasement and a gradual termination of the war in Morocco. Señor Maura still has a majority in the Cortes, but that means very little in Spain; and the nervousness of the Crown at the situation into which Señor Maura and his Clerical friends have flung the country is as intense as the anger of the nation.

* * *

ON Tuesday Mr. Henderson asked Sir Edward Grey what action the Government had taken to prevent the shooting of Señor Ferrer without trial in a civil court. Sir Edward Grey replied that the Ministry could not depart from the rule not to interfere with or to express opinions on the internal administration of other European countries, while neither British subjects nor treaty rights were involved. This, he said, was the rule of European Governments and could not be departed from. It seems to us to be a very wide doctrine, which would rule out not only Queen Elizabeth's expulsion of the French envoy after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, but also the withdrawal of the representatives of France and England from the Court of Naples after Gladstone's exposure of the horrors of Neapolitan prisons, and the official boycott of Serbia after the murder of King Alexander. We are inclined to think, however, that Sir Edward Grey has been a good deal better than his word. So far as private and informal counsel was concerned, our Government endeavored to do a service to the unhappy Administration which came to its deserved end on Thursday last.

* * *

ON Thursday Sir Edward Grey expounded his doctrine of non-interference in an interesting speech at Sheffield. Government could not, he insisted, interfere in the internal policy of other countries; moral influences must be left to the play of public opinion which, with its sympathies and antipathies, was a formidable factor in the world of civilisation. The Foreign Offices were doing very well—witness the questions of Persia, the Balkans, and Morocco, all settled without war. On the Congo, we should still press for the cessation of forced labor and for free trade as conditions of recognising the Belgian annexation. As to the industrial outlook, the spirit of hatred could solve nothing on either side; nor could labor do without capital. The way of peace lay through the threshing out of difficulties by competent and trusted organisations on both sides.

* * *

THE Tsar has at last set out on his visit to the King of Italy, every mile of his way being guarded, a new source of irritation arising from the scandalous proposal to sever the province of Viborg from the Grand Duchy of Finland. He should reach Racconigi this (Saturday) afternoon. The visit is long overdue, and has been looked forward to with great anxiety by Italian opinion. Italy is restless in the Triple Alliance, where she feels herself somewhat cramped and dependent, especially in her relations with Austria. For this reason Italian statesmen are desirous of getting on as intimate terms as possible with Russia, a connection which might counterbalance the Austro-German predominance in the Triple Alliance. A measure of the importance attached to the Russian understanding is given by the attitude of the advanced parties in Italy. A section of the Socialists were anxious to demonstrate against the Tsar; the Radicals and the Republicans, however, refused to associate themselves with this manifestation, and, apparently, even among the Socialists the more politic element has proved the stronger, for a projected general strike has been abandoned. Doubtless our own Foreign Office could throw some light on this visit to Italy, but in so far as it helps to break down the dangerous and artificial division of the European Powers into two camps it is welcome.

* * *

MR. GEORGE LAMBERT, Civil Lord of the Admiralty, made a most important statement on Wednesday at Penicuik as to the German "Dreadnought" building. Germany, he said, had laid down eleven "Dreadnoughts," and had ordered two more, which had not been laid down. She would thus have thirteen ready by the middle of 1912, when we should have twenty. This is, we think, a sanguine estimate of Germany's powers, for she has yet to prove that she can finish a "Dreadnought" in less than three years, and we are inclined to wager with Mr. Lambert that her tale of "Dreadnoughts" in 1912 will be, not thirteen, but eleven. We have to consider not only existing facts as to building, but the still more serious handicap of a net German deficit of twenty-four millions, and the inability to borrow even at four per cent. In any case, Mr. Lambert's statement absolutely destroys Mr. Balfour's prediction of twenty-one or twenty-five German "Dreadnoughts" by 1912, and convicts him of reckless exaggeration, while it also qualifies the Prime Minister's and Mr. McKenna's calculation of seventeen. Is it contended that we are now to strive for twenty-four "Dreadnoughts" to Germany's eleven or thirteen, plus our superiority of four or five to one in other non-obsolete types of warships?

* * *

THE report that the whole of the Russian force at Tabriz had been withdrawn turns out to be inaccurate. General Snarsky and the greater part of his men are to go, but 1,000 are to remain over the winter. There is no good reason why the evacuation should not be complete, and many strong and obvious reasons why it should. A Russian force in Persia is a standing temptation to the wild spirits in Russia, and a source of fear to every Persian. This is in a particular degree the case with the force at Kazvin, within a few hours' march of the capital. The Persian Parliament is expected to meet at the end of this month, and its deliberations cannot be secure or free so long as the shadow of Russian military power is thrown across them. The evacuation of Kazvin by Russia is an insistent necessity, if the work of reform and reconstruction in Persia is to be carried through. And that evacuation ought to be completed before the Persian Parliament meets. It is a disturbing fact that there is no hint yet of such a movement on the part of Russia.

* * *

PRESIDENTS TAFT and Porfirio Diaz exchanged visits on Saturday on the Mexican frontier, a meeting without precedent on the American Continent. The relations between Mexico and the United States are very intimate nowadays. The two big States co-operate to keep the small central American Republics in due subordination, and a vast amount of United States capital is invested in Mexican enterprises. President Diaz's Government has not been of the gentlest, and he has never concerned himself much about such political luxuries as liberty, but the concession-hunter has found him a good, if at times a critical and scrutinising, friend, and the concession-hunter has in most cases been an American. The United States have in return occasionally done President Diaz a good turn by rendering Mexican exiles innocuous.

* * *

MR. J. H. HOFMEYR, the famous chief of the Afrikaner Bond, and, after Kruger, the greatest and most characteristic of contemporary Dutch statesmen in South Africa, died on Saturday in London in his sixty-fifth year. He was the most successful organiser and the most inveterate moderator of Dutch opinion in Cape Colony and the sub-continent. He only once held office, but his gifts as a journalist and his understanding of the Dutch character made him a power behind the throne. He was both Imperialist and Protectionist in his leanings, and one of his last acts as a statesman was to modify the Constitution of the Bond after the war so as to bring it into strict harmony with the British hegemony of all South Africa. He keenly resented his personal betrayal by Mr. Rhodes in the matter of the Raid, but then, and afterwards, he worked both for peace and for compromise between the Republics and the British power. His statesmanship erred at times on the side of caution, but it had no real quality of "slimness." Personally, Mr. Hofmeyr was a man of marked amiability of character, a scholar and a student and lover both of Dutch and of English literature. Milton, in both languages, was, perhaps, his favorite author.

* * *

PROFESSOR LOMBROSO, the founder of the modern European school of criminal psychology, died on Tuesday at Turin, aged seventy-four. His later theories have somewhat obscured his first great service to mankind, namely the discovery that the hideous disease known as pellagra was due to the eating of bad maize, and his crusade against the shocking poverty among the Lombard peasants, of which it was a symptom. His most sensational work, however, was his attempt, pursued for many years, and recorded in many books, to fix and classify the criminal type, and to connect it with definite physical peculiarities. His books record his minute measurements of the skulls and bodies of criminals, and, if his theories had been pressed a little more gently, they would have made a deeper and healthier impression on prison discipline. As they stand, they have perhaps re-inforced the reactionary school, which treats crime as, in the main, a mark of a hopeless and permanent degeneration. He was undoubtedly a great inquirer, but the scientific value of his work is undetermined.

Politics and Affairs.

THROUGH REACTION TO REVOLUTION.

FOR four generations since the Revolutionary Epoch began in Europe, British Constitutionalists have thanked God that we were not as other nations are. Our rulers, since we settled accounts with the Stuarts, had never stiffened their backs against the forces of liberty. They had kept the letter of their privileges and abandoned their substance; they had maintained the forms of their dignity and preserved its moral influence by foregoing the literal interpretation of its claims. As with the monarchy, so with the aristocracy. In this land of old and great renown, no revolutions were needed, because there was no cast-iron sphere of privilege. Freedom broadened slowly down, and asked for no written guarantees, as it advanced from precedent to precedent, because it could trust always to the political genius of the nation, to a sense of constitutional loyalty pervading all classes, to a wise Conservatism which made progress sure if slow. There was a political honor among politicians of all parties, which enabled us to dispense with written guarantees and to enjoy the advantages of a more elastic, unwritten Constitution. The Crown had never formally resigned its power of veto. What did it matter? There was a tacit understanding, sanctified by long usage, that the veto would not be exercised. The Lords possessed an unrestricted veto on Bills passed by the House of Commons. This was more serious, because it was from time to time exercised; but there was an understanding that, none the less, the Lords occupied a secondary place in the legislature, and were bound to accept the clearly expressed will of the people, as formulated by their representatives. The Lords further were asked for their formal consent to the Finance Bill, and here no one doubted about the power, because it was understood by long tradition that it would never become a reality. Understandings of this kind made it possible for popular Government to develop peaceably, without revolution, and without hampering the future by a written Constitution. This is the development which leading members of the party supposed to be constitutional are now seeking to bring to an end.

To do them justice, they are still hunting for some shadowy kind of justification in history. Lord Curzon has entered the fray with a quotation from a speech of Gladstone on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill of 1861 when the right of the Lords to reject a Money Bill was, as we had fondly supposed, for ever set aside. It is strange, on the surface, that a speech by the Minister in charge of the Bill by which the undivided responsibility of the House of Commons was finally asserted should be used in defence of the present claim on behalf of the House of Lords, and a perusal of the speech as a whole makes Lord Curzon's selection not less strange. It is quite true that Gladstone, both here and in later speeches of the same series of debates which have been quoted by Mr. Gibson Bowles, places the right of amendment and the right of rejection on the same plane. But anyone who will consider the circumstances of the debate will easily see what is the true meaning of this conjunction. It is not that the right of amendment is a substantial right, but that the right of rejection is merely a formal right. Now, what Gladstone remarks in the passage referred to by Lord Curzon is (1) that the House of Lords have never "by any corporate and formal act of their own" abandoned the right of amendment. But (2) "speakers in the House of Lords, the highest individual authorities in the House of Lords who may in some sense be called representatives of it, have abandoned it" (this has later on been fortified by unqualified declarations in the same sense by Lord Salisbury and Lord Rosebery); and (3) in Gladstone's opinion the Lords had been right in not making any record of this "limitation of their privileges," because "cases might arise in which from the illegitimate incorporation of elements not financial into financial measures" it might be wise for them to reassert their privileges as construed by themselves. The last expression of opinion is, it seems, to be quoted as a justification of the rejection of a Finance Bill on the ground of "tacking." But before Gladstone's speech is quoted for this purpose it will be well to read it as a whole. It will then be seen that Gladstone was at the moment subject to attack on precisely the same ground. He was accused of "tacking" on the ground that he combined several financial operations in one Bill, and a considerable part of his speech is concerned with the proof, based on numerous precedents, that there is nothing relevant to finance that may not be included in a Finance Bill. He refers in particular, in a passage which we commend to Lord Curzon, to the Bill of Supply of the 7th of Anne:—

"There is no one form of financial operation material either to revenue, to expenditure, or to the contraction of debt, which is not compressed within the limit of that Act of Parliament, passed when the minds of men were still warm and fresh with the remembrances of conferences between the two Houses on the subject of 'tacking,' and on the respective jurisdictions in matters of finance."

Now, if Lord Curzon can show that the valuation of land is not an operation material to the raising of revenue by a tax on the value of land, he may prove Gladstone on his side. If not, he had better say no more of this speech. And when Mr. Gibson Bowles quotes Gladstone to prove that no formal surrender of the right of amendment was ever recorded, he may usefully consider the bearing of the following sentence in which Mr. Gladstone remarks that the privileges of the two Houses "from their nature are best maintained by the good sense and wisdom of the two Houses in putting them into action from time to time." By this wisdom and good sense alone can an unwritten Constitution be maintained. If the Lords think it will be shown in this instance by upsetting an understanding which the subsequent forty-eight years have only strengthened by undeviating usage, they will only precipitate a crisis which will end in the formal withdrawal of these and other privileges which they have hitherto enjoyed. If the executive power in this country does not depend on the control of finance, and if the control of finance is not in the hands of the House of Commons, then our Constitutional history is a tale told by an idiot, signifying nothing. The appeal in these cases is not really to the judgment of individuals, nor even to the people as a whole. The appeal is to the facts, and the simple fact is that the whole of our Constitutional machinery is pivoted on these relations of the Purse, the Executive, and the Representative House. The proof will be seen in this, that if this relation were dissolved, a completely new Constitution would automatically arise. What it would be none can tell. But that it would be fundamentally different from our present Constitution is certain. Of all this the Constitutional Party reckon little. Men like Lord Milner will overthrow the traditions of home government as readily and cheerfully as the traditions of Colonial administration. For them nothing with a touch of freedom in it is sacred. The element of liberality suffices to secure their contempt for the best established tradition. For in our day the historic sense allies itself with expanding liberty, and the Opposition is no longer the party of Conservatism but of Reaction, leading swiftly and inevitably to Revolution.

THE CASE OF FERRER.

WE doubt if any single event in European history has called forth such spontaneous and violent indignation among the peoples of Europe as the execution of Ferrer by the Spanish Government. From all over France, from the chief cities and coast towns of Italy, from the German capitals and working centres, from the lesser States, such as Holland and Sweden, and even from the University of St. Petersburg, comes the same story of indignant protest, stormy meetings, riots, boycott, and savage denunciation of clericalism and despotism. It is natural that the flame should have burnt most fiercely among the Latin races, partly owing to their more demonstrative temperament, and partly because clericalism is to them still a present or a very recent danger. But, in reality, the indignation has been no less strong among ourselves, who have known that danger only in mild forms or by old memories. Even if we made light of a Trafalgar Square demonstration and attempts to threaten the Spanish Embassy as mere turbulence, there would remain the large and orderly meetings, the resolutions of societies of every kind throughout the kingdom, and the condemnation of the act by all the important newspapers, except those which feel bound to deride every expression of the popular mind, unless it supports the forces of reaction.

What were the causes of the shock thus felt through Europe when the streets were placarded with the news that Ferrer had been shot? We think that two main causes were combined. It was believed that the trial had been a mockery, and that the Spanish Government, largely under clerical influence, had used this mockery of a trial to exterminate an innocent man whose teachings were opposed to their interests. No one would deny that Ferrer's teachings were opposed to the interests of the present form of government in Spain and to the power of the Church as it is there exercised. One has only to look at the long series of red-bound text-books which he published for the use of the Modern Schools to understand why Monarchists and Clericals alike feared and detested him. The books are simple but scientific treatises, sometimes of Spanish origin but more frequently translated from the French or other languages, and, as a rule, they were written by men of eminence in European science. They treat of such subjects as physical geography, physiology, psychology, education, war, and the history of man, according to modern scientific methods, and when the prevailing forms of government or religion are mentioned, it is in comparison with other forms, and with reference to their history and development. In this country we have been long accustomed to such methods. They used to be called rationalist: probably now most people would call them simply scientific. When first they were introduced they created much alarm, and a few politicians may have trembled for the Monarchy. But we did not shoot Huxley or Herbert Spencer on that account; still less do we now propose to shoot Mr. Edward Clodd, whose scientific writings come nearest to the publications of the Escuela Moderna.

In Spain the shock of the scientific method is more recent, and it was sure to be more violent, because education stood at a lower standard and had been controlled almost entirely by the Church. There was plenty of reason why clericalism and the supporters of the Spanish system of government should desire to destroy Ferrer and all his works. In the province of ideas he was their avowed and dangerous enemy, and the natural result of his teaching would be their overthrow. Causes of hatred abounded, and if relentless opposition to the established forms of government and religion is sufficient ground for execution, we need go no further to justify the action of the Spanish authorities. A large number of their supporters do go no further. Ferrer, they say, was admittedly an enemy of Church and State, as those terms are understood in Spain, and therefore he was justly put to death, as all heretics and rebels should die. If that doctrine is accepted, there is no need of further discussion; the question falls. But, outside the governing circles of Russia, the doctrine is no longer accepted by the greater part of modern Europe. Among ourselves, for instance, no one thought of having Mr. Chamberlain shot in what he once called "his Republican days," and though there was an effort to keep Bradlaugh out of the House, even Lord Randolph Churchill did not demand his execution. It appears to us that the doctrine did in fact weigh very heavily with the Spanish authorities and the officers on the Military Tribunal. But even they did not depend on it entirely, for some attempt was made to establish a charge against Ferrer of active complicity in the Barcelona rising. In order to estimate the fairness or unfairness of the methods of the trial, and to discover how far these two issues were either separately established or confused, we may briefly summarise the process and such of the evidence as the Spanish authorities have allowed to appear.

Ferrer was arrested at a village some ten miles from Barcelona on September 1st. According to the accounts of himself and his friends in England, he had recently returned from London to Barcelona owing to the illness of a niece, and was living in retirement, devoting all his time to his educational books. After his arrest, he was brought before the Governor of Barcelona, who passed him on to an examining magistrate, or "juge d'instruction." This magistrate, by Ferrer's account, was an impartial man, but he warned him that "military law was not the law of the ordinary courts." The meaning of this phrase is evident, for the Military Tribunal, consisting of a colonel and six captains, before whom the trial ultimately took place, did not allow witnesses to be called or cross-examined, and its knowledge both of law and evidence was no more than might be expected from the ordinary officer. The evidence was prepared for the Tribunal beforehand by the "juge d'instruction," who, at the trial, simply read out the charges and depositions of witnesses on both sides, after about five weeks had been spent in collecting evidence. These charges ranged over a large number of subjects—addresses and proclamations (some of them dating from fifteen or even twenty years ago), letters from freemasons, freethinkers, and revolutionaries abroad, and passages from published books. Many of these documents had already appeared in Ferrer's trial before a Civil Court three years before, when an attempt was made to implicate him in the crime of Morral, who threw the bomb at the King's wedding and had once been librarian to Ferrer in the Modern School. The Civil Court then acquitted Ferrer, and it was proved that Morral had spoken of him as "a simple-minded man who thought one could do anything with speeches." Other documents found in Ferrer's house, especially a supposed letter from Lerroux and a crazy proclamation exhorting the people to general destruction and violent revolt, were declared by Ferrer's counsel to be obvious forgeries inserted in the house by the police. It appears incredible on the face of it that any active revolutionist, recently engaged in the Barcelona rising and perfectly conscious of his danger, should allow such letters or such proclamations to lie about in his rooms for the police to lay their hands on when they chose; and it is equally unlikely that he would leave, as the police evidence maintained, "documents begging his adherents to let him know if they had supplies of arms, money, and dynamite." But the value of such evidence cannot be estimated either way by a tribunal of officers who had neither seen the documents nor cross-examined the witnesses.

Still less credit would be given in ordinary law to some seventy witnesses who are supposed to have supplied evidence of Ferrer's participation in the Barcelona rising. Here, too, the evidence was taken "in camera" by the "juge d'instruction," while Ferrer was not allowed counsel nor cross-examination, though he might call witnesses on his own side. The witnesses for the police stated that Ferrer had been seen at various places in the neighborhood, inciting the populace to declare a Republic, that he visited the office of "El Progreso" on July 26th, and was among the rioters on that and the following day in Barcelona. Ferrer admitted that, in ignorance of the outbreak, he had entered Barcelona to visit the newspaper office on July 26th, but asserted that he had returned to his place of retirement at once and there remained. His counsel at the trial also complained that anonymous denunciations had been admitted as evidence before the "juge d'instruction," and opinions had been collected from entirely unqualified witnesses. Where evidence on either side thus clashes with direct contradiction, it is essential that the actual witnesses should be produced before the Court, whether judge, jury, or officers, and that the counsel on both sides should be given full right of cross-examination; otherwise the truth cannot possibly be discovered. But nothing of the kind was allowed before the Military Tribunal. The "juge d'instruction" merely read out the charges and the depositions which had been made before him without further examination of any sort; the officer appointed to prosecute then followed, restating the case and demanding the death penalty; and the counsel for the defence—a young officer not chosen by the defendant, ignorant of law, and acquainted with the case only during the previous week—spoke for an hour, apparently with great eloquence and skill. The seven officers were then left to consider their verdict, and they sentenced Ferrer to death.

Whether he was guilty or not, such a form of trial is obviously a mockery of justice. The "Times" has been a hostile witness, steadily growing more hostile to Ferrer, yet, writing of the trial, its Madrid correspondent said:—

"However high the character of those who administer this system, the guarantees of justice offered by it are scarcely sufficient, in view of the gravity of the case, according to English notions."

Señor Maura, the Spanish Prime Minister, who resigned on Thursday, declared the Government had further convincing evidence which they would produce. Let them produce it by all means for the sake of their own credit and conscience, but evidence after the trial is not admitted, nor will it be easy for them to get it believed. To us it is only too plain that Ferrer in his last speech was justified in protesting that he was condemned, not for any definite or recent events, but on account of his past reputation as a teacher, and the general impression upon the minds of officers ignorant of the law and of the essential part in evidence that he was "a dangerous man." And by a dangerous man, officers are only too likely to mean a man opposed to them in politics, just as clericals mean a man opposed to them in doctrine.

THE BUDGET AND THE GROWTH OF TRADE.

THE fallacy of post hoc ergo propter hoc is so deeply rooted in the human mind that the improvement of trade is a very fortunate event indeed for the Budget and the Liberal Party. All that the united forces of Tariff Reformers and Primrose Leaguers could do has been done to stop the swing of the labor pendulum. How many favorite valets have been dismissed in order to reduce employment and mobilise flunkeydom against the Budget, nobody will ever know. It seems a pity that the Dukes do not send in returns to the Board of Trade, for at present that department only draws its statistics of unemployment from the Trade Unions, and a trade union of menials has not yet been formed. But in spite of all efforts the progress of the Budget has coincided with the revival of trade. We are not so foolish as to suppose that additional taxes are in themselves a means of promoting trade. In so far as the new revenues are merely devoted to the withdrawal of men from the ranks of industry into the navy or army, there is a waste of capital and labor which is bound to tell unfavorably on commerce. But Old Age Pensions are a distinct stimulus to the staple industries. They mean that this winter the poor will be able to buy more boots and clothing than before, and the expenditure of the poor upon necessities creates a far wider pool of employment than an equal expenditure by the rich upon luxuries and superfluities. A reduction of flunkedom is as good for the country as a reduction of the army. To suggest, as Lord Rosebery suggested, that the Death Duties are destroying capital, is absurd, except in the rare cases where it can be shown that some great factory or business has been pinched of funds in order to provide for the building of an unnecessary ironclad. No capital expenditure is better justified than that which ameliorates the conditions of the masses, and enhances their efficiency in field and factory by making their lives more stable, their physique more robust, their homes more comfortable and healthy. Moreover, if the grant of Old Age Pensions is accompanied, as it seems to have been, by a diminution of intemperance, it may safely be concluded that the conditions and prospects of our workmen will be distinctly better at the end of the year than they were at the beginning.

In his admirably clear and closely reasoned speeches at Dundee, Mr. Churchill laid proper stress upon this country's marvellous expansion of wealth. He showed that the very classes which are called upon to contribute most to the required revenue are those which have advanced most rapidly. He mentioned an estimate of Sir Robert Giffen that every year somewhere between two and three hundred millions are being added to the capital wealth of the nation; he reminded us that the paid-up capital of registered companies has doubled from above one to above two thousand millions sterling in the last fifteen years, and that the gross amount of income assessable to income-tax has risen in the last ten years from 762 to 980 millions. That wages in the same period have risen to a less degree is a good argument for throwing new burdens on the shoulders of those who are growing rich rapidly rather than on those whose poverty is diminishing slowly. The President of the Board of Trade also touched upon the ducal argument that the Budget is playing havoc with labor and driving capital into exile. Neither contention has any foundation in fact. Money is far cheaper in England than in Germany or the United States. Our manufacturers and merchants can borrow money far more easily and at much lower rates than their competitors. Our national, municipal, and industrial credit stands higher than theirs. Since the Budget came in, Consols, it is true, have fallen a couple of points, but within the same period German Imperial bonds have fallen four points, which does not argue well for Tariff Reform as an alternative to Free Trade, or for the German plan of laying taxes exclusively upon poverty and industry.

Let us return to the tests and standards of internal well-being. The Board of Trade returns show that our exports have steadily increased, month by month, since the Budget was brought forward. The Local Government Board's returns of pauperism since April, the month before the Budget, point in the same direction. The truth can be ascertained by comparing the monthly statements issued by the Board. At the end of April, 808,525 persons throughout England and Wales were in receipt of poor relief, the total population on the same date being over 35,000,000. In other words 22·9 out of every thousand were paupers. Of this ratio, 7·7 were in receipt of indoor relief, and 15·2 in receipt of outdoor relief. During the four months which followed these totals steadily declined.

			Indoor.		Outdoor.		Total.
April	7·7	...	15·2	...	22·9
May	7·5	...	14·9	...	22·4
June	7·4	...	14·8	...	22·2
July	7·2	...	14·5	...	21·7

During August the number of paupers began to increase, as usual; but the increase was comparatively slight, and the latest figures issued—indoor, 7·3; outdoor, 14·5; total, 21·8—are better than those for the corresponding month of last year, which were, indoor, 7·2; outdoor, 14·7; total 21·9. In April, 1908, the pauperism figures were better than in April of this year, so that there is distinct evidence that poverty of the worst sort has declined during the progress of the Budget.

Take now another side of the national life, the activity of our home industries. The industrial market on the Stock Exchange has been cheerful and active for many weeks past in spite of the tendency towards dearer money. Here is an illustrative table:—

MISCELLANEOUS SECURITIES.

NAME.	Lowest Price in March, 1909.	Price on Oct. 19th, 1909.	Rise or Fall
Associated Portland Cement
Pref.	51½	6½	+ 1½
Bradford Dyers' Pref. ...	1¾	1½	+ ¾
English Sewing Cotton Ord.	1¾	1¾	+ ¾
Guinness & Co. Ord. ...	372	400	+ 28
Calico Printers' Pref. .	¾	¾	+ ½
Coats, J. & P., Ord. ...	8¾	8½	+ ¾

The rise in Portland cement may be taken to indicate an improvement in the building trade, and the groans of the brewers are curiously reflected by the jump of 28 points in Guinness & Co.'s ordinary shares. Sewing Cotton and Calico and Dyers illustrate the state of the textile trades of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and it would be easy to provide other examples.

Lastly there are the statistics of employment. Each month in its "Labour Gazette," the Board of Trade publishes figures which serve as an accurate barometer of the labor market. They are compiled from the returns of 416 trade unions. During the last six months the actual number unemployed at the end of the month has fallen from 57,250 at the end of April to 51,749 at the end of September. The following table shows the movement in percentages, as compared with last year:—

				1908. per cent.	1909. per cent.
April	7.1	8.2
May	7.4	7.9
June	7.9	7.9
July	7.9	7.9
August	8.5	7.7
September	9.3	7.4

If the relation between the Budget and trade be what Tory orators and journalists declare it to be, we should be justified by these figures in asserting that the Budget has already produced a marked revival in trade and employment. Certainly our governing industrial forces look with no kind of perturbation on this instrument, for they know that it touches, not working England, but idle England, not the laboring and money-making community, but its more elegant and imposing parasitic growths.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE PRESS.

THOSE who have followed with some critical concern the later history of the London theatre will feel little surprise at the "incident" between Mr. George Edwardes and the "Westminster Gazette," unless it be that a journal so scrupulously, even so meticulously, moderate as the "Westminster" should be its victim. The facts are barely disputed on either side. The musical critic of the "Westminster Gazette" in writing an amiable notice of a "musical comedy" called "The Dollar Princess," produced at Daly's Theatre, found his patience exhausted by a perusal of the "book" and described it as "tiresome." He repeated this criticism in a more indirect form in some later remarks on a musical play at the Savoy, called "The Mountaineers." In this article he gently contrasted the method in which musical comedy is presented at the Savoy Theatre with that which finds favor ("in costumes by Paquin and Lucile") with Mr. George Edwardes. We cannot imagine a duty more proper to the critic, or one of which the kind of drama produced by Mr. Edwardes stands more in need. But the director's wrath was kindled, and he wrote to the "Westminster," declaring that a critic thus dealing with his productions could only be "actuated by spite and malice," and that as it was an "anomaly" for a theatrical manager to be helped in his business by a newspaper in one (the advertising) column and hindered by it in another, the literary portion, he withdrew his advertisements from a journal which had become a "menace" to him. The Editor of the "Westminster," being unwilling to give Mr. Edwardes a standing advertisement in two columns of his paper, when he had only paid for it in one, or to falsify the name and worth of literature in order to please an exacting customer, promptly backed his critic and published the correspondence, which now appears for the tardy enlightenment of the public. We do not know whether the maligned critic will require Mr. Edwardes to withdraw his charge of "malice and spite," and either apologise or pay for the attempt to injure him with his employer. If he is moved to any such action, we hope that the Institute of Journalists will fight his case for him.

Meanwhile, Mr. Edwardes's theory of the function of dramatic criticism requires some examination. Let us remark that he is not its only professor. Mr. Sydney Brooks points out in another column that the theatrical business in New York has been strong enough to impose it on one of the oldest and most respected of American journals, the New York "Tribune." The famous critic of that newspaper was required to effect something like the harmony between criticisms of plays and the paid announcements of them which Mr. Edwardes called for. He refused, in the interests of decency and critical independence, and he lost his position. With us, a daily newspaper, the "Mail," has largely accepted this view of a journal's responsibilities to its readers in the department of literature, by proposing to issue a Christmas book supplement, in which the publishers were offered space in the "literary" columns, to be "devoted to a well-written and illustrated description of the particular lines" they wished "to specially push." And, we observe, as a further instance of the growing fear of the money-power, that, according to the "British Medical Journal," several newspapers of standing have refused even to advertise a volume called "Secret Remedies," issued by the British Medical Association, and disclosing the composition of quack medicines. Thus the free and independent force of the Press on matters of deep importance to the public—the cure of disease and the character of literary and dramatic art—is already subject to siege by those who are interested in attacking and overthrowing it. In the case of the "Westminster" we see the assailant resisted and repelled. But in the case of the New York "Tribune," he has entered the fort; and in the other two examples we have quoted, its defenders have either opened the gates or acknowledged their servile position.

This is a serious matter, for it coincides with the growth of the strictly commercial view of the modern newspaper, conducted, as the Harmsworth Press is mostly conducted, on scientifically arranged lines of profit-making, and subordinating matters of opinion to that supreme end. It is, of course, clear that Mr. Edwardes's demand is both an exorbitant and a foolish one. What does he advertise for? Presumably that the public may see the announcement of his wares, and patronise them. The advertisement columns of a newspaper are miniature and movable hoardings, which are continually catching the eye of fresh passers-by. The spaces in them are let, because there is a steady competition for them. If they did not possess this value, the advertiser would not use them, and presumably he gets his money's worth. But a newspaper has also its affinities to the worlds of art and literature—an association, we are afraid, which gradually declines—that is to say, to the world in which a deliberate choice is made as to badness and goodness in ideas and the dramatic or pictorial or musical presentment of them. The claim of men like Mr. George Edwardes is to assimilate the one department to the other. The unwisdom of such a demand is obvious, for if the public come to understand that the criticisms of a play are merely descriptive and decorative expansions of the advertisements, they will cease to read or to trust them, and the dramatic profession will lose its most powerful stimulus to progress, the most coveted reward of the actor's talent or the author's genius. But its impolicy is still more striking. Evil will be the day when Mammon controls the Press, and cowardly and treacherous the editor who will sell his right of direction and choice, of warning and repugnance, in the sphere of art and literature. In the end such a Press would be of no service to the theatre. It would only serve the most mechanical, the least moral, the least truthful and inspired, form of dramatic production. It seems to us a matter of some seriousness that the manager who had the audacity to come before the Committee on the Censorship and describe "The Spring Chicken" as a "perfectly harmless play," should seek to weaken the Press precisely in the function of which that type of drama stands urgently in need. In such an attack it is the business of the Press to stand together, and we shall hope to see, as we mark the treatment of Mr. Edwardes's plays in other daily papers than the "Westminster," that this critical vigilance has not been relaxed.

And here, we think, there is some ground for quarrel with the dramatic criticism of the London Press. If the critics had done their duty from the first, would even a powerful manager have dared to open this assault on their independence? In this country we live in the atmosphere of good-natured tolerance in matters of art. We lack the fixed standards of the French critic and the intellectual conscience of the Germans. And the habit of criticism—of speaking one's mind—was never more in abeyance in our journalism. Critical journalism requires that the entire scheme and method of a work of art—its motive, plan of production, its author's ideas and view of life, as well as its skill and merely pleasurable quality—should be laid bare with all the critic's knowledge and force of thought and expression. This is not the mark at which much of our current writing on the drama is aimed. A correspondent of the "Westminster" maliciously describes the London dramatic critics as "half lackeys and half descriptive reporters." How much of this is true? And if we could imagine an heroic resolve on the part of half-a-dozen great newspaper proprietors, to buy seats for their critics instead of getting them for nothing, and to risk the loss of every theatrical advertisement in their journals, would not the public have a keener and more profitable exercise of the function of criticism than they obtain to-day? And would not the British drama, when it had recovered from the shock of such surgery, be all the better for it? The Press must make its choice. The theatrical manager will either master it or be controlled by it. It can go on swathing the commercial drama in the pleasantly enticing phrases in which it is so easy to describe all forms of decadent art, it can make the public more and more in love with its commonplace allurements, its sumptuousness, its empty, sensual prettiness, or it can endeavor to create the taste for a more truthful and a more serious theatre. If it chooses the first path it will sooner or later fall a victim to Mr. Edwardes's bow and spear. If the latter, it will at least restore to journalism something of its fast waning authority in the spheres of the intellect and the emotions.

A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-MAN ON THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION NOW PENDING, FROM THE THREAT OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.

I.

THE reasonings which you have submitted to me upon the great constitutional question now at issue, have been so strange in their character and so dreadful in their import that I cannot forbear writing to you at length upon them. I believe that the opinions which you hold are those not at present perhaps held, but likely to be held in the immediate future, by a number of citizens of this country—respectable, worthy, and law-abiding. The prospect is so dreadful that I cannot avoid warning you of the consequences, for if the principles which you profess, and the consequences which they carry with them, are accepted by the mass of this country, revolution must supervene. Nor will the revolution that occurs be a small one; it will be a revolution affecting every part of the oldest and most historic of constitutions; it will enter into every crevice, strain every joint, press on every hinge, of that ancient furniture and decoration and framework which we know as national institutions. This revolution will submit our ancient polity, which has been worked out by ages of experience, to the passion of the moment, and confide the practical knowledge and the embodied wisdom of generations of lawyers, statesmen, and judges to the noisy clamors of a mob—fanned by passion, diverted by interest, and stung by injustice. As the class to which you belong is one that is in all respects the reverse of the mob above described, I cannot but hope that you will have reason to draw back from this fatal advocacy of revolution.

In order to bring home to your conviction the deadliness of the cause to which you devote yourself, I will not seek to disguise or to color my exposition by personal advocacy, I will appeal to you on the broadest grounds—and where my own passions can enter. I will show you the door and the passage of their admission.

To divide systematically your objections to the existing Budget, the first I observe to be a legal one. Your first contention is that a "legal training" is needful to understand this issue, which raises at once the method of reasoning to be pursued in interpreting the constitutional issue. Here at first sight we come across an error, besides which any other error is pardonable—for the question is necessarily not a legal, but a constitutional one, and, of all persons least likely to understand it, the strict lawyer is precisely the most obvious. Our constitution—being based, not upon a charter composed at one time and strictly adhered to, but upon an infinite variety of statutes—differently interpreted at different times, and upon a yet larger number of customs, traditions and precedents, again subject to different interpretations—is in no sense law. A written constitution—if in any way a complete one—is loose history and strict law, therefore its best interpreter is a lawyer. But a historic and traditional constitution is loose law and strict history, therefore its best interpreter is necessarily a historian.

The customs of the British Constitution have changed so often even during the last three centuries that no legal precedents—unless those referring to definite statutes—are of use, except they be confirmed by continuous action and sealed by perpetual execution, unless they are true to the existing spirit, tradition, and atmosphere. Now in England it is the spirit of anything that the strict lawyer is deliberately taught to avoid, the letter and the letter only is his law. For interpreting the Constitution, therefore, strict law must be laid aside and strict history be substituted. Nothing so far tends to establish the truth of this contention as the fact that the greatest lawyers of the present age are the first to admit it. Blackstone as an exponent of our Constitution in the eighteenth century is universally derided, and the three greatest living authorities on our Constitution, Bryce, Dicey, and Anson—all lawyers—have agreed in admitting that it is custom which is the decisive law of the Constitution. Now custom is something different from law proper; the last may be the safeguard, but the first is the atmosphere, of a whole people. The air which they breathe, the food they eat, the ideas they express, the acts they commit, the dreams they dream, all these shape and mould the custom of their Constitution. Only the historian is fitted to interpret this, not because he neglects the strict law and the letter, but because he harmonises it with the spirit.

In viewing this question of custom historically, as regards the Commons and the Budget, only one opinion can be held. Since 1678 the Commons always have maintained their right to supreme financial control. If we penetrate still further back to the remote dawn of our Constitution we see the principle always clearly realised, if not so definitely expressed and defined. The whole business and condition of the Lower House has always been one of finance. For that it was first summoned, by that it gained its powers, by that alone can it continue them. From remote history another principle also emerges—that the parliamentary system of government has always existed in England, in some sense independently of popular influences. That is a necessary result of historic antiquity, and in the same way the Hungarian Parliament—the only legislative institution comparable to the English—has always preserved the same attitude. The independence of the Lower House, as against the people it represents, and the supremacy of its financial control, are the two chief parliamentary legacies England inherited from the Middle Ages.

The question arises, how have these two principles been modified since the great changes in the Constitution which the seventeenth century produced? Between 1688 and 1832 I can perceive no modifications whatever, except in so far as custom deepened and strengthened the operation of these principles. The voice of the people became the voice of God, but only when it was uttered through the House of Commons. The purse of the noble became open to the tax-gatherer, but only when the House of Commons pulled the string of it. In my judgment it is not till the period of the Reform Bill that any alteration is perceptible.

In 1832 we get an element introduced (which no strict lawyer would observe and no strict historian omit) that was destined to have great effects on the relation between the two Houses. The Lords opposed the Reform Bill, but by the aid of popular opinion the Commons vanquished them. Henceforth the Lords became distinctly inferior to the Commons, became registers of their wills in principle, if critics of their Bills in detail. From this time forward until 1884 the attitude of the House of Lords was entirely subdued and such that, though never confronted with a Commons majority half the size of that now existing, they over and over again suffered their dearest wishes and prejudices to be overridden. From 1884 onwards this attitude has changed; we no longer have a Commons, domineering and supreme, but a House of Lords—aggressive, alert, and rigid. However, during the interval of their submissiveness, in 1861, one change of great financial moment was acquiesced in by them. Their rejection of the Paper Duties Bill caused the consolidation of the Budget in one gigantic Bill, a principle which they accepted and have never since ventured to question or violate.

The general question of the attitude of the House of Lords does not concern us here, except incidentally. It is only of concern to establish that the House of Lords, so far from following old precedents, are gradually evolving new ones, and assuming an attitude of independence quite at variance with the spirit of their and our Constitution since 1832. For example, the India Councils Bill was recently modified by them in important particulars, though passed without criticism by the Commons. As each House contains distinguished Anglo-Indian authorities, the only possible conclusion is that the Commons refuse to arrogate to themselves an authority in such affairs, regarding them as non-party and Imperial ones, which the Lords openly and avowedly claim. That the Lords should occasionally exercise their interests as a class, whether as sportsmen or landowners or brewers, and throw out Bills on that account, is a species of action to which no reasonable historian can object. The rejections, for example, of such Bills as the Licensing Bill, the Scottish Land Bill, and the Cruel Sports Bill, are measures which the politician and humanitarian can assail, but which cannot be specially reprehended by the historian, who recognises the hereditary selfishness of a class or corporation. But in so much as the historian concedes much to measures inspired by the selfishness of a class, he can concede nothing to a resistance which opposes national measures in the arrogance of a fancied superiority over the Commons. Such a measure was the rejection of the India Councils Bill, an emphatic proof that the House of Lords seeks to extend its powers, to push them into regions hitherto secure from the invasion of party, and contrary to the spirit which has informed their chamber since 1832—a spirit created by one of the most zealous supporters of their power, and by one of the most earnest upholders of their historic rights who ever lived—by the Duke of Wellington.* It is only by a similar forswearing of the past, by a similar trampling upon the ashes of precedent, that they can venture to assert their sovereignty in finance by rejecting the Budget.

H. W. V. TEMPERLEY.

(To be continued.)

Life and Letters.

THE "IDEA" OF HELLENISM.

OF the white, clean avenues which make up the fashionable quarter of modern Athens, the whitest and the cleanest bears the name of "The Street of the Phil-hellenes." Of the cafés where in every town and village the modern Greek worships the Logos and the spirit of dialectic over his white raki and his brown coffee, the proudest and most popular is apt to bear the name of Byron. Amid poverty and defeat, under the scoldings of the world's Press, with his ports in danger of blockade and his frontier menaced with invasion, the Greek child grows up with this superb consolation that there are Phil-hellenes even in the sunless regions of the North, that there always have been Phil-hellenes, that there always will be Phil-hellenes. It matters very little to what class or grade of society he belongs. He may go abroad, laborious, ingenious, to keep a grocer's store in Khartoum, or cultivate oranges in Florida. He may find himself wealthy, well-educated, elegant, among the "intellectuals" of Paris. There is always around his head this enviable halo. His enemies are Mis-hellenes, the foes of culture and light. His friends are Phil-hellenes, who have done their best to compound for an unlucky accident of birth, by doing honor to his race, his traditions, and his manifest destiny. His good fortune is unique and he knows it. There are people who have lived in Bulgaria and Servia and learned to like and, it may be, with some reservations, to admire their "barbarian" inhabitants. But there is no cult of Philo-Bulgarism, and Sofia has no Street of the Bulgarophils. The tradition never dies. Byron might burn away the sacred fire in mortal fever. It kindled the eloquence of Gladstone. Gladstone dead, there still is Clemenceau. The most commonplace citizen of modern Athens speaks and votes and arms with the consciousness of a great crowd of witnesses which lurks amid the pillars of the Acropolis and flits with ghostly steps upon the road to Marathon. He might in some rude moment of prose and disillusion shake off the obsession, but behind him is the sentiment which sustains his pretensions wherever there are educated men in Europe. He cannot forget that a Legion of Phil-hellenes fought at Pharsala and Domokos. He is pleasantly aware that a group of distinguished Frenchmen, archaeologists, scholars, journalists, is ever ready in distant Paris to defend his claims and perpetuate the cult of his race in graceful lectures and neatly turned articles.* He cannot, if he would, lose the sense of being Greek in all he does. He serves the national idea when he sells brandy to Egyptians; he is conscious of patriotism when he defiles the sky of Attica with his mill-chimneys. He is never a lonely individual. He is always a Hellene with a backing of Phil-hellenes. If, under all these goads to self-consciousness, he develops a chauvinism which runs at times to a deplorable intolerance and extravagance, he also attains a patriotism which has no equal in its capacity for self-sacrifice and devotion.

* A similar proof was their attempt to amend the Old Age Pensions Bill, though in this case they submitted to the decision of the Speaker of the House of Commons, who ruled it out of order. A third is in their proposals for reforming the House of Lords, in which they attempt to limit and restrain the royal prerogative.

The sentiment which has canonised the modern Greeks with something of the affection which we feel for the ancients, is to some critics a splendid unreason, nor is it difficult to erect against its impetuous sympathies a formidable barrier of objections. It is not easy to decide how far the modern Greek inherits the blood of the ancients; it is even harder to say in what respect he represents the old tradition. There are undoubtedly islands on which the race has survived almost unmixed; there are as clearly large tracts of mainland Greece of which the population is chiefly Albanian, Wallachian or Slavonic in its origins. The nationalist patriotism of the Greeks is an essentially modern spirit, which owed its awakening to the French Revolution. Their democratic institutions are not centred in the city; they are based on a modern Liberal theory, and go to form a national State under a limited Monarchy. Their culture is predominantly French. Their Church, profoundly patriotic though it is in sentiment, is rather Eastern than Hellenic. It differs neither in doctrine, nor ritual, nor intellectual atmosphere from the churches of Bulgaria or Russia. It has none of the keen polemical spirit, the passion for speculation, the tendency to heresy and schism which were a distinctly Hellenic element in the early Christianity of the East. Nor can one honestly say that in letters, or philosophy, or the arts, the modern Greeks have as yet given proofs of the awakening of any hereditary genius. In literature their tradition is French, in architecture their masters were Germans, in music Italians. Promise we may detect, but as yet there is no great or spontaneous native achievement. In literature their advance is checked by the still undecided battle between the vigorous and natural vernacular, and the pedantic pseudo-classical language, imposed upon them by scholarly writers who knew something of ancient Greek but nothing of the laws which govern the evolution of a living tongue. Finally, despite the continual references in leading articles and public speeches to a classical past, the memory which really governs the thinking of the average Greek is not that of Periclean Athens, but rather that of Imperial Byzantium. The alluring dream, the "great idea," is not to restore the intellectual glories of the city-state, but rather to create again something resembling the Empire which the Turks overthrew. If this analysis—true so far as it goes—exhausted the truth about the modern Greeks, it would be a mere confusion of thought which caused the scholar, the poet, the idealist to expend upon them an affection which he denies to Servians or Roumanians. They would be simply one among several more or less promising Eastern peoples, all democratic, all as yet imitative in their culture, which are struggling through a difficult and often sordid present towards a future which we cannot divine. We know what we mean by the "Hellenism" which inspires the reverent study of Plato at Oxford, which clothes itself in Professor Gilbert Murray's translations of Euripides, or speaks to us in the pages of Pater. But Hellenism in that sense of the word was not involved when the Greek bands went out to meet the Bulgarian bands in Macedonia.

But there is none the less a sense in which the Greeks are splendidly right when they claim to be in a special sense the pioneers of civilisation in the Near East. They began some generations before any other Christian race in the Near East to organise their education and to cultivate letters. They pursue culture to-day with a disinterested and liberal passion. The Bulgarians and the Armenians are to-day no less eager to learn, and they are more at home in the modern world of thought. Socialism, for example, has as yet no footing in Greece, but it thrives among the younger generation of Bulgarians and Armenians. Both these races turn with avidity to the study of the natural sciences. But throughout Turkey the atmosphere of a Greek school, whether for boys or girls, is almost exclusively literary. The present writer has seen a class of girls of thirteen or fourteen in a Macedonian town, busied while the world beyond its walls was seething with revolution, in construing the Memorabilia of Xenophon and attempting to follow its thought. The boys in the Bulgarian gymnasium a few streets away were writing essays on Darwin and spending their afternoons on experimental chemistry. In a Cretan wayside inn one may chance upon a commercial traveller who will delight his clients by reciting long passages from the Odyssey. Among the leaders of the great insurrection was one who boasted the ability to recite by heart four plays of the Attic dramatists, another was translating Kant into modern Greek, and a third would lie on the roof of the insurgent headquarters, lost in a volume of Plato. It would be an exaggeration to pretend that such tastes are general or even common. The Greeks are not yet a reading people. But the astonishing fact in their social system is that this keenly commercial people is none the less anxious that boys destined to become clerks or store-keepers should spend valuable years in acquiring a by no means contemptible knowledge of the classics. That is but one illustration of the spirit which distinguishes the Greeks. The Bulgarian who reads Tolstoy in the original Russian may be a more thoughtful and a better educated man than the Greek who can recite by heart an oration of Demosthenes. But the latter acquirement is a proof of a disinterested love of letters which is rare among the other peoples of the Near East. It is in a utilitarian spirit that the Bulgarian acquires Russian and chemistry. The Greek goes to his classics with a passionate idealism which asks for no reward more sordid than the sense of pride in a great heritage. While this gifted race represents this spirit in the East, it fulfils a mission. Political success it does not need. Conquest and expansion would not assist its task. Its centre is the school. A wise Phil-hellene will not desire that Greece should greatly strengthen her army, or expend her strength in attempting territorial aggrandisement. The "great idea," as we see it, is not the restoration of the Byzantine Empire, but the development, wherever Greek is spoken, of this active intellectual temper, which has conceived, amid the perils of a racial struggle and the meanness of Levantine commerce, the conception of a disinterested intellectual life. There lies the true Hellenism, and the best service which the Phil-hellene can render is to help the Hellene to know himself.

THE SACRED RAGE OF THE PEOPLE.

THE blaze of indignation that has swept from one end of the civilised world to the other, from Paris to Montevideo, on hearing the tidings of the execution of Señor Ferrer is significant in various ways. In the first place, it is a vindication of what we may term the inherent virtue of the people. Historians and sociologists have been too prone to dwell upon a certain susceptibility to sheer brutality, and to base suggestions of blind ferocity which they attribute as dominant motives to the collective mind. A crowd, they argue, is a lower organ of humanity than its individual constituents, its emotions and its conduct are more irrational and more unjust, unfounded fears and suspicions operate as more potent irritants, it rushes into violent action and always repents too late. Even when for the visible chance crowd we substitute popular opinion, the same faults are found by those who from conviction, interests, or temper are enemies of democracy. For in this analysis of the general mind it is nothing else than the whole cause of democracy that is at stake. If the people in its aggregate capacity is irredeemably ferocious, credulous, and incapable of self-control, it is difficult to maintain that the ultimate control of government is better left in their hands than in those of some oligarchy of superior persons trained to act upon their individual judgment, and perhaps possessed of enough goodwill to keep in check their selfish proclivities.

* See "Greece in Evolution," a series of lectures translated from the French, with a preface by Sir Charles Dilke, under the editorship of Mr. G. F. Abbott. T. Fisher Unwin.

It is because it affords a practical refutation of this partial judgment of the popular mind that we are glad to witness this powerful display of the popular sense of justice. There is in every people a wisdom, an instinctive intelligence and a passion for right, a veritable voice of God. It is often beclouded, poisoned, and perverted to mean ends. But in the suggestion which works so powerfully upon the popular mind there is almost always a nucleus of sound passion; the mob of lynchers is goaded to a not wholly ignoble fury of sympathy with the victim of some cruel deed; "Mafficking" itself, with its degrading orgies, has its kernel of perverted patriotism.

The people is better as well as worse than its individuals, a crowd is capable of nobler judgments and greater heroism than its average member. Superior persons who sneer at or denounce the voluble indignation of ignorant folk who hardly know the place of Spain upon the map, and never heard the name of Ferrer until last week, only convict themselves of the ignorance which belongs to their superiority. It is true that this popular judgment is not based on a cool consideration of detailed evidence: it is largely instinctive. But the instinct is not so blind, so ill-informed, as is represented. The plain lessons of the secular struggle for toleration and for liberty are branded by just, though formless, traditions upon the minds of millions who have never heard of Lord Acton or buried themselves in the archives of national history. The unholy alliance of Church and State for the suppression of free thought, free speech, free Press, and free action, is perhaps the greatest, the most potent, and the most oppressive iniquity that history discloses through the ages, and even in the most liberal countries to-day the forces of reaction are constantly working towards re-establishing in some new shape this famous confederacy of spiritual authority and physical power. It needs no minute research into the methods of judicial inquiry prevalent in Spain to recognise in the legal assassination of Ferrer a modern instance of a once familiar procedure. Those who lecture the peoples for their want of self-control say they ought to accept the informed judgment of the tribunal which must be presumed to have before it facts and evidence of criminal intent not publicly disclosed as yet. But it is this procedure, the secrecy, the preference of a military for a civil court, the selection of witnesses, the hurrying of the execution, that furnish the substance of our indignation.

It is not, as some foolish persons suggest, a sign of growing anarchism that leads our great cities to organised protest against this action of the Government of Spain. On the contrary, this protest is the most powerful testimony that could be given to the growing recognition of the modern State as a standard and security of justice. In earlier times, nay, in times not remote, such acts of a State were so common as to awaken less indignation and no surprise. The most Christian monarchs employed false charges, cooked evidence, and hurried executions, as usual methods of dealing with the propagators of dangerous doctrine: the Church used the secular arm freely and openly to rid her of her enemies. We cannot affect surprise that the Church and the compliant Government of Spain should have failed to recognise that the age has gone when these things can be done with ease and impunity. For the force of the indignation of the civilised world against the judicial outrage in a little known country has surprised those who are in sympathy with the movement. It is, in the first place, a new testimony to the solidarity of labor. For though the shock of the outrage was felt among all classes of the nations, it is significant that the working-class organisations have everywhere and alone exerted themselves to give immediate and vigorous expression to their sentiments. Others have followed their lead. In some ways it is to be regretted that the public manifestation of an almost universal feeling should have been left so exclusively to the spokesmen of the Extreme Left. But any such consideration is outweighed by the revelation that the parties of urgent discontent in every land join in demanding plain public justice as the first and most urgent duty of the State. This sense for justice is the basis of democracy, and it is only natural that it should find earliest and most vehement expression among the workers, who in every country are still most exposed to the dangers of an officialism wielded by class or creed, and who see in liberty of speech and education the best security against such abuses of power. This internationalism of moral sympathy is not the mere vapid sentiment which some represent it to be. The official answers of Foreign Ministers still belong to the era of separatism which ever asks "Am I my brother's keeper?" International relations on their formal side still remain so inchoate that no open expostulation with a foreign Government is possible, unless it be covered by the assertion of some special interest upon the part of the intervening nation, or unless the erring State be very feeble or very backward. But the international character of this ferment of feeling must be itself a factor of growing import in the relations of States and Governments. Perhaps the time may even be approaching when it will be recognised, not merely as the right, but even as the duty, of the responsible statesmen in the foremost civilised nations to denounce as disturbers of the international peace Governments which commit or permit atrocities that shock the conscience of humanity and stir dangerous emotions of riot and distrust throughout the civilised world.

It is profoundly to be desired that the keen general sense of justice widespread among the peoples should grow so strong and find such vigorous expression as to compel their Governments to seek modes of realising in peaceable forms of representation this reality of the moral and emotional solidarity of nations. The enlistment of the Labor movement in the different nations in this cause of humanity is an admirable rejoinder to those who charge it with materialism, class-hatred, and anarchic tendencies. For the agitation has evinced in the workers the most passionate conviction that the State stands first for justice, that the education of the people is their truest and safest method of advance, and that a martyr for education is even more sacred than the soldier who suffers or is slain in the narrower political and economic struggle. But while such an act as the execution of Ferrer thus testifies to the general conviction of the supremacy of justice in the State, its criminality lies in the direct lead it gives to anarchism in Spain. It is a right feeling which regards this cold, calculated iniquity on the part of a State as an incomparably worse crime than the maniacal or desperately reckless act of the individual bomb-thrower. The one is a comparatively feeble assault upon the fortress of the State from without, the other a betrayal from within. A State, which thus implicitly declares that it is not strong enough or wise enough to stand upon right, has ipso facto abandoned its moral claim upon the respect and obedience of the people. Its spiritual foundations are sapped, and an abandonment to such a policy of terror, each instance inducing another by a fatal chain of vicious causation, must in time come to extinguish any claim it may have had upon the comity of nations.

FOREIGN POETRY AND ENGLISH READERS.

AMONG the few European newspapers which are over a century old, and which are able day by day to reprint matter from their issues of a hundred years back, is the "Journal des Débats." One day during last month it printed a piece of its dramatic criticism in 1809, which was remarkable as showing how cultivated Parisians at that time regarded German letters. The subject was some performances in Paris of the works of Gessner. The "Débats" critic (1809) observed that Gessner was the only German dramatist of any real merit. The fault of the Germans, he said, was that they were too much obsessed by "the monstrosities of Shakespeare" and "his more monstrous imitator, Schiller." No mention of Goethe is made in the critique.

Recollect that Schiller was then dead, and the whole body of his work was before the public. Goethe was sixty years old, and though the output of his wonderful old age had not appeared, practically the whole of his dramatic achievement had—a mass which in volume, weight, and splendor, utterly transcended the achievement of anyone then alive. And who was this Gessner, who effaced them all for the critic of the "Débats"? You may read of him in histories of literature, where a fraction of a page is now usually sufficient to catalogue his pretentious "Death of Abel" and the less pretentious pastoral idylls. The latter, perhaps, a few people with an especially keen taste for the eighteenth century pastoralism do still occasionally take down from their dustiest shelves.

Of course, it was time, as well as place and nation, that led the "Débats" critic of 1809 so far astray. The Romantic movement was then unborn in France; twenty years later it would have been different. But the real difficulty, when all is said, is national. For a considerable part of the eighteenth century German poetry, like English, had tried to form itself on French models. And then came the influence of those "monstrosities of Shakespeare," and by a mysterious inner harmony linked itself to the forces of native revival to produce a poetic literature which English and Germans can comprehend and which Frenchmen constitutionally cannot. The same thing happened in England shortly afterwards. And what is as noticeable, is that Englishmen, and to some extent Germans too, lost therewith much of that power of appreciating French poetry which they had spent a century in laboriously cultivating. The Englishman to-day, and in some measure the German, is constitutionally incapable of doing justice to Racine or Corneille. Perhaps he may tolerate it as literature; he cannot pass it as poetry.

On the French side, as on the English, this incomprehension remains. In spite of Hugo and the Anglicising or Germanising of other leaders of the French Romantic movement, English and German poetry only come to a Frenchman with difficulty. English poets, like Swinburne and Meredith, who have paid special poetic attention to France, are unread there. Such a fine contemporary French poet as M. Henri de Regnier, writing in the same "Journal des Débats" only last August, confesses the naivest ignorance of them. We may leave this to Frenchmen to deal with; presumably it is they and not we who are the chief losers; at any rate they alone can alter it. But the other half of the incomprehension devolves on us. It is we who are the losers through our failure to appreciate such a noble poet as Racine. It is we alone who can repair our omission and our loss. It is we whose interest it is to build bridges so far as we can across the gulf which separates us from the poetry of the most civilised and civilising of modern peoples.

If the gulf is ever to be bridged, one must begin by measuring it. It is not merely from Racine and Corneille that most English readers are divided, not merely from classicism or the Louis Quatorze school; it is from all the greatest French poetry, from the nineteenth century no less than the seventeenth and eighteenth. When a posterity sufficiently remote to be impartial compares the poetry of the different great nations since the death of Goethe, there cannot be much doubt which will bear away the palm. It will be the nation of Hugo, Lamartine, and Leconte de Lisle. Nearly all this splendid literature is a closed book to English readers, not only to average laymen but to critics and poets. A few of the lesser stars in the French galaxy—François Villon, André Chénier, Verlaine—have from time to time appealed upon what may be called accidental grounds to leaders of our literary fashions. But to the main lights they are blind. Take even one of them so sympathetic towards much that is French, as Matthew Arnold. Arnold observes, almost off hand, that in his judgment the single volume of André Chénier outweighs all the volumes of Hugo. Now André Chénier is an extraordinary genius. Considering when he lived and how early he died, we cannot easily put limits to what he might have been. But to draw the comparison which Arnold draws between what Chénier actually wrote and what Hugo actually wrote, is criticism nearly on a level with that of the "Débats" critic of 1809 upon Gessner, Schiller, and Shakespeare. It is, too, very similar in origin. The "Débats" critic did not praise Gessner for any fundamental excellence as a German poet, but because his pastorals were Frenchified and made an appeal ad hominem to the Parisian. In the same way it is evidently not Chénier's fundamental excellence as a French poet but his happening to be a precursor of Arnold's Hellenism that especially commends him to Arnold.

Arnold himself illustrates, and half explains, in another place, what is part of the reason—the part which most affects Englishmen and Germans in common. This is simply ear. The general system whereby words and sentences are accentuated is very similar in English and in German. It is wholly different in French, and this difference translates itself into a wide difference in the rhythm and scansion of verse. Very few Englishmen can really make head or tail of the rhythm of French verse. Arnold quotes a French Alexandrine couplet:—

"Ah! que me dites-vous, et que vous dit mon âme?
Que dit le ciel à l'aube, et la flamme à la flamme!"

and then quotes a couplet from Heine:—

"Siehst sehr sterbeblässig aus, Doch getrost! du bist zu Haus," and his comment is that the latter is by contrast very refreshing, to us "with the German paste in our composition." It is these last words which explain the verdict. The Heine couplet is strong in feeling, but as a piece of pure poetic sound—and it is as such that Arnold cites it—it cannot get over the horrible cacophony of its elements, which are an aggravated string of sibilants and gutturals. The Alexandrine couplet which Arnold quotes on the other hand, though not specially remarkable, has real music. But to the average English reader (Arnold included) the rhythm of the former affords the pleasure which comes from recognising something quite familiar beneath a curious (but not baffling) disguise. Whereas the rhythm of the French Alexandrine is something which he does not know and could not arrive at by guessing. Even the cosmopolitan Byron evidently did not know it. He called it "monotony in wire"; which is just what it is as read and heard by an Englishman, but not at all what it is as a Frenchman reads it and hears it.

The other bar to our appreciating French verse is one of language; and this is peculiar to us—the Germans do not share it. French is for an Englishman the easiest foreign language to translate somehow and the hardest to translate rightly. It is because half the words in English are of French origin, but these words practically never mean in English just what they mean in French. "Son coeur enflammé" does not mean "her inflamed heart"; it means "her heart on fire." "Des transports ardents" do not mean "ardent transports." It is not often that "audacieux" can be rightly rendered by "audacious," or "farouche" by "ferocious," or even "rage" by "rage." When the English reader, who forgets that, or has never been told it, turns to Racine or Corneille, he obtains a quite false impression of tinsel and bombast; the ardent transports and inflamed hearts are altogether too much for him; he gets tired of hearing bold men called audacious, and so forth. He translates Racine's French words not by their English equivalents, but by their English derivatives, and consequently comes to think Racine's style just as stilted and insincere and unpoetic as would be the style of an English poet who used no English words except those derived from French. The impression is so unjust and the reason for it so obvious, that one can only marvel at its quasi-universality among English readers to-day.

That excellent Anglo-French poetess, Madame Duclaux (Mary F. Robinson), in a recent book on French literature has put Racine to the single-line test beloved of Matthew Arnold. The lines which she compares with "Absent thee from felicity awhile," and the rest of the Arnold touchstones are not ill-chosen. She quotes the yearning cry of Antiochus in "Bérénice":—

"Dans l'Orient désert quel devint mon ennui!"

and Hippolyte's noble protest:—

"Le jour n'est pas plus pur que le fond de mon cœur."

It has been interesting to notice the English reviewer's absolute bewilderment at these instances. While he mentally translates "l'Orient désert" "the desert Orient," and renders "ennui" by "ennui" (i.e., mere "boredom"), it is certainly not easy for him to feel the poetry of the first. The second depends partly on the force of the French word "jour," which combines the ideas of light and life and the well-springs of both, in a way for which there is no English equivalent.

The gulf is alas, then, very wide and very much to be deplored; yet not unbridgeable. A less slovenly and more literary teaching of French in schools would go far to bridge it. Meanwhile everyone has more or less to construct his own bridge. The only fatal obstacle is a conscious or unconscious acquiescence in the notion—to which the old Adam in us all clings so persistently—that it is better to ignore and belittle foreign achievement than to understand and to profit by it.

"TOADSTOOLS."

THE warm, clinging nights that brought the mushroom into being are for the most part done with. Or they have retreated to the woods where they bring up all manner of poisonous and suspect beauty known by the comprehensive name of toadstools. Every day presents us with some new decoration of decayed stump, tall dead tree, or seemingly bare bank where leaves are rotting under the soil. You cannot walk far without being attracted by some russula under foot in the open alleyways of the wood, for the hues of the russula are almost as the flowers of the field, ranging from nearly the blue of chicory to the gloomy maroon of dusky crane's-bill.

On our heathery common where the birch trees grow, the most brilliant of all our fungi scatter themselves like ripe red tomatoes, each strewn with white spots that serve to enhance the brilliance of the scarlet. Nobody is likely to mistake the fly agaric for one of the many edible species that are to be found among the mob of toadstools. Even the slugs that batten on the russulas that no human being may eat, give these a wide berth. But if you split them you will find now and then the galleries of some fly in the grub stage, surely a very special fly to forage in so poisonous a mess. The association between the fly agaric and the birch tree is very marked. We scarcely ever see it ten yards from a growing birch, and have usually found some stump or trace of the tree whenever the fungus has apparently sprung up outside birchland. It is not, as most people imagine, a parasite or a battener on the decay of the tree, but a partner, very much as the nitrifying nodule is a partner to the great leguminous class that it almost exclusively serves. At any rate, we make bold to think so, and long ago shook out some of the spores under the birch on the lawn, and have added to the glory of the pale golden leaves the fiery glow of what the gardener calls "them nasty cankers."

"Mushroom" has become the last word of reproach for the rapidity with which it springs up, apparently out of nothing. It is because no one sees the long preparation by which the miracle is preceded. The flowering of a fungus is a complete triumph of organisation. For months the thin mycelium-threads spread through the country which is their source of supply, often a country full of chasms, fissures, faults, which must be bridged again and again by these airy message-lines. A pheasant's footstep is a catastrophe breaking many bridges, but they are silently and swiftly renewed and all the communications made once more intact. The invisible army of occupation goes on extending week by week, and still nothing else happens. Then, as though at a word of command, concentration becomes the order of the day. Supplies pour at breakneck speed along those countless roads. They meet at the arranged point which yesterday no one could have foretold. Their infinities of little pile up into an infinitely great, a dome like that of St. Paul's, but reared on a single central column. On the under side it is fretted with deep grooves with walls as slender as a barb from a bird's feather, and deep in the grooves are placed millions on millions of highly elaborated bodies, the germs of future fungi. It is the miracle of Aladdin's palace, performed by the million every brooding autumn night.

We have not the hardihood to dine on fungus except when we can get a basket of the one pink-gilled, easily skinned species which, under the name of mushroom, we lift from its fungus class into a position of special honor. Yet in fact there are tons of food just as good as the mushroom among these other fairy palaces. In the dank grass where the mushrooms grew are umbrella-like champignons which we could surely pick without an atom of doubt. Among the bracken gleam greenish yellow caps which, being turned over, reveal a pin-holed sponge instead of the usual gills. Drop it quickly. A thing so remote from Agaricus campestris as this must be not merely poisonous to the palate but even dangerous to the touch. Not so. This half-pound boletus would make for us, if only we had the courage to cook and eat it, a dish superior to mushroom. They eat it in countries where they deem the mushroom poisonous, and the Italians exiled to this land of fogs carry away the dainty by the handkerchief-full. But be it known that there are five or six boleti and only two of them edible, the others being compounded of baleful fire and stomachic torment. A safer experiment in mycophagy is to climb an oak and fetch down thence a fungus that looks like a pound or two of beef steak, for it is indeed the beef-steak fungus that juts out there like a rolled ox tongue—a link between vegetarianism and a carnivorous diet. Indeed, vegetable graves most beefy in flavor are sometimes of fungoid origin. Again, those pearl-grey half-moons jutting out in a big cluster from a decaying stump are oyster mushrooms—if only we could be perfectly certain of them—and one of the most delectable of all mushroom dishes.

A beech tree that has been dead some years, and still stretches its branches but not its twigs far up towards the still sky, is begemmed from top to bottom with shiny, slimy, white fungi, with here and there a blue-grey boss as a link between them and the dead grey bark. A hornbeam has been rent as though with an explosion where the mycelium insisted on coming through, and it has built there a pile of blossom that looks like a dish of nearly two dozen very large and very appetising penny buns. The golden-brown caps are glazed in the pastry-cook's best manner with sticky sugar through which you seem to see the gleam of saffron and other tasty contents. A water-dripping bank that seemed to be covered with huge dead leaves turns out to be covered with sad-brown fungi, the edges of the caps turned upward, twisted and curled like the wasted leaves of butter-bur or colt's-foot. But look into the hollow branch where once a little owl nested. While a red fungus unfolded its button there, a spider spun her web across, and now the button has become a full-grown umbrella, and has scattered the whole grotto with brilliant spores the color of fresh chloride of gold. The gossamer has become gold-spangled muslin; the sides of the cavern glow like fire; it is almost impossible not to talk nonsense about some fairy queen inhabiting there.

To what end all this magnificence? It is one of the unanswerable questions. It does not appeal to the aesthetic sense of any useful insect. When a fly is wanted to carry the spores about, the stink-horn knows well enough how to get scores of them, that is by a stench of bad eggs and sulphur that fills the wood from one end to the other. But the spores of the stink-horn are borne on the outside of the cap, while the gorgeous russulas and others protect them under the dome. We must fall back on the theory of warning colors, though not with entire confidence. The fly agaric no doubt effectually calls out, "Thou shalt not eat." There is no ambiguity about its red and no doubt about the reality of its ultimatum. On the other hand, the difference between a poisonous and an innocuous boletus is merely the difference between one "Liberty" tint and another. And many of the most gaudy of woodland fungi are not only nibbled by slugs but torn up and devoured by squirrels and mice. The most brilliant of all fungus gems is the peziza that we call "moss-cup," which blossoms on dead black sticks in gloomiest and dankest ditches. It is almost as woody and uneatable as the stick on which it blooms, and even if it had the color and the fragrance of honey, nothing would feel disposed to eat it. The outside is brilliant mauve and the inner concavity the intense carmine of unwinking fire. It is in the cup that the spores are pitted in clusters, but what adventurous insect goes in there when the frost is on the bog where peziza scutellata delights to blossom? And what animal even in the rigor of winter would wish to eat so unlikely a morsel? Surely it is as a pure delight for the eye that this splash of carmine is produced next to the black of rotted oak and the vivid green of mid-winter moss fringed with the feathers of hoar frost.

Communications.

THE NEW CENSORSHIP.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Against a paper of the standing of the "Westminster Gazette" nothing that Mr. George Edwardes can say will have any weight whatever with those who still retain some sense of proportion. Everyone is capable of assessing for himself the comparative values of the "Westminster" in the world of journalism and of Mr. George Edwardes in the world of drama. Nevertheless, I am glad that public attention has been drawn to the issue which has arisen between these oddly matched antagonists. It is an issue which touches the prestige, dignity, and usefulness of the Press very closely, and even the insignificance of one of the parties cannot detract from its gravity. When Mr. Edwardes declares that he considers it "an anomaly to advertise in one column and to be attacked in another," and when he orders the managers of his various theatres "to withdraw my advertisements and to cease my connection" with a journal that has the audacity to pass a mildly adverse judgment on one of his productions, it is perfectly clear that he regards the Press as a branch of the box-office, and that, as a patron of the counting-house, he expects also to influence, if not to dictate, the opinions of the editorial room. All journalists, as it seems to me, are equally concerned in seeing that his expectations are disappointed. Otherwise there is an end of all honesty and independence, not merely in dramatic criticism but in every other branch of the profession. The "contagious character," as Lord Rosebery might call it, of Mr. Edwardes's claim would be very quickly apparent if once it were submitted to. All the other advertisers would demand the privilege for which Mr. Edwardes is contending, and the journal of the near future would be one in which every publisher and theatre proprietor wrote the notices of his own books and plays, every manufacturer puffed his own goods, and so on; until, instead of an organ of opinion, you had nothing but a commercial circular. The forecast sounds fanciful; but nobody who has watched the change in English journalism from individual to corporate proprietorship, and the growing predominance of the dividend point of view which that change has brought with it, will deny that it is impossible. We have, as a matter of fact, in the very recent history of a famous New York paper, a pertinent illustration of what the dictatorship of the advertiser, and especially the dictatorship of the theatrical manager, leads to; and anyone who thinks Vaffaire Edwardes a matter of small moment, either to journalism or to the public, may be invited to ponder over the case of Mr. William Winter and the New York "Tribune."

The New York "Tribune" is one of the oldest and most reputable journals in the United States. A generation ago it was to America what the "Times," also a generation ago, was to England. It shaped and influenced American opinion more decisively than any daily paper, than any half-dozen daily papers, now published in the country. It was the only journal that could at all be held to speak for America. Even to-day, though much of its old authority has left it, it is still an organ of very considerable weight, admirably written, carefully edited, and with a wide range of interests. Its foreign, and especially its London, correspondence is one of its most excellent features. In domestic politics it represents the best conservatism of the nation; it is nearer than any other journal to being the official spokesman of the Republican Party. In international, and particularly in Anglo-American affairs, it has consistently thrown its influence on the side of peace. It discusses serious questions seriously and with knowledge. Against the sensationalism which has swamped too much of American journalism it has always taken a firm and effective stand, upholding the old traditions of sobriety and dignity in the face of a constantly dwindling circulation. I am very far from agreeing with all its opinions, but I found myself when in New York subscribing to it for longer periods, and reading it more frequently, than any other journal. It is a paper, in short, that by its appearance, its tone, its informed moderation in controversy, naturally attracts the exiled Britisher. For more than forty years Mr. William Winter has been its dramatic critic. He is a poet and essayist as well as a critic, a man of letters known and highly honored by all Americans. I think myself that his countrymen have somewhat overrated his abilities, and in reading his criticisms I have often been conscious of what seemed to me grave limitations, angularities, and petulanties in his attitude towards the best work of the modern dramatists. But that is a mere personal opinion. The great majority of Americans look upon him, not only as the doyen, but as the ripest and most scholarly and representative of native critics; and his resignation from the "Tribune" some two months ago, after a connection that had lasted since 1865, was felt as a national loss. When the reason of his resignation became known, it was felt to be a national scandal as well. The correspondence connected with it has been published, and from it I transcribe the salient passages:—

"I resigned from the 'Tribune' staff," wrote Mr. Winter, in a letter to the editor, "because of a perfectly plain, diametrical, irreconcilable opposition of judgment as to editorial policy and duty, in the public interest, relative to theatrical conditions and affairs. Since July, 1865, up to about two years ago, I opposed and denounced in the 'Tribune' every bad, vulgar, indecent play, and every person and every proceeding in the theatrical world injurious (in my opinion) to the public welfare. In doing so I not only did not incur censure from the editor, but I was often encouraged and sustained in that obviously right course. About two years ago there came a change. Many articles of mine, dealing with manifest abuses in the theatre, have been within that time rejected altogether. Many others (some of the same kind, some containing critical condemnation of plays) have been cut or modified in important passages. In protesting against that injustice I wrote to your managing editor, Mr. Brown, January 17th, 1909: ' . . . My articles, relative to indecent, and therefore reprehensible, plays, have been, and are, framed for the purpose of doing as much injury to the business of the persons exploiting them as is possible; of informing respectable persons of what is going on in the theatre, and of keeping as many readers as possible away from obnoxious and injurious plays.'"

The difficulties of an editor in dealing with a well-known and, possibly, exacting contributor are by no means among the least of human trials. But the editor's reply to

Mr. Winter shows that the difference between them did not concern their personal relations, but was based, as Mr. Winter declared, on "a perfectly plain, diametrical, irreconcilable, opposition of judgment as to editorial policy and duty." The editor wrote to Mr. Winter:—

"Your policy of placing, on the Sunday theatrical page, beside our theatrical advertising (my italics) matter 'framed for the purpose of doing as much injury as possible to the business' of some of our advertisers . . . may or may not be the right tone, and the publication of such articles may or may not be the duty of the journalist to society. I do not attempt to decide the question. All I say is that my instructions with regard to that page are that the articles are not to be framed with any such purpose, and the excisions which I made were in strict and necessary accordance with those instructions."

In another letter to Mr. Winter, the editor of the "Tribune" said:—"It is my opinion that the theatrical news published on Sunday should not be condemnatory. . . . That a play is well attended, that there has, or has not, been a change in the cast, &c., &c.—these are facts which can be properly stated, whether the play is good or bad."

There, sir, you reach the culmination of the Edwardes policy. It begins by the withdrawal of advertisements from any newspaper that publishes a hostile criticism. It continues until it compels even a famous and reputable journal like the New York "Tribune" to get rid of a distinguished critic, whose ineradicable vice it is that he will insist on telling the truth and serving the public in honesty and good faith. That is why the "Westminster Gazette" deserves the thanks, not only of all journalists, but of all playgoers and of the public at large, for so steadfastly exposing and resisting a manœuvre which can only end, unless crushed at the outset, in the degradation of two great professions—of journalism, by robbing it of its sincerity; of the drama, by depriving it of informed and candid criticism.—Yours, &c.,

SYDNEY BROOKS.

80, Addison Road, W.
October 21st, 1909.

THE ULTRAMONTANISM OF LORD HUGH CECIL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Welsh Church question has done a great deal to bring out a new school of Anglicanism. In fighting Welsh nationalism the Church of England has placed itself in a difficulty similar to that which confronts the Radical politician who opposes Woman's Suffrage. So far as the Anglican claims against Rome can be upheld, they must be supported from any but a purely Protestant standpoint, by an appeal to the principle of nationalism. And this very principle of nationalism hopelessly condemns the existing Welsh establishment. The late Mr. T. E. Ellis once put the Welsh case in a nutshell, when he asked if Wales has not the same right to repudiate Canterbury as Canterbury herself had to repudiate Rome. The historical and canonical arguments on which in Church defence meetings and Church Congresses Anglican dignitaries attempt to prove that the Welsh Church has of its own free will become part and portion of the province of Canterbury are as flimsy in the eyes of the historian as they are irrelevant in the judgment of the politician. It is a fact, no doubt, that the old Cymric Church in Wales and the Marches, which originally defied Augustine at the Herefordshire oak tree, in the course of the centuries accepted the discipline and ritual of the Latin Church, and entered into friendly relations with the Church of Canterbury. But when, after the Norman conquest, the Archbishop of Canterbury endeavored to make his jurisdiction effective, national feeling arose in revolt. It is far from being a fact, as the audience at the Swansea Church Congress may have imagined, that when Archbishop Baldwin, with Norman spears behind him, celebrated High Mass at the altar of St. David's Cathedral, the struggle was over. It was only a few years after Baldwin's visit that the chapter of St. David's elected Gerald de Barry, the very man who had been Archbishop Baldwin's guide, to the throne of St. David and sent him to Rome to ask for the pall, as the emblem of Welsh ecclesiastical independence. And every Welsh Prince stood by Gerald in the mighty, if hopeless, war that he waged in the curia for the "honor of Wales," for it was not by the decree of the Apostolic See, but by armed violence that the Ecclesia Walensica (so ran the Princes' petition) had been subjected to the power of England and Canterbury. Nor was the voice of Welsh freedom hushed when, nigh a century later, Archbishop Peckham, flushed with the final victory of the Norman Crown and the Norman Church over the last of the Llewelyns, came to set up his cross in the valley sanctuary of Menevia. He was greeted by the Bishop with the protest, "We receive you as Primate, but not as Metropolitan."

And once again, when, in the fifteenth century, the Wales of the old Princes and the Wales of the Marches rose to make Wales an independent State under the Red Dragon and Owen Glyndwr, the first demand of the patriot leader was for a national Church and an Archbishopric of St. David's for Wales. It is a strange reflection on the modern Anglican theory of the canonical identity of the Welsh and English Churches, that two of the Welsh bishops and the mass of the Welsh clergy, as well as the Franciscan friars, stood by Glyndwr in his fight against England and Canterbury. Rowland Williams, of "Essays and Reviews" fame, was not a High Churchman, yet his almost forgotten drama of "Owen Glyndwr" drew an over-true picture of the Wales that seethed under the oppression of foreign Lord Marcher and alien bishop, which is not undeserving of the attention of those ecclesiastical dignitaries who preach from Congress platforms that Welsh nationalism was never an ecclesiastical force since the day that Archbishop Baldwin carried his cross into the shrine of Dewi.

It is true that, after Bosworth, Wales acquiesced for a time contentedly in English rule, and that Elizabeth and Cecil, who understood something of Welsh nationalism, gave her the Bible and Prayer Book in Welsh. But with the accession of the House of Hanover, the old evil of an episcopate alien in race and language from Wales revived. From the days of Walpole to those of Gladstone, no Welshman sat on a Welsh episcopal throne, and the result of the alien rule appeared in the religious revolution that swept Wales into Nonconformity. Whether it be regarded in the light of past history, or of the practical needs of to-day, the incorporation of the Welsh Church in the Province of Canterbury is alike inexpedient and indefensible. From a strictly Church point of view, a Welsh episcopalian Church, free from State control and united to the Anglican communion by the same loose ties that bind the Colonial Churches, would make a tenfold stronger appeal to the Welsh people than does the present establishment. The practical advantages that would ensue from a reconstruction of the Welsh Church on nationalist lines, with an Archbishopric at St. David's, and Welsh services in the Cathedrals, would be bought cheaply by a sacrifice of a part of the ancient endowments. Sagacity has seldom, however, been the distinguishing feature of the Anglican episcopate, and it is easy to understand why it hesitates to take a course that would involve an immediate loss.

It is harder to explain at first sight Lord Hugh Cecil's position and his contemptuous tone at the Swansea Congress to all ideas of a compromise with Welsh nationality. For he does not speak in ignorance. He has sat on the Welsh Church Commission, and has heard the case for Wales put forward from the lips of her ablest Nonconformists. He must have known that his words at Swansea would carry pain to the Welsh clerics, who, apart from the establishment question, are good nationalists. Yet he spoke them all the same. Nationality as a force in religious matters he sternly refuses to recognise, either for England or Wales. Between Church and State there may be a concordat, but not between Church and nation, and he cynically explained that, in practice, the establishment system does not work badly in England, for when Churchmen are united they can make Parliament do what they wish.

One could easily criticise this cynical view, but it is more important to realise that its chief champion is, for good or evil, fast becoming practically the dictator of the Church of England. Lord Hugh is, as the Bishops well know, the only man of first rank in the country who has alike the will and the power to interest the public in ecclesiastical questions, and they must follow him, because he is their only possible leader.

He has led them on this Welsh Church question to repudiate that very principle of nationalism in religion on which Anglicanism itself rests, and one asks, in surprise, how much further he may lead them. Those who know most of his views believe that for the ideas of the nationalist Liberal and the Jingo Tory he has little but contempt. His support of Free Trade indicated a tendency to cosmopolitanism, and some of those who know him think that his sympathies are with the medieval idea of one western empire and one western Church. His emphatic repudiation of ecclesiastical nationalism, Celtic and Anglican alike, at Swansea, is a proof that, probably without realising it, he is drawing nigh to the Ultramontane position. Indeed, he is, philosophically, probably far nearer to the Church of Rome than Lord Halifax ever could be. That interesting and pious nobleman has for a long time dreamed of a kind of Anglican and Roman reunion, in which the Church of England, while incorporated in the Latin Communion, should enjoy an extensive autonomy. The dream, redolent of the studies of past ages, has never seriously affected Englishmen, nor has it much appealed to Roman Catholics themselves. It is in truth an anachronism. But it has been the dream of a distinctly nationalist Englishman, perhaps a medievalist, but in no sense an Ultramontane. Lord Hugh may not be in the technical sense a ritualist, but he shares to the full Lord Halifax's belief in sacerdotalism, and adds to it, as his Swansea speech showed, that contempt for nationalism as a religious force which is typical of the modern Curia. Moreover, on the questions of Socialism and the education of the poor, Lord Hugh and the Vatican see eye to eye. If English religious ideas continued to run on the lines of the past, the ecclesiastical idiosyncracies of Lord Hugh might no more seriously affect the development of English politics than did those of Gladstone. There are, however, many tendencies in the current of opinion of to-day that might harmonise with an Ultramontane policy. A French journalist recently remarked that the old English hatred of Rome has given way to the new hatred of Germany. At the same time a common dread of Socialism is tending to unite reactionaries all over the world. The "Libre Parole" and the "Daily Telegraph" have united to curse the Budget, and English Tories in the main are at one with the Spanish clericals in an approval of Ferrer's death. The anti-Papal shouts of Sunday were raised by the Socialists; the bourgeois journals, that once championed the Church Association, are to-day the apologists of Spanish clericalism.

If the struggle between Socialism and the classes becomes acute throughout Europe, and the Roman See, as Mr. Belloc has prophesied, proves itself Socialism's most implacable opponent, the feelings of the English classes will naturally tend to an entente cordiale with their ancient enemy, the Pope. A reaction inspired by Lord Hugh Cecil will require an intellectual background, and it must of necessity seek a better philosophical support in its war against Socialism than it can draw from the arid common-places of the "Spectator" or the cheap jingoism of Mr. Garvin. So the statesman who has already turned his back on ecclesiastical nationalism may yet live to lead his country into an alliance with the clerical reaction of the Continent. The first Cecil was a Welsh nationalist, for he gave Wales the Welsh Bible and Prayer Book. His descendant has already repudiated his Welsh policy. Will he upset likewise that ancestor's greater work—the laws and policy of the Elizabethan Reformation?—Yours, &c.,

A NATIONALIST CHURCHMAN.

October 19th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE LATE MR. HOFMEYR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On returning to town after a belated summer holiday, I am deeply shocked and grieved to hear of the death of my old friend of over thirty years' standing, Mr. J. H. Hofmeyr—the honored chief of the Afrikaner Bond! This is a national calamity for South Africa.

Mr Hofmeyr, with his gentle wife and niece, took tea with us just before they left for the Continent, and we arranged to meet on their return. I never saw him in better form; and he regaled us with a racy account of their recent entertainment by the King and Queen, and witty descriptions of men and functions; of his visit to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain; speaking most appreciatively of all the attentions and kindnesses shown to the South African delegates by the members of the Government and others.

On being pressed by some of us to stand for election to the Union Parliament, the great man characteristically objected, pleading his age and infirmities. "Besides," he added, "I am already politically dead, and I can prove it: they've put my bust in the vestibule of the House of Assembly at Cape Town. There it is; so that old fellow's shelved," he added, with the humorous twinkle in his eye which his friends were accustomed to look for. And he went on to say: "They've placed my bust just where I like it best, next to that of Mr. Saul Solomon. Didn't I sit beside him in the House itself for many and many a year?"

There was a touch of pathos in his tone; and when it was suggested that there must have been points of difference between himself and his old friend, he exclaimed, warmly: "A few perhaps, but I am proud to think of the many big questions on which we were agreed."

Then he launched forth on "the good old times," and spoke earnestly and hopefully of the South African Union. "Although," he forcibly exclaimed, "I don't believe in all this Lion lying down with the Lamb business! We shall all be fighting away on the old sides as we used to do. Don't imagine, as I've said before, that it's going to be a mutual admiration society—this Union Parliament! You won't see the leopard changing her spots, and so forth. But"—and he said this gravely—"I expect the Union to do great things, and to carve out the future destinies of a grand nation."

Little did we think, as the dear man stood up to give that cordial shake of the hand, so significant of his kindly heart and genial nature, that we were to hear his Afrikaner farewell for the last time on earth—"Tod wiedersens!"—Till we meet again!—Yours, &c.,

GEORGINA M. SOLOMON.

6, Belsize Avenue,
Hampstead, N.W.

October 18th, 1909.

THE GROUNDS OF ANGLO-GERMAN PEACE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on "The Grounds of Anglo-German Peace" will commend itself to many who have anxieties about that peace, by the soundness of its thought and the rightness of its tone. May one whose anxiety is not yet removed note briefly where it is that you leave him unsatisfied?

No better advice could be given to our people than your counsel not to talk about "inevitableness." Let us allow no one to say war with Germany is inevitable. But one main means of avoidance will be a clear recognition of a thing which is inevitable—a contest, from which we hope to exclude arms, between their national ambition and our own. They want not only to grow richer by commerce, but to have a greater place in the world than now, and we are in the way of this. Such contests lead to quarrels, which lead to war, that ultima ratio of national will: but though they lead to war, they will never get there, if war can be made to seem too costly. This is one way of denying the "inevitable"—to arm till war is too costly. How much arming will do this, one must leave to experts.

Many favor, as perhaps do you, as an alternative course, that we should seek peace and ensue it by a better understanding of our neighbor's position and intentions. I would not call the two courses alternative, but complementary. But I cannot be satisfied with your understanding of German intentions. It is thirty-nine years since I heard der Krieg ist erklärt shouted by men and sobbed over by women in a German street. It was in a deep sympathy that my own observation of German facts began: but that sympathy has not enabled me to read in a sense happy for England the course of that observation. The sinister revealings of the attitude of statesmen there towards international fact, in '70, '71, '75, and later dates less convenient to specify, the writings of their historians which suggest a relation of inspired or else inspirer between them and the statesmen, the scarce mistakable propagation among the masses of a sentiment which is the known correlative of warlike design in the leaders, and whether, with or without propaganda, the steady growth since '71 of a suspicious and hostile temper in almost the whole of German society, these things (which I particularise with some restraint of language) make me unable to think that this "inevitable" can be abolished by amending only our own understanding and spirit, or by accepting that moderate estimate of our neighbor's purposes which is Professor Delbrück's. It can be abolished, and you are to be thanked for wise words which make for that abolition. They will be wiser and stronger yet if they can find room for these considerations of some quite unscared persons, whose doubts you have not set at rest.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN H. SKRINE.

October 20th, 1909.

[We quite agree with our correspondent that the abolition of the Anglo-German difficulties cannot be left with complete assurance in the hands of the statesmen on either side. An energetic and continuous intervention of men of good-will on both sides will also be necessary. See Professor Harnack's very interesting article in the "Hibbert Journal."—ED., NATION.]

THE BUDGET AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—No man or woman, alive to the trend of events, can doubt that Liberalism is rapidly approaching that supreme conflict, on the decision of which its continuance as a political force in the life of England will depend. The tardy removal of obstacles accomplished in the past generations has opened up the road across which the entrenched army of monopoly and privilege is preparing for the last stand against the people. The failure of Liberalism at this juncture will mean its disappearance as a political factor, the temporary sway of what Burke called an "austere and insolent domination," followed by the irresistible advance of a Labor Party against which nothing will stand.

Those of us who believe that the mission of Liberalism, far from being accomplished, is only just coming to fruition, realise that the coming struggle with the Lords (quite apart from the rejection or acceptance of the Budget) will call forth the energies of every man and woman of any party who understands that feudalism has to be finally dislodged. Ten Budgets like the present, leaving the Lords' veto intact, will not avail to put things right. Across every movement for good government lies stretched the shadow of the Lords, and until it is removed the weary round will continue to be tramped. Unless Liberalism tackles this situation manfully the task must be left to some other political group with courage more equal to its opportunities. What then, in this supreme conflict, is to be the attitude of the official Liberal women? Now that the great battle is to be joined, surely the women who have helped to clear the ground are not going to stand aside from the conflict?

I ask this because the Countess of Carlisle has just informed me that the Women's Liberal Federation, by a policy framed in 1902, is refusing to help in any constituency where the Liberal member or candidate is not prepared to support the immediate suffrage demand. Can any clear-minded man or woman doubt that the suffrage will not be an issue at the next election? What cause, however great, could displace in the public mind the stupendous issue of the Budget and the Constitution? To suggest that women's suffrage can be expected to turn men's thoughts away from a constitutional crisis of the first magnitude is to argue one's self a perfervid enthusiast who has lost the power of consecutive thinking. What, then, in these circumstances are we to say of this policy of abstention laid down in an old resolution by the Women's Liberal Federation? Are Liberal women going to be tied by a resolution of 1902 in face of the greatest conflict of our time? Incredible as the supposition is, the result will not be the weakening of Liberalism, but the collapse of the Women's Liberal Federation. No association of women, however earnest, who could be so blinded by prejudice as to stand idly by in such a conflict as the one we are nearing, would have any prospect of surviving as a political force.—Yours, &c.,

HOLFORD KNIGHT.

Reform Club, Pall Mall, S.W.
October 21st, 1909.

AGRARIAN POLICY IN HUNGARY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One of your recent issues, in dealing with the matter of the Hungarian Coalition, foreshadows its break-up and seizes the opportunity to attack its political aims. It levels accusations which ought not to be allowed to pass without refutation. In the hope that you are not impervious to the truth, I beg to call your attention to another side of the picture.

According to the article referred to, "the Coalition Government spent most of its time warring upon the non-Magyar nationalities, tightening the yoke upon agricultural laborers, &c."

I can scarcely mistake if I accept these references as pointing to the law passed in 1907, relating to the adjustment of the juridical relations between farmer and servant.

As the member in charge of the Bill, in the course of its passage through the Lower House, and as the Director of the Hungarian Farmers' League, I am, of course, interested in the question as to how far the laws of various countries protect agricultural laborers and domestics as against the employer. These investigations tend to show that no single country has interfered so minutely nor so sympathetically with the question as has Hungary, as evidenced by her law.

Development in most countries has been very one-sided, and I regret to say that Great Britain, admired as it is by myself, forms no exception. Your country interests itself very specially and with admirable foresight in the condition of industrial laborers, but neglects almost wholly the interests of agricultural laborers and domestics. This result cannot be attributed to the fact that the numbers of industrial laborers tend to increase nor to the parallel facts that, as is well known to you, the villages are becoming depopulated and the arable land, which has hitherto responded to the demands made upon it, now remains uncultivated.

If, sir, it is your opinion that I have not correctly gauged the situation, would you be so kind as to explain more circumstantially the grounds upon which your accusations are founded? I am willing at any time—and ready—to refute them, nor am I in the least inclined to doubt upon which side victory will at length rest.—Yours, &c.,

ST. BERNOTT,

M.P., Director of the Hungarian Farmers' League.
Budapest, October 18th, 1909.

THE ANTI-BUDGET PETITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of October 16th you state that the bankers' petition against the Budget has missed fire. I believe that Lord Claud Hamilton is the chairman of the Great Eastern Railway Co., and therefore was not surprised to find a petition against the Budget in the Great Eastern Hotel, Liverpool Street.

It is possible that amongst the numerous shareholders of the Great Eastern Co. there may be some Liberals, and even Conservatives, who are in favor of the Budget. It is also likely that amongst the people who make use of the hotel there may be some who favor Lloyd George's scheme.

The chairman of the company does not usually take a broad view of such matters. It seems to me a particularly silly blunder, when all shades of opinion are connected with such a company, for the chairman or any other high official to take sides in a controversy.—Yours, &c.,

BUDGET.

October 19th, 1909.

THE TACTICS WITH THE LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an ardent Liberal worker in South Dorset and an eager reader of your excellent paper, may I say a word as to what many of us down here are thinking about the vital struggle of the nation in connection with the Budget and the veto of the House of Lords? In an article in your last issue you say: "If the Budget is thrown out, the appeal to the people follows, not only on finance, but on all that the Lords have done or can do to mutilate and destroy democratic legislation." But if the Government were to take this course they would admit a right on the part of the Lords to force a dissolution, a right which is strenuously denied by the Liberal Party and by the experience of nearly three centuries. You condemn the suggestion that the Premier should obtain the King's consent to the creation of Peers for the purpose of carrying the Budget, and urge that it should only be adopted when the Bill for the abolition of their veto has been sent to them. I think the primary object of the Liberal Party should be to get this great democratic Budget passed by the most expeditious constitutional method available. There is the precedent of the great Reform Bill of 1832, when the bare intimation of King William IV. that he would create a number of Liberal Peers was sufficient to induce the Lords to pass the Bill. Such an intimation on the part of King Edward would probably have a like effect, and the Budget would at once become law. What an immense gain this would be! The Government would then be free to prepare for the final struggle with the Peers, as they could not, without great injury to themselves and the Liberal cause, continue much longer to "plough the sands" by sending up Bills only to get them rejected or mutilated. For this preparation why should not the Government hold office until next spring or summer, and bring in another Budget developing the present one, besides dealing with such great measures as National Insurance, Welsh Disestablishment, &c.? This course would enable Free Traders to complete the work of exposing the fallacies, inanities, and falsehoods of the "Tariff Reformers," which have misled many electors in this district; and if the Peers dared to interfere with next year's Budget, the battle for the abolition of their veto—accompanied possibly by a sweeping reform of their House—must speedily follow.

The public enthusiasm for the Budget is certainly very remarkable, and should be utilised to the utmost. But the strength of all the progressive parties should also be concentrated for the attack upon the Lords and for jealously guarding the precious citadel of Free Trade. The suggestion of an able writer that if the Lords reject or amend the Budget, Mr. Asquith and his Government should resign and make way for the King to send for Mr. Balfour is, to my mind, almost unthinkable. The fate of the Liberal and Democratic Party at this great crisis depends largely upon the tactics, as well as the political capacity, of the Government, and it would be a national calamity if through any mistake on the part of the Prime Minister the magnificent reforming majority returned at the last General Election were to be dissipated, at least until it had carried out many of the most beneficent measures of the Ministerial programme. I, for one, have full confidence that Mr. Asquith and his brilliant Cabinet will do what is wisest and best, both for the Liberal Party and the country.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED DENNIS.

Southcliff, Weymouth,
October 21st, 1909.

THE DEATH OF FERRER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—During the last twenty years or so we have been the horrified spectators of three tragedies—we have witnessed the torture or murder of three victims of Clericalism—Rizal, Dreyfus, and Ferrer. The crimes associated with these names will assuredly not be forgotten. The very names themselves, like those of Giordano Bruno and Jean Calas, will be fresh counts in the long indictment of Humanity against the Church.

I write as, in some sort, a Clerical. I believe that Humanity cannot do without the Church, that she can give men more and do more for them than anything that can be taught in the rationalistic schools for which Ferrer has paid with his life. I believe that in a completely Catholic atmosphere the mass of the people are happy—they are contented, cheerful, courteous, they bless the Will of God. The teaching of Anarchy and Rationalism robs them of all this. Personally, I care little for the priests, much for the people. The faith of little children for the masses is perhaps gone; the faith of grown men—one hesitates to say anything which sounds so unchristian—might possibly be better. But if any reconciliation of the seemingly opposed, but equally real, needs of mankind is to be made, or if the future of the race is not to be violently severed from its past, the Church should make some adequate act of contrition, confession, and satisfaction, for the long series of the crimes of her priests, of which the shooting of Ferrer at Montjuich is the latest.—Yours, &c.,

R. L. GALES.

Gedney, Holbeach,
October 15th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The question, "How About England?" asked by the "Vossische Zeitung" in connection with the murder of Ferrer, is a disconcerting one.

There are things one would willingly forget, but which can become not wholly dark only by being remembered. Such are, I think, the following facts:—

In the bulletins of the evening papers of October 13th (including the "Westminster") Ferrer's death had to give way before the more interesting item of a divorce case.

The official Church of England, to which I understand all we belong who belong to no other, has achieved the perfect dignity which is the crown of well-bred acquiescence.

Finally the "Times," in its leader on October 14th, points out that while nothing was proved against Ferrer, and even the so-called evidence did not go to establish the charge on which he was condemned, yet since those on the spot know best, and there is, after all, no particular reason why he should not have been guilty, to protest or demonstrate is most unseemly. Nay; excitement on such a point were un-English. Can it be that the "Times" is right?—Yours, &c.,

C. S.

Richmond, October 19th, 1909.

"GOVERNMENT BY BUREAUCRACY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It would be a kindness if Mr. Belfort Bax would develop one or two points in his communication. I share the sancta simplicitas which regards the Civil Service as about the best of our institutions. There are two points in which I seek enlightenment. First, what system would Mr. Bax substitute for the present? A system which made administrative officials change with each change in the Government would, no doubt, be more democratic, but is it really more desirable? Does Mr. Bax wish to set up the American "spoils" system in the name of democracy? Second, can Mr. Bax point to any important instances in which Bills have been watered down or nullified in the drafting, or practically repealed by ineffective administration? It is strange that, so far as I am aware, no responsible Minister has complained of the way in which the permanent staff constantly thwarts his best intentions! No doubt, Mr. Bax will say, that all our Ministers are debauched by the permanent staff. That Cabinet Ministers are largely influenced by the heads of their departments is undeniable. To base on this fact the charge that the Government is controlled, or ever paralysed, by the Civil Service is a little silly. Does Mr. Bax, or any one else, really believe that the Civil Service prevents any Government carrying its main policy into effect? As it stands, Mr. Bax's letter rests on nothing but the widely known fact that an administrative body is, and must be, influential. That this influence is detrimental and obstructive Mr. Bax surmises, and does not attempt to prove. Perhaps so few people realise that our administrative "bureaucracy is incompatible with democratic progress," because it is not true.—Yours, &c.

H. G. WOOD.

Jesus College, Cambridge,
October 16th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Perhaps you will allow me to supplement Mr. Belfort Bax's letter on the subject of the growth of the power of the bureaucracy by giving a recent and very remarkable instance? Early in 1908 there was tried a case, "Wilford and others v. West Riding County Council," concerning a school at Garforth. The contention of the defendants was that the matter in dispute was entirely excluded from the jurisdiction of the High Court, and was wholly dependent on the Board of Education. The trial lasted several days. In giving judgment for the defendants, on February 4th, 1908, Mr. Justice Channell made the following remarks: "One thing certainly neither the local authority nor the Board of Education can do, and that is to say that, because they do not like the law as it stands, they will give directions which will frustrate its objects. They do frustrate its objects if they destroy this school as it has existed. . . . I further think that the directions given to the defendants were ultra vires, that there was no jurisdiction in the Board of Education to decide that they were intra vires, and any decision purporting to do so was ultra vires of the Board. To decide that the law is not what it was declared to be by the House of Lords is, in my opinion, ultra vires. . . . In truth and substance the course taken in the present case seems to me to be simply an attempt to get out of the decision of the House of Lords that voluntary schools must be taken as they are."

Seldom has a public department received such a severe castigation at the hands of a judge. But the Board of Education did not lay the rebuke to heart. It renewed its attempts to set itself above the law. On November 20th, 1908, the fourth Education Bill was introduced into the House of Commons. Section 11, sub-clause (5) ran as follows:—

"Every decision of the Board of Education purporting to be given on any matter which is to be determined, fixed, or computed by them, or on which they have to be satisfied under this Act, shall be final, and shall not be liable to be called into question in any court of law or otherwise."

The Bill was withdrawn, and with it came to nought this attempt of the Education Board to set itself above the law—or, to speak more exactly, to place itself under the protection of a new law, the object of which was to abolish the right of citizens to refer to the courts for the decision of questions at issue between them and the Board. The alarming thing is that the Bill, presented by Mr. Runciman, was supported by the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Attorney-General, and Mr. Trevelyan. It is, I think, fairly open to doubt whether twenty years ago any department would have ventured to ask a Minister to sanction such a provision. If asked, no Minister would have ventured to come to Parliament with such a demand. Finally, if we can imagine such a proposal made to Parliament, there would have been a storm to be quieted only by the throwing over of a Jonah. Of course, if the attempt had succeeded, other departments would speedily have claimed to be on the same footing as the Education Board, so that in a few years we should have been entirely deprived of the protection of the law against arbitrary rule by the several departments of the Government.

The maxim that the King can do no wrong is admissible where the King is a constitutional monarch acting solely on the advice of his Ministers who are accountable to a Parliament which can turn them out of office and impeach them for wrong-doing. The grotesque application of the doctrine to the Board of Education, and, by implication, to all other Boards, presages a tyranny more grievous than any suffered by men in the past at the hands of king or priest.

The case cited is, perhaps, the most instructive revelation of the new spirit of the bureaucracy, but it does not stand alone.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED MARKS.

155, Adelaide Road, N.W.

October 20th, 1909.

HOW HABEAS CORPUS PASSED THE LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Among the historical precedents lately cited of difficulties between the Houses and means of settling them, I have not seen any mention of the passing of the great Habeas Corpus Act of 1679. May I draw the attention of those interested to the story of that event, as related in Bishop Burnet's "History of His Own Times" (Book III., p. 485, folio ed.)? "It was carried by an odd artifice in the House of Lords. Lord Grey and Lord Norris were named to be the tellers. Lord Norris, being a man subject to vapors, was not at all times attentive to what he was doing, so a very fat lord coming in, Lord Grey counted him for ten, as a jest at first: but seeing Lord Norris had not observed it, he went on with this misreckoning of ten; so it was reported to the House and declared that they who were for the Bill were in the majority, though it, indeed, went on the other side, and by this means the Bill passed."

Could similar tactics be used in the present emergency?—Yours, &c.,

CANTAB.

October 21st, 1909.

THE WORLD WENT VERY WELL THEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is common, and it ought to be commoner, to provide music at political meetings. May I suggest the use of the song, "When Britain Really Ruled the Waves," from "Iolanthe," in Liberal meetings just now? It hits the situation with all Gilbert and Sullivan's felicity, and if it were well sung would certainly bring down the house—and that is just what we want to do! Failing a singer in the flesh, there is an excellent gramophone record to be had, that would serve the purpose on a good instrument (and all but the best should be taboo). The words are such pleasant reading just now that perhaps you will take the risk of breach of copyright by printing them:—

(Solo) "When Britain really ruled the waves
In good Queen Bess's time,
The House of Peers made no pretence
To intellectual eminence
Or scholarship sublime.
Yet Britain won her proudest bays
In good Queen Bess's glorious days.
(Chorus) Yes, Britain won her proudest bays
In good Queen Bess's glorious days.

(Solo) "When Wellington thrashed Bonaparte,
As every child can tell,
The House of Peers throughout the war
Did nothing in particular,
And did it very well.
Yet Britain set the world ablaze
In good King George's glorious days.
(Chor.) Yes, Britain, &c.

(Solo) And while the House of Peers withholds
Its legislative hand,
And noble statesmen do not itch
To interfere with matters which
They do not understand,
As bright will shine Great Britain's rays
As in King George's glorious days.
(Chor.) As bright, &c."

Yours, &c.,

MILITANT.

October 19th, 1909.

LORD CURZON'S ECONOMICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is there, or 'is there not, such a thing as economics? Am I, or am I not, right in thinking that the following sentence, occurring in a paper on elementary political economy, would cause the candidate to be ploughed without more ado?

The sentence is: "And all the while £150,000,000 worth of manufactured goods are pouring into our ports from abroad untaxed . . . to deprive the working men of this country of employment."

I really should like an answer, for I feel dizzy.—Yours, &c.,

TRIPOS.

October 19th, 1909.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE COUNTRY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—From a party point of view, it is easy to share the optimism recently expressed by "A Radical Member," but it is not so certain as he seems to think that, "in the event of amendment or rejection, the course is clear enough."

That such an event would create a constitutional crisis there seems no room to deny. But it would be more disastrous if it were allowed to create a commercial crisis. A constitutional crisis is a question of Government, and the Government in such a case should distinguish itself from the country, which must bear the brunt of any commercial crisis. The result even of an election would be materially modified if the Government permitted the constitutional crisis to cause a commercial crisis.

We contend, by very solid, and so far unanswered, argument, that the Lords have no right to touch the Budget by way of amendment or rejection. If they do so, they will, therefore, have done an illegal act. It would involve no new principle of English law to ignore altogether such an illegality. The Lords, having no choice in the matter, are under the duty of merely registering the decision of the Commons. Are we to understand that if they fail in this duty the Government are to go to the country to ask whether the duty should be enforced? And, if so, how will the result of a General Election, determined, as it must be, on so many issues, make clear the answer to that question? Even assuming that the undeniable popularity of the Budget sends the present Government back to power, what weapon will they then have which they do not already possess for enforcing that duty? The Lords set them at defiance on other subjects when they were newly elected with an overwhelming majority.

The present position seems to me, as a man in the street, one of grave peril from a point of view far more serious than that of the result of an election. Opinions necessarily differ as to the amount of good accomplished by the present Government. But a false step in the case of a crisis, such as would be created by the rejection, or virtual rejection, of the Budget, could do more mischief than all the good accomplished could counterbalance. The very popularity of the Budget enhances this danger. It tends to produce disregard of the paramount importance of retaining in the hands of the Commons absolute control over taxation. Loss of that is loss of all.

If, on rejection of the Budget by the Lords, the Government proceed to a dissolution, so far from asserting the right of the Commons, they simply acknowledge the right of the Lords not merely to dictate the time of dissolution, but also to control taxation. It would mean that the Lords could at any time hereafter, by the simple expedient of rejecting the Budget, dismiss at their own time an unwelcome Government which they thought had lost its popularity. For, without the Budget, Government could not be carried on at all. Rejection of other Bills carries no such consequence.

Worse than that incidental gain to the Lords would be the main fact of their having rejected a Budget with impunity. The financial disaster to the country would be nothing to them. They would be able to pick up cheap bargains in land, mines, and works, and invest their surplus wealth at high rates of interest. The same Government might go back to power, but the mischief would have been done. The financial disaster would, however, go against the Government at the polls. In any event, a substantial right would have been lost; for the Lords could always stake the risk of a new lease of power to their natural opponents against the chance of destroying a disagreeable Budget. They would not be likely to stultify themselves by a formal consent to abandon for the future a right they had just successfully exercised, because the result of that exercise had not fulfilled their hope of throwing the Liberals out.

On the other hand, the Government, on being advised that the consent of the Lords to the Budget is matter of form, not of substance, could proceed to ignore the form and ask the King's assent without that of the Lords. They would thus rivet the right of the Commons, instead of losing it. If the King's assent were refused, their resignation would be the alternative. A new Ministry, if one could be formed, might ask for a dissolution, despairing no doubt of support by the present Parliament, and they would get their answer from the country. But for a Ministry whose Budget has been rejected by the Lords to consent to carry on the Government even for the shortest time, would be to throw away the privilege of the Commons to grant supplies on which the whole consent of Parliament depends. To ask for a dissolution and retain office meantime would be to confirm the Lords in their action of controlling taxation and fixing the time of the dissolution.

Here is the need for courage and determination rather than in deciding to dissolve when there is no compulsion to do so. It may be most desirable to seek confirmation and a fresh mandate when the Budget has been passed, whether with or without the formality of the Lords' assent. Their real assent we know is impossible, and we contend it is immaterial. But, if the form can neither be obtained nor dispensed with, it is infinitely better that government should come to a standstill than that the business of the subjects should do so or the people lose their right to grant or withhold supplies. And if the Ministry in power do anything whatever to facilitate the temporary carrying on of government under the illegal interference of the Lords, they will jeopardise the people's right and the country's trade.—

Yours &c.,
LEX.

Derbyshire.

THE BUDGET AND SNOBBERY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think that there is one possible indirect result of the Budget which is being too much overlooked. There is a great outcry against the meanness of the great people who announce the abandonment of their subscriptions to various philanthropic or otherwise helpful institutions. But would not the more manly and practical course be, first, to acknowledge that the people who have started these societies have attached an undue importance to securing a long list of titled or otherwise socially influential supporters who have no real interest in the movements which those societies represent or capacity for administering them; and, secondly, to resolve that, for the future, a more independent course shall be taken. If hospitals, for example, could be taught to abandon their very vulgar dinners at which it is announced amid loud cheers that my Lord This and Sir John That have given 100 guineas to the funds of the hospital, I think our sick folk might in the end be quite as well cared for. Even scientific and other learned societies are not free from this taint, though they do not confess it often quite as frankly as one secretary of whom I once heard. It was in a country district, where the chief squire, a baronet, had really acquired a considerable knowledge of Eastern languages. Rather late in his life, the secretary of a society for promoting these languages applied to him to become a member. "Oh," pleaded the baronet, "I fear my knowledge of Persian is becoming rather misty, and I should give you little help." "It is not the Persian scholar we need," answered the secretary, "but the baronet."

If Lloyd-George can strike a blow, and neatly, at this sort of thing, he will have continued the work so admirably begun in the eighteenth century by the letter of the great man whose bicentenary we recently celebrated.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead.

Poetry.

DREAD NOUGHT.

DREAD not the power of kings who have kings to brother,
And truly have none other.
Dread not the captains whose far-killing art
Pierces their own hard heart.
Dread not the lords who pay not; they shall pay
Their own heaped dues some day.
Dread not the craft of priests, for priests are fed
Upon man's baser dread.
Dread not for iron or anger or the loud cry
Which is of them that fly.
Dread not though foes thine earthwork's weakness find,
Strong soul entrenched behind!
Dread God: if even Him thou canst not dread,
'Twere well to love instead.

GUY KENDALL.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

- "Last Poems" By George Meredith. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)
 "After Death—What?" By Cesare Lombroso. (Unwin. 10s. net.)
 "Marie Antoinette." By H. Belloc. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
 "Shelley, the Man and the Poet." By A. Clutton-Brock. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters." By F. A. Mumby. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)
 "The Meaning and Value of Life." By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by L. J. Gibson and W. R. B. Gibson. (Black. 3s. 6d. net.)
 "The Life and Times of Bishop Challoner (1691-1781)." By E. H. Burton, D.D. (Longmans. 2 vols. 25s. net.)
 "The Austrian Court in the Nineteenth Century." By the Right Hon. Sir Horace Rumbold. (Methuen. 18s. net.)
 "Irish Ways." By Jane Barlow. Illustrations by Warwick Goble. (Allen. 15s. net.)
 "Memoirs of the Duchesse de Dino (1831-1835)." Edited by the Princess Radziwill. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
 "The Ethic of Jesus." By the Rev. James Stalker. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)
 "Sailors' Knots." By W. W. Jacobs. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)
 "Pages d'Histoire et de Guerre." Par le Marquis Costa de Beauregard. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3 fr. 50.)
 "La Politique Extérieure du Premier Consul." Par E. Driault. (Paris: Alcan. 7 fr.)
 "Le Troisième Rang du Collier (Souvenirs de Ma Vie)." Par Judith Gautier. (Paris: Juven. 3 fr. 50.)
 "La Maison qui dort." Par Camille Lemonnier. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)
 "La Porte étroite." Roman. Par André Gide. (Paris: Mercure de France. 3 fr. 50.)

* * *

THERE is a rumor that the Nobel Prize for literature will be awarded this year to M. Anatole France. Former recipients of the prize were Sully Prudhomme, Theodor Mommsen, Björnsterne Björnson, Frédéricque Mistral, José Echegaray, Henry Sienkiewicz, Giosué Carducci, and—most astounding selection of all—Rudyard Kipling. It is noteworthy that no Russian writer has as yet received the distinction.

* * *

MR. HENRY JAMES's recent contributions to the "English Review" and other publications would make up a fairly large volume, and it is not unlikely that a collection of stories from his pen will soon make its appearance. A story called "The Bench of Desolation," the scene of which is laid in an unfashionable English watering-place, and which is rather simpler than most of Mr. James's later work, is at present running as a serial in "Putnam's Magazine."

* * *

THE bi-centenary of the final suppression of the convent of Port Royal, which falls on October 29th, will be marked by the publication, through the Oxford University Press, of Miss M. E. Lowndes's "The Nuns of Port Royal: As Seen in their own Narratives." The history of the convent is also touched upon in a biography of Pascal by Viscount St. Cyres, which Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. have in the press. Although later research has brought to light many facts of minor importance, Sainte-Beuve's great work still holds its ground as the best account of Port Royal, both in its religious aspect and its influence upon French literature.

* * *

THE Georgian Society, which was founded in Dublin a little over a year ago with the object of inspecting and noting the eighteenth century architectural and decorative work which remains in that city, has published its first volume through the Dublin University Press. The illustrations form a valuable record of the beautiful Georgian domestic architecture of Dublin, and an interesting series of notes throws much light on the rise and development of the Dublin school of eighteenth century designers and craftsmen, whose work is, perhaps, the finest of its period.

* * *

ONE of the most interesting of the books of verses about to appear is one by Mr. Yone Noguchi, printed and decorated in Japan, and published here by Mr. Elkin Mathews. Mr. Yone Noguchi has written and published poetry in America and in England, which he visited with his countryman, the artist, Yoshio Markino. "From an Eastern Sea," published five or six years ago by the author himself, contained some beautiful unrhymed verses, showing the contact of a genuine Eastern artist with European things, and they were, in a sense, a literary equivalent of Mr. Markino's pictures. The poet is now a teacher of English in Japan. His last book, also printed and decorated at Tokio, was reviewed in "The Speaker" some four years ago.

* * *

IN "South African Memories," by Lady Sarah Wilson, a book to be published next week by Mr. Arnold, we are promised some fresh side-lights upon South African politics at the time of the Jameson Raid and of the War. Lady Sarah Wilson describes a meeting with the raiders when on their way home to be tried after the failure of their enterprise. She also gives a sketch of Cecil Rhodes at Groot Schurr, just before the war began, and records his estimates of Lord Milner and others who were there at the time. Lady Sarah Wilson's adventures in Bechuanaland, where she was made a prisoner and released in exchange for a horse-thief, her experiences in the siege of Mafeking, and the work of the Yeomanry hospitals, are treated in detail. The book runs to fifteen chapters, the last of which describes a visit to Victoria Falls, and a hunting expedition north of the Zambesi.

* * *

THE effect of reviews upon a writer's reputation is a topic likely to be raised by a selection of twenty-three articles dealing with George Meredith, which Messrs. Chapman & Hall have just reprinted in a single volume. Its title is "George Meredith: Some Early Appreciations," and Mr. Maurice Buxton Forman, the editor, made his selection with the object of representing "critical judgment on George Meredith's writing from the year 1851, when his first book was published, till 1883, when he issued 'Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth.'" The selection is open to some objection, for, of the twenty-three reviews, four are by James Thomson and three by George Eliot. Moreover, we are given two reviews by George Eliot of "The Shaving of Shagpat," and two by James Thomson of "Beauchamp's Career." The range of choice might have been widened with advantage, but many readers will be interested in seeing the impression made by Meredith upon the small band of his early admirers. It is hardly too much to say that they compelled a reluctant public to accept him at their own valuation, and Meredith is an instance of a writer of genius who might never have won proper recognition were it not for the persistent praise of his reviewers. Mr. Forman has chosen the best of these—among them Mr. W. M. Rossetti, Kingsley, George Eliot, Swinburne, Dr. Richard Garnett, James Thomson, R. H. Hutton, and W. E. Henley—and his collection of their opinions will be of value alike to students of Meredith and to students of English literary criticism.

* * *

M. GUSTAVE DAVOIS is preparing a bibliography of French works relating to Napoleon which have appeared before 1908. He has been assisted in his task by members of the Bonaparte family, as well as by a number of historians, librarians, and collectors interested in the subject, so that the "Bibliographie Napoléonienne Française" promises to be much fuller than any earlier bibliography of Napoleon.

* * *

MR. C. DELISLE BURNS, who was some time ago deprived of his Professorship of Philosophy at the Roman Catholic College of Old Hall, Ware, because of his Modernist views, and who has since definitely abandoned the Church, has written a book called "The Development of Modern Philosophy," which Messrs. Sampson Low will publish during the present season.

* * *

A TRANSLATION of "Modes and Manners of the Nineteenth Century," by Dr. Oskar Fischel and Max von Boehm, will be issued immediately by Messrs. Dent. The aim of the authors has been to show how changes in the fashion of dress, furniture, architecture, and similar matters illustrate the tendency of thought and tone of society at different epochs. The work will contain a large number of illustrations from contemporary pictures and engravings, which it is claimed give an accurate idea of dress and manners during the century.

Reviews.

MEREDITH'S LAST POEMS.*

THE gleanings of a mighty crop should be garnered—provided they are not taken to be the harvest. It was right to publish this volume. But it is to be feared lest that part of the public who have recently been persuaded into a respectful belief that there was more in Box Hill than was dreamt of in their philosophy, may seek for what Meredith's admirers have proclaimed to be his poetic genius in this little volume of septuagenarian and octogenarian verse, suited as it is to the public's desires at least by reason of its extreme brevity. But his greatest poems must be sought elsewhere, between red covers for the most part. Here we have merely his "Last Poems," which, like those of Browning, Tennyson, and others, have interest for two reasons: because here and there comes a flash of the old inspiration, and yet more because the volume shows what kind of spiritual profit he drew from old age, and with what countenance he sat in the shadow of death. Did earth grow dark and terrible to him as he watched it from the sentinel chair to which illness so long confined him in that last, long watch? Or did all our affairs grow far away, and dim and foolish in the light of some higher reality drawing near? Did the new world of machines and mobs and vulgarity that had grown up since his youth seem to him at the last, as it did to Carlyle and to Tennyson, just a bad mistake and nothing more, a driving of the car of humanity into the ditch? Or did he, like Browning, fixing his eye on the curtain behind which he himself was about to pass, "greet the unseen with a cheer"?

Meredith does none of these things. Although his attitude resembles that of Browning more closely than that of Tennyson or Carlyle, yet to him the unseen remains unseen, and if he had his last thoughts on it he carried them away with him. But, indeed, he had already said what he had to say about death and the beyond, in his earlier works, when he was more speculatively interested in such questions. In these last years, when the question of death became personal to him, it ceased to occupy his mind. It was long years ago that he first asked in a rapturous irony:—

"Into the breast that gives the rose Shall I with shuddering fall?"

And then again he wrote:—

"If there is an eternal rest for us, it is best to believe that Earth knows, to keep near her, even in our utmost aspirations."

And there he left the matter, peacefully at rest. During the long years when he waited with kindly patience for death, he was entirely preoccupied with fears and hopes, not for himself, but for the actual world that he was to leave behind, and for the races to come. Here was the scene where he felt his own future to lie, in the survival of his influence; and here, on Mother Earth, would live the race of Man, with whom he had, in his altruistic philosophy, absolutely identified himself. And so we find that Meredith's "Last Poems" are almost entirely concerned with—history and politics! There is no "Crossing the Bar," no "Epilogue." With a characteristic touch of independence and dislike for curiosity, he squares his own accounts with death in private. But he is gravely concerned that we should give Home Rule to Ireland and have conscription! His last voice is raised to commemorate Nelson and Garibaldi, and to proclaim sympathy with the struggle for Russian freedom. There is a valor and a jollity in this way of ending life that, to me, is infinitely touching, in view of the grave, beautiful things that he has formerly written about death in the fourteenth chapter of "Lord Ormont," and again and again in his other novels, in "The Ballad of Past Meridian," in the "Faith on Trial," and in the incomparable sonnet on "A Friend Lost."

There is only one intimate personal confession in this volume. It is a perfect expression of what old age was to him, and what we may pray that it will be to each of us. The poem is called "Youth in Age":—

"Once I was part of the music I heard
On the boughs or sweet between earth and sky,
For joy of the beating of wings on high
My heart shot into the breast of the bird.

"I hear it now and I see it fly
And a life of wrinkles again is stirred,
My heart shoots into the breast of the bird,
As it will for sheer love till the last long sigh."

That is the feeling that constantly inspired this athlete and lover of life, as he sat crippled alike by disease and age. But he was the man who had written, "There is nothing the body suffers that the soul may not profit by." His soul enriched itself with all the pleasures and activities that his once splendid body was now compelled to forego. Youth never left him, but became transformed into a gracious spiritual repossession of youth's joys, by memory and by seeing them in others. He loved the presence of the young, and to hear how they fared in their work, and in the same pursuit of Artemis and Aphrodite. I have seen him watching the esplanade from a seaside-lodging window. To an ordinary person, old or young, it would have seemed a very ordinary lodging-house window indeed, but to him, and to those who heard him talk, it was a peephole on glorious life. A girl passing on a bicycle set him prophesying the fuller life that was now setting in for women. A boy leading a pet goat up and down aroused his envy and delight, made him again in spirit a boy, a Crossjay. One went away from a talk with him feeling as if one had been plunged by Esculapius into the healing waters of youth.

Well, then, what of these political and historical poems which Meredith has left as his last word of all? The finest, to my mind, are the two on Nelson ("October 21st, 1905," and "Trafalgar Day") and the one on "Garibaldi" and the one on "Milton." I will not spoil the market by quoting them. Let readers get the book, and they will find, in those four poems, rare stuff indeed, fine thought, magnificent expression, keen historical insight and knowledge—and all quite easy to understand.

The rest of the volume, except the beautiful portrait idyll beginning "The years had worn," seems to me on a relatively lower plane poetically, though one never knows till one has read Meredith many times over if there is not some great merit concealed. But the poems in favor of Home Rule and conscription are very interesting. There are not very many people, perhaps, who will agree with both these pieces of advice. That should enable his countrymen to look impartially at the advice of this democratic and Home Rule supporter of large armaments. The temper of his patriotism, based on an intense respect for the patriotisms of other people, is all too rare. Whoever is right about the particular questions of Home Rule and conscription, both Liberal and Conservative sadly need a long draught at the sacred well of the spirit of Meredith's patriotism. His word to Britain and her Colonies is:—

"How wise will be
The Power that trusts to love.
A love that springs from heart and brain
In union gives for ripest fruit
The concord Kings and States in vain
Have sought, who played the lofty brute,
And fondly deeming they possessed,
On force relied, and found it break.
That truth once scored on Britain's breast
Now keeps her mind awake."

The once, I suppose, refers to the War of the American Revolution.

In the poem on "Ireland," he would apply this principle to the case of "England's broken arm." "The Call," the conscriptionist poem, has almost exactly the same points as the verses, "To Colonel Charles" and "England before the Storm," in the second volume of the collected poems; and the older versions of the theme are the most vigorous of the two, though all have vigor.

Lastly, I cannot refrain from calling attention to the exquisitely characteristic little grumble of this fine gentleman of letters at the cacophonous name of "Atkins," which we, as a people, give to our heroes in war.

"Exquisite humour! that gives him a naming Base to the ear as an ass's bray."

In the same spirit I remember his holding up to horror and ridicule the song of "He's a Jolly Good Fellow," as the national method of expressing approval. There are, doubtless, worse vulgarisms now descending on us than the name "Tommy Atkins," and the song, "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow." But Meredith came down from Olympus and judged us by certain standards. We can submit to be judged by him, for when all is said and done :—

* "Last Poems." By George Meredith. Constable. 4s. 6d. net.

"He has been our fellow, the morning of our days;
Us he chose for housemates and this way went.
God! of whom music
And song and blood are pure,
The day is never darkened
That had thee here obscure."

G. M. TREVELYAN.

THE PLAINNESS OF ROME.*

MISS POTTER begins her book on Rome with the remark that "Rome is the most beautiful web that the hands of man have ever woven." Mr. Douglas Sladen, who contributes a few pages of preface, asserts that "Rome is a city of color." On the other hand, Mr. Yoshio Markino, a young Japanese artist who supplies the pictures, writes, in a letter to the author, that he, for his part, is "rather disappointed with Rome," and adds, "I prefer Newcastle-on-Tyne far better."

It is odd that it should be so, but, so it is, that ninety-nine travellers out of a hundred, if they have occasion to praise any scenery or city for any cause whatever, always add the praise of beauty to their eulogies. It makes very little difference if beauty has anything to do with the matter in hand or not. They may be dealing with subjects of merely intellectual interest, and describing monuments and scenes closely associated with the past history of the human race, but without any pretensions to aesthetic merit; but, in the majority of cases, they will quite overlook the distinction between things interesting to the mind and beautiful to the eye. Let some old building or ruin move them by its ancient historical associations, and they are quite certain to endow it with all the lofty aesthetic qualities of the Parthenon. They are quite certain to praise it for its beauty and magic loveliness and transcendent charm of color and line. In reality, in spite of its interest, it may very likely be one of the ugliest of places.

About no town in the world, perhaps, is this truer than about Rome, for in Rome the proportion of actual beauty to historical interest is extraordinarily meagre. Rome may lay solid claims to being, at least to a European, the most interesting city in the world, but, apart from the contents of her galleries and museums, which no more beautify the city itself than the Elgin marbles beautify London, her claims to beauty are altogether of the slightest. In what sense are the classical remains of Rome beautiful? They are extremely interesting. They convey to us, as nothing else can, the life and character of the Imperial city. But there they stop. The Romans had no conception at all either of the nature or the uses of aesthetic beauty. It did not enter into their philosophy to consider what the influence and effect might be of a visible representation of unity and symmetry, and the consequence is that, not only were their temples and other buildings ignoble in themselves, but they were ignobly placed, and tell for little in the appearance of the town. The Greek temples, most worthy of being looked at and models of perfect symmetry, were placed where they can be best seen. Raised on lofty rock or hill tops, they overlooked the city at their feet, and still, in salient and lonely relief, their ruins attract the gaze which their beauty justifies. The Roman ruins, on the contrary, stuffed into the little hole of a Forum, seem anxious to avoid a scrutiny which their coarse proportions and misapplied ornament can ill repay.

But it is not only that in Rome there remain for us only the baser elements of classic art; the second best period of artistic activity, the Renaissance period, likewise failed to manifest in Rome its highest characteristics. All the genius and talent which could be transplanted was attracted to the capital; but the genius and talent which could be transplanted—the merely individual genius and talent, that is to say—was an altogether unimportant and secondary affair in the evolution of the great Italian cities. The great Italian cities do not owe their beauty and dignity to any such individual efforts. What is it that gives dignity and beauty to an old city like Pisa? Largely the mighty group of buildings which cluster together in the ample cathedral close. What gives beauty and dignity to Florence? Chiefly, there, too, the similar great group in the Piazza del Duomo. And Venice, what is the chief source of her beauty and dignity? The Piazza and Piazzetta, of course—those squares, not large, but by the beauty of their buildings raised to pre-eminence among all architectural views. No doubt, several of the features which go to make up these great scenes and centres of city life may be traced to one individual hand or another. But in their entirety and general composition such scenes are more than individual: they are national, or, at least, communal. They are the outgrowth of certain social conditions and of a certain high consciousness of civic unity and patriotism, and, as is evident to anyone who sympathises with Florentine or Venetian history, they are so far independent of individual effort that had one individual not been forthcoming, another would have taken his place. The need of these things, the power to live up to them, the resolve to possess them, were incentives animating the whole community. Such motives create their own instruments.

These noble and dignified architectural views are the background and setting of the life of a free community. They are found wherever the northern, barbaric blood, the blood that re-established the instinct for freedom in the west, is sufficiently pronounced to assert its influence. Nine-tenths of the beauty we associate with old Italian cities is due to these great scenic effects. They date for the most part to an age anterior to the Renaissance, yet they cannot be separated from it. The tendency was, as the intellectual movement spread, for the creative faculty to become more and more an individual gift. But the individual gift grew out of the communal. It was the free cities that bred the great artists. Thus the noble civic scenes we have been speaking of, which form, as we said, the background and setting of a free communal life, form also the right and appropriate background for the individual works of genius in which that life eventually both expressed itself and expired. This, indeed, is often what we are in danger of forgetting. We lay too much stress on the individual. We forget that the works of Tintoret and Veronese which clothe the walls and ceilings of the Ducal Palace are part of the same effort which raised those walls themselves, together with those other encircling walls and colonnades which make the square beneath the noblest on earth.

But still, even if our eyes are now and then drawn off from the whole to the parts, and if sometimes we are inclined to think more of those individual achievements which can be carted about and housed in galleries and museums than of the great collective achievements which expressed the national life, and are fixed there where the national life was lived, still it only needs for us to recall the thought of the cities themselves for the balance to be redressed. Venice, Florence, we say to ourselves, and there rises before our eyes the image of those splendid vistas of broad space and arch and column which were the arenas the city's life made for itself. We realise, easily enough at such moments, that nine-tenths of the beauty of these cities is non-transferable, that it is built into their aspect and proportions.

But this source of so much of Italian beauty is not in Rome operative at all. A vivid and strenuous local vitality was inconsistent with the part which Rome was destined to play in human affairs. Consequently, all the manifestations of that vitality are absent. The transferable works of individual genius, painted or carved by artists attracted by the munificent papal patronage, she possesses in abundance, but she does not possess those ordered spaces and clusters of noble and varied architecture which are the glory of the free cities. This is why Rome is not beautiful. The two main sources of beauty in classic and Christian art have been, in classic art, the aesthetic instinct of the Greeks, and, in Christian art, the vigorous initiative of free communities. Neither of these influences has been indigenous to Roman life, and therefore Rome, though she is the most interesting city in the whole world, is not a beautiful city.

*"The Color of Rome." By Olive Muriel Potter, illustrated by Yoshio Markino. Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.

With those clear-sighted Japanese eyes of his, Mr. Markino saw this readily enough. But Miss Potter has not seen it, and the consequences of her not seeing it are detrimental to the style of her book.

"Rome is a dream city after rain. Her silken robe of mist, blue as the heaven above, makes her a city of desires."

"But, although Rome is wonderfully gracious with the dawn lightening over her hills, at nightfall, when the setting sun gilds her palaces and ruins, and turns the diamond spray of her fountains into tender amethyst, and the echo of vespers is in your ears, she is the City Beautiful." . . . "That veil of inexplicable beauty through which her eyes gleam with eternal youth."

If there is beauty in such passages, the overstrained sentiment, the tendency to rhapsody, is also evident. The actual facts do not sufficiently support such a style, and the consequence is that the author is driven to rely too much on her own moods. She invokes the aid of mist and night. She indulges unduly in dreams and visions. The tendency is common among writers who mistake interest for beauty. What the book wants, it seems to us, is less emotion and more thought. The realisation of the significance of Rome is through the intellect.

We must add a word of praise for Mr. Markino's illustrations. We have seen none to equal them. There is not the slightest tinge of trickery or exaggeration in them, yet each is presented with such force and freshness that it is felt by the spectator as an experience of the scene itself. The combination of such clear, unspoilt eyesight with such a gift of execution is rare. It is to be hoped Mr. Markino will retain it.

OUR NEW PATRIOT.*

MR. ELLIS BARKER (we still know him best under his recent name, Eltzbacher) writes upon problems of "Motherland and the Empire" with the holy glee of a new patriot. The most industrious and audacious of our scaremongers, he has the art to support his sensationalism by a pomp of easily got erudition, well-calculated to impress the sort of "educated" men whom our public schools turn out yearly by thousands into the business world or a narrow professional career. In a grandiloquent preface, Mr. Barker acknowledges "the deepest obligation to Mr. Chamberlain. He has been my teacher. He has formed my views, and he has influenced my writings."

Mr. Barker's "views" are strong and simple. In a broad, historic survey of the empires of the past, which follows conveniently the audacious misinterpretations of Mr. Welsford, Mr. Barker shows how this procession of empires, from Phœnicia to Holland, have one and all gone the road to ruin because they have allowed prosperity to debauch their energies and to blind their intelligence, so that they permit agriculture and solid home industries to fall into decay, and become more and more dependent upon foreign labor for their supplies, and upon mercenary soldiers for their defence. England stands "at the parting of the ways"—nay, she is already on the downward slope. Her wealth is already "stagnant, if not declining," the world-trade she once held is passing from her, Free Trade is "converting once highly skilled and highly paid workers into badly paid unskilled laborers." Unemployment, exceptional in other nations, is chronic here, and is growing even worse, though its dimensions are concealed in part by the immense immigration; our taxation is twice that of Germany, and, falling on "the masses of the people," cripples industry. Meanwhile, our national physique is deteriorating, and our Empire, for lack of organisation, is subject to a constant strain which may soon reach the breaking-point. Even our naval supremacy is destined soon to disappear, for certain statements about German incomes, which Mr. Barker describes as "facts," indicate that "Germany is financially able to out-build the British fleet, and the result of the recent Reichstag elections seems to show that the nation has also the ambition and the will to do so."

Mr. Barker fortunately is able to diagnose the exact nature of the peril which threatens us, and to prescribe the right remedies, so all is not yet lost. For Germany, the villain of the piece, has shown her hand to the watchful eyes of Mr. Ellis Barker. He sees through her little game. Ever since the establishment of the German Empire of 1871, the far-sighted statesmen of that nation have bent all their diplomacy to weakening France and Russia, not because they feared attack from either of these quarters, but because, ever contemplating a career of conquest, they wished to pave the way for subjugating Central and Northern Europe, and for establishing an over-seas Empire which would inevitably bring her into conflict with Great Britain. Her earliest active advance will consist in the absorption, largely by fiscal and political pressure, of Holland, Austria-Hungary, and Switzerland. So she establishes "a German Empire stretching across Europe from Hamburg to Trieste," which "would dominate not only the continent of Europe, but Asia Minor as well. Such an Empire would be able to threaten Constantinople, Egypt, and India, and it might legitimately aspire to the domination of the Mediterranean, of Asia Minor, and of North Africa." What is then to become of little England? "When Germany once has 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 inhabitants, a standing army of 1,000,000, and a war army of 5,000,000 men, and a large number of excellent harbors; in short, when her position on the Continent is absolutely secure against her neighbors, she can, with her flourishing industries, soon build a fleet sufficiently strong to defeat the British Navy."

Is it not a terrible prospect? What shall we do to be saved? Mr. Ellis Barker tells us in two words, Tariff Reform and Compulsory Military Service. These reforms will restore our agriculture, recuperate our national physique and morale, organise an Anglo-Saxon Empire on a self-sufficing economic basis, which, by alliance with the United States, will place at our disposal a population and a finance adequate to match, and even over-awe, the military and naval power of Germany.

It is difficult to treat quite seriously such a medley of misstatements, false imputations of motives, and impracticable policy. The only really serious factor is that the articles of such a man should now be found occupying in our reviews the place of prominence which used to be accorded to such men as Gladstone, Huxley, or John Morley. This seems to imply a degree of credulity among our "educated" classes which a generation ago would have been impossible.

Let us rehearse a few of Mr. Barker's really salient "facts." Germany, he holds, is already determined to spend a minimum of three hundred million pounds upon her fleet, and is able to do so. "The wages in Great Britain are low in consequence of Free Trade. They are low in those industries in which foreign manufacturers and producers compete freely, and they are high in those industries which are naturally or artificially protected against foreign competition." "Taxation per head of population is exactly twice as high in this country as it is in Germany." Such statements, supported by sham or irrelevant statistics, abound in Mr. Barker's book. Every one of his comparisons between Great Britain and Germany is vitiated by considerations which have been set forth in countless documents, official and others, since the beginning of the fiscal controversy. "I shall prove," writes Mr. Barker, "that in no industrial country in the world is there such widespread and such permanent unemployment as in Great Britain, and that the prevalence of that widespread unemployment coincides with the rise of Free Trade" (p. 127). Now, even were there any tittle of truth in these statements, there is no way of proving them. There are no statistics enabling us to compare, even approximately, the proportion or the amount of unemployment in England to-day with those of the times under Protection. Again, our Board of Trade has expressly and repeatedly warned us that the official figures of English and German unemployment are not comparable, and has even given detailed explanation of the reasons why they are not. Yet we find Mr. Barker crudely parading the percentages of unemployment among trade unionists in the two countries, without a word of qualification, and deducing the utterly false conclusion that "unemployment among trade unionists was, as a rule, from three to four times as large in Great Britain as it was in Germany." He plays in a similarly unscrupulous fashion with statistics of savings-banks and of wages, in order to support, in face of the conclusive evidence of a carefully conducted inquiry by the Board of

* "Great and Greater Britain." By J. Ellis Barker. Smith, Elder.

Trade, the false statement that "the German working masses are considerably better off than are the British working masses."

Germany has not the industrial and financial strength he accords to her. As every intelligent reader knows, her financial embarrassments are far graver than ours. The attempt simultaneously to be a great military and naval power is eating into her resources, and is lowering the real standard of life of her population through the persistent and large rise of prices due to her protective tariff. She is likely, as time goes on, to be rent by constantly growing dissensions of class and party, and even should pan-Teutonic sentiment bring Austria some day into organic union, the whole superstructure of aggressive policy which Mr. Barker builds upon this basis is a growth of his heated imagination.

Perhaps, however, we are wrong, and Mr. Barker's imagination is not heated. He is, perhaps, merely an ingenious gentleman who has fastened upon the Tariff Reform movement in that spirit of full-blooded patriotism common to his race and order. The success of such a movement, as in other branches of finance, figures itself to him simply as a problem of credit, of creating confidence. The raw material of such confidence is credulity. Now in order to convert credulity into effective confidence, what are needed are such statements of facts and figures as by their circumstantiality will carry conviction. Figures can be found, and facts can be faked, by the play of a lively imagination on the loose material of history. To do this sort of thing requires a certain knack which Mr. Ellis Barker undoubtedly possesses.

"MAX." *

BLESSED are they who possess the gift of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers: it is the privilege both of the humorist and the poet. Wordsworth found that thoughts too deep for tears could spring from the contemplation of the meanest flower; Mr. Max Beerbohm, with no less insight, discovers matter for a tragedy in a hat-box. Both temperaments are deficient in what is vulgarly known as common sense, but both enjoy spiritual experiences which are to the ordinary mind unknown. For example, Mr. Beerbohm, with a pathos which no sympathetic reader can resist, describes how, with infinite patience and ingenuity, he has for many years made a collection of luggage labels. Pasted on to a common, brown, pigskin hat-box, these labels symbolise all the keen and varied sensations of an enthusiastic traveller. But one day, owing to the misplaced zeal of an unimaginative trunk maker, they are all washed off. A simple theme, but with what profound emotion it is penned!

Again, Mr. Beerbohm goes a journey by a midnight express; a stranger enters the compartment somewhat hurriedly; they both settle down for the night. That is all. And that is all it ever would be to those who cannot see beyond the primrose. Not so, however, with "Max." Opening his eyes he looks at the intruding stranger, and instantly perceives him to be a murderer.

"Screwing up my courage, I fixed the man with my eye. I had never seen such a horrible little eye as his. It was a sane eye, too. It radiated a cold and ruthless sanity. It belonged not to a man who would kill you wantonly, but to one who would not scruple to kill you for a purpose, and who would do the job quickly and neatly and not be found out."

"... He was standing now with his back towards me, pulling his hatbox out of the rack. He had a furtive back—the back of one who had born many an alias. To this day I am ashamed that I did not spring up and pinion him there and then."

Presently the murderer opens conversation by inquiring whether the two have met before. They have not; but in the course of the explanation it dawns upon the other that the man is no murderer but quite a harmless commercial traveller. His feeling of terror changes to one of friendship, and finally to an emotion of profoundest pity. There are tears in his eyes as he alights on his doorstep. Yet for neither of these two deep and powerful emotions was there the slightest real justification. As Max rightly surmises, the philistine will reject these experiences as unreal and possibly ridiculous. He condemns himself; for there is no clearer mark of a superior mind than a sustained capacity for disinterested feeling.

Mr. Beerbohm chooses themes that are common and simple, but treats them with conscious art. He sees a club in ruins, and muses epigrammatically on man's mortality; a rocking-horse outside a toyshop, and writes a study in dejection. In a slightly more serious mood he sits down before a fire: the attitude is favorable to meditations, and those arising from the flames are among the writer's brightest.

"Time (he writes) has not tamed fire. Fire is as wild a thing as when Prometheus snatched it from the empyrean. Fire in my grate is as fierce and terrible a thing as when it was lit by my ancestors, night after night, at the mouths of their caves, to scare away the ancestors of my dog. And my dog regards it with the old wonder and misgiving. Even in his sleep he opens ever and again one eye to see that we are in no danger. And the fire glowers and roars through its bars at him with the scorn that a wild beast must needs have for a tame one. 'You are free,' it rages, 'and yet you do not spring at that man's throat and tear him limb from limb and make a meal of him!' and, gazing at me, it licks its red lips; and I, laughing good-humouredly, rise and give the monster a shovelful of its proper food, which it leaps at and noisily devours."

But there are readers who thirst for realism. Let them turn to the essay on "Seeing people off" and convict the author, if they can, of artificiality, or of any undue leaning towards the poetic. A traveller bound for America is sitting in a railway carriage, and his friends, who have come to see him off, are waiting on the platform.

"'Have you got everything?' asked one of us, breaking a silence. 'Yes, everything,' says our friend, with a pleasant nod. 'Everything,' he repeated, with the emphasis of an empty brain. 'You'll be able to lunch on the train,' said I, though this prophecy had already been made more than once. 'Oh, yes,' he said, with conviction. He added that the train went straight through to Liverpool. The fact seemed to strike us as rather odd. We exchanged glances. 'Doesn't it stop at Crewe?' asked one of us. 'No,' said our friend briefly. He seemed almost disagreeable. There was a long pause. One of us, with a nod and a forced smile at the traveller, said, 'Well!' The nod, the smile, and the meaningless monosyllable were returned conscientiously. Another pause was broken by one of us by a fit of coughing. It was an obviously assumed fit, but it served to pass the time."

This, to use a phrase which has done much good service, is a page torn straight from the book of life.

"Max," however, is no lover of the commonplace. He is an aristocrat, ever on the side of the Graces, who chooses his words carefully and puts his commas in the right place. The simplicity of his themes serves but to enhance the elegance of his mind. His emotions, though sincere, are seldom universal, and there is a hint of preciousness in his style. In this age, which people in the country tell us is rapidly becoming Socialistic, distinction has a hard struggle to survive. Mr. Beerbohm has, however, achieved, not only a style, but an orthography of his own. With an artist's fierce individuality, he writes of a miser's "horde." The dictionary and the gross bulk of the reading public are against him—but we admire panache.

EDMUND GARRETT.*

THIS book is a work of affection; and merits the respect due to a sincere tribute of one friend to another. Let us say also that Garrett himself had the personal attraction which flowed from high spirits, a love of adventure in journalism, considerable talent and ardor in its pursuit, and the always pathetic spectacle of a losing fight, conducted with the utmost gallantry, with mortal disease. Beyond this, we shall not agree with Mr. Cook that Garrett's career deserves special commemoration. His literary skill was undeniable, as any reader of his spirited version of "Brand" and his early brilliant sketch of political Africa, entitled "In Afrikanderland," will allow. But these two works, the best, in our view, which he ever produced, have hardly proved to be less ephemeral than his later contributions to English and South African newspapers. Professor Herford's "Brand" is far superior to Garrett's; and, "In Afrikanderland" belongs to a passing and past phase of South African life. Indeed Garrett's powers of

* "Yet Again." By Max Beerbohm. Chapman & Hall. 5s. net.

* "Edmund Garrett: A Memoir." By E. T. Cook. Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.

production did not mature. Nature had laid on him too heavy a handicap, and his early training was scanty and hurried. His impatient advocacy of the policy of Mr. Rhodes and Lord Milner can be applauded only by those who, like his biographer, were thick-and-thin apologists alike of the Raid and of the diplomacy which preceded the South African War. Mr. Cook does, indeed, claim for his hero a certain independence of these political figures, or even a share in shaping their action. We are not able to trace this influence. Garrett's more refined and sensitive temperament was not, perhaps, in complete sympathy with all the political ways and means of Mr. Rhodes. But that powerful character had no use for half-and-half sympathisers, and Garrett's espousal of the Raid and his later endeavor to restore its author to public life in Cape Colony were mere acts of uncritical advocacy. How far this championship led him the incident recorded in pages 118 to 120 will show. Mr. Cook describes Garrett's conduct as "injudicious." We will say nothing of its moral aspects—we will only suggest that it seems to us an exact model of conduct which journalists who desire to obtain the confidence of public men, and to retain their respect, should avoid. Garrett was shown, in confidence, a copy of the draft proclamation in which Sir Hercules Robinson strove to recall South Africa to its senses after the emotional disturbance of the Raid. He suggested and obtained the omission of a paragraph calling on British citizens to abstain from demonstrations likely to disturb public order. Having obtained this concession, he telegraphed privately to the editor of the Johannesburg "Star," warning this gentleman that the proclamation would put Jameson "formally in the wrong," but that this course was forced on the Imperial authorities, and that the Progressives need not concern themselves about it. What could be worse: first, to falsify the character and meaning of the proclamation, on the strength of a private confidence freely bestowed by its author, and then to sow such a crop of tares in soil where they were certain to spring up and multiply exceedingly? There were better sides to Garrett's journalism than this episode discloses. It is unfortunate that, if Mr. Cook thought it necessary to mention it, he should also deem himself bound to excuse it. The only palliation of such conduct was that Garrett was always something of a boy and never had time to grow up; and that his was not the type of journalism which thrived in the forcing-house of the "Pall Mall Gazette" under Mr. Stead. John Morley would have applied a temperature more suitable to the development of Garrett's veritable graces of mind and character.

MODERNISM.*

THE subject of this volume is of urgent interest, and the writer is a man of eminence, yet it has little chance of giving us much illumination. There is always something defective when a writer gives an account of a highly controversial subject from the outside; but the defect becomes a fatal flaw when he is not only outside the controversy he is describing but also quite unreservedly in favor of one side of it. M. Paul Sabatier is a man who has gained reputation by his studies upon St. Francis, and has indeed endeared himself to many by the charm and the spirituality which distinguish those studies: the writer has high claims upon our attention. And the subject is in the front of those which engage the minds of thoughtful people to-day—the severe conflict which has opened in the Roman Church between the Liberal movement, now designated Modernism, and the Conservatism of the official authorities in that Church. But to look to M. Sabatier as a guide in this conflict is another matter. For he is vehemently with the Modernists at every point of their position, and yet he is not one of them: he remains a Protestant, and that of an extreme type. We fear, therefore, that if men are to be judged by the character of their champions, M. Sabatier's vigorous advocacy will tell against the Modernists in the estimation of the Romanists of a Conservative temper. See, they will say, what Modernism really is: here is an ultra-

Protestant, fervent in his admiration of its principles and deeply sympathetic with its leaders; and, they will add, wholly unable to attribute to the Conservative Catholics either sincerity or intelligence, or at least to allow that both of these together can characterise any person in their ranks. If followers of the Curia were to say these things, there is nothing in this volume which would put them to silence.

Under these circumstances, we do not see that any detailed account of the volume is called for. All that need be said is that it contains some statements of the general position of Modernism, of its orientation, as M. Sabatier calls it, and a continuously antagonistic criticism of the ultra-Conservative policy which at present is dominant at the Vatican, in theology, in scholarship, and in ecclesiastical administration. At the same time, an English reader who has inadequate access to the literature of the controversy, and no personal acquaintance with any of the protagonists, will find here a good deal of useful and interesting matter: notably upon M. Loisy and the nature and significance of his voluminous contributions to thought and learning, and upon the Catholic laymen who, in Italy, France, and in England, are eloquently and under difficulties making this new learning known. They are described with the warmest sympathy by M. Sabatier, and at the same time with due respect for their loyalty to their Church. The "Jowett Lecture" was the occasion of M. Sabatier speaking on the subject in England, and perhaps his eloquent advocacy will have drawn attention to the controversy in quarters in which it was being insufficiently noticed. In order to constitute a volume even of moderate size, the editor has added a number of important documents: the Encyclical of 1906; the Petition from a group of French Catholics (Liberal), deprecating it; the Syllabus Lamentabili; and especially the official English translation of the Encyclical of 1907, Pascendi Gregis. These documents are indispensable to anyone who desires to be informed as to the movement; but for a general statement of the thoughts and the aims of the Modernists, recourse should be had to the same publisher's volume, "The Programme of Modernism," by Father Tyrrell, translated by Mr. Lilley.

ANN VERONICA.*

THE story is simple enough. Ann Veronica, living in the suburbs with a suburban father, breaks away from his suburban dominance: determines to "live her own life." She speedily discovers the impossibility of a pretty girl with no wage-earning capacities "living her own life." She borrows money from a man who, in return, demands a customary and expected reward. She engages herself to a sentimental humbug, and breaks off the engagement without compunction. She essays various outlets for unsatisfied and stifled woman's desires: mingling with the pitiful company of the ineffective "moderns," who discuss, egotistically and with tragic futility, various methods of unattainable reform. She plunges into the "Suffragette" agitation, goes wearily to prison, emerges disgusted and disillusioned. Finally, in passionate and reckless love for her teacher in biology (a married man), she snatches at one crowded hour of glorious life: heedless of honor and the moralities, confident in the attainment of some transfiguration beyond them all. The end of the book is, in reality, the journey of Capes and Ann Veronica to the mountains and their sojourn there. The rest is the conventional conclusion which Mr. Wells, good artist as he is, might well have spared us. The phantom Mrs. Capes has disappeared: Ann Veronica becomes decently married to her lover: father and aunt accept reconciliation and dinner with affable forgiveness: Capes makes a huge financial success as a writer of plays. The author must have mocked at himself as he added this fairy tale ending to a work that is otherwise a study of reality. It may have been necessary for the quieting of the public conscience: but it lacks the sombre sincerity of Mr. Lewisham's gaze from his dingy lodging into the London darkness with some vague, faint hope that, through the child who has been born, his life

* "Modernism: The Jowett Lectures, 1908." By Paul Sabatier. Translated by C. A. Miles. Unwin. 5s. net will be linked with a less intolerable future: or the passage of George Ponderevo on his destroyer past a world symbolic of waste and confusion down to the large breath and salt airs of the open sea.

* "Ann Veronica." By H. G. Wells. Unwin. 6s.

It is less a story than a study: a study of the unrest and dissatisfaction which has entered into the soul of the modern city-bred girl, who from the beginning has been relieved from the need for wage earning, and finds herself condemned to waiting for the suburban husband who will condescend one day to ask her to be his wife. In part, Mr. Wells is dealing with present peculiar conditions, the revolt which comes from idleness, and artificial occupations, and the circumscribing tumuli of dead moralities, dead conventions, dead religions. In part the study is more universal: of the stimulus and great desires of adolescence, with the world suddenly opened to the mind first attaining self-consciousness, oppressed partly by vague unattainable longing, partly by revolt against the "shabby second best," which is the utmost most can make of life. Ann Veronica finds herself called to a crusade—to a dozen crusades. Here are things so obviously out of joint: here are evils eagerly demanding remedy. A little propagandism, a little preaching of reasonableness, a little general kindly feeling, and the world can be made beautiful and dramatic again. Only towards the end does she realise that she is campaigning—with no adequate weapons but egoism and some vanity and a wavering resolution—against the inheritance of a hundred centuries, and all the solid amalgam of good and evil of a world which is very old. Her meditations in prison amongst the "Suffragettes" bring her sharply against the blind jagged edges of reality. Religious faith is gone. "I suppose I believe in God. . . . Never really thought about Him—people don't." "Violence won't do it" (again). "Begin violence and the woman goes under." "Life is difficult," she cries; "when you loosen the tangle in one place you tie a knot in another." She has descended suddenly into regions she had never appreciated—the underside of civilisation, the kingdom of force, against which even the refinements and securities of suburbandom maintain their continuance but hardly. "This is the real texture of life," she cries. "This is what we secure people forget. We think the whole thing is straight and noble at bottom: and it isn't. . . . One doesn't realise that even the sort of civilisation one had at Morningside Park is held together with difficulty." "Life is many-sided and complex and puzzling. I thought one had only to take it by the throat." "It hasn't got a throat."

That absence of throat to grapple with in life is the crowning discovery. Having lost all through its apprehension, Ann Veronica can gain all through the acceptance of one transfiguring passion in which the world (without a throat) becomes remote and negligible. Capes has come "damaged goods": with a wife that refuses to release him, "of a very serene and proud and dignified temperament." "I worshipped her and subdued myself." He has come through the divorce courts as co-respondent in a "shabby, stupid, furtive business." He and Ann had met dissecting dog-fish in the atmosphere of the laboratory amid the smell of decay and cheap methylated spirit. They escape to moonlight on the mountains: through great waste spaces of snow and star-lit sky, in which for one moment the "earth life" of the "earth bowed" confusion below vanishes in an ecstasy of intoxication. And the place of return is still the region of dissecting dog-fish and the smell of decay and cheap methylated spirit: in which the "wrapped" conventional existence, the set grey life and apathetic end, seem only less unendurable than the feeble efforts of all who essay escape except into the Kingdom of Passion—where man and woman, indifferent to all pasts and futures, are plucking the red petals which they know must fall.

Mr. Wells devotes all his extraordinary ironic power to destructive, savage criticism of the modern emancipators. Their dinginess, their utter futility, their intoxication with words, their egotisms and vanities, fill him with bitterness and disgust. Perhaps his revolt is, in part, the resentfulness of one who once resided in that fantastic world, and is angry at the time wasted there. Fabians attempting to transform modern civilisation with surreptitious intrigues, "Suffragettes" whose "martyrdoms" in prison consist in howling before the midday meal, and imitating "the noises made by the carnivora at the Zoological Gardens at feeding time," little literary coteries who discuss the sincerity of Tolstoy or the significance of Chesterton, or whether Bernard Shaw should be elected to Parliament—all this appears to him less as a revolt than as a disease, compounded of unrest and ineffective vanity. He sees the huge, clumsy world, blundering along with its Atlantean load, in some strange progress towards an uncertain goal. He sees all the apparatus of sedentary life, the small cunning and hysterias of those who have never faced death or been challenged by Hunger and Cold, producing not even a scratch upon the surface of this Cosmic Colossus. Life and Death, huge stark forces of Lust and Avarice and Hatreds and Affections, judge and condemn all these "sloppy" and gushing and furtive movements towards change. And when Ann Veronica borrows forty pounds from a man who had appeared a genial suburban gentleman of unimpeachable reputation, she finds that the wolf and tiger instincts have only dressed themselves up in thin clothing—that "primitive man will feed and must take his pasturage." Ann Veronica is out for sincerity, while others are wrapped in deception. She is breaking her teeth biting at her chains in prison, while her comrades are content with making noises like the carnivorous animals. "Your queer code of Honor"—she can say to Capes at the end—"Honor! Once you begin with love you have to see it through." It is this demand for bedrock fact—for some hard ground beneath all the slush and make-belief of contemporary illusion—which drove George Ponderevo into the study of machines, aviation, something solid and real—which drove Ann Veronica into open repudiation of it all.

"Morningside Park had been passive and defective: all this rushed about and was active, but it was still defective. It still failed in something. It did seem germane to the matter that so many of the people 'in the van' were plain people, or faded people, or tired-looking people. It did affect the business that they all argued badly, and were egotistical in their manners and inconsistent in their phrases. There were moments when she doubted whether the whole mass of movements and societies and gatherings and talks was not simply one coherent spectacle of failure protecting itself from abjection by the glamor of its own assertions."

It is the revolt of the stomach against a diet of "Justice," "the Vegetarian," "Friends of Egypt," "Votes for Women," and other similar periodicals. Ann Veronica escapes for a moment—to the mountains. The hero of "Tono-Bungay" finds less satisfying experience in the sense, haunting and persistent, of a search never attained: all life the secret—revealed as but for a moment in a sudden sunset, in music, in a passionate love episode, in moments of half-apprehension—eluding and baffling those who would solve the mystery. At the end one may still, like Ulysses, resolve to "sail beyond the sunset" or blow dauntlessly "Childe Roland to the dark tower came." Meantime the Mountains cannot be occupied for ever: and back again, half-stiffed in the crowd, its visitants must set themselves to the wrapped life with but little guidance from sun or star.

"Some day, perhaps," says Ann Veronica's lover, "some day the old won't coddle and hamper the young, and the young won't need to fly in the faces of the old. They'll give facts as facts, and understand. Oh! to face facts! Gods! What a world it might be if people faced facts. Understanding. There is no other salvation." All Mr. Wells's later work has been an attempt to face facts. He has brought an enthusiasm for reality, born of his scientific training, into union with an enthusiasm for humanity, born out of disgust at the disorder of life, and pity at its sufferings. "Ann Veronica" is his latest attempt to face facts. It is lacking in the intimacy and kindness and humor of "Kipps." It has little of the broad, sombre, epical effect of "Tono-Bungay." It is written in irony and in bitterness. But it is extraordinarily honest, and in consequence extraordinarily readable. Here is a man who is applying the dissector's scalpel to the society of modern England. The ordinary investigator will deliberately omit the tearing open of certain parts; you must leave the heart intact, or make no search for this nerve ganglion, or confine yourself to slices cut off the surface of the skin. Mr. Wells will have none of it. He will tear the whole organism into tatters, till the skeleton and all the organs stand revealed—"far too naked to be 'shamed.'" He is not content with attacking illusion: he will dissect also the revolt against illusion itself, and the revolt against the revolt against illusion: until no wrappings and curtains

THE DIVINE MINSTRELS.

By AUGUSTE BAILLY. Authorised translation by ERNEST BARNES, with photogravure frontispiece after Geraard David's painting "S. Francis," and a cover design adapted from Giotto's fresco "S. Francis preaching to the Birds." Crown 8vo. coloured tops. Cloth, 5s. net. Whole limp vellum, silk ties, 12s. 6d. net.

"Without in any way detracting from the peculiar charm of the original legend," Mr. Bailly, with the constructive genius of his nation, has retold the story of the Life of the Saint of Assi with his Companions in the form of a consecutive narrative.

[Published October 26.]

ITALIAN PAINTERS OF THE QUATTROCENTO AND CINQUECENTO.

By WILHELM BODE, General Director of the Royal Museums, Berlin; together with seventy-five reproductions in coloured collotype after the original paintings selected by the Author. The English translation by . . .

To be issued in Fifteen Parts in Card Portfolios (each plate separately mounted in grey and gold—dimensions of mounts about 25 by 19 inches). Price £5 5s. net per Part. The text (a volume in quarto, finely printed and convenient to handle) will accompany Part XV.

* * Part V. now ready: the remainder at intervals of four to six months.

OF THE ENGLISH EDITION OF 100 COPIES 50 ARE RESERVED TO AMERICA. A FEW ENGLISH COPIES REMAIN FOR SUBSCRIPTION.

* * DRAWINGS BY ALBRECHT DÜRER.

An Exhibition of 64 selected Drawings, from the collection by this Master in the Albertina Library, Vienna, reproduced in facsimile collotype, is now OPEN at the MEDICI GALLERIES, 38 Albemarle Street, Piccadilly. Entrance free on presentation of visiting card.

The complete catalogue, post free 2d. stamps, or with miniature illustrations of all subjects, 1s. stamps.

* * The subjects include many water-colours reproduced in the exact colours of the originals, and embrace Figure, Religious, Costume, Architectural, and Decorative Studies, also Birds, Flowers and Animals.

NEW MEDICI PRINTS NOW READY.

Speaking of "Special Plate 1909" the Burlington Magazine for October says: "The subtlety of Giorgione's colouring is conveyed with a fidelity as marvellous as that which reproduces every tiny crack in the aged canvas, and the traces of old varnish which survive here and there in the interstices. For those who cannot study at first hand such a superb facsimile ought to be invaluable. PRINTS LIKE THIS, WHICH ARE AT ONCE TRUE IN GENERAL EFFECT AND WILL STAND THE TEST OF THE MICROSCOPE IN THEIR DETAILS, CAN NEVER BE SUPERSEDED."

The Society's completely illustrated Prospectus, containing details of suitable frames, the annual subscription, &c., post free 6d. stamps. A special list, illustrated, of some 100 Colour-collotype Facsimiles after the Early Flemish, German, and Italian Schools, post free 6d. stamps.

C.S. = Colour Surface. Postage 6d. extra; additional copies in same parcel 1d. each.

No. VIII.	BOTTICELLI	The Birth of Venus	C.S. 35 × 22	25s. od. net.
The price will be raised to 30s. on November 1st.
No. XVIII.	M. DA FORLI	The Archangel Gabriel	C.S. 22½ × 11½	17s. 6d. net.
Occasl. II.	BRAMANTINO	Boy Under a Vine	C.S. 17½ × 13	12s. 6d. net.
" III.	A. DI PRÉDIS (?)	Beatrice d'Este (?) [Milan]	C.S. 20¼ × 13½	12s. 6d. net.
* " IIIA.	A. DI PRÉDIS (?)	Beatrice d'Este (?) [London]	C.S. 17¾ × 12¾	31s. 6d. net.
* The Edition limited to 300 copies of the never before photographed or described version on canvas of the above famous portrait, which is now in a Private Collection in London, is rapidly subscribing.
Spec. Plate '09	GIORGIONE	Landscape with Figures	C.S. 20¼ × 18½	21s. od. net.
English V.	GAINSBOROUGH	The Painter's Daughters	C.S. 20½ × 13½	15s. od. net.
Flemish IV.	P. DE HOOCH	Interior with Soldiers	C.S. 17½ × 15	15s. od. net.

PHILIP LEE WARNER, Publisher to the MEDICI SOCIETY (Ltd.), 38, Albemarle Street, London, W.

and figments and phrases remain. He may not—by such method—achieve the naked Truth. But at least he is sincere in his effort towards that perilous attainment.

SIX NOVELS.*

It is an odd, but an incontestable fact, that the most, if not all, of the truly natural things, are wholly irrational. In the Park, and in more exalted circles of debate, one learns that religion is utterly irrational, and there is a good deal to be said for that position. It is certain that the acts of eating and drinking would be hard to justify in terms of the logical understanding; and it was not until the days of Coleridge and Wordsworth and their successors, that men were brave enough to confess to the mystery and incantation of woods, and streams, and hills. To Smollett and his contemporaries Gothic architecture seemed lunacy in stone. And there is another thing for which it is really very difficult to find a true rationale; that is the act of laughter. Rabelais, who saw into the deep places of the human complex, has told us that laughter is the property of man. True; but why do we laugh? Why, for example, does Mr. Jerome K. Jerome make food not only for reflection—and this Mr. Jerome continually does—but for mirth, restrained or less restrained according to company? Well, here are some examples, which we offer without answering our question:—

"It is unexplainable, the average woman's passion for cupboards. . . . I knew a woman once who was happy—for a woman. She lived in a house with twenty-nine cupboards: I think it must have been built by a woman. They were spacious cupboards, many of them, with doors in no way different from other doors. Visitors would wish each other good night and disappear with their candles into cupboards, staggering out backwards the next moment, looking scared. One poor gentleman, this woman's husband told me, having to go downstairs again for something he had forgotten, and unable on his return to strike anything else but cupboards, lost heart, and finished up the night in a cupboard."

Then, again, there is the description of the "average woman's" contempt for any natural water-supply, whether from wells or tanks. She never believes "that water can be good that does not come from a waterworks. Her idea appears to be that the company makes it fresh every morning from some old family recipe." Mr. Jerome is certainly an orthodox Rabelaisian; he knows that it is better to write of laughter than of tears; and most cordially is "They and I" to be commended to all disciples of the High Pantagrueline Wisdom.

Neither laughter nor tears—rather curious, subtle, and shadowy emotions—are dealt with in "Confessions to My Wife." Mr. Kipling has prophesied against all attempts to unite West with East, and M. de Noussanne has written this singular book to show that the best of Frenchmen and the most charming of Englishwomen are not designed by nature to intermarry. There is no tragedy in the book; Josiane, the English girl, engaged to "Jean René Raymond Desormes, cavalry officer in the French Army," visits her lover's French home and sees the incompatibility of it all: even the Limousin peasants, who seem to Jean worthy and happy folk, strike her as poor, earth-tortured creatures, veritable martyrs of the soil which they till. So Josiane goes on her way, and Jean marries the Frenchwoman to whom these "Confessions" are supposed to be made. It is probable that the "moral" of the tale is a true one, in most instances at all events; and some might say that the gulf between any man and any woman being of necessity a great one—the very differences which make the passion of Love possible tending at the same time to make real understanding difficult—it is unwise to add to the natural and inevitable grounds of disagreement the artificial barriers of race, education, and convention. The problem is an interesting one, well treated by M. de Noussanne.

* "They and I." By Jerome K. Jerome. Hutchinson. 6s.

"Confessions to My Wife." Translated from the French of Henri de Noussanne. By M. Harriett M. Capes. Melrose. 6s.

"A Sword in Ambush." By Lillias Campbell Davidson. Cassell. 6s.

"Great Possessions." By Mrs. Wilfrid Ward. Longmans. 6s.

"The King's Signet." By Morice Gerard. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

"The Rose of Dauphiny." By Philip L. Stevenson. Stanley Paul. 6s.

There has been a discussion going on for some time as to the merits or demerits of the "detective novel." Some experts—real detectives amongst them—have urged that Scotland Yard knows nothing of Sherlock Holmes, that the thief and the murderer are not, in crude fact, found out by the exercise of the deductive faculty. The writer is free to confess that he holds this objection to be altogether frivolous, that he regards the detective story as a rich and variegated and curious pattern, to be compared rather with mazes, and Persian carpets, and such musical forms as Canon and Fugue, than with the tedious and practical transactions of the "Yard." Only there is one proviso to be made; there is no place for the second-rate in the art of detective fiction; if it is not of the best, it is clearly a weariness. And so with the story of plot; if we are to be interested in a plot it must be a very excellent plot. It is to be feared that "A Sword in Ambush" and "Great Possessions" hardly attain the standard indicated. Each story turns on the theme of unjust possessions, and of the misery and dissatisfaction that wealth wrongly held brings on the wrongdoer. The moral is, doubtless, just, but the interest is not absorbing. "A Sword in Ambush" is the simpler tale, but the characters are somewhat shadowy and indistinct. "Great Possessions" is more complicated, more elaborate; but its somewhat bewildering plot is redeemed by the interesting character-study of "Molly," and there are scenes which show the possession of the literary sense, and of even better things than that. "She had the born mystic's love of little kind actions, little presents, things treasured as symbols of the union of spirits, all the more because of their slight material value." It is a profound truth that is indicated in this sentence; and in an age which is apt to believe mysticism to be an affair of signs, wonders, and Eusapia Palladino, it is well to be reminded that the popular opinion is a mistaken one, and that the true wisdom is largely a matter of little things, just as literature and art are largely matters of the alphabet and the paint-box. Between mysticism and occultism there is all the magnum chaos that intervenes between the gospel and the gnosis; and Mrs. Wilfred Ward's remark shows her to be fully aware of the distinction between two things that are often confused.

Sir Walter Scott remarked, shrewdly as usual, that he, as a writer of historical or "costume" novels, had a great advantage over his imitators. Sir Walter wrote out of the abundance of his heart; the study of old "nick-nackets," of old manners and customs, and costumes, and weapons, had been his hobby for years: he was not a very accurate antiquarian, but he was thoroughly devoted to antiquity. But his imitators wrote historical novels because historical novels had become a "business proposition," because such tales were fashionable; and their antiquarian knowledge had been laboriously acquired. It would be harsh to pass this judgment on Mr. Morice Gerard, or on Mr. Philip L. Stevenson; but in each case, though the workmanship is careful and conscientious, one is aware of a certain lack of freshness. "The Rose of Dauphiny" is a tale of the French religious wars of the sixteenth century; "The King's Signet" begins with the escape of King Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. Each period is various, adventurous, and good to write of; but the "properties" seem somewhat worn and dusty. Mr. Gerard's secret chamber is not so secret as it must once have been, and the swords in Mr. Stevenson's duel have lost something of their flashing brightness. The art of romance is, above all, the art of adventure, a passage into strange and unknown territory, into regions where we hold our breath, not knowing what may lie hid in the wood, what figure may not appear on the long white road. It is only an infinite cunning that can take known and familiar figures, and show us that they are in truth strange and unearthly shapes of beauty or of terror.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

EXCEPT to a few curious inquirers the name of Dr. John Dee, astrologer, alchemist, theologian, scientific investigator, mathematician, and mystic, is quite unfamiliar, but his career was so interesting, and throws so odd a light upon the progress of scientific studies in Elizabethan days, that

Hints on taking a cold

Not on how to take a cold; but on how to take a cold in time!

Everybody can catch cold; nothing is easier in this climate; but it is not everybody who knows how to avoid one. Yet it is quite simple.

If you suspect a cold is coming, take a

Mustard Bath

a bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added.

Colman's mustard

Re-appearance of

"THE THRUSH,"

A MONTHLY PERIODICAL FOR THE PUBLICATION OF ORIGINAL POETRY,

Dec. 1st, 1909.

New Feature—Literary Articles on all Subjects.

Contributions (which will be paid for) should be addressed to—

The Editor, "The Thrush" Office,
12 & 13, Henrietta Street,
Covent Garden, W.C.

Publishers: Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

OCTOBER, 1909. Price 6s.

Articles—

1. THE REVISION OF THE UNITED STATES TARIFF.
2. THE WANDERER: GEORGE BORROW.
3. WHAT IS MORALITY?
4. THE LAND FORCES OF THE CROWN: PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.
5. SOME RECENT VERSE.
6. THE LIMITATIONS OF EGYPTIAN ART.
7. THINKERS AND IRONISTS.
8. ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.
9. RECENT POLAR EXPLORATION.
10. CARRYING ON THE KING'S GOVERNMENT.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

Catalogue No. 367. Just Out.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Also a Useful and Comprehensive Catalogue of Current General Literature, Fiction, Science, Art, &c.

"THE FLEET of England is her all in all."—Tennyson.

Now Ready, 2s. 6d. net.
With Illustrations.

THE NAVY LEAGUE ANNUAL

(Corrected to October 10, 1909.)

Founded and Edited by ALAN H. BURGOYNE.

A Popular Book for the Information of the Public upon all matters concerning the progress of the British and Foreign Navies.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 421. OCTOBER, 1909. 6s.

THE NATIONALIZATION OF BRITISH RAILWAYS. By EDGAR CRAMMOND.	THE UPPER ANIO. By Professor JAMES SULLY.
THE UNITED STATES THROUGH FOREIGN SPECTACLES. By JOHN T. MORSE, JUN.	THE DECLARATION OF LONDON.
THE EARLIEST ENGLISH ILLUSTRATIONS OF DANTE. By PAGET TOYNBEE. Illustrated.	SPORT AND DECADENCE.
THE INFLUENCE OF DARWINISM UPON THEOLOGY. By the Rev. F. R. TENNANT.	THE ENGLISH CONCEPTION OF POLICE.
	PORFIRIO DIAZ: SOLDIER AND STATES-MAN.
	THE NEEDS OF THE NAVY.
	ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND RUSSIA: THE ROLE OF THE TRIPLE ENTENTE. By ANDRE CHERADAME. With Two Maps.
	THE NEW RADICALISM.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

6/- for 2/- Post Free
2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF
BARRY'S TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK.
Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes, and a Commentary upon the Psalter. By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo. Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges, 6s. for 2s. Abroad 2s. 2d.; Pastegrain, limp, gilt edges, 7s. 6d. for 3s. 9d.; Abroad 3s. 11d.; post free. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£16 18s. GREECE, HAIFA (FOR GALILEE AND FOR DAMASCUS), JAFFA (FOR JERUSALEM AND BETH-LEHEM), ALEXANDRIA (FOR CAIRO), NAPLES AND MARSEILLE, October 22nd.

Full particulars from the Secretary,
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

ALPINE SPORTS LIMITED beg to announce that they have secured the entire accommodation in the following hotels for the winter season for SKATING, TOBOGGANNING, CURLING, SKI-ING and SLEIGHING:—MONTANA PALACE, VILLARS-SUR-OLLON, the seven principal hotels; MORGINS-LES-BAINS, two hotels; ST. BEATENBERG, two hotels; KANDERSTEG, Hotel VICTORIA, WENGEN, four hotels; LENZERHEIDE, Kurhaus; BALLAIGUES, GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE, &c. For illustrated handbook apply to The Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WHAT DO UNITARIANS BELIEVE AND TEACH?
Send name and address to the Secretary, British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C., and explanatory pamphlets will be forwarded, post free.

AUTHORS AND ARTISTS. Special facilities for placing a work of every description. Particulars from Manager, Literary Department, WIENER AGENCY, LTD., 64, STRAND, LONDON, and Tribune Buildings, New York.

KENDAL (Westmorland). FURNISHED HOUSE to Let Monthly, Ten Beds, Wide Views, Golf Close. T. Wilson Wilson, Kendal.

Miss Charlotte Fell Smith's "The Life of John Dee: An Elizabethan Crystal Gazer" (Constable, 10s. 6d. net) has a much better right to existence than many of the biographies that swell the publishers' lists. Early in his career Dee attracted the notice of Elizabeth and was invited to cast her horoscope, though he had been accused of directing his enchantments at Queen Mary's life. He was acquitted of the charge, and thenceforward Elizabeth consulted him on many occasions, visiting his house at Mortlake, but turning a deaf ear to his petitions for some place that would secure him a livelihood. The only piece of preferment he got was the Wardenship of Christ's College, Manchester, which came when he was in the direst straits. Dee's search for the philosopher's stone and the elixir vitae was pursued in the company of Edward Kelley, a charlatan who robbed him and injured his reputation. Miss Fell Smith's book shows that Dee was a dupe rather than an impostor, and justifies her claim that the attitude of modern men of science to such precursors as Dee is wanting in generosity. Among his other claims to an enlightenment above that of the general body of his contemporaries, it may be said that he advocated the establishment of a national library nearly 200 years before the British Museum library was opened, and that he himself collected 4,000 volumes which were always at the disposal of his friends. Miss Fell Smith's description of Dee's pursuits and travels is capably done, and presents him in an engaging light, though she rates his services to science somewhat too highly.

* * *

MESSRS. METHUEN have issued "A Woman of No Importance" and "Lady Windermere's Fan" (5s. each) in their smaller uniform edition of Oscar Wilde's works. The volumes are tastefully produced, and handier for reading than those of the limited edition. Wilde allowed himself some devices in construction which are ruled out by later dramatists, but it is safe to say that his incisive and witty dialogue will cause him to be read for many years to come.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Oct. 15.	Price Friday morning, Oct. 22.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82 ⁵ / ₈	82 ³ / ₁₆
German Threes	82 ³ / ₈	82
Spanish Fours	93 ³ / ₈	93 ¹ / ₄
Union Pacific	209 ¹ / ₄	207 ¹ / ₄
Steel Common	91 ¹ / ₈	91 ¹ / ₄

THE sensational event of the week occurred on Thursday, when the Directors of the Bank at their usual court decided to raise the Bank rate from 4 to 5 per cent. They had raised it from 3 to 4 per cent. on the previous Thursday, so that the upward movement has been unusually, and quite unexpectedly, rapid. Until last week money in London for short loans was very cheap and abundant, but in order to make its 4 per cent. rate effective, the Bank borrowed freely and removed the superfluous floating supplies, with the result that both money and discounts were driven rapidly upwards towards the official minimum. But the situation in Berlin and New York was such (in consequence of excessive speculation at both centres) that rates abroad have gone up faster than in London, and our 4 per cent. rate proved inadequate to check the outflow of gold, of which Brazil, Egypt, Constantinople, and other places have been in urgent need. Most significant is the fact that Berlin has been importing gold at unprofitable rates and selling stocks freely for several days. In fact, there is a good deal of anxiety and uneasiness there. From the tone of the German Press one gathers that discontent with the new taxes is rife, especially among the beer and tobacco people, and that the Government is very unpopular indeed. Our trade with India and the Straits Settlements is much better, and there is no need to fear the brief spell of dear money which is necessary to enable the Bank of England to replenish its reserve. The stock markets generally and gilt-edged securities in particular, are naturally lower, and it is quite likely that American railway shares will decline rapidly. But in the end no great harm need be done. Speculators ought to have their wings clipped; but London is in no danger, as the open account for a rise is not particularly large apart from the rubber market.

THE AMERICAN MARKET

A market that works on borrowed money as much as the American does is bound to be upset by a sharp rise in money rates, and on Thursday, when the 5 per cent. Bank rate was announced, some curious movements took place in American prices. Union Pacifics, whose rise of a month or two ago to 226 now begins to look rather ridiculous, collapsed at once, and dropped to 206½ in New York—which was either unable or unwilling to support the stock. Other speculative securities fell, too, and a comparison of American prices over the week shows some very remarkable changes. At this time of day it ought not to be necessary to warn people against dabbling in Yankees, but, just to show how extraordinarily variable the market is, I may quote the recent prices of a few speculative stocks:—

	Highest, 1909.	Present.	Fall.
Denver and Rio Grande	55	48 ³ / ₄	—16 ¹ / ₄
Erie first preference... ..	58 ¹ / ₂	49 ¹ / ₄	—9
New York Central	152 ¹ / ₂	138	—14 ¹ / ₄
Southern Pacific	142 ¹ / ₂	132	—10 ¹ / ₂
Union Pacific	226	206 ¹ / ₂	—19 ¹ / ₂

The highest prices are comparatively recent, so that the drop has been very sharp, and is probably not finished yet. The fact is, of course, that the market is completely in the hands of professionals, and so long as they have ample funds to draw upon, they can do what they like with it. When the pinch comes in the money market it is a different story, and we are all waiting to see what will happen now that the interior is withdrawing funds from New York, and London is chary about filling up the gap. It is an interesting position.

SPAIN AND NICARAGUA

Spanish bonds are mainly controlled by Paris, and it is rather odd that the fall since the Morocco war began has been so small. It takes a great deal to make the French investor sell, as the history of Russian credit sufficiently testifies. But the death of Ferrer, the assassination of his prosecutor, and the outburst of indignation in so many parts of the world caused much uneasiness, and the fall of Señor Maura's Ministry was hailed with relief by the Paris Bourse, which hopes to see the war against the Riffs and martial law in Catalonia put an end to by a new Government. The tyranny of President Zelaya in Nicaragua seems likely to be upset, as the revolutionaries appear to have seized some of the principal ports. The Nicaraguan Government is bad, and the people are, perhaps, worse. The best hope of Central America lies in the prospect of increasing friendly supervision from the United States, which has recently created a Court of Arbitration in Costa Rica.

LUCELLUM.

EVANS'

ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

FOR YOUR THROAT AND VOICE.

These Pastilles have a world-wide reputation for their wonderfully soothing and beneficial effects in all Throat troubles.

Should you suffer from Loss of Voice, Hoarseness, Weakness, Irritation and Inflammation of the Vocal Organs, then give Evans' Antiseptic Throat Pastilles a trial. You will be delighted with the result. Give certain relief.

PREPARED TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL.

Of all Chemists, Stores, &c., 1/- and 4/6 per box. Send 1d. stamp for sample box to Evans & Sons, Lescher & Webb, Ltd., Hanover St., Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse imitations.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

Social amenities make necessary the entertainment of your friends. To entertain them successfully is not always easy. And nothing disheartens a host more than a slow evening. The evenings will always be a delight if you have a Billiard Table in the house. An adjournment to the Billiard Room is always welcomed.

RILEY'S COMBINED DINING AND BILLIARD TABLES

will be found most convenient where space is limited. Are made in all sizes. Fitted with Riley's patent automatic action, enabling the table to be converted from Dining to Billiard Table and vice versa in less than a minute. A handsome piece of furniture and a perfect billiard table.

Prices from £13 10s. CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Riley's Standard Tables

(as used in the Championship matches).

These tables are designed on most artistic lines, and built of the finest materials in the best possible manner. They are fitted with low frost-proof cushions, patent pockets, and are fully warranted for ten years. Prices from 55 guineas upwards.

FREE On receipt of postcard, full detailed Illustrated Catalogue of Billiard and Dining Tables, and small or full-sized tables and sundries.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Willow Bank Works, ACCRINGTON.

London Showrooms: 147, ALDERSGATE STREET, E.C.

RILEY'S Billiard Tables

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

Rowntree's Cocoa

has a distinctly rich flavour all its own. It is really delicious.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, R.S.O., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No.: GERRARD 1854.

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children's Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply, the Principal, Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming, Riding. Much outdoor life

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

CO-EDUCATION.

SIDCOT SCHOOL, WINSCOMBE, SOMERSET.

FOUNDED 1808.

80 BOYS. 64 GIRLS. Ages 11-18 years.

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

All particulars from Dr. BEVAN LEAN, Headmaster.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
61, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday
Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"

Book Reviews and Special Literary

Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

THE LONDON CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY has vacancies for three gentlemen as District Secretaries. Commencing salary £150. Candidates should be University Graduates, and should be between 25 and 35 years of age. They should write to the Secretary, C. S. LOCH, Denison House, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W., giving particulars as to their age, places of education, and experience, also stating when they could call for a personal interview.

BANKING.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Three and a-Half per cent. per annum, until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C. 21st October, 1909.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day advanced to 3½ per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,

5, Prince Street, Mansion House. 21st October, 1909.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BOLTON.

THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- weekBRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., BridportBRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, ManagerROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. PrestonBUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First HotelDARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. SaraDEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. JeffersonEASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- dayHADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- dayEDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading HotelGREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per dayGREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. PearlHENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta CourseILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing SeaKEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap RefreshmentsLANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntoshMARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. DouthwaiteLEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either stationLIVERPOOL.*COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing seaLLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. WeaverLYNTON (Devon).*ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acresMALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. WilsonMANCHESTER.

"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. ChallandROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from StationOXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. MilesPORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, ProprietorSOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. TaylorWHITEBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	$\frac{1}{2}$ PAGE.	$\frac{1}{4}$ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages... ..	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52	6d. ..

Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they have just published a new and delightful volume of Stories by W. W. JACOBS. It is entitled SAILORS' KNOTS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

They have also just published THE TYRANT, by Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "The Lonely Lady of Grosvenor Square." Crown 8vo, 6s.

The third Edition is now ready of NORTHERN LIGHTS, by Sir GILBERT PARKER, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SEARCH PARTY, by G. A. BIRMINGHAM, Author of "Spanish Gold," a mine of honest fun, is in its Third Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Messrs. METHUEN have just published twelve interesting books:—

1. THE AUSTRIAN COURT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By Sir HORACE RUMBOLD, late Ambassador at Vienna. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.
2. MARIE ANTOINETTE. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.
3. GOOD COMPANY: a Rally of Men. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. This is uniform with "The Open Road."
4. SHELLEY: the Man and the Poet. By A. CLUTTON BROCK. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
5. THE NINE DAYS' QUEEN: being the Life of the Lady Jane Grey. By RICHARD DAVEY. Edited by MARTIN HUME, M.A. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Romantic History.]
6. THOUGHTS OF A TERTIARY. By ELIZABETH WATERHOUSE, Editor of "A Little Book of Life and Death." Pott 8vo, 1s. net.
7. ONE HUNDRED MASTERPIECES OF SCULPTURE. With an Introduction and Descriptive Notes by G. F. HILL. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. A splendid book.
8. THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON. Edited by J. B. BURY, Litt.D. In 7 vols. Vol. I., 10s. 6d. net. This is a completely new Edition, reset, with many illustrations and new Maps, and is a most desirable library edition.
9. THE INCOMPARABLE LIDDONS. By Mrs. CLEMENT PARSONS, Author of "Garriek and his Circle." Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
10. THE COURT OF A SAINT. By WINIFRED F. KNOX. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. This is a Life of St. Louis of France.
11. AIR AND HEALTH. By RONALD C. MACFIE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [New Library of Medicine.]
12. MY PETS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by A. R. ALLINSON. With 16 illustrations by V. LECOMTE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GENERAL LITERATURE

THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE. A New Edition, reset in 12 vols. fcap. 8vo, 5s net each.

1. LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME. 2. THE DUCHESS OF PADUA. 3. POEMS (including "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" and "The Sphinx"). 4. LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN. 5. A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE. 6. AN IDEAL HUSBAND. 7. THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST.

TREMENDOUS TRIFLES. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]

"Delightful to read."—Daily News.
"What pleases in this lively and amusing volume is its agile wit."—Morning Leader.

ONE DAY AND ANOTHER. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]

"The essays are inimitably refreshing."—Morning Leader.

A WANDERER IN PARIS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 16 illustrations in Colour by WALTER DEXTER, and 32 from Photographs after Old Masters, crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"We do not hesitate to pronounce this fascinating volume a perfect model of its class."—Daily Telegraph.

DARWINISM AND MODERN SOCIALISM. By F. W. HEADLEY. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

ROME. By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of "The Cities of Umbria." With 16 illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, and 12 other illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

This is the third volume in the series of books, that will eventually include all Italy, which Mr. Hutton is writing.

OLD ETRURIA AND MODERN TUSCANY. By MARY LOVETT CAMERON. With 32 illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE LAST KING OF POLAND AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. By R. NISBET BAIN. With 16 illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Morning Post.]

"The ground is covered with really exhaustive scholarship."

HANDEL. By R. A. STREATFEILD, Author of "Modern Music and Musicians." With 12 illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [New Library of Music.]

NAPOLEON'S BROTHERS. By A. H. ATTERIDGE. With 24 illustrations, demy 8vo, 18s. net.

"A complete book and unfailingly well written."—Daily News.

A ROSE OF SAVOY: Marie Adélaïde of Savoy, DUCHESSE DE BOURGOGNE, MOTHER OF LOUIS XV. By H. NOEL WILLIAMS, Author of "Five Fair Sisters." With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 16 other illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE COURT OF LOUIS XIII. By K. A. PATMORE. With 16 illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.]

ST. TERESA OF SPAIN. By HELEN H. COLVILL. With 20 illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A fascinating book."—Illustrated London News.
"A most sympathetic study of Teresa."—Daily Chronicle.

FICTION

NORTHERN LIGHTS. By Sir GILBERT PARKER, M.P., Author of "The Weavers." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"These stories will be read by future generations."—Morning Post.
"The stories are very readable and attractive, full of movement and colour."—Globe.

THE SEARCH PARTY. By G. A. BIRMINGHAM, Author of "Spanish Gold." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"Full of humour, humanity, and real interest."—Westminster Gazette.
"As hilarious a book as you could desire; witty and rich in the genius of mirth."—Daily News.

THE SEVERINS. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK, Author of "The Kinsman." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"The charm, ease, and freshness of the book are altogether delightful."—Morning Leader. [Times.]

"A clever book; the situations are always well conceived."

SPLENDID BROTHER. By W. PETT RIDGE, Author of "Erb," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"There could not be a better proof of Mr. Pett Ridge's literary power than is given by this novel."—Spectator.
"It is a beautiful book."—Liverpool Post.

THE PRICE OF LIS DORIS. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "Brothers All," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The pictures of character are wonderfully firm and clear; their intimacy and vitality is surprising. This is a strong and valuable novel."—Morning Leader.

JACK CARSTAIRS OF THE POWER HOUSE. By SIDNEY SANDYS. Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This is a thrilling story of engineering and adventure.

THE BRIDE. By GRACE RHYS, Author of "The Wooing of Sheila." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An extraordinarily interesting book."—Guardian.
"This fine, delicate, moving novel is a real book."—Daily News.

A ROYAL INDISCRETION. By RICHARD MARSH. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Replete with a most delightful humour."—Manchester Courier.
"An ingenious idea, used freshly and amusingly."—Morning Leader.

IN AMBUSH. By MARIE VAN VORST, Author of "The Sentimental Adventures of Jimmy Bulstrode." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A story which will assuredly hold the reader."—Edinburgh Evening News.

DEEP SEA WARRIORS. By BASIL LUBBOCK. With 4 illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"A fascinating book, a real book of the sea."—Daily Mail.
"All those who love the sea should read this book."—World.

TOIL OF MEN. By ISRAEL QUERIDO. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A vivid, powerful, and terrible description of a year in the lives of certain Dutch peasants."—Times.

THE FIRST ROUND. By ST. JOHN LUCAS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The book is exceedingly rich in observation, interest and intellectual reactions."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A novel written with genuine literary art."—Standard.

THE COLUMN OF DUST. By EVELYN UNDERHILL. Author of "The Grey World," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is a book to set one dreaming; the style is terse, yet touched with beauty and feeling."—Evening Standard.

THE BURNT OFFERING. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN (Mrs. Cotes), Author of "Those Delightful Americans." Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SQUIRE'S DAUGHTER. By ARCHIBALD MARSHALL, Author of "Exton Manor." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"It is an admirable picture of a pleasant land: every one in it is alive, every one is English. A graceful, gentle, entirely charming story."—Morning Leader.

LORDS OF THE SEA. By EDWARD NOBLE, Author of "The Edge of Circumstance." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"A great, almost tremendous drama."—Daily Chronicle.
"Mr. Noble has once more proved himself a master of craft."—Westminster Gazette.

AVENGING CHILDREN. By MARY E. MANN, Author of "The Parish of Hilby." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"It is a charming story, excellent in design and execution."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THIS DAY'S MADNESS. By MAUDE ANNESLEY, Author of "The Wine of Life." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"A vastly entertaining novel."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Miss Annesley writes with a great freshness, buoyancy, and vigour. From the first she grips the reader."—Liverpool Courier.

HAPPINESS. By MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON, Author of "The Enchanted Garden." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"Full of the comedy and the tragedy that makes so much of life."—Scotsman.

LOVE AND THE WISE MEN. By PERCY WHITE, Author of "The West End." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"The whole thing is done with great address, and the characterisation is crisp. A clever and enjoyable piece of work."—Daily Chronicle.

GIANNELLA. By Mrs. HUGH FRASER, Author of "The Slaking of the Sword." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"The story is a very charming one, and told with an easy grace of style."—Sheffield Telegraph.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"Exhales the very breath of modern adventure. The most jaded lover of romance can hardly fail to fall a victim to its fascinations."—Daily Telegraph.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 5.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	177	The Indian Deportations. By
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Frederic Mackarness, M.P. ...	195
THE ISSUES OF THE BUDGET.		Liberal Women and the
BY THE CHANCELLOR OF		Suffrage. By Fred. C. Cony-
THE EXCHEQUER ...	180	beare, F.B.A., Catherine Ryle,
The Coming Storm ...	182	and M.A. ...	195
A Sham Passion and a Real		The Denial of Supplies. By
Dilemma ...	183	Law ...	196
A Sentimental Journey ...	184	Government and Bureaucracy.
A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-		By A.I. Tillyard, G. Montagu
MAN ON THE ENGLISH		Harris ...	197
REVOLUTION NOW PEND-		Reaction and Revolution. By
ING. FROM THE THREAT		R. Henderson Smith ...	197
TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS		Agrarian Law in Hungary. By
TO REJECT THE BUDGET.—		Jos. Sachse ...	198
II. By H. W. V. Temperley ...	185	POETRY:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		The Re-Incarnation. By
The Fear of Socialism ...	186	Frederick Niven ...	198
The Coutisses of the Super-		THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	200
natural ...	187	Books to be Read ...	200
With Horn and Hound ...	189	REVIEWS:—
The City Garden ...	190	Lecky ...	202
SHORT STUDIES:—		Mr. Watson's New Poems ...	204
Milking. By Edward Thomas ...	191	The Byron Mystery ...	206
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		A Medley of French Characters ...	208
The Indian Decentralisation		The Birth of Modern Italy ...	210
Report. By Sir W. Wedder-		Blue Bonnet and Mitre ...	212
burn ...	192	Hand Made v. Machine Made ...	214
THE DRAMA:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Bohemia and Bathos. By		Art in Great Britain and
William Archer ...	193	Ireland ...	216
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		French Vignettes ...	218
Gladstone and Money Bills.		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
By the Rev. J. Frome		Lucellum ...	218
Wilkinson ...	195

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

A PAUSE in the critical situation which the country is fast approaching has been secured by an agreement between the rival leaders to defer the second reading of the Budget in the House of Lords till November 22nd. A day later the House of Commons will meet, after nearly three weeks' adjournment. We doubt whether the pause will affect the decision of the Tory "backwoodsmen," led by the brewers and the Protectionists, to throw out the Bill, to disregard all counsels, however exalted, against such a course, and to flout Lord Lansdowne, who is obviously opposed to it. The Liberal Party must, therefore, prepare itself for immediate and vital action towards the end of November.

THE fifth of the series of bye-elections which have taken place since the Budget was introduced has been less satisfactory than its predecessors, but it has yielded the same result, a majority of votes for, and a minority against. Mr. Dumphreys, the Protectionist victor at Bermondsey, polled 4,278 votes; Mr. Leigh Hughes, the Liberal pro-Budget man, 3,291 votes; and Mr. Salter, the Socialist supporter, 1,435 votes. In other words, Bermondsey contains 4,726 friends of the Budget and 4,278 opponents. The result, fought under every disadvantage—the presence of a famous local "character" as the Conservative champion, the division into two camps of the Progressive strength, and all the confusion and doubt which such a distraction of forces brings about, and the fact that the brilliant Liberal candidate fought an improvised battle as a complete stranger to the constituency—should not cause Liberals a moment's discouragement. It may, indeed, like the first Southwark election, push the peers over the precipice. And THAT need not daunt us either.

MEANWHILE, on the general feeling about the Budget, more especially in the rural districts, we print the following communication from "A Country Candidate": "Strange things are happening in rural England. At C—— last night, the village school was so packed for the Budget League meeting that there was no standing-room left. No such audience has been seen there, even in the height of an election contest. C—— is eight miles from a railway station, in a purely rural parish, and the meetings hitherto have been small and absolutely quiet. Last night the principal man in the parish, a retired major, came with two or three friends to shout out interjections and to ask questions. The answers given by the speakers were wildly applauded, and the outspoken attacks of a local orator on the quondam potentate were greeted with howls of delight. There is much good humor and little bitterness in all this. It is simply that we are waking up. We are suddenly beginning to think that the fear, which has brooded so long over the land, is largely a groundless one. The democratic spirit, familiar enough in the towns, is making its appearance among the fields and along the miry lanes."

"SEVERAL months ago, before the Budget League was even thought of, I wrote in your columns that the Lloyd George Budget, once explained, was immensely popular. It has now been so widely explained that there are few districts where it is not fairly well understood. It has been an education. Direct and indirect taxation, the nature of rent, the distribution of wealth, the incidence of mineral royalties, the relations of capital to labor, these and other problems have been raised, and raised for the first time. They are grasped very vaguely, but they are felt to exist. In crude form, but often with apt or quaint illustration, they are handled to-day in the barn, in the smithy, in the public house. They will not, for they cannot, be dropped or forgotten. It is a golden moment for the cause of reform. The demand for fairer social conditions is being put forward, but it has not yet developed into a class war."

"WHETHER it will so develop or not, depends largely on the coming election. The new demand will be fought, bitterly and hard. The Unionists are as well aware of the real issues at stake as we are. Workmen will be dismissed from work, or evicted from their houses. Subscriptions, on which the success of some little local enterprise depends, will be withdrawn. Corruption will supplement intimidation. If the election comes in January, Christmas gifts and parish charities will be arranged with a keen eye to the ballot-box. Beer will flow freely from unseen sources. The armory of wealth, never fully utilised yet, will be employed to the best advantage. The contest will be no easy one. Yet, if the Liberal Government is returned to power, the extremes of class feeling will, I think, be avoided. The forces of reaction will throw up the sponge. The conflict of ideals and interests will continue, but it will not deepen into mutual hatred. That, however, is the alternative we shall have to face if the Liberal programme of social and financial reform is arrested in its inception."

* * *

ON Tuesday Mr. Balfour, in a speech of outrageous, but calculated, violence, denounced Mr. Ure in terms never within our recollection applied by one public man of eminence to another. Mr. Balfour's assumption was that Mr. Ure, the Lord Advocate, had repeatedly stated that if the Tory Party came in it would repudiate the obligation to provide old age pensions. He declared this statement to be "a frigid and calculated lie," "carefully thought out," "deliberately coined," and then "put into legitimate circulation." He also said that Mr. Ure had repeated the calumny, which he must have known was a calumny, to audience after audience. He had also committed a "crime" against the pensioners, and had acted with "the deliberate object" of perverting public opinion.

* * *

THIS insolent language, addressed to a man of very high character and obvious sincerity, rests, so far as we know, on no statement of Mr. Ure's which deserved it. The Lord Advocate's charge was in the nature of an argument, which he fully developed at Rochdale on the following day. Mr. Ure showed, first, that Mr. Balfour had put forward Tariff Reform as the only possible alternative to the Budget, which he repudiated, with all its works. He excluded from his Protectionist scheme any increase in the proportion of food taxes to be paid by workmen, and any tax on raw material. That left him dependent for revenue on duties (ten per cent.) on foreign manufactures. But such duties, after allowing for the cost of collection and the exclusion of effectually protected goods, would only provide five millions' worth of taxes, instead of the fourteen millions required to fill the deficit. Mr. Balfour would, therefore, have to choose between breaking one kind of pledge and breaking another. Supposing that he chose not directly to break the promise over old age pensions, for which he never voted, but to substitute a scheme of contributory pensions? Statesmen in a quandary have done such things before.

* * *

THE Prime Minister briefly announced on Wednesday that the Lords' amendments to the Irish Land Bill would be dealt with under a single motion, which would enable them to be put as a whole from the chair. This probably means the rejection of the substantial amendments of the Lords, but not necessarily of all the changes they have introduced into the Bill. Essentially, however, it will be restored to its old form. The Lords treated the original measure as a mere sketch and substituted for it a Bill with different machinery, different intentions, and different objects. One peer went so far as to propose that the provision of funds should be left to a committee consisting of a representative of the landlords and a representative of the tenants, with Lord Macdonnell and Lord Milner as "amici curiæ." The British Exchequer and the British taxpayer were left out of this quaint tribunal.

* * *

THE report on the clauses dealing with the Licensing duties was concluded on Wednesday, the Government making some further concessions to hotels and restaurants, and proposing reduced duties where the receipts from the sale of intoxicants formed less than two-fifths (instead of one-third) of the total receipts. The general policy of the duties was re-argued on Tuesday, when the Prime Minister powerfully defended the call for additional taxation from a class to which the State had granted a valuable monopoly, while he ridiculed the possibility of adhering to the 1880 scale. Mr. Sherwell, indeed, pointed out that, excluding hotels valued at over £3,000, the old average duty was £21, while the future average duty would be at £49. Mr. Balfour, however, insisted that many publicans would be swept out of existence, that this would give them "a sense of rancorous wrong," that they would be "oppressed," and that the licensing trade would feel that the House of Commons could not be trusted to deal fairly with it. Nothing, he said, would persuade him that this was "legitimate finance." His language, though very guarded, is thought to have given slight encouragement to the policy of rejection. It is significant that, on the same day, the Tory leader declared that it was clear that the controversies now being raised in Lords and Commons must soon be transferred to a higher power than either.

* * *

THE Tsar, after seven years, has paid his return visit to the King of Italy, and the toasts have contained the customary fluid generalities. M. Isvolsky gives some solidity to them by saying that Italy and Russia have identical interests in "the preservation of peace, the maintenance of the status quo in the Near East, and the development of the autonomy of the Balkan peoples." The unofficial Italian commentators make no doubt that the visit means an important addition to Italy's power of resisting Austria in the Balkans. To judge from the Press of the "Triple Entente," the particular group of Powers of which England and France are the centre has been strengthened, and the new European balance of power has received its finishing touch. There is a good deal of diplomatic fudge in all this, but the cant becomes a little perilous when the Temps says that now the peace of Europe is threatened only by the Socialists. The plain truth of the matter is that the cement of the Triple Entente is much more hatred of Germany than love of peace, and if the Triple Entente is to be a new Holy Alliance against Socialism as well as against Germany, it contains graver seeds of peril than even its critics have hitherto suspected.

* * *

THE dramatic eviction of the Conservative Cabinet in Spain by the Liberals seems to have violated the conventions of Spanish politics. Some of Senor Moret's old friends are disturbed, and Senor Maura, in a speech of singular violence, has put the Liberal Party outside the pale along with Anarchists—tactics closely resembling those which the Protectionist Reactionaries adopt here. Senor Maura is a great political power, but, on the other hand, the Republicans and Socialists, who are now in alliance, have begun a campaign designed to make his return to politics impossible. As the conventions of Spanish politics are responsible for the ruinous state of the country, there is some prospect now of the old game of the Ins and Outs ending at least for a time and of some real reform work being taken in hand. Senor Moret has not yet officially proclaimed his policy, but unofficially he has made it known that the operations in Morocco—where the Spanish army is in a bad way—will not be extended but brought to a close as quickly as possible. He approves the execution of Senor Ferrer, but apparently is against cold-blooded repression continued months after the trouble is over. So that an amnesty and measures of conciliation may be expected.

* * *

PRINCE ITO, the foremost of modern Japanese statesmen, was shot dead on Tuesday at Harbin in the presence of M. Kokovsteff, with whom he was about to enter into important negotiations. Prince Ito was born in 1838, a Samurai of humble extraction, and by sheer ability he forced his way rapidly to the front. He was one of the first Japanese to travel in the West, and what he learned during his four years' stay in Europe he applied in his own country as Minister of Public Works. At the age of thirty-four he introduced railways and telegraphs, and modernised Japanese finance and Japanese political institutions, and he was four times Premier. It was during his Ministry that the war with China was carried on and he led Japan along the road to the Russian war. His great administrative talents marked him out for the mission of absorbing Korea, and in the sense that he secured complete Japanese control and recast the whole Government without provoking foreign protests he was successful. But his methods were harsh and he did little to check the ruthless exploitation of the Koreans by his countrymen. Korea was swept by revolt, and hatred of Japan became Korean patriotism.

* * *

AFFAIRS in Turkey have just taken two notable steps forward. The Young Turks have decided that things are settled enough for a return to something like normal constitutional methods, and they have realised that they cannot push Ottoman conformity too far or too fast. In accordance with the first decision the Committee of Union and Progress has converted itself from a secret society into an ordinary political party, and the army has taken an oath not to intervene in politics. In accordance with the second an agreement has been made with the Patriarchs to recognise them as in some respects the representatives of their nationalities. It would be too optimistic to hope that the Young Turks will in an instant throw off the habits of the secret society or that the army will be able to carry out its self-denying ordinance with perfect fidelity. But it is plain that the Young Turks appreciate what is implied in constitutional institutions, and think that the critical period of transition is passing. Still less likely is the arrangement with the Patriarchs to be permanent, for the nationalities are the Turkish problem. But even a temporary settlement implies that the Young Turks are modifying their rigid Imperialism and are on the way towards a saner and more prudent handling of the most difficult political problem that faces them.

* * *

THE past week has offered several tests of political sentiment in Germany. There have been State elections in Saxony and Baden and Berlin, and a bye-election to the Reichstag in Coburg, and in every instance the Socialists have exhibited astonishing strength. They carried Coburg, which had been held by the National Liberals ever since its existence as a constituency; they increased immensely their votes and their membership in the Saxon and Baden Diets, chiefly at the expense of Conservatives, Clericals, and National Liberals; and they again won the Berlin seats in the bye-elections to the Prussian Landtag. In Saxony, the franchise has been altered since the last elections, so that comparison is difficult; but in Baden the Socialist vote has gone up some seventy per cent. The parties that voted the finance reform or opposed it with least vigor have suffered most, and there is no doubt that the electorate is voting Socialist as a vigorous protest against that most unpopular measure. Whether or not the present Socialist wave is enduring, nobody in Germany questions that the check inflicted on the Socialists by Prince Bülow was a mere episode, and that the Socialists will take ample revenge at the next Reichstag elections.

THE sending of a Russian army into Finland seems to have been postponed; the Government, we are told, was misled by some obscure Finnish powers into anticipating a revolt. The incorporation of the Finnish province of Viborg into Russia has likewise been put off, or is to be carried out gradually. That it is to be carried out seems certain; the reactionaries and the military men want it done, and even M. Homiakoff, the Speaker of the Duma, says "it is impossible to pass judgment." Meanwhile the new Finnish Senate of Russian nominees has bowed to the Tsar's decree for a subsidy of £800,000 in lieu of military service. It is impossible for foreigners to decide the niceties of constitutional law raised by M. Stolypin's Finnish policy, and it is also impossible to deny that the curious position of Finland in the Russian Empire does raise some difficult problems. But it is equally impossible to approve the methods of M. Stolypin. The tangle of Russo-Finnish relations cannot be satisfactorily adjusted except by mutual agreement. What the Russian Government is doing is to settle them of itself, and ride rough-shod over the will of the Finnish people, as though M. Stolypin was at least as anxious to cripple the constitution of the one relatively free province in the Empire as to abolish inconveniences arising from the uncertainty of the respective legal rights of the Russian and Finnish Governments.

* * *

ON Sunday the Secretary for Scotland released the five Suffragettes who were sentenced at Dundee for attempting to break up Mr. Churchill's meeting. These women had already undergone a fast of ninety-six hours—a quite sufficient punishment for the not very serious offence of which they were guilty. No attempt was made to feed them by force, and here, again, we think that Lord Pentland has shown his wisdom. We imagine that he acted with the consent of the Home Secretary, and we cannot see why the precedent thus set should not be followed in all cases where the offence is trivial and has a distinct and easily recognisable political color. Some of the recent sentences have not been wanting in a touch of vindictiveness on the part of the magistrates, or, at all events, of the irritation which this unhappy conflict has aroused. In such cases it is, we think, all the more incumbent to keep the law on the side of tact and leniency.

* * *

THE Committee for establishing a national theatre as a memorial of the tercentenary of Shakespeare's death has issued an appeal signed by the Lord Mayor of London, Lord Lytton, and Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, for the sum of £500,000. Half of this sum will be devoted to an endowment fund, and the other half to the purchase of a site and to building and equipment. On Saturday a resolution moved by Mr. Birrell at the Mansion House pledged the chief local authorities to the support of the scheme, which will have behind it the authority of the Crown, of the learned societies, of the municipalities, and of the Imperial Dominions. Local committees will be set up for its promotion.

* * *

WE believe that Mr. Herbert Gladstone is to be the first Governor-General of South Africa. The selection is a fortunate one, and there will be special satisfaction in the thought that the first representative of the British Crown in the new Federation is to be the son of the man whose portrait is seen in thousands of Colonial homes, and whose memory is deeply cherished there.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ISSUES OF THE BUDGET.

BY THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

[All Rights Reserved.]

THERE are ominous signs that we may be approaching one of the greatest Constitutional struggles waged in this country for over 250 years. If the struggle comes, it is a subject for gratification that it should arise over a measure which probably raises, in a clearer and more decisive fashion than any other legislative proposal within living memory, some of the most important issues that divide Liberalism from Toryism. There is the question of Free Trade and Protection. Should taxation be used as a means of artificially raising prices so as to enrich a few at the expense of the rest of the population? I observe that this week the "Times" dwells upon the advantage of keeping up the prices of wheat in this country in the interests of agriculture, and as experience proves that the landlords constituted the only agricultural class that profited by that expedient when it was tried before, it means that the cost of living is to be permanently enhanced for over forty millions of people in order to benefit a group of persons who barely number a few thousands. The frantic efforts made by the Tariff Reformers to defeat the Budget prove that they at any rate are fully alive to the fact that when it has become law it will make it much more difficult for any succeeding Government to carry through the great operation which Protectionists have in contemplation for passing on the burden of taxation from the banking accounts of the rich to the bread and meat of the multitude.

That is not the only fiscal issue raised by the Budget. There are others of equal importance. Should taxation be borne by those who can best afford to bear it or by those who can least afford to pay? Should it fall on the necessities or on the superfluities of life? Most momentous question of all, has the time not arrived for the State to call to a reckoning those who have secured valuable monopolies at the expense of the community, and too often abused those monopolies to its detriment? And when you come to the purposes to which the State ought to devote its revenues, should not the national resources be charged with the avoidance and prevention of unmerited poverty and distress? Lastly, has the State no responsibilities for the organised development of the neglected wealth of the land? All these fertile and suggestive questions are raised by this year's Budget. As a constitutional conflict between Lords and Commons is, having regard to the events of the last few years, inevitable in the immediate future, I think it is well it should be finally and definitely challenged over a proposal, or rather a series of proposals, which embodies so much of the Liberal plan for dealing with the social problems which confront statesmanship throughout the world.

It may be said that these projects are not a part of the Budget upon which the Lords will be called upon to pronounce. But personally I look on the Budget as a part only of a comprehensive scheme of fiscal and social reform—the setting up of a great insurance scheme for the unemployed, and for the sick and infirm, the creation, through the Development Bill, of machinery for the regeneration of rural life. All these constitute as essential and vital parts of the Budget as the taxation of ground values and the imposition of a super-tax.

The mistake made by the Liberal Government of 1894 will not be repeated. Sir William Harcourt's great financial proposals raised a huge revenue for the State, but it was not hypothecated by the author and his colleagues to any specific purpose. The result was that when the Tory Government came into power they reaped the abundant harvest sown by Sir William Harcourt, and proceeded to squander it on the most reckless and wasteful enterprises. The very first year two millions of the yield was voted practically to arrest the decline in landlords' incomes due to the fall in agricultural rents. That sum soon went into the pockets of the landowning class. It ought to have been devoted to a well-conceived plan for aiding and improving agriculture, for assisting the establishment of small holdings, for improving rural transport and organizing co-operation, so as to help farmers, great and small, to bring their produce to market under conditions which would enable them to compete successfully with the foreigner, for the endowment of scientific research in agriculture, and for the training of the population engaged on the soil. Had that use been made of the £2,000,000 expended under the Agricultural Rates Act, not merely would the agricultural community have derived a hundred times as much benefit as they have ever received from that barren grant towards rates, but the nation as a whole would have profited in the enrichment of its land. It would be safe to say that even the landlords themselves would have now been deriving much more advantage, direct as well as indirect, from such an enlightened expenditure than from the crude dole so precipitately and unintelligently handed over to them out of the yield of Sir William Harcourt's Budget taxes.

What was done with the balance of that yield? Can any one point to one useful national enterprise promoted by it?

What was left after the landlords had enjoyed the first cut was frittered away over futile expenditure on armaments. How futile that expenditure was the South African war demonstrated to the world. It was part of my plan in raising a revenue for the urgent national needs of the hour to raise it by means which in succeeding years would grow into a substantial and a swelling surplus. It was also part of the same plan that this surplus should be earmarked from the outset, in so far as the declaration of the Government could accomplish that object, to ends which might in themselves be beneficent and fruitful. That is why I devoted so considerable a portion of what would have been even otherwise an overburdened Budget statement, to an elaboration of the schemes sanctioned by the Government for social reform and national development.

The Protectionist Party in this country are more alarmed about these schemes than about our methods of taxation. They recognise that these plans when matured will appreciably increase the bank balance of Liberalism. For that reason, even if the Budget goes through, I predict that another concerted effort will be made to rouse a fresh naval or military panic, so as to rush the Government into the criminal extravagance of unnecessary armaments on land and sea. A successful agitation of that kind would bankrupt social reform, and the enormous advantage which would otherwise be gained by means of the Budget surplus would be completely thrown away. Nothing would be left for our pains but the bare taxes. So there will be the usual crop of rumors about German plans and preparations. We know now how little foundation existed for the last scare. In the light of established facts the March fright which shook Britain and convulsed the Colonies looks rather foolish. Mr. Balfour's twenty-five German "Dreadnoughts" in 1912 have, for the moment, disappeared from the stage. The sensational drama of a foreign invasion has ceased to draw. It is not now to the interests of the Tory Party to dwell too much on the "grave national emergency" whilst the country sees them fighting with grim tenacity in the House of Commons against contributing a penny towards the fund which the Government are raising to meet it. But when the taxes are established, the Tory members will strive to divert their produce from the channel of fruitful reform, which may win gratitude for the party which initiates it, to the barren waste which ends in popular disappointment and national restlessness or even disaster. Liberals will have themselves to blame if they lack the perspicacity and firmness to resist these manufactured cries of national danger.

I sincerely hope that our schemes of social reform will not end with the establishment of a national system of insurance. The Budget has revealed the intensity and the universality of the interest taken in the land question in this country. It affects not merely every class, but every industry. My opinion as to the feeling in the country on this subject is not in the least affected by the result of the Bermondsey election. We have had five bye-elections since the introduction of the Bill. They all showed a majority of voters for the Budget, and Bermondsey is no exception to this rule. And if a comparison is instituted between the ante-Budget and the post-Budget contests, it will reveal a startling change in the electoral prospects of Liberalism. Bermondsey may perhaps indicate that the London democracy has not up to the present grasped the importance of the land question to the same extent as the rest of Britain. A rational land system lies at the very root of national well-being. Liberalism will commit one of the most fatal blunders of its career if it allows this question to rest until it is settled. The real meaning of the enthusiasm aroused by the Budget is that the country has risen in revolt against the land monopoly. It has impoverished our rural districts, it has driven old industries away from our villages, and has prevented the establishment of new ones; it has emptied the Highlands, and scattered the robust population from which flowed the most splendid material for the defence of the country to the ends of the earth. It has cramped the natural, healthy growth of our towns. Streets which might have been filled with real homes, affording ample breathing space to restore the energies of our laboring population, in all ranks of life, have been crushed into airless blocks of unsightly buildings which are the eye-sore of our great cities and a danger to civilisation. Traders, manufacturers, professional men, business men, builders and workmen, in town and country, have long been smouldering with disaffection against this oppression of landlordism, and with the Budget their discontent has burst into flame. If Liberalism leaves the matter there and does not substitute some more rational system, it must inevitably suffer for its lack of courage and foresight.

The Budget campaign must be the beginning and not the end of the Liberal effort in land reform. The intelligent foreigner who supplies the Tariff Reform party with ideas has foreseen that the British democracy are profoundly dissatisfied with the conditions under which land is now owned and managed. He has therefore pressed upon his leaders—and has met with some measure of acceptance—a scheme of State purchase. But the success of such a scheme must necessarily depend on the price paid for the land. If the extravagant prices which have hitherto accompanied every acquisition of land for public or industrial purposes are to rule in future, the peasant proprietary of Mr. Ellis Barker is doomed to a subsidised insolvency. The new State valuation must be the basis for all plans of communal purchase. On this basis municipalities ought to buy the land which is essential to the development of their towns. And the State could also buy up land necessary to the policy of re-creating rural life in Britain. We are pledging credit to the extent of some scores of millions for the purpose of giving Ireland a fresh start in life, freed from the crippling influences of landlordism. Is nothing to be done for Britain? The Budget has excited a real hope in the breast of the people as to the answer which the Liberal Party are prepared at last to give to that question. The future of Liberalism depends on the courage and the firmness with which the party faces the task of realising that hope.

DAVID LLOYD GEORGE.

THE COMING STORM.

THE Liberal Party and the people of this country may, we think, now take it for granted that the House of Lords will destroy the Budget, thus depriving the House of Commons of the source and centre of its age-long authority, and arrogating to itself the power, superior in effect to that of the Throne, of dismissing Ministries and dictating the course of national policy. The day after that event, every power in the Constitution will have suffered a shock. The power of custom and tradition, which regulates the balance of forces, will have been seriously, if not fatally, weakened. The Monarchy will have been enfeebled, even if not repelled by the rejection of its counsels. The representatives of the people will have suffered in the two main sources of their strength. They will have lost the uncontrolled power of the purse, built up under Plantagenets and Tudors and Stuarts, and continually fortified since the Revolution. And they will have sustained a wide breach in the equally vital and deeply grounded doctrine of the responsibility of the Executive to the elected Chamber. As for the two political parties hitherto enjoying an equality of opportunity with their fellow-countrymen, the Liberals may consider themselves disinherited of their rights under the present Constitutional order, and shut out from all future share in government under the new tyranny set up by the Lords. The Tories will have undergone a change of a different but to them a not less fatal aspect, though its immediate consequence will be psychological even more than political. They will have ceased to be a Conservative party in any sense of the word. They will be the fully responsible authors of a Revolution comparable in importance to any sudden change that has ever overtaken a modern State, and will be liable to all the perils, accidents, and reprisals that a revolutionary period entails.

These being the facts and consequences of the overthrow of the Budget by the House of Lords, let us next examine the character of the parties and the circumstances responsible for an act of this magnitude. The first truth is that the overthrow of the old British Constitution will be brought about by the pressure of the drink trade on the Tory Party, by the threat of a withdrawal of what is at once the strongest and the basest asset in the finance and the popular strength of the Opposition. The second most powerful factor is the organised effort of the Protectionist Party to destroy the Budget as the main obstacle to its scheme for the taxation of labor and industry for the benefit of all rents and some selected profits. An equally powerful volume of pressure comes from the landed interest, which sees the community released, under the valuation scheme, from the immense grip it possessed on every form of industrial and social activity.

But the power of these three elements depends on an equally important phase of the political situation, namely, the demoralisation of the Tory Party. All the movements we have described have come from the ranks, or rather the depths, of Toryism. Mr. Balfour has done nothing to forward them, just as he has done nothing to check them. He is drifting to Revolution, as he drifted to Protection, because, save in the unreal contentions of Parliamentary debate, he has never led the Tory Party. Its policy is still directed by the adventurer who led it to disaster four years ago, and who will now complete from his sick bed the ruin he planned and executed in the full vigor of his powers. Under that veiled, but still effective, direction, the entire political country has already been divided up between "Tariff Reformers" and "Socialists," as if Liberalism and Conservatism counted for nothing, and England hung on the verge of a dramatic plunge into the void. Not less reckless than this disposition of forces is the selection of the means by which the great political change is to be brought about. The most reactionary and antiquated of hereditary chambers, with a direct financial stake in the controversy before the country, is summoned to break down our unwritten laws and customs, so as to let in a fiscal on the top of a constitutional Revolution. Thus does British Conservatism turn the sword on its own bosom, despising the forces that give it strength and beckoning to those that intend or imply its fall. Well may the "Edinburgh Review" suggest that, if it comes to exceeding constitutional powers, it may be not the Tory peer, but the Radical Prime Minister, with a deposed and outraged House of Commons at his back, who will turn such a situation to account. When custom goes, as even Sir William Anson, rejecting his written testimony on the Constitution, is willing that it should go, it is the party of tradition, not that of innovation, which suffers.

Indeed, if the storm is to burst, the Liberal Party, which has not provoked it, will say: "By all means let it come, and sweep away with it the feudalism which still cumber the land, checks its material and intellectual progress, keeps its country-side empty, characterless, and dependent, and forbids it to mix with the main stream of European democracy." Any democratic party possessed with faith and spirit must feel that all its public work and teaching are but a preparation for such a conflict. The language and demeanor of the Dukes have shown the people how far unbridled wealth and power have warped the amenities of the old landed system, and how much it needs a drastic purge, such as we hope this Budget and following Budgets will provide. Could they desire a better, a clearer, issue? The old enemy is, at last, to be met on his weakest ground—the land question. He must put forward in his defence what cannot be defended—the hereditary principle, stretched to the monstrous demand that it shall overbear the historic, the central, power of the ancient British Constitution. He has also chosen to tie himself to an industry possessing and exercising (as in Bermondsey) great capacity for public corruption, whose political power must now be destroyed, in the interests of the State and of public morals. Is it likely that we shall lose such a battle? And even if we were defeated to-day, are we going to lose to-morrow? It may be necessary for the full purpose of the conversion of our democracy to these large ends, that our statesmen should become agitators, and the ordinary processes of party politics be suspended until, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer says in another column of THE NATION, the double issue of the Lords and the Land has been settled. But we are very certain that the England that will emerge from such a crusade will be a different country from the England that exists to-day, and that neither the House of Lords nor the present Tory Party will find a place in it.

A SHAM PASSION AND A REAL DILEMMA.

THE pose of Olympian indifference to the passions of men is something which in skilful hands may be made effective. It irritates and it is meant to irritate. But it has its dangers, and in particular it is a dangerous pose to exchange suddenly for the opposite pose of melodramatic passion. The one is not a good preparation for the other. Of the pose of indifference Mr. Balfour is the supreme master among living politicians. No one else can speak with such lofty negligence on matters that touch the passions or involve the misery of thousands. No one else can keep so cool if he chooses when accused of harsh or questionable dealing. In these matters Mr. Balfour has had a long practice, and has attained mastery. Who but he would have endured the long-drawn-out discredit of a nominal leadership? But when Mr. Balfour suddenly throws off this pose for the contrary attitude of righteous indignation all his experience militates against him. He shrieks as loud as the wildest of his henchmen. He "calls names" in a style which is rather that of the street than of Parliament. He gives his opponent the lie direct—"the frigid and calculated lie" are his own choice terms. The object of this indecent wrath is Mr. Ure. The Lord Advocate, according to Mr. Balfour, "has dishonored the profession to which he belongs. He has dishonored the office which he holds, and he has dishonored the country in which he was born." He exercises a "mendacious imagination." He has gone on "repeating a calumny which he must have known was a calumny," and how a man of his traditions can have sunk so low Mr.

Balfour knows not. This and much more through a column of the "Morning Post."

What is it all about? Mr. Ure has been making a number of very effective speeches on the Budget, full of knowledge, sincerity, force, and genuine insight into the working of our land system. Not the least effective part of his argument has been his challenge to the Tariff Reformers to produce their alternative. There are upwards of fourteen millions to be met, partly for Old Age Pensions, partly for "Dreadnoughts." Now, as to "Dreadnoughts" we know that the Tariff Reformers only complain that not enough has been done. They wanted eight, and would not wait. There is no retrenchment open to them under this head. Well, then, Mr. Ure presents them with a dilemma. Either you must show that you can pay for Old Age Pensions, or you must be prepared to cancel them. If we take you at your word, what are we to believe? You reject the Budget. Very good, then, you have to find the millions. Can you do it by Tariff Reform? Cool figures show that you cannot do it. If not, then what do you mean? Admit that you must either withdraw the pensions or accept the Budget. This is the essence of Mr. Ure's argument. Of its form it is difficult to judge from abbreviated reports. We do not interpret Mr. Ure to have meant that there was serious danger to those actually in receipt of pensions that they might lose them. We are well aware that strong opposition exists to the pensions system, and that Lord Lansdowne, who now, it would seem, is about to claim to be our master in finance as he is already in legislation, has called for a contributory system, which is, in effect, a withdrawal of the existing pensions. None the less it is perfectly certain that in this matter there can be no going back. The Tories may, and with their financial methods, probably would, refuse to remove the pauper disqualification. But we are sure that they dare not touch the existing pensions, and, if his argument suggested such a possibility, it was, as a point of form, mistaken.

But we may be sure that it was not a formal point of this kind that made Mr. Balfour so angry. The sting in Mr. Ure's challenge is that he demands the Tariff Reform balance-sheet. He who wills the end, argues Mr. Ure in effect, wills the means, and if the Tariff Reformers seriously intend to maintain Old Age Pensions they must prove their capacity to do it. This is to bring Mr. Balfour precisely to the point which for years he has skilfully avoided. It is to commit him to a definite scheme. It is in particular to make him say yes or no, whether he means to raise new revenue by taxes on food. Mr. Ure in his calculations rules them out, quoting Mr. Balfour's pledge that the proportion of such taxes now paid by the workmen shall not be increased. He takes Mr. Balfour at his word, and we may say, in passing, that before Mr. Balfour gets so vexed over Mr. Ure's alleged disregard of his pledge to maintain Old Age Pensions, he had better look through his own utterances and make himself quite sure that he has said nothing there which he will not be forced to retract. Apart from food taxes Mr. Ure brings down the amount which Tariff Reform would raise to some five millions, as against the fourteen millions that are required. If Mr. Balfour disagrees with the figures let him correct them. Let him tell us with no more ambiguities what he does intend. Will he pay for Old Age Pensions by means of a tax on bread, on meat, butter, condensed milk, eggs, cheese, and will he calculate for us the amount necessary? Will he show that Mr. Chamberlain's famous equation holds, and that by remitting equivalent duties on tea and sugar it will be possible for Tariff Reformers to maintain that they are not increasing the cost of necessities? If his equation holds, will Mr. Balfour explain how he expects to get one penny out of food taxes for revenue? If he can get nothing from food, will he show how he can get more than five or six millions from manufactured goods, and, if he cannot show this, will he explain how he means to pay for Old Age Pensions? Lastly, if he cannot show how he will pay for Old Age Pensions, will he admit that his denunciations of the Budget are merely theatrical, and that, if he is to keep his pledges, he has no alternative but to accept it?

These are the practical and serious questions that Mr. Balfour has to face before he can attack Mr. Ure with effect. We cannot forbear to add that this sudden passion for high standards of political controversy sits ill on Mr. Balfour. What is there that has been said on the Liberal side that approaches in audacity or in political unscrupulousness to the famous declaration that every vote given for a Liberal is a vote given to the Boers? In virtue of this formula Mr. Balfour's party swept the country in 1900, Mr. Balfour held power for five years, and used it, among other things, to carry measures bitterly repudiated by thousands of Nonconformists who had voted for his party on the strength of a clear understanding that they were voting only on the settlement of South Africa. In face of the history of the Education Act Mr. Balfour cannot complain if his undertakings are scrutinised, and if men ask not only what he promises but what means he has of carrying out his promises. Nor could any one of living statesmen have less title than Mr. Balfour to complain, as he complains in the speech which belabored Mr. Ure, of interruptions at public meetings. He may have forgotten his cynical justification of the riot at Scarborough, when Mr. Cronwright Schreiner was stopped by a mob from telling Englishmen what a great body of South African Colonists thought about the war. But those who hear him talk solemnly of the disgrace done by such methods to a free country have not forgotten it. Mr. Balfour is not the man to take the high line on these questions. He has not the reputation or the record which justifies the attitude of censor.

A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY.

AFTER a lull of several months the European situation is once more disagreeably interesting. When Lord Rosebery made his feverish speech about the "hush in Europe," it was still possible to hope that the momentary pause which succeeded the Balkan crisis might have been used by a constructive statesmanship to smooth away the causes of resentment. Russia had been decisively checked and was suffering from a visible fatigue. France, which had declined throughout the long wrangle to adopt an extreme or irreconcilable attitude, was manifestly anxious to preserve good relations with Austria. It was equally clear that a reaction had declared itself in this country against the unmeasured resentment which Austria's action had, originally caused. The Foreign Office and the Court seemed both to be feeling towards a reconciliation, and the "Times" frankly reflected the change of mood. But the events of the past week have taught us that Russia at least is prepared neither to forget nor to dissemble. That the Tsar should have visited the King of Italy would in itself have seemed the most natural and innocent of courtesies. The visit would have taken place six years ago had not the Italian Socialists put their veto upon it. It had been expected and discounted for many months. It need under normal conditions have meant no more than the visits paid to King Edward, the Kaiser, and President Fallières earlier in the present year. The Tsar is manifestly anxious to break down the popular sentiment which has hitherto opposed his visits alike in England, France, and Italy. We regret for our part that this sentiment should be weakened. But nothing could be more natural than the Tsar's anxiety to emerge from this unofficial boycott. The moment, from his standpoint, was cleverly chosen. The mass mind in Italy was dominated by two impulses, which both served to prepare it for the Tsar's coming. It had been deeply touched by the generous aid rendered by a Russian warship after the Sicilian earthquake. It had also used the Jubilee celebrations of the last Lombard campaign to emphasise its abiding distrust of Austria, its restlessness under the obligations of the Triple Alliance, and its preference for any other connection.

Had the Tsar desired only a personal success the way was smooth and clear. But the real significance of his going to Racconigi lay in the route which he chose to follow. For the sake of avoiding all contact with Austria, he chose to make a pilgrimage through half the countries of the Continent. He braved a perilous journey through Poland, and a tedious journey through Germany, Switzerland, and France. No symbolism could have been more obvious or more wounding. It has served to convert what would otherwise have been an inoffensive courtesy and a personal success into something like an insult to Austria. The position of Italy within the Triple Alliance has become in consequence more than ever ambiguous. The Tsar and M. Isvolsky have contrived to advertise the fact that their resentment against Baron von Aehrenthal is unrelenting and active.

The best that one can hope is that this manifestation of a rather petty feeling may for the moment satisfy the mind which conceived it. But the consequences of so public a demonstration of ill-will can rarely be confined to a single act. A whole train of resentments and calculations has been set in motion once more. M. Tittoni, one of the least scrupulous of European statesmen, is doubtless asking himself how best he may turn the Tsar's mood to his own account in the Balkans. In Constantinople and in Athens, in Cettigne and in Sofia, groups of adroit and ambitious men are at this moment, we may be sure, adjusting their own manœuvres to the new situation. In every café in Crete and Greece the thing is being welcomed as Eastern politicians invariably welcome every sign of a rift in the concert. The official press in Austria has preserved a dignified silence, but the less disciplined German organs have been at no pains to conceal their very natural anger. Baron von Aerenthal is not the man to turn the other cheek, and for years to come the position of affairs in the Near East is only too likely to offer a tempting field to any Power which may wish to assert itself at the expense of another. If the aims of Russia and Italy were merely to check any further aggressions which Austria might contemplate at the expense of Servia or Montenegro or Turkey, their object would command approval, however little one might like their methods or admire their motives. But unfortunately neither Russia nor Italy is disinterested. The one has, or has had, designs upon Persia and the Dardanelles, and the other upon Tripoli and Albania. Modern diplomacy is rarely satisfied to defend the status quo. Its method is more commonly to arrange that if others disturb the unstable equilibrium, it shall secure for itself some part of the spoils. It is not uncharitable to suppose that the resentment of M. Isvolsky and Signor Tittoni against Austria is due less to her success in turning the Eastern crisis to account than to their own failure to profit by it.

The moral for the rest of Europe is patent. This sentimental journey round Austria to Savoy means that we all stand precisely where we have stood through four restless years. Europe is divided into two camps, and all her energies are bent upon a struggle to modify the uncertain balance of power. Once more the Germans are complaining that the Powers of the Triple Entente are bent upon isolating her by "debauching" Italy from her alliance. No share of the immediate responsibility for this latest phase in the game of "penning in" can be ascribed either to Sir Edward Grey or to M. Pichon. Both of them, indeed, have been anxious of late to repair the breach with Austria. But Russia, for her own purposes, and in her own way, is none the less following a precedent set for her at different times by both her partners. It may not suit us that she should choose this particular moment to assert herself, but we may none the less be involved in some of the possible consequences of her act. Nor can we forget that, while she is disturbing Europe, reaction still dominates her domestic affairs. Her Cossacks have just carried their menace of impending trouble into Finland; her advance guard has settled into permanent winter quarters on Persian soil; the Governor of Odessa, fresh from a conversation with the Tsar, has boasted in a public proclamation of the utter impotence of the Duma; the Bills establishing religious toleration are said to have been withdrawn; the chief of the "Black Hundreds," accused of murder before the Finnish Courts, has been covered with the Tsar's protection. It is intolerable that we should be forced in the wake of such a Power into some new phase of the Continental adventure. France is clearly in a pacific mood. If there is the smallest prospect of reaching with Germany such an arrangement as Lord Courtney has advocated, the resentment of M. Isvolsky must not be allowed to fetter our initiative.

A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-MAN ON THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION NOW PENDING, FROM THE THREAT OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.

II.

POWER OF THE LORDS TO AMEND THE BUDGET.

This must be regarded as out of the question. The precedent of 1678 still stands, a more ancient and definite precedent than many in our existing constitution, as, for example, the abuse of the King's veto, the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament, the unity of the Cabinet, and the like. That it is still an active and working principle is shown by the Speaker's ruling of but yesterday on the subject. It is safe to say that, if this precedent is abandoned, the House of Lords can have no other object than Revolution in view. To strike at a precedent of this kind is to bring down the whole fabric of our constitutional customs at a blow. It would be quite as reasonable, or unreasonable, for the Minister to hold office for seven years with a minority in the Commons. The one exactly resembles the other; in the one case a chamber, in the other a Minister, are consumed by a selfish interest or a passion for independence, and would exercise it to the detriment of the State, and to the defiance of the Constitution.

POWER OF THE LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.

The grounds urged are that extraneous matter is contained in the Budget, namely, a Land Valuation Bill and a Licensing Bill. The candid historian—who differs from the politician—will not deny that the inclusion of these two Bills was no doubt influenced by the rejection of the Scottish Land Bills and the English Licensing Bill. This, however, does not affect the real point; the manœuvres of politicians may be temporal, but the principles of constitutional interpretation are eternal.

It does not seem possible to deny that the taxation of licences is a fair means of raising revenue, and the inclusion of this measure in the Bill cannot be justly condemned. It is not to the point that the licences might have been taxed less, if an earlier Bill had obtained revenue from them at some previous period. The fact may be true, but the precedent is thereby unaffected.

The question of land valuation is more difficult, but it will be apparent that the point is whether the Lords can fairly complain of its inclusion. Land valuation cannot fairly be called extraneous to finance, and the fact that the principle embodied is of more importance for next year than for this, is of no special moment. If the Commons really have the financial initiative, they alone have the power to decide upon such an expedient.

The real point in both these questions rests on the inclusion of all Budget-taxes in one great Bill, a measure which traces back its precedents to less than fifty years. That the Lords, having acquiesced in 1861, can hardly go back upon this precedent, is obvious. The decision presented to them then could only be settled once, and, that it could only thus be settled is apparent from the nature of the case. Had the Lords then threatened to reject the Budget on the ground of the Paper Duties Bill, and negotiated with the Commons for that purpose, it might have been seen that they did not claim the right of amending, but only of separating, the diverse Bills.

Now, however, that claim cannot stand. There can be no difference between threatening to reject the Budget on the ground of one Bill (for that threatens the principle of amendment), and amendment outright. Hence any attempt to reject an alleged tax, and any threat to reject the Budget on the ground of one or two measures only, must be considered an attempt to amend. In this sense, therefore, it is inadmissible, because that attempt is negatived, not by a precedent of more than forty, but by one of more than two hundred, years. In destroying this plant, the peers would not just sever it above the surface of the ground, they would tear up the roots which have held it firm through the centuries.

GENERAL GROUNDS OF REJECTION.

The more general grounds of rejection are that the Budget is "unprecedented," "involves a revolution," and so forth. The hardest historical fact shows exactly the opposite to be true, that the precedents are entirely against rejection, and that the revolution will be created by those who reject it. It may be regarded as very doubtful whether the Lords have any right to consider or to criticise the details of the Budget as such, if we adhere to precedent. No one, who has not studied it, would believe the extent of the financial subservience of the Lords to the Commons in the past. Any change in that attitude towards finance, while quite new, is founded on the situation created by the extension of the franchise in 1867 and 1884. The defence of such claim is that democracy, having won its way to the Commons, has found its best and truest and most permanent representatives in the Lords. The change has been startling. Those individuals, who are without any constituents, are the first to remind members of their duty to their electors; and those, who have so often defied the popular will, now proclaim themselves the champions of it. This doctrine may serve one political party and enrage another, but it can hardly impress the historian. Reduced to its simplest terms, this doctrine in effect is, that the House of Lords, realising that the House of Commons may not always be in exact touch with the people, will use its power to thwart the other Chamber in deference either to its own or the popular interest. This is the real secret of the newly-born aggressiveness of the House of Lords, which had its birth in 1884, its vigorous boyhood between 1892 and 1895, and its exuberant manhood to-day. Within certain limits this doctrine may be sound, the worse degrees of party may possibly be checked, and certain objectionable measures may be vetoed. But it is quite clear that the theory does not cover their ordinary actions. It may cover their passing of the Trade Disputes Bill and rejection of the Education or Licensing Bills, but it cannot convince us that they amended the India Councils Bill or rejected the Cruel Sports Bill out of deference to the people. A sound judgment will therefore suspect these pretensions, and will decline to admit that their attitude in this whole matter is dictated solely by desire to gratify the people. Red caps may be worshipped by the Levites in the outer courts of the Temple, but, if we could penetrate to the Holy of Holies, I suspect that we should find a High Priest prostrate before a coronet. However, whether the instinct be one of self-preservation or of generosity need not concern us; all that is important is that one or other of these impulses has led to renewed vigor on the part of the House of Lords.

The impossibility of rejection on any grounds, except those of the revived activity of the Lords during the last twenty years, can be easily demonstrated. The raising of taxes or of excise upon Resolution of the House of Commons, before the Budget became law, has been exercised for an almost indefinite period. This practice has been increased and extended during this Budget to articles and in certain directions to which it has never before been applied. That these are innovations none will deny, that they are undesirable innovations is a question that may fairly be debated, but it is more important than anything else to recognise that they proceed upon the lines of recognised precedent. It may be—and undoubtedly was—an immense revolution to raise money on resolution of the Commons and not by law, but once the principle was established it was capable of extension. That extension may owe more to party needs than to financial ones, and may be adjusted on tactical rather than on sensible grounds, but that merely raises the relative question of worth or badness—not of legality. From the constitutional point of view, the extension follows the recognised rule of all judicious innovations; it projects a well-marked line somewhat further, it deepens a groove, but it creates neither groove nor line.

The extension of the practice of collecting certain taxes by resolution has been described as an innovation upon an old practice; but that very practice could not have grown up if the Budget had either ever been rejected, or if it had ever entered the minds of men that it could be rejected. The first action of the Lords, if they had objected to this principle when first imposed, would have been to reject the Budget as a whole. The Commons would then have been convicted of illegality, the officers of the Crown exposed to punishments in the Courts. No legislative body would have been willing to adopt such a practice, unless its members had been certain that they could avoid the consequences of their action. A little strict history may be shown to confound much strict law, and it is quite evident from these reflections that the rejection of the Budget is really unconstitutional, in the sense that it sins against every custom, inheritance, and tradition.

That such rejection may be legal is a small point compared with the fact that it is unconstitutional. If we are to rest on the strict letter of the Constitution it is not illegal for the King to use his veto, for the Minister to be impeached or to reign in defiance of the majority in the Commons, for the Lower House to stop supplies. The rejection of the Budget is, in fact, precisely on a level with this last action. Let the Lords remember that at a period of great party heat and of directly unconstitutional action, Fox and North—two politicians not always associated with principle—refused to stop supplies, though they had the power of doing so. Not even at a moment when their dearest wishes were destroyed, and when they had been exposed to unconstitutional treatment by opponents, did these two men strain the resources of the Constitution. They had the power to stop supplies, but deliberately declined, refusing to use the letter to destroy the spirit of the aged institution. It is my dearest hope that the House of Lords and their advocates who advise rejection, may remember this lesson. No Ministry was ever so assailed or denounced as more unscrupulous than this Government of Fox and North, and yet they scrupled to take an action exactly similar to that which is openly advocated to-day by partisans of the Peers.

H. W. V. TEMPERLEY.

(To be continued.)

Life and Letters.

THE FEAR OF SOCIALISM.

WHEN children play at "ghosts" it is often difficult to tell how far they are really frightened and how far they pretend to be frightened. They seem easily to pass from one state into the other, and a mingling of the two is the staple of their enjoyment. But to the sensitive imagination of some children there comes a time when realism swallows up pretence and the pleasure of the feint passes into a sudden panic of terror. It looks as if some of our titled innocents were made like this. At Primrose League picnics, and even at more solemn party gatherings, they used to play with Sir William Harcourt's "We are all Socialists now," with pleasantly simulated apprehension. Now it has got upon their nerves, they are beginning to see red, their eyes start out of their faces and their teeth chatter as their political nurses dress up for them the spectral monster which is to devour their estates, rifle their bank accounts, destroy their churches, break up their families, dissolve their Empire, and hand them over naked to a State which is their enemy.

Lord Rosebery and the other stage artists have daubed the colors on so thick, with such hideous imagery drawn from the French Revolution, the Paris Commune, the revolutionary documents of Bakunin and Marx, Henry George and Mr. Belfort Bax (weird blending of contradictories!), that they must feel some apprehension lest they have overdone their part, producing, instead of the fighting spirit they intended, a paralysis of fear. If "the end of all things" is so near, so formidable, so inevitable, perhaps resignation is the wisest attitude. It surely does honor to the sturdy character of our landlords and our brewers to suppose that they should show themselves prepared to lead the men of property against so terrible a foe.

It would be interesting, were it possible, to know just how this Socialism appears to those who rave at it, and how far their fear and indignation are genuine. In speculating on this theme we must first remember the hopeless ignorance of the movements of modern European history in which most of our educated classes are brought up, and how little they attempt to understand the broader tendencies of the political and industrial nation to which they belong. Such ignorance almost lets us suppose it possible that a company of country squires or City merchants can contemplate the establishment of an era of revolutionary Socialism under the joint leadership of Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Keir Hardie as a contingency which calls for the heroic efforts of all patriotic citizens to avert it. We say "almost," because the catastrophic has for so many generations been banished so completely from our internal history as to make it hard to believe that even the asseverations of a dozen dukes could make it credible.

But if we hold that the Socialism charged against the Government is not exactly red revolution, wholesale confiscation, and the immediate establishment of the State as the sole instrument of production, distribution, and exchange, what is it? What are its ingredients, the rags and tinsel which are worked up into this terrifying image? It is not difficult to answer this question. The first and most poignant quarrel of the business man and the householder with the public authority is the rise of rates. The city swoops down upon him and extorts a growing share of his income. It may clean, light, and police his streets better, provide parks and public baths and libraries, cheap trams or other services, which he would grumble about if he did not get them. But he hates to have to pay. This enlargement of municipal life also means more inspection and regulation, officials poking their noses into "private" affairs. Then the leading citizens have a third grievance, their growing expropriation from the highly lucrative monopolies in the supply of lighting, water, and other services which formerly they sold to their fellow-citizens by their private companies. Such is the substance of their outcry against municipal Socialism. The recent electoral success attending the outcry in London and certain other cities has encouraged the party of vested interests to elevate it into a national alarm. So we are told English Liberalism has sold itself to Socialism, to a policy of confiscating private property in land, seizing the money of the rich to endow the poor, stifling by predatory taxes and vexatious administration the incentives to profitable industry, providing lucrative jobs for hordes of officials, and supplying maintenance on easy terms for the lazy and incapable. A number of legislative achievements and proposals are commonly cited in support of this charge, many of them, curiously enough, proceeding from Conservative sources. But an endeavor is now made to sever such enlargements of the State as are contained in Factory and Public Health Acts, or free education, from the new Socialism of which the Budget is the financial instrument. Lord Hugh Cecil recently laid his finger upon three salient illustrations of this Socialism—Old Age Pensions, the Development Bill, and the new fiscal doctrine of a scrutiny into origins of property and income. Now, though Lord Hugh was wildly wrong in his deductions, he was right in his examples. For these three measures do indicate, not indeed Socialism, but a new enlightened Liberalism seeking to perform its long neglected tasks. Old Age Pensions are the first instalment of an organised policy to put an end to destitution and degrading poverty, and to secure a minimum standard of work and life for all sections of the people. The Development Bill contains the potency and promise of a continuous policy of utilising public intelligence, energy, and finance, in order to improve the fabric of the commonwealth by undertaking such works of construction, transport, education, and the like, as lie outside the sphere of private business enterprise. It would be easy to contend that there is nothing new or revolutionary in either of these designs, and that they are concerned as much with the conservation as with the development of our national resources. But what is new is this, that they are for the first time conceived as designs, as steps in a planned advance, as parts of a new enlarged conception of the functions of the State.

And this larger determined purpose is dramatically indicated in the nature of the Finance Bill. For that Bill not merely takes more money from those who have ability to pay; it furnishes instruments of public information which will enable the State to get more revenue in the future, it imposes taxes expressly designed to fructify in after years, and lastly, as Lord Hugh rightly urges, it establishes a scrutiny of origins as a new taxing principle. Hence these tears and curses! A correct instinct directs the fiercest resentment of the rich against those portions of the Finance Bill that are concerned with origins, which claim contributions on the express ground that certain incomes or increments are not earned by those who receive them, and by necessary implication are earned by, and therefore belong by right to, the public. Here is the heart of what they not unnaturally deem an attack upon existing rights of property.

Although not the first conscious object of the Budget, which simply sought to find the easiest ways of securing the necessary revenue, this new interpretation of the rights of property by reference to origins is a really radical reform. Confined at present to certain instances of land values, liquor licences, and to the implication underlying the discriminative rates of income and inheritance tax, it will show further developments in the near future. For, as upon the one hand the needs of public expenditure, whatever economy be practised, will constantly advance, so on the other hand the land valuation, and the nicer information as to other forms of wealth furnished by income tax returns, census of production, and other modes of publicity, will enable our State to extend from land to other forms of property the public right to share in unearned increments. Thus the chief grievance which rankles in the minds of Mr. Balfour and of Mr. Harold Cox, the discrimination between land values and other sorts of investment, will be relieved, considerably to the advantage of the public purse.

Those who insist upon calling this new policy to which Liberalism is now committed, "Socialism," will probably continue to do so. This is a free country, and some persons prefer loose language. But, in point of fact, it is nothing else than a more rational and ordered realisation of that alliance between individual liberty and collective or co-operative effort which has gone on continuously from the beginning of the State, demanding a repeated re-adjustment of the respective spheres of action, and in modern civilised communities a constant enlargement of public operations. This is required partly to safeguard individual liberty against encroachments of landed or capitalistic monopoly, partly to secure society against the physical and moral degradation of poverty, and partly to carry out important works which from their size, nature, or directly unprofitable character, will not be undertaken effectively by private enterprise. The revenue required for such portions of this work as is not specifically remunerative will be got by such scrutiny into origins of incomes as are needed to reclaim for society the social earnings that constitute its rightful income.

THE COULISSES OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

It has rarely been the habit of mankind to think meanly of the after-life. Tradition has framed of it notions which were by turns terrible and sublime, and in this at least the humaner religions have agreed, that its pleasures are ecstasies, and its pains are torments. One possibility the natural mind of civilised man has never faced. It has never dreamed that the after-life may be trivial, sordid, and contemptible. It has calmly faced the alternative of ineffable joy and unimagined suffering. But it has never allowed itself to suppose that the disembodied spirit may have before it a career that is meaningless and unworthy. The Greeks, perhaps, came the nearest to this thought. The jibbering ghosts of Homer are futile and pitiable shadows, and the ancients, until they came under Oriental influence, assuredly did not think of the after-life as a desirable state. It is Dostoevsky in modern times who has given a fantastic expression to this hideous possibility which mankind has spent its centuries in evading. He drew in "Crime and Punishment" the astonishing portrait of the drunken wife-beater, Mr. Svidrigailoff, who on one occasion gave vent to the horrible opinion that eternity may resemble a large and ill-kept bath-room, full of spiders. That nightmare serves at least a negative purpose. It reveals to us in a flash the resolute optimism of our species. Men have denied the after-life. They have imagined the absorption of the soul in the Absolute. They have conceived of its procession through vistas of incarnations and hierarchies of advancing perfection. They have sketched their paradises and their infernos. But it was left to an extravagant creature of fancy in the pages of a Russian novel to suggest that the after-life may be merely sordid and uninteresting.

It is, one fancies, this unconquerable megalomania, this conspiracy to hope, which chiefly accounts for the reluctance of the normal mind to investigate the revelations of spiritualism. The intellect which has discarded the traditional Heaven and Hell would rather a thousand times acquiesce in the possibility of extinction, or comfort itself with some vague and improved hypothesis of its own, than stray in the company even of distinguished scientists into this degraded after-life. One must begin by establishing an intimacy with hysterics. One must skirt the probability of the basest fraud. And in the end, if the revelation comes, it is of a continued existence so futile, so unhallowed, that immortality on these terms would be of all gifts the least desirable. So far from desiring to explore and inhabit this realm, the mind which has any regard for its own dignity would rather cast about for the means of committing a permanent suicide. It is not the will to live, the passion for continuity which would lure a virile intellect into these enfeebling studies. They may indeed point to the conclusions which Wallace and Lombroso have drawn from them. But the bias of a normal human being would certainly be to reject all but the most overwhelming burden of proof, and to accept it, if acceptance were inevitable, as one might accept from one's doctor a verdict of approaching insanity.

The evidence has been collected afresh by Lombroso in a book which appeared, by an uncanny coincidence, in its English version, within a day of his death.* It comes as the last work of a powerful mind which had already outlived its prestige. It was an ardent intellect which framed its theories boldly but too hastily, and spent its powers in compelling facts and observations to march in a too disciplined phalanx. But the honor and good faith of the man were never in doubt, and Italy will never forget his courage in exposing the share of the landed class in producing the diseases of the peasantry. In so far as the experiments and records in this book rest on his own testimony, corroborated, as most of it is, by distinguished colleagues, it will encounter no brutal scepticism. The volume is a storehouse of facts which present their problems to the patient reader. It is the rash and uncritical structure of interpretation which deserves to be carefully scanned. It is probable that when all the phenomena of hysteria and its developments in the trances of mediums have been fully investigated, the consequences may be an even completer transformation of our conceptions of the relation of matter and mind, than the phenomena of radiation have brought about in physics. But until that investigation is completed it would be folly to assume that the hysterical medium really is in relation with the disembodied or partially embodied spirits of the dead. The purely physiological marvels are puzzling enough. There is, for example, the apparent transference of the organs of sense in some cases of acute hysteria from one part of the body to another; vision, for example, will have its seat in the tip of the nose. There is also the apparent extension of the sense of touch for an inch or more beyond the surface of the skin. Thought-reading and clairvoyance, however little we may yet be able to explain it, falls presumably within the same class of abnormal but not supernatural manifestations. Of authenticated cases of prediction Lombroso has collected some striking instances which it is difficult to dismiss as mere chance. But if any mind can defy the limitations of time, that mind may as well be that of the hysteric himself as of some disembodied spirit. The real difficulties begin when we have to face the vulgar manifestations of séances conducted with a "medium." Tables are raised apparently without human agency; heavy wardrobes advance along the floor like monstrous and primeval animals; hands touch and strike or caress the assistants; notes are played on mandolines or trumpets suspended from the roof. It is one's first instinct to scoff at all such stories. There have been many undoubted cases of fraud, and one is justly suspicious of "experiments" carried out in darkness. But there is a good deal of evidence which cannot be easily dismissed. Most of the more startling "manifestations" have been repeated in daylight, and the lifting of the table has been frequently photographed. The more reputable mediums have operated under every condition which ingenuity could suggest, tied up in sacks or in netting, or with their arms, legs, and bodies enveloped in electric wires, which would have rung a bell at the slightest movement. Most of the experiments which Lombroso records were carried out by a committee of Italian scientists who all had serious reputations to lose.

So far no mind which respected the economy of causes would go to the spirit world for an explanation. It is natural to resort to that hypothesis only when one faces the evidence regarding the visible and usually tangible though almost "fluid" spectres which some of the more gifted mediums are said to "materialise." Some of them are said to be more or less permanent, reappearing continuously for weeks or even years, and exhibiting a consistent personality which is not that of the medium in her waking state. Several have been photographed, sometimes under conditions which are said to have satisfied reputable experts. Fraud is, of course, the easiest explanation, if one chooses to assume the unlimited folly of scientific men who in other spheres have made great reputations. To believe in disembodied spirits is also easy, because it is a return to a primeval habit of thought.

There is, however, another possible line of explanation, and Lombroso unconsciously supplies it. He insists that he and his colleagues have seen a spectral third arm forming under their eyes from the body of the medium. The permanent "spirits" also seemed to form themselves out of her body, though they gradually detached themselves from it. The medium in such cases underwent an astonishing loss of weight, which continued throughout the séance. Is it an impossibly bold guess to suggest that what really happened—if anything happened at all save fraud and illusion—was a disintegration of the medium's personality? Such splitting up of personality is of all the phenomena of hysteria the most common. It is not easy to imagine how such disintegration of the mind might in certain conditions be accompanied by a parallel disintegration of the body. But it is even harder to suppose that the alien "soul" of a dead person can clothe itself with a portion of the substance of the medium. The spectre, in short, if it is real at all, if it is a phenomenon for which sane men have got to account, may be a manifestation, not of immortality, but simply of hysteria. It would on that showing be none the less marvellous and none the less shattering to our accepted notions of matter and spirit. It is difficult in any case to guess how even the less disputable phenomena of hysteria can be explained without a revolution hardly less complete in all our theories. But this hypothesis would at least save us from the monstrous conclusion to which Lombroso and his fellow-spiritualists would drive us—that we survive after death like phantoms in a mad-house, the sport of diseased mediums, the parasites of the living, fit neither for Heaven nor Hell, the restless tenants of a mean Limbo.

* "After Death—What?" By Cesare Lombroso. Fisher Unwin

WITH HORN AND HOUND.

It is an ironic jest that the boy fondest of animals should be made a butcher; yet in the sportsman, who is the butcher as amateur, the jest turns to simple earnest. Every sportsman has a tender affection for the thing he sets out to kill, and William the Conqueror, "loving the wild deer as though he were their father," laid Hampshire waste for their habitation. What praises and endearments have been lavished on all beasts of the chase, from lions down to sheep, if only they provided sport! The fox is loved as a knavish rascal, the badger is belauded if he bites, and the pig glorified to heroism because he dies so game. One might have supposed that the desire to hunt implied hatred, for among ourselves persecution is seldom the evidence of esteem. Yet the present writer has seen a Yorkshire huntsman take a hare from before the very mouths of the pack, and, if it were still "wick," lay it in his coat pocket as tenderly as in a hospital bed; nor has he himself ever felt the smallest animosity towards anything he has attempted to kill, except, perhaps, towards crocodiles and men.

Whether it is more justifiable to pursue a creature to death when you love it than when you hate, must be left to the moralist, but certainly the wisdom of civilisation has inclined to think it is. When man warded off pleiocene dragons with a knob of stone attached to a fibre lest it should be lost, or when he hacked bits from the mammoth with a sliver of flint clamped in a cleft stick, he was inspired to those actions rather by terror or hunger than by love. Love came with pleasure and grew with safety. It dawned with the use of the bow that made the infliction of death possible at a re-assuring distance from the monster's jaws. Then only could sport begin, for the admixture of safety does ever add pleasure, and the addition of pleasure to a struggle involving death constitutes the element of sport. By the time that history produced Assyria, we see Sennacherib driving out in brazen chariot, surrounded by huntsmen and dogs, to transfix lions and lionesses with his royal arrows, while only the horses were ever clawed, and the king himself twanged his bow in Imperial composure. It is evident that necessity had then become a joy, if not a virtue. Neither fear nor hunger any longer animated the king, but he killed for pleasure in the exercise of skill, and was conscious of hardy virtue in returning to the simple life. The chase had become to him what it still is to Mr. Roosevelt—"the best of all national pastimes," and it is but human to feel a certain affection for beasts that afford so much delight and such opportunities for virtue at comparatively little risk. With civilisation the risk has continually decreased, and we must suppose the affection growing, till the paradox of modern sportsmen is reached, who so love the creatures they kill that they seek rather to augment than diminish the dangers of killing them.

Such artifice in pleasure, like the deliberate savagery of bare heads and sandals, marks a self-conscious degeneracy, and, like the collection of decaying skulls as "trophies," or the enumeration of record slaughter in books, foreshadows the cheerless day when there will be nothing worth hunting left upon the globe, as there is little left in Europe now. We come late for the glory of the chase. The golden age for sportsmen fell in the century just before gunpowder gave them an advantage which has depopulated the forests and killed their joy. They were then indeed the kings and paragons of animals, happy in this world, and secure of the world to come. One of the finest sportsmen that ever snuffed the morning thus wrote of himself and his fellows before the noise of guns had terrified the woodland:—

"Hunting causeth a man to eschew the seven deadly sins. . . . All good customs and manners cometh thereof, and the health of man and of his soul. For he that fleeth the seven deadly sins as we believe, he shall be saved: therefore a good hunter shall be saved, and in this world have joy enough and of gladness and of solace."

And, a little later on, the author writes:—

"Wherefore I say that such an hunter is not idle, he can have no evil thoughts, nor can he do evil works, wherefore he must go straight into paradise."

Having thus comfortingly assured the sportsman of salvation, the writer proceeds, something after the manner of Chaucer, whom he knew and admired, to depict the sportsman's terrestrial joys. As we should sing, "A southerly wind and a cloudy sky," or "The dusky night rides down the sky, and ushers in the moon," so he breaks into lyric:—

"Now shall I prove how hunters live in this world more joyfully than any other men. For when the hunter riseth in the morning, and he sees a sweet and fair morn and clear weather and bright, and he heareth the song of the small birds, the which sing so sweetly with great melody and full of love, each in its own language in the best wise that it can according that it learneth of its own kind." (The sentence is lost in transport.) "And when the sun is risen, he shall see fresh dew upon the small twigs and grasses, and the sun by his virtue shall make them shine. And that is great joy and liking to the hunter's heart."

The passage comes from that earliest and best of guides to sport, written in choice English by Edward, Duke of York, who after all his hunting was slain in the cruel venery of Agincourt. To his cousin, Henry IV., he was Master of Game, and to merry Prince Hal he dedicated his book, under that title of "Master of Game," it being in the main a translation from the "Livre de Chasse," by his friend, Gaston de Foix, known as Phœbus for his golden hair and debonair nature, to both of which together a bear put a bloody period in the forest shade. But of late, to the solace of all tender-hearted slayers of beasts, Mr. Baillie-Grohman has issued, through Messrs. Chatto and Windus, a cheaper form of his great edition of the book, with illustrations from the most beautiful of contemporary French manuscripts. Wherein we may still learn, as from life, the nature of hare and hart, and how to quest in the dawn for game (an easy task when one can hardly see the wood for the stags); how to set the lymer on the fues, to pursue with raches, to blow the mort, to prescribe the hart's undoing, and reward the hounds with the curée.

To give the book a stamp of high authority befitting its royal origin, the editor has induced ex-President Roosevelt to contribute a preface. With characteristic rigour he denounces the effeminacy of modern sport:—

"Shooting at driven game," he writes, "on occasions when the day's sport includes elaborate feasts in tents on a store of good things brought in wagons or on the backs of sumpter mules, while the sport itself makes no demand upon the prowess of the so-called sportsman, is but a dismal parody upon the stern hunting life in which the man trusts to his own keen eye, stout thews, and heart of steel for success and safety in the wild warfare waged against wild nature."

And at the end of his preface Mr. Roosevelt sings the joys of "the wilderness wanderer of our own time":—

"The man who with simple equipment, and trusting to his own qualities of head, heart, and hand, has penetrated to the uttermost regions of the earth, and single-handed slain alike the wariest and the grimmest of the creatures of the waste."

It is all very well; the picture of Mr. Roosevelt waging wild warfare against wildest wapiti with a Winchester, or slaying alike the wariest and the grimmest rhinoceros of the waste in Uganda, is a strenuous and instructive scene. But we turn back with some relief from that wilderness wanderer to Edward, Duke of York, who found in the morning air of England the great joy and liking of a hunter's heart, and describes the hunter's pleasure at coming home at night, when "he shall doff his clothes and his shoes and his hose, and shall wash his thighs and his legs, and peradventure all his body."

Many other fine observances of the hunter's life may be learnt from his book, for, indeed, the ritual of the chase was almost as accurate as the Church, and as elaborate as chivalry. Much also we may learn of the nature of the creatures by whose pursuit Providence had arranged that the hunter should enter straight into paradise. We may learn how harts can live a hundred years by rousing serpents to anger and swallowing them quick, whereby their venom purges the body of evil humors; and how the wild boar's tusks on the upper jaw only serve as grindstones for the lower; and how the she-wolf, with feminine instinct, always chooses the poorest and raggedest of her followers for her mate, because she sees he has suffered most for love of her; and how when she has her cubs she hides the family food lest the he-wolf should eat it all; and how foxes are not true sport, but vermin to be killed by any means; and how, if any beast hath the devil's spirit in him, without doubt it is the cat, both the wild and the tame. We are also instructed in the management of hounds, and how the "worm" under the tongue should be cut out as a preventative to madness—a treatment common in the present writer's youth, and probably still practised, though rather to prevent barking than madness. We are told of the two kinds of alaunte—the gentle and the butcher, which seem to have combined as ancestors of the British bull-dog, since both "helped at the baiting of the bull, for it was their nature to hold fast."

Finally, we may here learn all the variety of strange Norman cries which English sportsmen still used to mark each incident of the chase: "Cy va, cy va" (which might possibly be the origin of the north-country "Sitha, lad, sitha!" when the first sign of game is seen); or "Le douce, mon ami, le douce," which now is "Whist, boy, whist!"; or "Oyez à Beaumont, oyez," which is "Hark to him! Hark away!"; or "Illoques, illoques," which is "Yoicks!"

THE CITY GARDEN.

If the sixty-four squares of the chess board should be taken as so many square miles, they would rather more than cover the four-mile radius but still fall short of the county of London. We should still have to add huge tracts of brick-and-mortar in order to get the idea of the actual London that includes East and West Ham, Tottenham, Enfield, and many other dormitories of business and working-men. A chess-board of a hundred and forty-four square miles would give us some concept of this town, and if every white square should be made into a park or recreation ground it would be not such a bad town to live in. As a matter of fact, the four great parks of the West End would about make one square green and sprawl half-way through two others, and if we went eastward we should have to trudge very far before we came upon anything like a quarter-square break in the almost unending sea of mean and very mean streets.

The black square nearest the middle of the board may stand for the City. A pin dipped in green ink would suffice to trace on its blackness all the trees and gardens within it—which shows how very precious the City garden is. Right in the middle of Cheapside a stout-hearted plane runs its roots under the pavements and foundations and lifts its peeled branches into the sometimes sunny air. Do not despise its cracked and scabby bark. Only by throwing off in great scales its smoke-choked skin can the plane keep itself healthy in our peculiar atmosphere. And your tall tree cutting the blue sky into diamonds with translucent green is not everything. Right into this middle of Cheapside that very bird of the wild, the wood-pigeon, comes, builds its rustic nest in the branches of the plane, and feeds squeaking youngsters over the heads of the City men whose passing to and fro keeps the pavement hot. The wood-pigeon that men are lying in not very hopeful wait for now in the thick of beech woods all over wildest England! Wood-pigeon, cushat, queest, says the book, but we have heard it called quist, sometimes with a short "i," but in the purest vernacular with the vowel as open and uncompromising as in "ice." "What," said a West countryman to a Yorkshireman he had met in the far North-West of Canada, "Thee dussent know what quisteses be?" and he laughed loud and long at the limitations of some folk's knowledge. But we have seen the eye of the Yorkshireman, just as the eye of any other countryman, brighten at the sight of the wild woodpigeon walking the rare sward and even the tiles of central London. In his "Visit to Aesculapius," Sir E. J. Poynter has painted a group of the ordinary courtyard doves, and then one portly "quist" comes floating down to join them at the feast. It may be that this wild bird among the tame was put there as a tribute to the skill of the great doctor, it may be that it just got there from a chance group of London pigeons that caught the artist's eye. At any rate, the bird has got into an important national record, as once or twice did the kite of old, a London bird that has ceased to be.

Whether or no the Cheapside pair of pigeons are worth the whole flock of the St. Paul's pigeons hard by, is a question to be fought out between the sentimentalist and the mere lover of beauty. Surely nothing is more beautiful than the wild eddying of the common domestic pigeon round this smoke-blackened and rain-washed pile. They exhibit most of the varieties caused by domestication, though scarcely any of the eccentricities of form that the breeder has grafted on the graceful wild form, and authorities say that year by year the flock more and more reverts to the ancestral uniform of the "blue rock." The swelling dome of St. Paul's is as much their own wild domain as the cliffs of Scarborough ever were, but Olympians friendlier to the mortals that crawl round its base it would be impossible to imagine.

The gardens in which bird and man meet are but the thinnest of green lines between the majesty of the cathedral and the insistent, sordid traffic of the street. At first it seems impossible to shut out the sound and the sight of the motor 'bus. It is a sight of some of the old foundations that date from beyond the great fire that performs this magic. These noble fragments peeping hard and true from the velvet of the grass are enough to make the least of us psychometrists. If we dared sit on one of them we should see the whole pageantry of Tudor London go by, and find Roman chariots far more credible than electrobuses and steam trolleys. Round by the quiet of the north side more distinctively called "the Churchyard" we can, without magic aid, forget awhile the call of the City. With a book on a sun-smitten seat, the junior clerk or the young lady from the fur house can spend a better lunch hour than the most sybaritic of employers. The sparrows are the waiters, little birds of a far deeper brown than at the farm where we were born, and of infinitely greater trust in human kindness. In London, the sparrow has to be skylark, nightingale, flycatcher. Throw a crumb into the air and see him flutter up and take it as neatly as a swallow does a fly. Having thrown the last crumb, hear him chirrup his grace after meat. Wait a little and see Philip, at almost any month in the year, strut his wings upon the ground and become rigid under the influence of the grand passion. Yet it is left for the artists of Japan to do justice to this most valiant of birds.

An archer could have sent his shaft from old St. Paul's towards Aldersgate Street, and let it fall into a far quieter garden, the then burial ground of St. Botolph, now known as the Postmen's Park. Here in the midst of the noiseless industry of the parcels office is peace indeed. The fountain in the middle has gold-fish, of course, but it has more than that. A young man leans over and looks hard into its shadows, then tosses his head with a tiny air of something solved. He has identified the gloomier forms of a couple of dace, possibly the remnants of some pike-fishing expedition that a postman has put there. In this pond also are many of the really wild water weeds. Water plantain rears its dainty inflorescence, hornwort pushes in the depths, and other pond weeds "occur" here as though they had perfect right. Most of us refrain from peering for details, and get deeper rest by sitting in the Temple of Honor and drinking in the general air. Behind us are emblazoned on tiles the names of some fifty heroes of common life, whose deeds have no other monument. Sometimes a familiar name such as that of the Stella, but for the most part just people who have stepped out of the crowd to stop a runaway horse, snatch a sister from drowning or a tiny brother from the flames. Boys and girls of tender age have their names there, side by side with engine-drivers and a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, in one splendid democracy of all ages and every class. Their good deeds stretch out hands of blessing over those seated beneath them in a half-hour's oblivion of the driving world outside.

All round this quarter-acre of peace rise the tall buildings of the General Post Office. They are packed with the parcels that some of the resters must soon go to handle, and men pass without noise up and down the iron staircases that cross the windows. From the tree overhead a few dead leaves come slowly filtering down. One of them bears the tell-tale snippet-mark of a leaf-cutter bee, and we remember to have seen two of these insects playing here in the hot sunshine of a few months ago. The dahlias are bitten with caterpillars, and here may some entomological postman get specimens of more than one moth. One evening last summer, many adventurous May beetles were flying round the street lamps outside, and snipe and other strange visitors have been picked up alive not many yards away. The garden in the depth of a City gold-mine touches and attracts, like the wireless telegraph pole, the great wide forces of Nature that no fork yet forged by man can quite expel.

Short Studies.

MILKING.

THE end of April was sappy, careless, and profuse. One day it was all eagerness and energy and gave no rest to the wind and the sun, in the earth or in the waters or in the clouds of the sky, and the songs of the birds were a mad medley. Another day it was indolent: a soft grey sky without form covered all; there was no wind; the birds were still; the lusty, buxom spring, a pretty and merry slut, with her sleeves and skirts tucked up and her hair down over her eyes and shoulders, had fallen asleep in the midst of her toil and nothing could waken her but a thunderstorm in the night. The next day she was simply at play with showers and sunlight, sunlight and showers, at play with sky and earth as if they were but colored silks, and now she fluttered the white and blue and green together and then, wearying of that, held up the grey and the grey-white and the green, and lastly mingled all together inextricably. For the most part she preferred not to let either go quite out of sight; when the heavy rain fell on the rustling wood it was out of a sky serene, lustrous, and mild; and when the light was steady and the rain tripping away from it upon myriad feet down among the leaves to the earth, still the shadows of the rain clouds stole like smoke over the hills. There was a gamesome spirit abroad. It was seen in the amorous conflict of rain and sun, and heard in the cry of the titmouse along the hedge: "Fitchy! fitchy!"

Rain or not, always far away in the south there was a cluster of white peaks apparently belonging to a land that knew neither our sun nor our rain. Rain or sunshine, or both, made little difference to the shed at the cross roads. It was shadowy and old under a roof that was patched and hollowed like the sail of a ship. The door was open, but on either side the piles of dung were high and long, and allowed the sun to enter the shed only for half an hour each day. And now in that half-hour the farmer Weekes was going to milk the last of his seven cows. Until then he had known of the afternoon only that the wind whined in the roof, and that the rain dripped through on to his back at intervals. When the sun at last stepped in between the banks of dung he could see that it was a forward spring. For his eye travelled up between the green walls of the road to the hills four miles away, and there the beech trees were almost in perfect leaf, and in their dense ranks resembled a flock of sheep with golden fleeces descending the slope. Yet it wanted a week before May-day. The grass was good, and already the cows were clean and bright after their winter in the yard; and, having looked at his hands alongside the white and strawberry hide of the cow, he got up and wiped them on a wisp of grass beside the door. He stood there a moment—a tall, crooked man, with ever-sparkling eyes in a nubby and bony head, worn down by sun and toil and calamity to nothing but a stone, hollowed and grey, to which his short black hair clung like moss; in his starved fields you might have found a weathered flint of the same shape, and have said that it was much like a man's head. He stretched himself, and then turned and called the cow by her name, in a voice so deep and powerful that it was as if the whole shed and not a man's chest had uttered it.

He sat down again to milk and to think, with his face turned to the sun. He was thinking of the farmhouse under those woods on the hill, where he used to go courting twenty years ago, and of the girl, the only daughter of that house, who was now his wife. He had driven over there one day in his father's cart to see about some pigs. The old man had given him supper—honey and bread and butter, cold apple dumplings with cheese, and cowslip wine. It was a wonderful quiet house, very dark under tall beeches, with a quality in the dark, still air as if it were under water, but very clean and bright with china and brass and the white tablecloth and the old man's white beard and glittering blue eyes. He knew that the old man was failing to make both ends meet, but there was no sign of it; he spoke with a cheerful gravity, and there was a look about house and man as if they were apart from the world, and not subject to such accidents as failure of crops, cattle disease, and the like. They had done their business, and at the end of a long silence he was thinking of rising to go, when Emily, the daughter, came in without noticing him, kissed her father, and said, "Father, there is a white bird in the old apple tree of the rickyard singing like a blackbird. Yet 'tis as white as milk."

"Well, we will all come and see," said the old man, and then she saw that a stranger was there, and with a blush she retreated and opened the door. As she was shutting it she turned round out of curiosity, thus revealing her own face to the stranger, but seeing nothing of his which was in shadow. In a minute or two they went out into the rickyard where the cart was waiting. Emily was patting the horse's neck, but with her face towards the old apple-tree where a white blackbird was singing from the topmost branch. "You will not let them shoot it, father, will you?" she said. The white bird and its song, the girl's fair hair, and rosy face very serious, the unbent old man soon to die, the sombre smouldering old tiles and brick wall of the house, and the high black woods behind, were remembered now. Soon afterwards he had returned to the house, and again and again, avowedly to see Emily. In the late summer they used to walk out after the haymaking was all over, while the nightjar sang and the woods were dark and discreet and the sky above them as pale green as a new-mown field. They went in amongst the untrodden bracken together. He could recall the smell of the crushed fronds where they sat, the light of the near planet between the fox-gloves gushing from the violet sky, and the kisses that were as sweet as the honeysuckle overhanging them, and unlike that, could be tasted again and again without cloying.

And now the cold whine of the wind in the roof and the drip of the rain; and Emily was lying at home, sick, with a dead new-born child in the next room, and a child that he was glad was dead, yes! that even she would not be crying after if she knew what a monstrous mistaken thing had come into the world with their help. Weekes looked at that old farmhouse and the rickyard, and the crushed bracken bower, as if to search, among these things engraved by joy upon his brain, for the devilish magic that had brought about this wretchedness. He looked at her remembered face, scanning it for something to explain this thing, looked closely and fiercely at the face that was turned back towards him in her father's doorway so that he loved her from that day. What? Why? But neither in the young girl nor in the worn woman could he see what he sought. He thought of their labors, of the six children she had borne and reared, of her rough hands and wrenched voice, of the smearing out of all her prettiness except her hair. He turned it over and over, ruminating, undisturbed by the spurting of the milk into the pail, the trickle of the shower, or the sight of the hills and the clouds over the hills. Yet he did not take his eyes from these hills, nor change the look given to them by his pain and questioning—questioning he knew not what now—the whole order of things, perhaps, from which the terror had sprung unexpected. Having naught for his brain to grip and hold, but only the dead ghastly child lying still and repeating the question, and round about it the moving world of men and Nature, enormous and endless and careless, each effort was weaker than the last, and sorrow brought its narcotic stupidity. It was some time after he had drawn her last milk that the cow licked his face impatiently. He kicked away the stool and began singing a verse of a ribald song which he did not know he had remembered—

"Poor Sally's face is plain,
But Sally's heart is kind—"

And it was so singing that, without wishing it, he returned the question to the teeming womb and grave of the earth, to be swallowed up in the vast profusion of life and death, while the merry maid waved to and fro the colored silks of the sunshine and of the rain, and the titmouse crept through the hedge, crying, waggishly, "Fitchy! fitchy!"

EDWARD THOMAS.

Present-Day Problems.

THE INDIAN DECENTRALISATION REPORT.

By SIR W. WEDDERBURN.

At the beginning of this year the Royal Commission upon Decentralisation in India submitted their report. It is a lengthy document, filling 300 folio pages of the blue-book, besides the nine volumes of evidence; so that we cannot expect the general reader to make himself master of its contents. But as the recommendations therein contained may seriously influence the particulars of Lord Morley's impending scheme of reform, it seems desirable to place before the public a note of the main issues involved.

Speaking generally, the issues, as in all Indian questions, are between European official opinion on the one hand, and independent Indian opinion on the other; the former leaning towards increased departmental "efficiency," the latter towards making the bounds of freedom wider. Both these aspirations are natural and legitimate; and what we want from the Commission is a scrupulously balanced judgment, as between the two. But when we look to the personnel of the Commission, we find that a most unfortunate predominance has been given to the representatives of the European official side. Of the six members of the Commission, only one is an Indian, Mr. Dutt, while all, including the Chairman, are of the official class. Independent Indian opinion is therefore wholly unrepresented on the Commission. And this initial defect is aggravated by the fact that the three Anglo-Indian civilians, who constitute half the Commission, belong to the class of headquarters officials, who are little in touch with the people, whose views generally differ from those of the rank and file of the service, and who are mainly responsible for the existing over-centralisation. Also, we must regret that the opportunity was not taken to place on the Commission one or more of the independent members of the House of Commons, such as Sir Henry Cotton, who are accepted authorities regarding Indian affairs on the progressive side.

If we want to find a trustworthy presentment of the case for the Progressives, we must look to the evidence of the unofficial Indian witnesses; and the Commission would have done wisely if, instead of going, with tedious iteration, into the details of departmental mechanism, they had taken, as the basis of their inquiry, the clear and concise statement of popular claims (Vol. VIII., page 57) placed before them by the Hon. Mr. Gokhale, on behalf of the Bombay Presidency Association. This statement, supported by the high authority of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, shows in practical fashion where the shoe of over-centralisation pinches; and to obtain fruitful results, the procedure should have been to draw up issues and determine how far these reasonable desires of the people might be satisfied, without (to use the words of the reference) impairing the strength and unity of the Executive power.

It is upon the district and village administration that the every-day comfort of the people chiefly depends. I will therefore quote in full the paragraph in which Mr. Gokhale outlines his scheme with regard to this part of the subject: "Decentralisation in district administration must be accompanied by measures for a larger association of popular representatives with the work of the administration. There is no doubt that, with the multiplication of central departments, and a steady increase in the control exercised by the Secretariat of the provincial Government, the position of the collector as the head of a district has considerably deteriorated. There is also no doubt that the people require more prompt government, and more of it, so to say, on the spot. But this object will not be secured by a mere delegation of larger powers to the collector. The time has gone by when the collector could hope to exercise—and with beneficial results—a kind of paternal authority over his district. The spread of education, the influence of new ideas, the steadily growing power of the vernacular Press, make a return to the benevolent autocracy of the collector of old times impossible. The only remedy lies in carrying a substantial measure of decentralisation down to the villages, and in building up local self-government from there. It will not do to be deterred by the difficulties of the task, or by the possibilities of initial failure. Village Pancháyats must be created. Local and municipal boards must be really popular bodies, and larger resources than they can command at present made available to them. Last, but not least, district councils must be formed, whom the collectors should be bound to consult in all important matters, and with whose assistance they may be empowered to deal, with ever-increasing finality, with questions of district administration on the spot." After thus sketching the general method of district decentralisation, Mr. Gokhale sets forth the constitution and functions of the proposed village organisation, as the natural foundation upon which the edifice of local self-government must be built. The Pancháyat, or village council, consisting of members hereditary, nominated, and elected, is to have the disposal of small money claims, the trial of trivial offences, the management of the village forests, water supply, and sanitation, the supervision of school attendance, the distribution of agricultural advances, and famine relief—in fact, the care, as in old times, of all matters pertaining exclusively to the village. In cases of proved misconduct on the part of the Pancháyat, the collector will have the power of suspension. The village becomes, thus, the first organised unit in the administration; and the two vital principles are established: (1) that everything that can be done in the area shall primarily be done there, and (2) that the control shall be exercised from without, and not from within.

The second unit of administration would be the Taluka, or sub-district, comprising a group of villages. Here the same principles would be applied. The Taluka Board should be a wholly elected body, charged, as at present, with the administration of matters exclusively appertaining to the Taluka; the Government retaining in its hands the power of enforcing action, if its advice and warning are disregarded, by suspending a Board temporarily, and appointing in its place a small body of nominated members.

The village Pancháyat and Taluka Board may be likened to the parish council and rural district council in England; and we now come to unit No. 3, the district or collectorate, which corresponds with the English county, and forms the most important centre of local administration. It is with regard to this unit No. 3, the district, that the most far-reaching changes are advocated, with a view to giving to it something of the autonomy of a native State. At present considerable administrative duties are assigned by the Local Government Acts to the existing district board; and Mr. Gokhale submits suggestions to make this board more representative and efficient. But he would prefer that the district board should be abolished, if its functions were made over to a small district council, partly elected and partly nominated, which would assist the collector in the current administration of the district. The principal evils of the present district system are, aloofness from the people, secrecy, and want of finality; and all these evils would be mitigated if it was made obligatory on the collector to consult the council in all important matters. Large additional powers might be delegated to him, provided those powers were exercised in association with the council, so that ordinary questions of administration would be disposed of on the spot without unnecessary reference to higher officials. In confidential and urgent matters the collector would act on his own responsibility; in ordinary cases his decision would be final, if he carried his council with him; otherwise, he would report for the orders of Government. The hands of the collector would further be strengthened by restoring to him his ancient position as real head of all executive departments in his district. Those who have experience of the work know how completely of late years the authority of the collector, as the representative of the "Sirkar," has been undermined and destroyed by the encroachments of the great centralised departments: Revenue Survey, Forests, Irrigation, Public Works, Sanitation, and so forth. The subordinates of all these departments are located in the district, and can disregard the wishes of the collector, if they can count upon the support of their departmental chief at the seat of government.

Finally, to consolidate the position of the "Collector in Council," as the effective head of the district self-government, there remains an important proposal, which is, to get rid of the intermediate offices which obstruct direct communication between the district and the Governor in Council. Mr. Gokhale states this condition as follows: "If this machinery (the district council) is brought into existence, and if larger powers are then delegated to the collector, I would have above the latter only the one higher authority in the Presidency—viz., the Central Government. This means the abolition of all the commissionerships except that in Sind. The collectors will then correspond direct with the Central Government, and probably a third member will have to be added to the Executive Council. To enable the Government to exercise general supervision over district administration, it will be necessary to appoint Inspectors-General, who will tour round the Presidency on behalf of the Government." This completes the scheme which was placed before the Commission on behalf of the Bombay Presidency Association. And it may be noted that the principle of "administering our collectorates more on the model of a well-ordered Native State" was approved in the Minority Report of Lord Welby's Commission, when it was pointed out that Lord Salisbury spoke of well-governed Native States as highly favorable to the well-being of the Indian people.

At page 297 of the Report will be found the "Conclusions and Recommendations" of the Commission. As regards the villages, they recognise the value of the ancient organisation: "It is most desirable to constitute and develop village Pancháyats for the administration of certain local affairs within the villages." And, as regards provincial governments, they support the popular view, which is adverse to one-man government by a Lieutenant-Governor: "We prefer," they say, "a regular Council Government, such as exists in Madras and Bombay, with a Governor usually, but not invariably, appointed from home. We think that all council governments should consist of not less than four members besides the Governor, and that not less than two of these should be appointed under the conditions which now apply to Madras and Bombay. This enlargement would admit of the appointment of specially qualified natives of India."

It is in dealing with the popular scheme for constituting district self-government under a Collector in Council that the Commission reveals the frowardness of the bureaucratic diathesis. The carefully framed proposals put forward on behalf of the Indian public are hardly considered, the bold proposal to abolish the office of commissioner as superfluous and obstructive, being apparently sufficient to condemn the whole scheme. With almost pathetic insistence they strive to find possible uses for this fifth wheel in the administrative coach; and curtly decide, not only to maintain the office, but to magnify it: "We consider it essential to give larger powers to commissioners, and reject proposals for their abolition, or their conversion into mere advisory and inspecting officers." We must hope that Lord Morley will himself look into this matter, and apply the necessary corrective to the defects arising from the purely official personnel of the Commission.

The Drama.

BOHEMIA AND BATHOS.

MR. MONCKTON HOFFE, author of "The Little Damsel," at Wyndham's Theatre, is a new writer of distinct promise. He has, in a high degree, the knack of the stage, and can write bright and effective dialogue without artificial point-making. Yet one hesitates to hail him very confidently as one of the forces of the future; for, though he can say things dramatically and effectively, there is little evidence of his having anything to say. He knows too much about "life" in the narrow sense of the word, and too little about life in the broad sense. The popularity of Mr. Hawtrey, and the amiability with which (I am glad to see) the piece has been received by the Press, may make it popular up to a point; but it can have no lasting success, for, without being precisely cynical, it introduces us to a moral chaos in which there is not a single firm spot for our sympathies to rest upon. A comédie rosse we can understand, in which every one is actuated by the basest motives, in perfect unconsciousness of their baseness. But here it is not the characters who are altogether base; it is, rather, the author who seems to possess no faculty of moral discrimination.

The Little Damsel is a certain Julie Alardy, a foreigner from Kidderminster, whose family history I did not clearly catch. She plays the harp in a Blue Hungarian band attached to a Bohemian café in Soho, and is adored by the conductor, Papa Bartholdi, and by the other musicians. I gathered (though, to tell the truth, I am not at all certain on this point) that she was a young lady of irreproachable morals. Somehow or other she became engaged to an elderly personage of forbidding aspect and undesirable habits, Captain Neil Partington by name, who wrote her a number of letters, in which he seems to have made frank avowals concerning the habits before mentioned. The gallant captain has now broken off the engagement, in order to marry a young lady of family, named Sybil Craven; but he knows that Sybil would not have him if she knew the contents of his letters to Julie, and Julie dangles this Sword of Damocles over his head. I am not quite sure whether she threatens him with an action for breach of promise, or merely proposes privately to communicate his epistolary indiscretions to Miss Craven; but in neither case can I find her action sympathetic. That she should ever have thought of marrying so disagreeable an old ruffian is little to her credit; that she should try to take a low revenge on him is still less. In short, Miss Julie strikes me as a rather common adventuress. She has a perfect right, no doubt, to bring an action for breach of promise; but ladies who avail themselves of such rights do not make quite satisfactory heroines of comedy.

Meanwhile a happy thought has occurred to Captain Partington. There is a good-natured, impetuous sportsman hanging around, named Recklaw Poole, who has been warned off the turf seven years before, and has since lived by his wits. He likes Julie, Julie likes him; and Partington proposes to give him £10,000 to marry her. "I will, if you make it £15,000," says Mr. Poole; and Partington makes it £15,000. A telegram is concocted, announcing that some relative has died and left him this money; and Julie, learning of it, at once consents to bestow on him her hand and heart.

Now, we have here quite a jumble of motives; not very good, not very bad, but simply a little squalid. Since Julie and Recklaw sincerely like each other, there is no great harm in their getting married; but as Julie apparently would not have married him but for his money, she cannot be acquitted of a tinge of mercenariness; while Recklaw's conduct in taking money to marry a woman who, if not Partington's cast-off mistress, is acting very much as if she had been, is, perhaps, a little lacking in delicacy. The whole conjuncture excites neither approval nor very vehement indignation. It is a trifle grimy, and that is all. At the same time, it would seem that Julie is sufficiently disinterested to prefer revenge to money. Since Partington is willing to give £10,000 (and eventually £15,000) to marry her off, we may presume that he had failed to buy her off at something like the same figure. Whether this is stated I cannot say (I was unfortunately placed for hearing); but it seems a fair deduction from the known facts of the case. On the other hand, I do not know that I actively respect a lady who prefers revenge to £10,000. If she were determined, at all costs, to save Miss Craven from the disaster of marrying such a cur as the gallant captain, that would be a different matter. But, no! she seems to be, as Mr. George Edwardes would say, "actuated by nothing but spite and malice." If she had Miss Craven's interests at heart, she would not allow herself to be married off any more than to be bought off. Altogether, the situation is, as I have said, a tissue of motives which are neither actually laudable nor positively detestable, but simply grimy.

Well, the marriage takes place, and we find Mr. and Mrs. Poole, their honeymoon over, settled in a comfortable flat, with a footman, a billiard-table, and everything handsome about them. Recklaw has been fortunate in his sporting investments, and even his finances are flourishing. One fine day Captain Partington calls to recover from Julie the famous packet of letters. She is on the point of giving them up when a caprice seizes her, and she demands that Sybil Craven shall call upon her. Now Captain Partington knows, what Julie does not know, that in the old days, before Poole came his cropper on the turf, he was engaged to Sybil; consequently he is most unwilling to bring her to the flat. Julie, however, is obdurate, and Partington weakly consents. The result is that Sybil and Recklaw meet and recognise each other, with disastrous consequences. Recklaw flies into a great rage, returns Partington his money, and tells Sybil what a pitiful personage she is about to marry. Sybil flies into a great rage, breaks off the match, and leaves the house. And, finally, Julie flies into a great rage, and vows that she will never speak to Recklaw again. Once more we are in a region of psychological fog. Sybil's action is clear enough; she sees that she has got into a very queer gang, and had better get out of it. But Recklaw's sudden burst of chivalry certainly takes us by surprise; while Julie's fury seems wholly disproportionate. If she had acted in a sudden paroxysm of jealousy on finding that her husband cared so much for another woman as to give up £10,000 in order to have the right to serve her, one could more or less understand her conduct. But this does not seem to be her motive. What she resents is having been "entrapped" into this marriage—a shady transaction, certainly, but who is she that she should rebel so very violently against conduct that is a little "off color"? The standards of all these people are to me an inscrutable mystery.

There is, in fact, no reason whatever for a breach between Recklaw and Julie, who have come to love each other very sincerely. In the last act, Julie learns that Recklaw, still chivalrous and still shady, has heavily insured his life in her favor, and proposes to commit suicide. If this be possible (is there not generally some time-limit within which suicide invalidates a policy?) it is, in effect, a fraud upon the companies; but we are expected to accept it as heroism. Julie, at any rate, does so, and consents to reintegrate the conjugal domicile; so that all is for the best in the shadiest of all possible worlds. Mr. Hawtrey is delightful as Recklaw; Miss May Blayney plays Julie very cleverly; and Mr. Vane Tempest and Mr. Arthur Playfair are excellent in subsidiary parts. I hope we shall meet Mr. Hoffe again, and meet him in better company.

Circumstances over which I have no control compel me to deal very briefly with "The Servant in the House," by Mr. Charles Rann Kennedy. This I cannot altogether regret, for I find myself quite inadequate to the task of appreciation. The play has been a great success in America, where I saw it eighteen months ago, and heard it praised by good judges. It was received with what seemed to be genuine enthusiasm by the Adelphi audience on Monday night. I am told that very intelligent men on this side, to whom the author has read it, have been mightily impressed by it. Surely, then, there must be something in it; but for the life of me I cannot tell what. It seems to me a piece of confused and laborious symbolism, with no coherent or competent thought behind it, and with no dramatic interest independent of the symbolism. It is written with some vivacity and force, so that several passages, taken in themselves and apart from their context, have a plausibly dramatic air. But they hang in the void, they do not fit into any intelligible scheme, whether of dramatic action or of figurative significance. So, at any rate, it seems to me, after having listened to the play twice with all possible attention. I do not dislike it at all; there is nothing offensive in it; Mr. Kennedy is not at all akin to that class of dramatists whom Mr. Henry Arthur Jones aptly personifies as Mr. Godly-Slime. I should like very much to feel the greatness of his play; but, with the best will in the world, I cannot. It bored me in New York, it bores me in London. It is at once too "brainy" and too "drainy" for me. Is it Ibsen's fault, I wonder, that people insist on associating symbolism with drains? After all, he employed that motive in only one play.

In New York, "Manson," the butler in the house of the Rev. William Smythe, was made up after the conventional portraits of Christ, and wore a gorgeous hieratic garment, which the other people in the play supposed to be Indian, but which had nothing to do with Hindustan. At the Adelphi Mr. Valentine wears no make-up except a brownish complexion, and dresses in a turban and a very plain Indian costume of (I take it) tussore silk. Whether this change is made in deference to Mr. Redford, I cannot say; but it renders meaningless the remark with which everyone greets "Manson"—"Surely I know you"; or, "Where have I seen you before?" Mr. Valentine plays the part with quiet strength; but, with the make-up, the irony of their non-recognition of the Personage vanishes. Mr. Forbes Robertson, in "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," needed no make-up; for Mr. Jerome had simply conceived the character in the spirit of Dekker's line: "The first true gentleman that ever lived." But in Mr. Kennedy's play the figure is symbolic or it is nothing, and there seems to be no meaning in the plain Eastern dress. Mr. Henry Miller gave a very fine performance of the drain-artist, which went a long way towards securing the favorable reception of the play; and Miss Edith Wynne Matthison, Mr. Guy Standing, Mr. Barnes, and Miss Gladwys Wynne, were all remarkably good.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters to the Editor.

GLADSTONE AND MONEY BILLS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article, "Through Reaction to Revolution," you commented upon the way in which Lord Curzon had made use of a passage from a speech of the late Mr. Gladstone, which was delivered in 1861. It looks as though the opinion of the great Liberal chief, which he elsewhere, and much later in history, put in emphatic and precise terms, has been overlooked. We have had reference made to Pitt, to Wellington, to Salisbury, to Rosebery, and even to Mr. Balfour, of last autumn, as a series of warnings against putting the Lords in action against the Budget. But why not Mr. Gladstone? The passage to which I allude occurs in a speech on the finance of the Conservative Government made at Hastings so late as 1891: "I must remind you," said the speaker, "of that which is apt to pass away from recollection, for the finance of the country is intimately associated with the liberties of the country. It is a powerful leverage by which English liberty has been gradually acquired. Running back into the depths of antiquity for many centuries, it lies at the root of English liberty, and if the House of Commons can, by any possibility, lose the power of the control of the grants of public money, depend upon it your very liberty will be worth very little in comparison. . . . That powerful leverage has been what is commonly known as the power of the purse—which not only is your main guarantee for purity . . . but which likewise lies at the root of English liberty, and if the House of Commons could, by any possibility, lose the power of controlling the granting of public money for the carrying on the affairs of the Government, depend upon it your other liberties will be worth but very little in comparison. No violence, no tyranny . . . could, even for a moment, have a chance of prevailing against the energies of that great assembly. No; if these powers of the House of Commons come to be encroached upon, it will be by trick and insidious methods." (Speeches of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, cl. by A. W. Hutton and H. J. Cohen, 1902.)

When it is constantly being stated that the "new" Liberalism of to-day has removed from the standpoint of the "old" Liberalism of yesterday, and the chiefs of the past are lauded at the expense of those of the present, because of certain elements in the composition of the Budget in connection with the land clauses, I am old enough and (may I say?) good enough Liberal to remember that the party pressed forward over twenty years ago, as items of the legislative programme, taxation of local values and ground rents, taxation of mining royalties, &c., and that Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, and other leaders, supported the same. It looks as if the present loud outcry mainly arose from the fears that these old things of Liberalism were at last becoming the law of the land; new, they certainly cannot be said to be.—Yours, &c.,

J. FROME WILKINSON.

Barley Rectory, Herts,
October 26th, 1909.

THE INDIAN DEPORTATIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Four months ago you allowed me to point out the injustice which—in addition to the actual imprisonment without charge or trial—the policy of deportation in India imposes upon its victims. I illustrated it by showing how Mr. Lajpat Rai, deported in 1907 for alleged seditious tampering with the troops, succeeded at last in 1909, at the price of lengthy legal proceedings, in obtaining from the High Court of Calcutta a triumphant verdict of rehabilitation against the paper in India which had libelled him. It took him two years to do it. He had to travel from Lahore to Calcutta for the hearing, and he is still waiting for the result of an appeal, though the only issue is the amount of damages to which he is fairly entitled.

In that action it was attempted to use against him the fact of his deportation by Lord Morley. But the Judge held that that would be unfair, on the ground that Mr. Lajpat Rai had never been permitted by the Government to know why he was deported, and therefore could make no answer to the alleged accusations against him. Neither the Government nor the police could suggest any other evidence against him.

The unfortunate man had barely got through his action in India when his suit against a London paper came on here. The libel was more gross than that of the Calcutta paper, alleging treasonable intrigues with a foreign Power to oust the British from India. The alleged authority for this was a certain "highly-placed official." When sued, the London paper, like the Calcutta paper, made no attempt to substantiate the libel, and refused to give the name of the "highly-placed official." Again, therefore, the only issue was the amount of damages to be awarded to Mr. Lajpat Rai. But in this case the conduct of the Judge was wholly different. Instead of ruling that the deportation was an irrelevant fact which it would be unfair to use against the plaintiff, he summed up to the jury that they must bear in mind that Lord Morley had deported Mr. Lajpat Rai, and that Lord Morley was a very careful man in whom everyone had confidence. The result was that, although the jury gave the plaintiff a verdict that he had been falsely and maliciously libelled, they awarded much smaller damages than had the Court in India.

I need not argue with your intelligent readers which Judge took the fairer course. I want to insist upon the wrong done to Mr. Lajpat Rai, a wrong which must inevitably befall those who suffer deportation, dogged as they are throughout their lives by the odium of some unknown charge, the nature of which they can never ascertain, and the authors of which they are never allowed to confront.

Mr. Lajpat Rai is largely dependent upon his earnings in his profession of the law. He has had to leave his practice for months, and spend his time between India and England in order to compel his libellers, first in one country and then in the other, to withdraw their charges. The expenditure of time and income is perhaps less serious than the mental anxiety. And the nine gentlemen, who were deported in December last and who are still in jail, may, whenever they are released, have to go through a similar ordeal.

Let me remind my fellow Liberals how long ago it is since this arbitrary policy was discredited, and admitted by both political parties to have completely broken down. It was tried a generation ago in Ireland under less unjust conditions than those now practised in India. Within ten years its failure was admitted in Parliament by Sir William Harcourt in the following words, which were assented to by Mr. Balfour:—

"The Act of 1881, whether a 'monstrous' Act or not, was an enormous mistake. It certainly proved so. Why was it called by the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Balfour) a 'monstrous' Act? Because it vested the discretion of imprisoning men in the Secretary for Ireland or the Lord-Lieutenant, and because the people of this country would not tolerate powers so exercised, or such a discretion." (Mr. Balfour: "Hear hear.")

Yet under that Act the warrant notified the accused of the crime of which he was suspected. Parliament was informed of the ground for every arrest. Each case was reconsidered every third month by the Executive. There was no banishment. Imprisonment was limited in duration. In India the imprisonment is unlimited. Parliament and the accused are kept in the dark as to what is the offence, or who are the accusers of the deported person.

Why have so many Liberals sat silent? Because it is India where these things have happened, and because the chief actor has been such an accredited champion of freedom as Lord Morley. But history will not accept this as an excuse for violating the immutable principles of justice. And in the mouth of a future reactionary Government the practical precedents of despotism, furnished by these deportations, will speak louder than any Liberal protests in favor of liberty.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC MACKARNES.
House of Commons,
October 26th, 1909.

LIBERAL WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It seems to me that the letter, entitled "The Government and the Suffragettes," in your issue of October 16th, 1909, calls for some remarks. In it the Suffragettes are defended on the plea that they are "high-minded and devoted women," possessed with "an earnest desire to raise the status of their sex." In the next paragraph the writer denies any right to be heard to the enormous and daily growing multitude of women who are against the concession to women of a vote for Parliament. Surely the latter have as much right to form a judgment as to what is likely to raise the status of their sex, and also to urge their judgment and be listened to, as the female hooligans and energumens who have converted not a few men (myself among the number) who were formerly well-disposed towards the movement initiated by John Stuart Mill into determined opponents of it. I believe if Mill were alive now he would be reconsidering his scheme.

The writer of the letter in question regards the maiming and wounding of innocent people met together to listen to an address by a Liberal statesman, and the destruction of other people's property, as "technical obstruction for political purposes," and demands that such offences should be recognised as merely political. Surely such a demand stamps him as a hopeless crank.

To my mind, the worst aspect of the matter is that these women are steadily undermining that chivalrous consideration for their sex which men should entertain. All the votes in the world would not undo the harm to their sex which these viragoes will soon have done.—Yours, &c.,

FRED. C. CONYBEARE, F.B.A.

17, Bradmore Road, Oxford,
October 26th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Holford Knight raises a question that is stirring the hearts of many at the present time.

In the light of coming events, many official Liberal women are having to decide each on her own account and responsibility to whom she will give her allegiance.

Shall she obey the behests of the Women's Liberal Federation and work only for those members or candidates who are willing to support the immediate Suffrage demand; or shall she obey the call of Liberalism itself and work for that, regardless of what assistance she may get as a Suffragist?

Or, as some put it, does she count herself a woman first and then a Liberal, or vice versa?

That it is a difficult decision goes without saying. Women who have for years worked hand in hand, will now, in many important ways, have to take different paths, and, in so doing, will appear to condemn each other.

But so it must be.

To many of us it seems certain that the enfranchisement of women will come at no very distant date, but that which particular date it may be would make very little appreciable difference to the welfare of the country; the balance of things would probably be only very slowly modified.

But it would make an enormous difference to the welfare of the country if the forces of reaction gained any further hold on democracy; if the House of Lords gained any further right of way into the British Constitution, or if the Feudalism of Wealth regained its power over individual life.

As Suffragists we should naturally rejoice could we come full-weaponed to help in this cause, but surely we ought to help in this fight left-handed, rather than not at all.

To me it appears very clear, to use another metaphor, that by merely taking one's hand off the plough we are helping to smooth the way for forces which, as Liberals, we condemn.

When future generations recall the history of women's work for freedom, I hope that they will read in the annals of the great movement that, at this period of the country's history, the majority of Liberal women counted their Liberal principles to be a higher claim even than their Suffrage demands.—Yours, &c.,

CATHERINE RYLE.

15, German Place, Brighton,
October 27th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Holford Knight's letter in your last issue is but one more example of the curious blindness which has fallen on the official Liberal in reference to women's enfranchisement. I agree that the continued existence of the House of Lords' veto is an anomaly which Liberalism should take the earliest opportunity of removing, and that the Budget has introduced some new principles of finance which are likely to have a very beneficial effect on the future of this country. Had I a vote, and were I recognised in politics as a person capable of exercising all civic rights, I should certainly be ready to devote my time and energy to forwarding these reforms. But does Mr. Holford Knight think that, at the present moment, any other cause can appeal to a woman as does the enfranchisement of her own sex? In 1832, in 1867, and in 1884, measures re-arranging the details of the franchise accorded to men ranked on each occasion as among the greatest issues of the day. The abolition of the sex disability in politics is as important as any previous reform of the franchise. And increasing changes in our social system render it quite as urgent. On the one hand, owing to the disproportion of the sexes and the rising age for marriage, more women are being compelled to depend on themselves for support. On the other hand, the greater interest in social reform is leading Parliament to pass laws having a direct and immediate bearing on home life, and the bringing-up of children. I may instance the Children's Charter and the Housing and Town Planning Bill. These are women's matters, and it is the duty of women to insist that their views shall be ascertained and taken into account before more legislation on similar objects is framed. To the supreme issue of their own enfranchisement, all other political issues must for them be subordinate, and to compare the inconvenience of the Lords' veto to the injustice of the sex disability, is to betray a total lack of sense of proportion.

It is Mr. Holford Knight's misfortune that he belongs to a party which refuses to devote any serious consideration to the political enfranchisement of women, and, in so doing, undermines the loyalty and weakens the enthusiasm of its supporters. That he should display some alarm at the situation is natural and justifiable, but he should not upbraid or counsel the women. It is the leaders of his own party to whom his advice should be given. He should urge them to make a clear pronouncement on the subject as soon as possible, undertaking either to pass a Bill enfranchising women before they go out of office, or to make woman suffrage an item in the Liberal programme at the general election. If that step is not taken, women who respect their own dignity have no alternative save, with very great regret, to sever or, at the very least, suspend their connection with a party which treats the demands of women, whether they proceed on militant or on strictly constitutional lines, with insulting neglect.—Yours, &c.,

M. A.

Hampstead, October 26th, 1909.

THE DENIAL OF SUPPLIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As I understand Constitutional history, the taxes granted by Parliament were in former times handed over to the King, to be expended by him in maintaining his state, and for keeping up the military, naval, and civil services. The rents and profits of his estates—the Crown lands—were also paid into his treasury. All these receipts are now collected into one fund called the Consolidated Fund, the first charge upon which is the interest on the National Debt, and the next charge is the civil list.

If the House of Lords is entitled and does refuse to assent to the taxes proposed to be imposed by the House of Commons, it would seem that the latter could in turn refuse to sanction any borrowing of money temporarily to replace the refused taxes. Moreover, as a matter of legal right the nation would appear to have no right against the holders of Consols to mortgage the Consolidated Fund, except as a second charge. That being of no value as a security, the ability of the Government to borrow upon an expectancy of future taxes is highly speculative, and the security would practically be confined to the personal responsibility of the various individuals effecting the loan. The refusal, therefore, by the House of Lords to assent to the taxes of this year would amount to a denial to the King and country of the means of maintenance of himself and the Services, and, seeing that it would abrogate the right and duty of the Commons to vote supplies, would be as near an act of high treason to the Crown and nation as this country has yet witnessed.

Under these circumstances the King and Commons, as two of the three estates of the realm, should each unite to ignore the treasonable act of the Lords, or proceed to punish it in a summary, but none the less effective, manner.—Yours, &c., LAW.

October 27th, 1909.

GOVERNMENT AND BUREAUCRACY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. H. G. Wood, does not seem to me very successful in his attempt to minimise the difficulty raised by Mr. Belfort Bax. I will give him an instance, which, I think, will appeal to him. Since 1870 there have been two standards of efficiency for public elementary schools, a higher one for what are now called provided schools, a lower one for non-provided. Since 1906 the two standards have approximated slightly, but not much. Can we believe that Mr. Birrell, Mr. McKenna and Mr. Runciman like this discrepancy? Why, then, does it continue? Is it not because of the permanent officials? These gentlemen are not treacherous conspirators, but good, easy persons, who just go on in the old groove. Their inertia defeats the efforts of the best-intentioned Minister.

The next point—the remedy—is harder to deal with. The American spoils system is out of the question, but there is one suggestion I should like to make. Policy and finance go closely together, and if the House of Commons would only frame its own estimates, instead of taking them ready framed, it would go far towards getting control over those who are now its servants in name only. The Education estimates may be taken as an example. These would be referred to a Grand Committee. This Committee would elect its own Chairman, and have before it the Minister of Education, who would be attended by his chief permanent officials. The items of expenditure would be scrutinised one by one, and the House of Commons, through its Committee, would be face to face with its own servants. The matter would not end here. Certain members of the Committee would develop a thirst for information, and would get the run of the Education Offices, thus letting light in upon their dark corners. The same plan might be adopted with all the great spending departments.

The House of Commons, if it acted thus, would only be following the example of all municipal authorities, for there is not a single municipal body in England, from the smallest parish council up to the most important town or county council, which has not more control over its permanent officials than our "Mother of Parliaments," and the sooner that venerable lady condescends to learn of her offspring the better.

The plan I suggest would not only give the House of Commons control over its servants, but also over its finances—a thing it has long lost. To take Education once more as an example, there has not been a single thorough debate of the Education Estimates during the present Parliament. Further, the way in which vast sums of money are voted without a word of criticism, when once the allotted days of supply are fulfilled, is a scandal patent to the whole civilised world.

Of course, there are difficulties in the way. My suggestion pre-supposes a House composed of men who can give the whole of their time and energies to their work, and a nation sufficiently interested in being well-governed to pay adequately for services rendered. But the present state of things cannot continue when once the electors realise what it is.—Yours &c.,
A. I. TILLYARD.

Fordfield, Cambridge,
October 25th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is most refreshing to find in your columns a recognition by Mr. Belfort Bax of one of the great political dangers of the moment—centralisation and the substitution of bureaucracy for representative government. It is a policy which, for different reasons, no one, I think, would have expected from either of the great political parties. Yet it is undoubtedly the case that the proposals for legislation now before the country, but particularly the Housing and Town Planning Bill, do contain provisions which, in set terms, overthrow, in favor of the permanent Government Departments, both the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and also that principle of the rule of law, which has hitherto been looked up by all thinking politicians of whatever party as the greatest safeguard to the private citizen contained in the British Constitution. However keen may be the feelings of supporters of the present Government against the veto of the Lords, it can surely not be alleged, as a cause of complaint against that House, that they insisted that no portion of an Act of Parliament, whether public or private, should be allowed to be tampered with save by Parliament itself, and that our legal system should not be violated, and the citizen deprived of his legal remedy, by transferring to a Government department jurisdiction properly belonging only to courts of law.

Mr. Bax seems to indicate that the absolute rule of the permanent official requires dealing with by some change in our Civil Service. I do not know what is in his mind, but I trust not the American "spoils system." It does not appear to me that any change in our Civil Service is required save a more up-to-date organisation in certain offices. Some body of men trained in the technical work of drafting Bills and of executive administration is clearly indispensable, and better civil servants than those of this country I firmly believe it is impossible to find, but it is necessary to see to it that they are confined to that work which is properly the work of permanent officials, and that they do not encroach upon the powers appropriate to and hitherto exercised by Parliament, the courts of law, or the local authorities.—Yours, &c.,

G. MONTAGU HARRIS.

Reform Club, Pall Mall, S.W.

October 21st, 1909.

REACTION AND REVOLUTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article in THE NATION of October 23rd contributes materially to the strength of the Liberal position, by exposing the desperate straits to which the Conservative Party are driven for support when they would fain have recourse to the speeches of Mr. Gladstone, who, in his very last speech in the House of Commons, contended for the limitation of the peers of the House of Lords, and who was notoriously thwarted by them in all his measures of reform.

The work of a revising Chamber should be, as far as possible, non-party and judicial. The revision work of the House of Lords during the term of office of the present Government, before they have the handling of the Finance Bill, is enough to convince every sincere reformer that, as now constituted, they are incapable of revision, except in the interests of reaction. They cannot add to the proof of this in principle by amending or rejecting the Finance Bill; they could only show how consistently blind they are to the irresistible progressive forces that will not any longer suffer the anomalous proprietorship of the land under feudal conditions.

The constitutional question in its financial aspect has its own importance, and is being argued with accumulating cogency against the peers' right of intervention, but let us not exhaust our appeal to the democracy on this one issue. We have other scores to settle, even if, as seems probable, they do pass the Finance Bill, we should persistently keep this fact to the front. The present Government assumed office with vast arrears to make up; they were elected to do so by a solid, thoroughly aroused democracy, who will expect to see something more than an Old Age Pensions Act—to be sure, an excellent instalment—plus the dubiously progressive items of the Territorials scheme and eight "Dreadnoughts."

If some means can be devised of depriving the House of Lords of the absolute veto, will not a long step have been taken towards transforming them into an impartial, constitutional revising Chamber? If, then, they remain implacable enemies of progress, they will, indeed, in a fuller measure than you even contemplate in your article, provoke the forces of reform to formulate and prosecute remedies of a more revolutionary character.—Yours, &c.,

R. HENDERSON SMITH.

Edinburgh, October 27th, 1909.

AGRARIAN LAW IN HUNGARY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Stephen Bernáth, the director of an organisation which he, for the special purposes of his letter, euphemistically describes as the Hungarian "Farmers' " League, but which, in reality, includes, and is directed by, the richest dukes and greatest landlords of Hungary, challenges you to explain the ground upon which your accusations against the social and national policy of the Hungarian Coalition Government are founded.

As Mr. Bernáth has the astounding temerity to expressly refer to the Hungarian law on the juridical relations between landlords (or farmers) and servants, and to assert "that no single country has interfered so minutely nor so sympathetically with the question as has Hungary, as evinced by her law," I ask your permission to quote a few clauses of the said law, leaving your readers to draw their own conclusions.

According to clause 2 of this law, all servants up to the age of eighteen are under the complete domestic discipline of the master, which means that the master has a legal right to chastise or to punish them in whichever way he pleases. Clause 33 entitles the landlord to scold or reprimand the (grown) servant for neglecting his duty. The servant has no legal redress against his master for insult or libel.

Clause 5 forbids the authorities to furnish any servant while in service with a passport for abroad without the consent of the master.

According to clauses 17 and 57 the servant who fails, without legal cause, to enter his service at the appointed time, must by the authority be brought to the place of service by force. If he even then refuses to work he is fined up to fifty kronen. If his refusal to work is the outcome of a previous arrangement with the object of compelling the master to grant concessions, the servant is punished with imprisonment up to ten days and a fine up to 100 kronen. Persons who try to induce a servant to extort concessions from the master by refusing to fulfil his obligations towards him, are punished with imprisonment up to sixty days and a fine up to 400 kronen.

If the master, without legal cause, refuses to allow the servant into his service, he must be fined not more than fifty kronen, and obliged to pay the servant's wages and to provide him with lodgings. If, notwithstanding the demand of the authority, the master refuses to pay wages and provide lodgings, the authority may compel him to do so.

According to clause 18, the servant is obliged to do, apart from his own duty, "temporarily" all other agricultural work, including that of his sick or otherwise absent mates, without pay. Refusal to do this is punished with a fine up to 50 kronen.

Clause 19: The servant is not permitted to have his work done by someone else; to admit, even temporarily, persons not belonging to his household into his lodgings against the will of the master. Infringement of this rule is also fined up to fifty kronen.

By clause 29, the landlord is obliged to provide each servant and his family with one living-room and one box-room—ten years' hence. Up till 1917 the servants may be housed—as they are now—like pigs.

According to clause 30, the servant is supposed to have a day "of rest on Sundays and Church holidays. The servant must, from time to time," be allowed to attend the Sunday morning service of his denomination. On the day of rest the servant is obliged to do all the work necessary to the upkeep of the farm, feeding of the animals, &c. In urgent cases, the servant is compelled to do any other work for an ordinary day's wages. Refusal is punished as above.

According to clauses 7 and 40, the agreement of service usually is meant for one year. If neither of the parties two months before the expiration of the year, gives notice to end the agreement, the same is legally binding for another year.

It will be understood that this clause is calculated to, and effectually does, bring about the perpetual bondage of the servant, who, illiterate as he usually is, almost certainly misses the exact date of the legal notice.

According to clause 60, the authority may, on the recommendation of the master, remit any sentence against the servant, if he is ultimately willing to work. A sort of royal prerogative of mercy vested in landowners, and, needless to say, a fruitful source of tyrannical extortion.

It may also be remarked that the "authority" mentioned in this law is the "Stuhlrichter" or the "Gespan," as the case may be, an "authority" which is practically nominated by the landlords of the district.

These are some of—by no means all—the infamous provisions of the law which Mr. Bernáth is eulogising. Your readers will, doubtless, quite understand why the director of the Hungarian "Farmers' " League sees nothing to complain about it. But perhaps Mr. Bernáth will next time be kind enough to quote the opinion of the Hungarian Agricultural Laborers' Union.

It is no part of my business to defend the omissions of English social legislation with regard to agricultural servants. But, surely, one might expect the elementary sense of shame on the part of a representative of the dominant squirearchy of an Eastern European country not to boast before the Western world about a measure which, in the year of grace 1907, deliberately undertakes to reintroduce some of the worst features of medieval feudalism.—Yours, &c.,

JOS. SACHSE,

Editor of the "Londoner Volks-Zeitung."

107, Charlotte Street, W.

October 27th, 1909.

[The letter on "Agrarian Policy in Hungary" in last week's NATION was, by a mistake, signed St. Bernoit. It was written by Dr. Stephen Bernáth, M.P.—Ed., NATION.]

Poetry.

THE RE-INCARNATION.

[To him, in Hades, who wrought the Winged Victory, to tell him of how she whom he made immortal has again put on mortality.]

*Again hath bloomed the loved, lost face ;
Again men see, as you of yore,
The calm, the might, the line, the grace,
That did thy craftsman's soul implore,
In sea-girt, sacred Samothrace.*

Out of the brief and fleeting years,
Comes softly hence, to mortal man,
She whom you marked with hopes and fears
Till that eternal moment when
You captured what was lost till then :

The grace, the might, the calm, the line,
More transient than the wavering gleams
Of sun and shade that intertwine,
Afloat upon the wavering streams,
Weaving for poets their vague dreams.

O Thracian, who in marble made
Immortal mutability
(Even as a rose that cannot fade,
A wave-crest rescued from the sea),
As you wrought, wherefore cannot we ?

For though on earth she comes again,
None capture now nor face nor pose ;
She passes like an April rain ;
More lost than are the last year's snows,
Or any fleeting wind that blows.

*Again hath bloomed the loved, lost face ;
Again men see, as you of yore,
The calm, the might, the line, the grace,
That did thy craftsman's soul implore,
In sea-girt, sacred Samothrace.*

FREDERICK NIVEN.

MACMILLAN & CO's New Books

THREE BEAUTIFUL COLOUR BOOKS.

The French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century; their Lives, their Times, their Art, and their Significance. By HALDANE MACFALL. Edited by T. LEMAN HARE. With 40 Examples in Colour and 12 in Black. Demy 4to, 42s. net. [Tuesday.]

The Water Babies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble. Crown 4to, 15s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe, printed on Hand-made Paper and limited to 250 copies. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

The Forest Lovers. By MAURICE HEWLETT. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by A. S. Hartrick. 8vo, 5s. net.

Antonio Stradivari: his Life and Work (1644-1737). By W. HENRY HILL, ARTHUR F. HILL, F.S.A., and ALFRED E. HILL. With an Introductory Note by Lady Huggins. Illustrated. Second and Cheaper Edition. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

CHEAPER RE-ISSUE.

Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. By G. B.-J. Cheaper Re-issue. With 2 Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations, 2 vols. 8vo, 10s. net. Immediately. The Edition with 41 Photogravure Plates, 2 vols., 30s. net, is still on sale.

Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic. Translated from the Italian of BENEDETTO CROCE, by DOUGLAS AINSLIE, B.A. (Oxon.) 8vo, 10s. net.

Handbook of Marks on Pottery and Porcelain. By W. BURTON, M.A., and R. L. HOBSON, B.A. Illustrated, Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Essays on Some Biblical Questions of the Day. By Members of the University of Cambridge. Edited by HENRY BARCLAY SWETE, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity. 8vo, 12s. net.

The Two Empires: The Church and the World. Being Lectures on Early Church History. By BROOKE FOSSE WESTCOTT, D.D., late Bishop of Durham. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE GEM SERIES.

Miniature Volumes, bound in Peltine Leather, Gilt with Decorated Titles, F'cap. 16mo, 1s. net each.

Christmas, Christmas Eve, and Christmas Day. By WASHINGTON IRVING. With Illustrations by Randolph Caldecott.

Country Pictures. By MARY RUSSELL MITFORD. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson.

Faithless Sally Brown, and other Poems. By THOMAS HOOD. With Illustrations by Charles E. Brock.

Goblin Market. By CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI. With Illustrations by Laurence Housman.

In Memoriam. By LORD TENNYSON.

Rubāiyāt of Omar Khayyām. Fourth Edition. Translated by Edward FitzGerald.

St. Paul: a Poem. By FREDERICK W. H. MYERS.

Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Rudyard Kipling's New Book Actions and Reactions

1. Uniform Edition; Scarlet cloth, extra crown 8vo. 6s.
2. Pocket Edition; India paper, limp leather, f'cap. 8vo, 5s. net.
3. Edition de Luxe (limited to 775 copies); Hand-made paper, saten cloth, 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Highways and Byways in Middlesex. By WALTER JERROLD. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON, and a Map. Extra Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

Open Country.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

Stradella: an Old Italian Love Tale. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

The Key of the Unknown. By ROSA N. CAREY.

Robert Emmet: a Historical Romance. By STEPHEN GWYNN.

A Gentle Knight of Old Brandenburg. By CHARLES MAJOR, Author of "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," etc.

The Little Merman. A Story for Children. By ETHEL READER. With 8 Illustrations by FRANK C. PAPE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

The New New York. A Commentary on the Place and the People. By JOHN C. VAN DYKE. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. 8vo, 17s. net.

Essays on Greek Literature. By R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D., LL.D. Crown 8vo, 4s. net. [November 5th]

A Latin Anthology. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Limp Leather, full gilt back and gilt edge, 3s. 6d. net. Golden Treasury Series.

New Volume Commences with the November Number.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

The Dramatist and the Theatre. By Brander Matthews. Pictures by André Castaigne, &c.

Amiens. By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. Pictures by Joseph Pennell.

Louis Loeb, Illustrator and Painter. With Reproductions from his Paintings.

The Creators: a Comedy. 1. A Novel. By May Sinclair.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest. Also ready Volume LXXVIII. May to October, 1909.

Price 10s. 6d.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

- "New Poems." By William Watson. (Lane. 5s. net.)
 "The Enchanted Island, and Other Poems." By Alfred Noyes. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)
 "The Man Shakespeare and His Tragical Life-Story." By Frank Harris. (Palmer. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "Memories of Fifty Years." By Lady St. Helier. (Arnold. 15s. net.)
 "The Life of Joan of Arc." By Anatole France. Translated by Winifred Stephens. (Lane. 2 vols. 25s. net.)
 "French Cathedrals, Monasteries, and Abbeys." By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. (Unwin. 20s. net.)
 "A Century of Empire." Vo. I., 1801-1832. By the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell. (Arnold. 14s. net.)
 "Giovanni Boccaccio: A Biographical Study." By Edward Hutton. (Lane. 15s. net.)
 "The Tribunal of the Terror." By G. Lenôtre. Translated by Frederic Lees. (Heinemann. 10s. net.)
 "The Incomparable Siddons." By Mrs. Clement Parsons. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
 "Men and Manners of Old Florence." By Guido Biagi. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
 "Rosemary's Letter Book." By W. L. Courtney. (Melrose. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "Robert Emmet: A Historical Romance." By Stephen Gwynn.
 "A Crucial Experiment." By A. C. Farquharson. (Arnold. 6s.)
 "Lettres Inédites de Lamennais à la Baronne Cottu." Avec un Introduction par le Comte d'Haussonville. (Paris: Perrin. 5 fr.)
 "L'Académie Française sous l'Ancien Régime." Par Gaston Boissier. (Paris: Hachette. 3 fr. 50.)
 "Au Service des Idées et des Lettres." Par Etienne Lamy. (Paris: Bloud. 3 fr. 50.)
 "Aimer Quand Même." Roman. Par Jean de la Brète. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3 fr. 50.)
 "Bismarck: Eine Biographie." I. Band. Bismarcks Jugend 1815-1848. Von Erich Marcks. (Stuttgart: Cotta. 7 m. 50.)

* * *

THE critical essays of Walter Bagehot, a reprint of which has just been issued by Mr. Melrose, provide an instance of a book published in three slightly different forms under three different titles. It first appeared in 1858 as "Estimates of Some Englishmen and Scotchmen" and attracted the attention of several distinguished writers, but had a small sale. Next, after Bagehot's death, R. H. Hutton republished it, together with a few additional essays, under the title of "Literary Studies." Mr. Cuthbert Lennox has now made a selection of these, which he calls "Estimations in Criticism." Hutton set a high value on Bagehot's criticism as the work of a man who, possessing a vein of high imagination, could yet prosper as a banker and a man of business. "Certainly," he says, "the literary taste of England never made a greater blunder than when it passed by this remarkable volume of essays with comparatively little notice. . . I hardly know any book that is such good reading, that has so much lucid vision in it, so much shrewd and curious knowledge of the world, so sober a judgment and so dashing a humor combined." Bagehot is better known as a writer on political economy and on the science of politics than as a literary critic. Both his "Economic Studies" and "Lombard Street" have been used as text-books at the Universities, while his "English Constitution" is almost a classic on its subject.

* * *

It is surprising that, except for the short memoir by R. H. Hutton, no biography of Bagehot has been written. A record of his career and of the many distinguished men with whom he was intimate would be full of interest. He was an undergraduate at University College, London, when De Morgan, Hewitt Key, Malden, and Long were Professors there, and he took an active part in founding University Hall, of which Clough was the first Principal. He was present in Paris at the time of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état, and has written a good, though not unprejudiced, account of that incident. His attendance at Crabb Robinson's famous breakfast parties brought him into contact with a crowd of notable people. The story of his friendship with R. H. Hutton and their joint work for the "Inquirer" and the "Spectator" would add an important chapter to the history of English journalism. We may mention that it was Bagehot who first described articles which fall short of the highest merit, but are still good enough to publish, as "padding."

It is likely that another volume of reminiscences by Lady Cardigan will be published by Mr. Eveleigh Nash. "My Recollections" has had a bigger sale than any other book of memoirs of the season, and a second volume may be quite as outspoken.

* * *

THE same publisher is about to issue and to edit a reprint of the memoirs of Harriet Wilson, a celebrated courtesan in the later Georgian days. The book first appeared in 1825, and in December of that year Scott wrote in his diary: "The gay world has been kept in hot water lately by the impudent publication of the celebrated Harriet Wilson. She must have been assisted in the style, spelling, and diction, though the attempt at wit is very poor, that at pathos sickening. But there is some good retailing of conversations, in which the style of the speakers, so far as known to me, is exactly imitated, and some things told, as said by individuals of each other, which will sound unpleasantly in each other's ears." The Duke of Wellington figures largely in Harriet Wilson's pages, which, though often merely spiteful, are not without historical value, for her memory, as Scott hints, was accurate and even remarkable.

* * *

In another column we review Mr. Edgcumbe's study of the last years of Byron's life. As a sign that Continental readers are still more interested in Byron than in any other English poet, it may be mentioned that two French books dealing with him were published almost simultaneously with Mr. Edgcumbe's work. One of these is "L'Aristocrate," a drama by M. Albert du Bois, in which Byron is the central figure, while Count d'Orsay, Southey, Wordsworth, Hobhouse, Scott, Moore, Lady Caroline Lamb, and Lady Cork are introduced. The other is a short but pithy biography, written by M.M. Alphonse Sédici and Jules Bertraut for Michaud's series "La Vie Anecdote et Pittoresque des Grands Ecrivains." The writers reach the conclusion that there is absolutely no proof for the charges brought against Byron and Mrs. Leigh to which Mrs. Beecher Stowe gave currency.

* * *

UNDER the title of "Quills from the Swan of Lichfield," Lady Ritchie contributes a number of hitherto unpublished letters by Anna Seward to the November "Cornhill Magazine." These letters are addressed to Mrs. Sykes, with whom Miss Seward carried on a correspondence for several years. They treat of Richard Edgeworth's marriage to Honora Sneyd—at which Miss Seward was a bridesmaid—of various pretenders to the Swan's affection, and of her hopeless devotion to Mr. Saville, "the principal singer at Lichfield Cathedral," who was already married when he became acquainted with Miss Seward. The following, describing a meeting with Edgeworth some years after his marriage, and when he had become estranged from Miss Seward, is a characteristic specimen of her extreme sensibility:—

"Ah! my dear Mrs. Sykes, you would have sooth'd me with your tender pity if you had seen me receive a message from our servant last Monday evening. I was sitting in my drawing-room with a silly coxcomb of an officer who had called upon me. John opened the door and said—'Madam, Mr. and Mrs. Edgeworth are below stairs.'—Oh my Friend! I had not the least expectation of such an event—'Good God!' I exclaimed, and sunk back in my chair more dead than alive—I desired he would say I was out—a violent flood of tears reliev'd me. The macaroni was astonished, but if a thousand Fops had been present I could not have concealed my emotion. I did not intend to see them at all—it was an hour before my aunt could prevail upon me to do down, she and my mother were out when they came. I will reserve a particular description of this, to me—heart-rending scene for the first tête-à-tête I have the pleasure to share with you, since my paper will not allow me to be circumstantial now."

Her criticism of Lord Chesterfield's letters is also worth quoting: "It would, perhaps, have been better for the youth of England if they had never been written, as they tend to destroy that virtuous, that romantic enthusiasm of youth where benevolence is fired by generous credulity, and morality preserved by passionate affection."

FROM J. M. DENT & SON'S LIST.

NEW BOOKS Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM.

LAMB'S TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE. Medium 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

GULLIVER'S TRAVELS. By JONATHAN SWIFT. Medium 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

These Books contain Numerous Coloured Drawings Finely Reproduced, Many Illustrations in Black and White, Specially Designed End-Papers and other Decorations.

There is also a Large Paper Edition of Each Volume, at 25s. net. This Edition contains a Coloured Illustration which does not appear in the 7s. 6d. Editions, and will be strictly limited to 150 copies, numbered and signed by the Artist.

MODES AND MANNERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY, as represented in the pictures and engravings of the time. By DR. OSCAR FISCHER and MAX VON BOEHM. Translated by MARIAN EDWARDS. Square demy 8vo. Three vols. in slipboard case, 21s. net. Silk Moriette, 25s. net. 600 Coloured and Half-tone Illustrations of Old-World Fashion. Of the 83 Coloured Illustrations 77 are coloured by hand.

TREES AND SHRUBS OF THE BRITISH ISLES. By C. S. COOPER, F.R.H.S., and W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S.

Over 550 Species of Trees and Shrubs are described. 16 Full-page Coloured Plates and 70 Black-and-White. Two Vols. 21s. net, or in 16 parts at 1s. net per part. Detailed prospectus on application.

NATURE STALKING FOR BOYS Through Field-Glass, Stereoscope and Camera.

By W. PERCEVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction for Boy Scouts by Gen. Sir R. S. S. BADEN-POWELL, and Verses from a Patrol Song, by special permission of Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Four Coloured Plates and 100 Photographic Illustrations. Chapter on Nature Photography by Rev S. N. Sedgwick, M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A specially made stereoscope suitable for viewing the stereoscopic pictures in this book may be obtained through any bookseller complete in case, and with instructions how to use same, price Ninepence net, or post free Tenpence. Ask for Dent's Stereoscope.

NATURE PHOTOGRAPHY FOR BEGINNERS. By E. J. BEDFORD. With Coloured

Frontispiece, and about 100 reproductions of Stereoscopic Photographs taken by the Author. Square demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. An important feature is the series of stereoscopic illustrations which, by means of a simple stereoscope supplied with the book, can be viewed by the reader.

DENT'S "OPEN-AIR" NATURE BOOKS. Edited by W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S.,

and HENRY E. TURNER, General Secretary of the School Nature Study Union. Crown 8vo. Cloth, extra gilt, 1s. net. Books 1, 2, and 3, or 4, 5, 6 in one vol., 2s. 6d. net each. Six books in one vol., 5s. net.

The First Six Books in this entirely New and Important series consist of the following:

- | | | |
|----------------------|-----------------------|-----------------------|
| 1. The Hedge I Know. | 3. The Wood I Know. | 5. The Stream I Know. |
| 2. The Pond I Know. | 4. The Meadow I Know. | 6. The Common I Know. |

The 1s. Edition contains Eighty-Six Pages of text, including Calendar and Notes. The 2s. 6d. Edition contains Forty Illustrations in Colour, Fifty Illustrations in Half-tone, One Hundred Illustrations in Line, and over 250 pages of text. The 5s. Edition contains Eighty Illustrations in Colour, Ninety Illustrations in Half-tone, One Hundred and Ninety Illustrations in Line, and over 500 pages of text.

THE HEART OF ENGLAND SERIES.

Small Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

THE SOUTH COUNTRY. By EDWARD THOMAS.

Mr. Thomas in this new book gives his impressions of a year's wanderings afoot as the seasons change through Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, Wiltshire and Devon. It is a prose-poem of the most beautiful counties in England.

THE HEART OF ENGLAND. By EDWARD THOMAS. Uniform with "The South Country."

THE HISTORIC THAMES. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P.

These last two books were originally published in a limited edition at One Guinea net per volume.

ENGLISH IDYLLS. Each Volume Illustrated with 24 Drawings by C. E. BROCK, reproduced in colour. Narrow crown 8vo. Cloth 5s. net; vellum, 8s. 6d. net. Two New Volumes completing Jane Austen's Works in Six Vols. in this Series:—EMMA, PERSUASION. Complete set in Cloth Case, 33s. net.

DICKENS' CHRISTMAS STORIES. Each

Volume has 8 Full-page Coloured Illustrations from Water-Colour Drawings by C. E. Brock, together with many line drawings by the same Artist.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL. THE BATTLE OF LIFE. THE CHIMES. THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH. THE HAUNTED MAN.

5 Volumes, Large Fcap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net per Vol. Vellum 5s. net per Volume.

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

Four hundred volumes now ready. Cloth, 1s. net. Leather, 2s. net.

Aldine Morocco, 2s. 6d. net. These books are especially suitable for gifts or presentation purposes—detailed list of the Four Hundred Books post free.

PROSPECTUSES OF ABOVE BOOKS ON APPLICATION.

Reviews.

LECKY.*

MRS. LECKY tells us that her husband never encouraged the idea of a biography, and that he wished to live through his books alone. But the present graceful tribute cannot be taken as an infringement of his wishes. In an age of lengthy memorials, swollen by an extravagant infusion of matter which can interest none but the family of the hero, it is an agreeable novelty to be presented with a portrait so reticent and discreet. The most refined and least pushful of men could not have been more fittingly commemorated.

Brought up as an evangelical, and destined for a family living in the south of Ireland, Lecky studied divinity at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the age of twenty-one published an anonymous work on the religious tendencies of the age; but his earliest and strongest interest was in the history and literature of his own country. "He studied the speeches of the principal orators," writes a college friend, "and could repeat by heart many passages from them: he was saturated with the writings and poetry of the patriotic party, and he looked upon the author of 'Who Fears to Speak of '98?' (J. K. Ingram) with feelings of unbounded admiration. Patriotism seemed to be his one absorbing passion." His enthusiasm found vent in speeches in the Trinity Historical Society and in the publication of his "Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland" at the age of twenty-three. If we did not possess this youthful effort, we should find it hard to believe that Lecky was ever young. Immaturity is stamped on the book, and the epilogue breathes a fiery nationalism; but the essays are not without power, and the study of Grattan revealed a view of the critical moment of Irish History which its author never discarded.

The complete failure of the book turned Lecky's literary energies into a widely different field. His multifarious reading, his travels in the Catholic South, and his almost boundless admiration for Buckle, suggested to him a line of study of which the first fruits appeared in the "History of Rationalism." The four years that had elapsed since the publication of the Irish essays had been turned to good account. The new book was the work of a ripe scholar, though its author was but twenty-seven, and was received with delight both by scholars and by the reading public, not only in the English-speaking world, but throughout Europe. The "History of European Morals," which appeared four years later, marked a further advance. Its learning was still more comprehensive, the arrangement was better, the style richer and stronger. It is not surprising to learn that it was, on the whole, its author's favorite.

Tennyson wrote that it was "a wonderful book for a young man to have written, a great book for any man to have written, and proved that the author possessed true genius." The latter term is a little too strong; but the "Rationalism" and the "European Morals" are works of enduring value which must still be read by all who desire broad and deep views of civilisation. With Burckhardt's "Renaissance" and Friedländer's "Roman Empire" they were among the earliest notable attempts to broaden the conception of history by penetrating behind the screen of action to the immaterial forces which largely determine it. An interesting letter explains their author's purpose. "The two books are closely connected. They are an attempt to examine the merits of certain theological opinions according to the historical method. The 'Morals' is a history of the imposition of those opinions on the world. The 'Rationalism' is a history of the decay of those opinions. They belong to a very small school of historical writings which began with Vico, was continued by Condorcet, Herder, Hegel, Comte, and found its last great representative in Buckle. What characterises these writers is that they try to look at history, not as a series of biographies, or accidents, or pictures, but as a great organic whole."

At the age of thirty Lecky had won an European reputation by his studies in "Kulturgeschichte"; but the next twenty years were devoted to modern political history. An enlarged and greatly improved edition of the "Irish Leaders" found scarcely more favor than the little volume of the Trinity graduate; but the "History of England in the Eighteenth Century," which appeared in eight massive volumes between 1878 and 1890, was immediately acknowledged as a classic. Lord Stanhope's volumes, painstaking and useful as they were, lacked breadth and color, and Lecky's broad and luminous survey of national life and policy profited by the contrast. The main fault of the work was its lack of proportion, the period preceding the accession of George III. being scarcely more than outlined, while the later decades of the century are described with remarkable fulness. The standpoint is that of an independent Whig, and the discussion of the American War, which forms the most valuable part of the volumes relating to England, is a triumph of impartiality. It is of these volumes that Lord Acton wrote to the author, "They are fuller of political instruction than anything that has appeared for a long time."

By far the most important part of Lecky's monumental work is that which concerns the history of Ireland. He had sharply criticised Froude's deplorable volumes on "The English in Ireland in the Eighteenth Century," which appeared when he was already engaged on his task. "His whole nature," writes his wife, "revolted against the spirit of intolerance of which Mr. Froude was the advocate and the use he made of his authorities." Though a friend of Froude, he thought the book "so mischievous, so sophistical, so insulting to Ireland," that he felt it his duty to demolish it. After prolonged research in Dublin Castle Lecky revealed to the world for the first time the true history of the Grattan Parliament, the rebellion of 1798, and the Union. The work was so thoroughly done that it need never be done again. These volumes on the greatest period of Irish history rank with Gardiner's account of the struggles of the seventeenth century, and constitute Lecky's highest achievement. The wisdom of Grattan, the criminal folly of the recall of Fitzwilliam, and the abominations by which the Union was effected, had never been brought home with such learning and power.

While he was still at work on the "Eighteenth Century" the Home Rule Bill burst on the country. His half-forgotten book on "Irish Leaders" was pillaged for missiles in the attack on the moral validity of the Union; but Lecky ranged himself without hesitation among Gladstone's opponents, and labored as diligently as Professor Dicey to counterwork his policy. The letters printed in this volume completely dispose of the charge of inconsistency that was sometimes brought against him. He had welcomed the Land Act of 1870, and always had the greatest respect for such Home Rulers as his friends Gavan Duffy and O'Neill Daunt; but he felt the strongest repugnance to Parnell from the moment of his appearance, and warmly denounced, not only the agrarian agitation, but also the rent-courts which Gladstone set up in 1881. His objection to Home Rule was based on the character and opinions of the Nationalist leaders. Grattan's Parliament was an assembly of Protestant landlords who were loyal to England: Home Rule would involve a Parliament in which the Protestant and the landlord would be powerless and the reins would be held by the declared enemies of England. How intense was his distrust of his countrymen appears in a curious letter of 1880, in which he writes, "I think you will soon find the opinion growing up on all sides that Ireland is unfit for the amount of representative government she possesses, and that a Government on the Indian model may become a necessity."

The Home Rule controversy made Lecky a politician and intensified the Conservatism to which he had long been tending. Though the Union was saved, he took an increasingly gloomy view of the future, and on the last day of 1893 he wrote in his Commonplace Book—"The world seems to me to have grown very old and very sad." Even his own party was now moving too fast for him. He viewed the Irish Local Government Bill of 1898 with disfavor, and "hoped it would not do much harm." He distrusted the newer philosophy of the State, and declared that the project of old age pensions was "one of the most dangerous of all forms of State Socialism." It was under the influence of this pessimism that he wrote "Democracy and Liberty." The contention that democracy was antagonistic to liberty was not new, and there is something to be said for it; but his attack was passionate and indiscriminating to a degree

* "A Memoir of W. E. H. Lecky." By his Wife. Longmans.

NEW BOOKS AT THE BODLEY HEAD

History & Biography

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

A Biography by LEWIS MELVILLE. With 2 Photogravures and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 25s. net.

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC.

By ANATOLE FRANCE, a Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 2 photogravure Portraits, 6 black and white Illustrations and a Plan. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 25s. net.

THE LAST JOURNALS OF HORACE WALPOLE

During the reign of George III. from 1771 to 1783. With Notes by DR. DORAN. Edited with an Introduction by A. FRANCIS STEUART, and containing numerous Portraits (2 in Photogravure) reproduced from Contemporary Pictures, Engravings, &c. 2 vols. Demy 8vo. 25s. net.

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO: A Biographical Study.

By EDWARD HUTTON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

MARIA EDGEWORTH AND HER CIRCLE: in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon.

By CONSTANCE HILL, Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends." With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

THE DAYS OF THE DIRECTOIRE.

By ALFRED ALLINSON. With 48 full-page Illustrations, including many of the Costumes of the Directoire Period. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

MADAME DE MAINTENON: Her Life and Times, 1635-1719.

By C. C. DYSON. With 1 Photogravure Plate and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12d. 6s. net.

THE SOUL OF THE TURK.

By MRS. DE BUNSEN. With 8 full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"The most delightful books are those which either depict the characters of men and women or those which reveal the personality of the writer. Mrs. de Bunsen's account of her travels combines both these charms. . . . Her book must be read by those who would know Turkey. It must be read also by those who are trying to understand the elemental, primitive feelings or instincts which form the background alike of religion and superstition."—Morning Post.

Poetry & Belles Lettres

NEW POEMS.

By WILLIAM WATSON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. Also a Limited Edition of 75 copies on Japanese Hand-made vellum, £1 1s. net. This is the first volume of poetry that has come from the pen of Mr. William Watson since 1903.

NEW POEMS.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"His hand has lost nothing of its cunning."—Daily Telegraph.

LAURUS NOBILIS: Chapters on Art and Life.

By VERNON LEE, Author of "Genius Loci," "Renaissance Fancies and Studies," "Limbo," &c., &c.

Uniformly bound, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

"There is a real love of beauty, an intellectual curiosity and honesty, which ought to prove profitably disturbing to the average lover of art. . . . She has written no better book."—Morning Post.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"It is the best picture of Shaw that we have yet had, and the best synopsis of the Shavian philosophy."—MAX BEERBOHM in the World.

A BOOK OF SATYRS.

By AUSTIN OSMAN SPARE. Large folio. 21s. net.

New Novels

THE HOLY MOUNTAIN.

BY STEPHEN REYNOLDS. 6s.

THE ODD MAN.

BY ARNOLD HOLCOMBE. 6s.

GERMAINE.

BY H. C. ROWLAND. 6s.

TRIAL BY MARRIAGE.

BY W. S. JACKSON. 6s.

THE EAGLE'S NEST.

BY ALLAN MCAULAY. 6s.

THE DIVERTING ADVENTURES OF MAURIN.

BY JEAN AICARD. 6s.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON, W.

which surprised those who only knew him in his previous books. "I think," he wrote to a friend, "people rather exaggerate the pessimism of my Democracy." It would be difficult to exaggerate it. He was at war with a world which he did not fully understand. Mrs. Lecky does not mention the masterly review in which Lord Morley chastised the dogmatism and the superficiality of the book. It was a disappointment to many of his admirers that he laid himself open to such a retort.

The closing chapters tell us a good deal about Lecky's life in Parliament, but they are not among the most interesting. He spoke often and well on Irish questions, but he deplored the waste of time and energy and never felt completely at home in his new surroundings. His literary work suffered, but did not altogether cease. "The Map of Life" was colorless and commonplace and quite unworthy of him; but the closing months of his life were occupied with the revision and expansion of the work on Irish leaders with which he had begun his career. His antipathy to Home Rule had not diminished his reverence for Grattan nor blinded him to the faults of British policy. It was felt by all to be a fitting close to his literary life. "We recognise in him," said Mr. Barry O'Brien, "a man who has done for Ireland work of infinite value which none of our side has shown ability to do."

MR. WATSON'S NEW POEMS.*

For some years now Mr. William Watson's silence has been one of the stock regrets of criticism. Occasionally, indeed, one has read expressions almost of annoyance that Mr. Watson should withhold his voice so long; as if, in these days, when the Gospel of the Strenuous Life is so faithfully maintained by stockbrokers, engineers, and novelists, it were scarcely pardonable for a poet to keep himself apart from the modern vehement standard of conduct. Certainly no one to whom books are something more than an amusement will fail to welcome the publication of Mr. Watson's "New Poems" as one of the pleasantest and most refreshing events that could happen in literature to-day; and yet, while we have sorely missed his song of late, many of us, probably, have tempered our regrets by reflecting that, in Mr. Watson, we have a poet who refuses to sing until he is altogether ready to sing, who prefers to meditate and perfect his utterance rather than to keep the popular ear tingling, whose pleasure is more (to quote from his "New Poems") in teaching "Truth to walk delicately in rich brocade," than in regular explosions of newspaper applause. All this is, after all, only what anyone who has read Mr. Watson's works judiciously might expect from him; for from the very beginning of his career it should have been completely evident that no poet, not even Milton himself, has been more scrupulous to "moralise his song," to admit no single word that would not help beauty and expressiveness, and never to admit a word that would transgress the exquisite decency of verse. Mr. Watson has always been, in the conscience of his art, like the England of his own vision, "Of high and singular election"; and through these "New Poems," as much as through all the others, his conscience shines admirably. There is no one writing to-day who is so reverent of his art and calling as Mr. Watson. He has, in his time, passed through the cloud of "detractions rude"; when the austere dignities of his verse did not square with the favorite eccentricities of the moment. But now his single-minded devotion to the severe ardors of poetry has its reward; and now, if we wish to see the noblest poetic traditions of the English language carried into our own day, we naturally look for them in the work of William Watson.

Looking back on the body of Mr. Watson's poetry, and attempting to assess its value, it is hard to avoid the unphilosophic discrimination between matter and manner. For, without doubt, the chief value in what Mr. Watson says is always that it is so perfectly said; it is always consummate art. We do not get much ferment for the brain from his poetry. His is a large and profound thought, clear as glass, strong and direct; contact with it is invigorating and ennobling. But its work is finished when the poem is finished; we enter into it as into a splendid and finely-proportioned room. We seldom meet the thought in Mr. Watson's poems with that startled rapture which the thought of Shelley or Blake, Donne or Crashaw, arouses—the sense of a quite new mental experience. Our experience with him is a purely aesthetic one, the pleasure and exaltation of moving in an ample, elaborate, beautiful style; but we altogether mistake if we underrate the value of such experience. A very casual review of Mr. Watson's poetry will show that his mind is continually occupied, perhaps pre-occupied, with style. That is not only clear from the evident intense care with which he considers every word he puts down, but from the fact that he very frequently in his poetry tells us outright what, in his opinion, the qualities of a good style are. Many of his poems and epigrams have dealt directly with the business of the poet, and allusions to the nature of poetic composition are common throughout his works. No one, except perhaps Wordsworth, has so plainly and so often told us what his conception of the poet's art is; and it is hardly too much to say that Mr. Watson has written better about writing and writers than about anything else. His elegies on Wordsworth, Burns, and Tennyson are (with the exception of his Coronation Ode) perhaps the best of his longer poems; and the most memorable phrases in them are those which sum up the peculiar excellences of the poet he is celebrating. And the best of his epigrams are certainly those which deal with poetic craftsmanship. Consideration of the other arts, too, fill a good many of his poems. On the whole, too much of his poetry is concerned with aesthetics, and is therefore twice removed from life; and this is roughly the better portion of his poetry. It is a tendency less noticeable in these "New Poems" than in the preceding volumes; which do, nevertheless, contain enough poems that come straight out of the general heart of nature to make the reputation of half a dozen minor singers. And were that not so, we cannot expect everything from a poet even of Mr. Watson's eminence; with a man who fills our minds and senses with such a noble utterance, we have assuredly no reason for dissatisfaction.

Solemn and lofty themes suit Mr. Watson best; that is to say, they give him the likeliest opportunity for using his particular skill with words. One remembers, certainly, a few delicious lyric ecstasies, as his "April, April," or "Pass, thou wild light"; and in the "New Poems" there is a notable instance of this, an exquisitely simple song, almost a folk-song, of "The Winter Sleep," in which reiterated words come like the repeated turns in a blackbird's song. But if one had to instance Mr. Watson's characteristic utterance, one would think naturally of the elegies and the ode we have already mentioned, or of the "Hymn to the Sea" or "The Father of the Forest," or of some other spacious and gravely worded poem. There is no need to describe in detail the craft of such a master of diction as Mr. Watson. We must not insist on his austerity too much; there are sensuous splendor and verbal riches in his poetry, though never "barbarick pearl and gold." It does not " . . . from insensate height,

With prodigies, with light
Of trailing angers on the monstrous night,
Magnificently fall";

but Mr. Watson quite evidently prefers the gorgeous phrase to bare severity. Verbal beauty, however, never predominates; Mr. Watson will have all his words strictly subordinate to the general beauty. His verse is always nicely steered between nakedness and extravagance. In the ordering of his thought, there is usually a strong tendency towards epigram, even in the longer poems; and his thought is in consequence admirably direct and clear. This is more than ever manifest in the "New Poems," wherein constantly, having placed before us in a clean Hellenic light the idea, or contrast of ideas, which animates him, he very wisely refrains from pushing the conclusion forward, with an immense gain of impressiveness. Thus we have in most of his work a static rather than a dynamic strength. No one could write as Mr. Watson does without having felt mighty passions; but the poems themselves are not passionate, they are symbols of passion. There are times when Mr. Watson's rich brocade of words hangs rather stiffly, and seems a cumbrous garment;

* "New Poems." By William Watson. John Lane. 5s. net.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

THE BRITISH ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION, 1907-1909.

THE HEART of THE ANTARCTIC,

BY

E. H. SHACKLETON, C.V.O.

Library Edition.—In two volumes, fully Illustrated in Colour and from Photographs by members of the Expedition, with Maps, Plans, Panoramas, &c., crown 4to, 36s. net.

Autograph Edition de Luxe.—Limited to 300 numbered copies, each signed by Mr. Shackleton and the members of the Shore Party, with additional Illustrations and Text, printed on Dutch Hand-made paper, with special water-mark, medium 4to, vellum, £10 10s. net.

Mr. Heinemann has pleasure to announce that Mr. Shackleton's eagerly-looked-for account of the great Antarctic Expedition which started from London in the 'Nimrod' in August, 1907, reached the furthest point South ever trodden by man, and returned to England in the Summer of 1909, will be published in two crown 4to volumes on NOVEMBER 4th, magnificently Illustrated with Facsimile Sketches in Colour and Photographs by members of the Expedition, Maps, Plans, Diagrams, Panoramas, &c.

ITALIAN HOURS.

By HENRY JAMES. Illustrated in Colour by JOSEPH PENNELL. Demy 8vo, 25s. net.

MR. ARTHUR RACKHAM'S NEW BOOK UNDINE.

Adapted from the German by W. L. COURTNEY. Illustrated in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Crown 4to, 7s. 6d. net.
N.B.—This is the only entirely new and original work by Mr. Rackham published this year.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. Illustrated in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM.
Crown 4to, 15s. net.

THE CATHEDRAL CITIES OF SPAIN.

By W. W. COLLINS, R.I. With 60 Water-colour Drawings by the Author. Demy 8vo, 16s. net. Also Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

ORPHEUS: A Universal History of Religions. By Dr. SALOMON REINACH, Author of "Apollo."
Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. [Next week.

 The religions of man, hardly to be distinguished from his art in their common origins, have never ceased to intermingle their currents with those of art. In studying the one, M. Reinach has naturally been drawn to contemplate the other, and he offers us the fruits of his labours in a masterly synthesis which he has christened "Orpheus."

THE TRIBUNAL OF THE TERROR: a Study of Paris in 1793-95.

By G. LENÔTRE. Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

 M. Lenôtre needs no introduction to students of history as an authority on the French Revolution. His new book deals with the history, day by day, of the Revolutionary Tribunal, and will be found a faithful and picturesque reconstruction of the period.

MEMOIRS of the DUCHESSE DE DINO. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

A COTSWOLD FAMILY: Hicks and Hicks Beach.

By Mrs. WILLIAM HICKS BEACH. Fully Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

FATHER AND SON. By EDMUND GOSSE. Popular Edition, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

HEINEMANN'S LIBRARY OF MODERN FICTION.

BELLA DONNA.

By ROBERT HICHENS. 2 vols. 4s. net.

THE STREET OF ADVENTURE.

By PHILIP GIBBS. 1 vol., 3s. net.

HEDWIG IN ENGLAND.

By the Author of "Marcia in Germany." 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE SCANDALOUS MR. WALDO.

By RALPH STRAUS. 1 vol., 3s. net.

LORD KENTWELL'S LOVE AFFAIR.

By F. C. PRICE. 1 vol., 3s. net.

BEYOND MAN'S STRENGTH.

By M. HARTLEY. 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE WHITE PROPHET.

By HALL CAINE. 2 vols., 4s. net.

Mr. Heinemann's Illustrated Autumn Announcement List post-free.

London: WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

but more often it is royal robe for royal thought. When we read his poems, we admire the splendid, dignified procession of imagery, but we are not excited by it; yet in these days, with so much of the turbulent, so little of the majestic about us, there are few things for which we should be more thankful than for the stately, large inspiration of Mr. Watson's poems and its noble gestures of words.

In the "New Poems" there is not so much of the gorgeous language, perhaps, as in some of the preceding volumes, though the words are always used in such a way as to express all the meaning out of them. But in the severities of style Mr. Watson is here better than ever. A naked speech is by no means to be found here; it is a song whose maker knows that it must always (in his own words) "forbear all light and easy accost." Nowhere to-day shall we find English made so expressive with so little tormenting; and, indeed, Mr. Watson has rather hard things to say of the "phrase-tormenting fantastic chorus," those who "prance on language," and "tumble their thoughts in a heap before us." Nothing could be less like tumbling than the way Mr. Watson's thought emerges; it is carven, not outpoured, thought. Take for instance this lyric, "In Dreams":—

"In dreams the exile cometh home;
In dreams the lost is found;
In dreams the captive's feet may roam
The world around.

"In dreams thou may'st a monarch be,
And sit upon a throne.
Give thanks that this befalleth thee
In dreams alone."

Is that not cut as clean and as sharp as if the words were onyx wrought with a keen tool? And there are many poems in the volume before us showing the same high economy of artistic method, both for the diction and for the restrained contrasting of ideas. In a fine sonnet on "Leopold of Belgium," the restraint becomes fierce in its intensity, far more terrible than any scourge of invective:—

"Embalm him, Time! Forget him not, O Earth!
Trumpet his name, and flood his deeds with day."

Those are the last two lines of the sonnet; a tyrant has never been more severely condemned. And beside this sonnet we would put, for its terseness and sternness, the poem on "Hate," which is a wonderful little treatise on one aspect of politics as they may be in Utopia. Nor must we forget to mention specially, while we are considering the more evidently epigrammatic portions of Mr. Watson's "New Poems," the lyric called "Heaven and Hell," which puts a whole moral philosophy into five verses, five verses of perfect craftsmanship. For the splendors of Mr. Watson's style, the colors and odors and musics, we may turn to the sonnet-sequence, "To Miranda"; but we confess that these do not attract us so much as the less decorated poems. That is not to say that they are not very good, but they are less unusual than the latter, for which, indeed, we cannot think of any likeness, unless it be Landor or the Greek epigrammatists. But the finest poem in the book is, in our opinion, the first, "The Blacksmith." In this the thought is not of marble, but, as befits the subject, of fire. The blacksmith becomes a tremendous cosmic symbol; the imagery is memorable throughout, and the verses ring like a hammered anvil. We quote three stanzas:—

"Like a mighty Enchanter
'Mid demons he stands—
'Mid Terrors infernal,
The slaves of his hands.

"As a pine-bough in winter,
All fringed with wild hair,
His arm, too, is shaggy,
His arm, too, is bare.

"And the bars on his anvil,
They struggle and groan
Like a sin being fought with,
That's bred in the bone."

After poetry like that, we must forbear to prose any longer about poetry.

THE BYRON MYSTERY.*

It would have been better if Mr. Edgcumbe had kept to the title of his book, and confined himself to describing that part of Byron's life when, as he says, "Byron was morally ascending."

In the first, and by far the most readable portion of this volume, Mr. Edgcumbe has collected contemporary accounts of Byron, which display the finer side of his complex character. He has not discovered new facts or fresh materials. But he has made such good use of what he found that his readers can see Byron as he appeared to those who had the best opportunity of observing him at the close of his life. It is Mr. Edgcumbe's merit that he gives a vivid picture of the strenuous efforts which Byron made on behalf of a cause beyond his own interests and tastes. This has never been done before quite as he has done it, and it was well worth doing. Whatever may have been Byron's motive for going to Greece, he showed when he was there a spirit of endurance and self-sacrifice which it is impossible not to admire. He shook himself free from the capricious weakness which had stood in his way at home. He discerned clearly the object he pursued, and the means whereby he thought it could be accomplished. Under difficulties and discouragement he developed qualities which he had not had the same opportunity of showing before. He behaved prudently in not attaching himself to any of the factions which broke up the Greek cause, and at the same time retained his enthusiasm for the real object of the expedition in most discouraging circumstances. We see him in wretched surroundings, an agreeable, amusing, and even genial companion. He laughed at Colonel Stanhope's idea of converting the Greeks to the principles of Bentham. But he respected Stanhope's integrity of purpose, and recognised him as an honest enthusiast. His intercourse with the Methodist doctor who tried to convert him is very characteristic. He never treated the subject lightly, and in knowledge of the Bible he was more than a match for the Methodist. Everything connected with Byron in Greece has a poignant interest, and illustrates his sterling qualities, as well as his unquenchable spirit.

Unfortunately, this picture is placed side by side with an attempt to clear up a most disagreeable story, and to refute the late Lord Lovelace's "Astarte," which was at all events privately printed. Lord Lovelace wished to relieve the memory of his grandmother, Lady Byron, from the odious suspicion of having invented groundless charges against her husband's half-sister, Mrs. Leigh. Mr. Edgcumbe, who professes equal anxiety to clear Mrs. Leigh, is driven, in spite of himself, to defend Lady Byron. For one main object of his book is to prove that Mrs. Leigh and Byron conspired to make her believe in the truth of a story which he elsewhere repeatedly ascribes to "her prurient imagination." Mr. Edgcumbe suggests that Lord Lovelace deliberately manipulated the papers. He says "he discarded some that would have told in favor of Mrs. Leigh, and selected others which colorably supported his peculiar views." This is a grave charge, and the only excuse for making it, as well as for reviving the imputation upon Lady Byron, would be the production as well as the possession of conclusive evidence. Although Mr. Edgcumbe claims to have positive testimony, he has not produced it, for a reason perfectly good in itself, but good also against publishing the second half of his book. Moreover, he cannot be congratulated upon his method of telling the story which he wishes to substitute for Lord Lovelace's, and the citations from the poems, on which he lays so much stress, are not sufficiently definite for his purpose. His theory is as follows: He would remove all difficulties by assuming that Byron's boyish passion for Mary Chaworth, who married John Musters, was the cause of his unhappiness with his own wife, and his reason for the conduct which made her leave him. He goes on to make the startling suggestion that Mrs. Leigh inculpated herself to save Mary Chaworth's good name, and even pretended that Byron's child, Medora, was her own. Of this assumption he offers no proof, though we are left to infer that he has confirmation of it in his hands. His procedure is indirect and unconvincing, as, for instance, when he

* "Byron: The Last Phase." By Richard Edgcumbe. John Murray. 10s. 6d.

Messrs. BELL'S BOOKS.

Crown 4to, 15s. net.

SAVOY OPERAS.

By W. S. GILBERT.

With a New Introduction by the Author.

32 Illustrations in Colour by W. RUSSELL FLINT, and Title-page and Binding designed by the same Artist.

This volume contains the libretti of "Patience," "The Pirates of Penzance," "Princess Ida," and "The Yeomen of the Guard," which have been revised by the author for the purpose.

"The coloured pictures by W. Russell Flint represent with finished and delicate art the chief episodes of the operas. The style of reproduction is admirable, and altogether this may be regarded as one of the most attractive gift books of the season."

—Scotsman.

8vo. With numerous Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

A LADY OF THE OLD REGIME.

By ERNEST F. HENDERSON, M.A., Ph.D.

An account of Elizabeth Charlotte, daughter of the Elector Charles Louis, and granddaughter of the Winter King. She married the Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV.

2 vols. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 62 half-tone plates. 16s. net.

THE BUILDERS OF SPAIN.

By CLARA C. PERKINS, Author of "French Cathedrals and Châteaux."

The author has a full knowledge of her subject; and the treatment is interesting. While appealing especially to those who have visited Spain, its elaborate illustrations, historical and architectural comment make this an admirable guide to intelligent sight-seeing.

Now Ready. Fcap. 8vo. 6s.

A HANDBOOK TO DANTE.

By F. J. SNELL, M.A.,

Late Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford,

Author of "The Age of Chaucer," &c.

This volume is uniform with Mrs. Sutherland Orr's well-known "Handbook to Browning," and Mr. Morton Luce's "Handbook to Tennyson," and "Handbook to Shakespeare."

MASTERS OF LITERATURE.

A Series of Representative Passages from the Works of Great Writers in Prose and Verse, with full Biographical and Critical Introduction and Editorial connections.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

DEFOE.

CARLYLE.

THACKERAY.

EMERSON.

By JOHN MASEFIELD.

By A. W. EVANS.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. [Ready Shortly.]

By G. H. PERRIS. [Ready Shortly.]

NOW READY, Imp. 16mo, 3s. 6d. net.

LOVE'S EMPIRE, and other poems.

By A. M. CHAMPNEYS.

BOHN'S CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUME. Now Ready. 3s. 6d.

THE PLAYS OF AESCHYLUS.

A New Prose Translation from a Revised Text by

WALTER HEADLAM, Litt.D., and

C. E. S. HEADLAM, M.A.

A Complete list of Bohn's Libraries, which now include upwards of 800 volumes, will be sent on application.

The QUEEN'S TREASURES Series.

Small crown 8vo. With 8 Coloured Plates and Decorated title-page, covers, and end-papers. 2s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

Lob-Lie-by-the-Fire. or, The Luck of Lingborough, and other Stories.

By Mrs. EWING, Illustrated by ALICE B. WOODWARD.

Little Women, By LOUISA M. ALCOTT. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE DEEPER STAIN.

By FRANK HIRD, Author of "King Fritz's A.D.C."

"Mr. Hird's new novel will maintain and increase his reputation, because its characterisation is strong and faithful, and its description vivid and true. Beatrice Stratton, the very type of noble womanhood, and her husband, John Houghton, the representative of so much that is admirable in British manhood, will remain among the great figures of fiction."—Manchester Courier.

STARBRACE.

By SHEILA KAYE-SMITH, Author of "The Tramping METHODIST."

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

The reminiscences of W. H. DAVIES, the Super-Tramp, are related in his new volume

BEGGARS.

"Written in an excellent style," it gives first-hand information on the art and craft of begging. "He has probed to the bottom the mind of the true beggar," and "one mingles with strange company under his guidance." With a portrait. 6s.

MARGARET HEVER.

By ELIZABETH MARTINDALE.

"This clever novel has for its subject the struggle in a girl's nature when invaded and hypnotised by a man whom she fears and strives to repulse. A first novel, it is receiving a great deal of attention as a work that means something. "A thoughtful book of first-rate quality." 6s.

MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD'S

THREE PLAYS.

"The construction is excellent in every case and the dialogue has always sparkle and humour. It is rather curious when there are constant lamentations over the dearth of good plays that such admirable work should be neglected."—Manchester Courier. 6s.

H. W. NEVINSON'S NEW BOOK

ESSAYS IN FREEDOM.

"The author is one of our best prose writers, a true and natural stylist. It is life, not fictitious romance, which attracts Mr. Nevinson. He has travelled much, witnessed many things, seen men and and life in a thousand different aspects. What he says is not fiction. . . . Brilliant, scholarly impressions."—Observer.

6s. net.

THE MERRY PAST.

MR. RALPH NEVILL'S racy volume of Anecdotes and Reminiscences abounds in quips and stories of town and country life. It is written in "terse and vividly picturesque English," and is "outspoken, vigorous, and breezy." Hunting, coaching, club life, society, rustic and business life of bygone years are all brought back with a certain amount of method, but mainly by a series of good stories. The volume has a frontispiece reproduced in colours. 12s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY.

The first two volumes in this notable series are now ready.

A CRITICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By ARTHUR SAMUEL PEAKE, D.D.

FAITH AND ITS PSYCHOLOGY.

By the Rev. WILLIAM INGE, D.D.

2s. 6d. net, each volume.

Prospectus on Application.

DUCKWORTH & CO., Covent Garden, London, W.C.

A List of Autumn Announcements sent post free.

says: "These three pieces comprise the so-called 'Thyrza' poems, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, we may reasonably suppose that their subject was Mary Chaworth. This is the more likely, because the original manuscripts were the property of Byron's sister, to whom they were probably given by Mary Chaworth, when, in later years, she destroyed or parted with all the letters and documents which she had received from Byron since the days of their childhood." Is this a mere conjecture, or is it founded on suppressed information? Likelihood and probability are insufficient here. Again, Mr. Edgcumbe says that Byron met Mary Chaworth in the autumn of 1808, and adds, "It may be inferred that an intimacy sprang up between them, which was broken off somewhat abruptly by Mary's husband." Elsewhere this inference becomes a positive and highly colored statement. After quoting Byron's lines, from a poem found among his papers at Missolonghi:—

"I watched thee when the foe was at our side,
Ready to strike at him—or thee and me
Were safety hopeless—rather than divide
Aught with one loved, save love and liberty," he comments, "We have here a glimpse of that turbulent scene when Mary's husband, in a fit of jealousy, put an end to their dangerous intimacy."

So with Byron's last words to his valet, Fletcher, Mr. Edgcumbe suggests that they refer to Mary Chaworth: "We may well believe that those inarticulate words which the dying poet murmured to the bewildered Fletcher—those broken sentences which ended with, 'Tell her everything; you are friends with her'—may have referred, not to Lady Byron as policy suggested, but to Mary Chaworth with whom Fletcher had been acquainted since his youth." But he himself quotes on another page the message as beginning with the direction "Go to Lady Byron." Is this the way Mr. Edgcumbe draws his inferences from facts which he does not disclose?

Mr. Edgcumbe is able to write a lively description of simple scenes and incidents. But he does not discuss a peculiarly painful theme with the gravity and restraint it demands. In some places he writes with a flippancy quite unsuited to the subject. He seems almost to exult in Mrs. Leigh's horrible mystification of Lady Byron in providing her with "damning proofs against her brother and herself" when he speaks of Mrs. Leigh seeming "to have enjoyed the wriggings of her victim on the hook," or says that "the whole thing was a 'blind,' devised to support Augusta's rôle as a Magdalen," or that "Augusta Leigh, the selfless martyr, the most loyal friend that Byron ever possessed, assisted her brother, so to speak, to place the pack on a false scent, and the whole pack blindly followed."

Sometimes he does not appear to realise the force of his own arguments. Does he not see that Lady Byron's suspicions were inevitable when he tells us that Mrs. Leigh, "while pretending contrition for imaginary sins, revenged herself upon Lady Byron by heightening her jealousy and encouraging her in the belief that not only had Byron been her lover, but was still appealing to her from abroad"? Mr. Edgcumbe's insight is clearly not to be depended on, and as he does not give the source nor the precise nature of his knowledge, we cannot arrive at any conclusion except that he has left the mystery involved in difficulties as impenetrable as ever.

A MEDLEY OF FRENCH CHARACTERS.*

THE gifted lady whose style varies so often, and whose titles seem so inadequate to the expression of her meaning, would appear to care for none of these things. The prefatory letter which she writes to "My dear Vernon," carries us back to Lichfield and the Hot Wells when the fair Anna poured out her unhumorous soul to the sympathetic Mrs. Pennington. She regrets the charming talk amid the folds of the Red Lily of Florence, when, with poor Eugène, "we would pass whole afternoons in a passionate, a vehement discussion, of French literature." In these days "we drank the prose of Michelet as though it were a sacred wine. Books then were a rich elixir, to be taken, kneeling, from a chalice." Now, from the watch-tower of a tranquil mind, she watches the pageant with a Kodak. Some of the plates are missing—spoiled. But some of the films (twenty-nine to be exact) she gives us, arranged under three stops: "In the Distance," "The Romantics," "The Sons of Science." It takes all this to explain the title, which is not really very easy to justify. Sometimes these chapters read like "views," but others suggest reviews. Nothing but the exigencies of a reviewer could well explain the discursiveness of these papers, if we did not already know how impossible it was for the author to keep Froissart and Renan in their respective departments, how she interprets "The End of the Middle Ages," and how she brings the Middle Ages into a motor trip through France. People who write on France seem to claim the privilege of discursiveness as if it were a sacred right. The least they could do for their bewildered readers is to issue their books in detachable paper covers, leaving the task of sorting and classifying to the confidential binder. The present work, we remark, though prettily alluded to by the author as "my little book," is issued in solid cloth, and is heavy even for the "nominal" price of twelve and sixpence (net, London and Leipsic).

Like most women writers who stray from the flowery paths of fiction, Mme. Duclaux wants a literary director, or moderator, to canalise her work, and get it into some moderately direct and purposeful channel. Flitting, as she flits, from flower to flower, and filling tiny phials with essences, she seems to us too often to be minimising the effect she is really capable of producing. Her gifts of appreciation are exquisite, and she is continually upon the verge of critical discovery. Like Vernon Lee, she seems to have read everything. Her communications commonly start from a summary of the latest, most modern point of view. Her range of information enables her to transfer good things from one medium to another. Her knowledge of French and command of English enables her to duplicate herself in another way, and the rare Gallicisms to which she is addicted (prestigious, self-diffident, frequentation, plexus) only serve to add a savor of quaintness to her otherwise impeccable English. If a third of these essays had been retrenched, and the remainder expanded à volonté, she would have appeared, as she can be at her best, one of the happiest and most imaginative critical writers of the day.

A few illustrations will serve to show the remarkable delicacy and finesse of the essayist's conceptions—had she only the inspiration to carry her conceptions out a little more systematically. Her formula for Louis Quatorze is that he was great by reason of a symphony of small qualities and the perfect balance of inconspicuous parts. This is admirable, but requires a framework of evidence, towards which she supplies a brief three pages, of which two at least are devoted to absolute commonplace. Similarly, in the essays on Fénelon and Fontenelle she begins brilliantly. In honor of Voltaire she sends up a rocket which breaks and detaches one or two bright particular stars. Lanson's description of the malign old fairy, almost toothless, yet "inlassablement attaché aux mollets des gens qu'il déteste"; Voltaire's regretful back-glance at the world of his youth, the world as it was before he enlightened it; the comparison with Voltaire, not of About, but of Anatole France, "the Benjamin of the nineteenth century" (this is subtle), in whom Mme. Duclaux is fain to detect all his [Voltaire's] lucid elegance, his incongruous strain of filth, his public spirit, his malignity, his most generous ardor, his religious scepticism, his candid faith in human progress. She had evidently been reading Lanson and Tallentyre when she wrote on Voltaire. In dealing with Rousseau, though she emits one or two good things, she falls back upon a conventional estimate, and Mrs. Macdonald has written in vain. Bernardin de Saint-Pierre is her first real success, for here she has a story to tell (and a precision to observe), in which her imagination is deeply stirred. The Richardsonian atmosphere about Bernardin, the women by whom he was adored and the amount of flattery that he required for daily consumption, are done to a fine point.

The Duc de Liancourt, not a very literary figure, is, perhaps, the most sympathetic portrait that the authoress gives us. By an effort of praiseworthy stoicism, Mme. Duclaux abstains from telling us all about the famous retort, "Sire, it is not a revolt, it is a

* "The French Procession: A Pageant of Great Writers." By Madame Mary Duclaux. Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. Edward Arnold's List.

Second Large Impression in the Press.

Lady St. Helier's Memories of Fifty Years.

By MARY JEUNE (Lady St. Helier).

With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

"One could go on indefinitely enumerating the good things in this book, which is likely to be one of the most répandu publications of the season."—Observer.

"Peculiarly fascinating. Likely to prove an invaluable contribution to the history of our times."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is needless to say that the memories of fifty years, written by one possessing the almost unique qualifications of Lady St. Helier, will hereafter rank as a classic."—Standard.

First Impression Exhausted before Publication and a Second Impression almost ready.

Lady Sarah Wilson's South African Memories.

By LADY SARAH WILSON.

With illustrations. 1 vol. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

EDMUND GARRETT: a Memoir.

By E. T. COOK, Author of "The Rights and Wrongs of the Transvaal War," &c. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"This book should be read. It is the memoir of a man. This memoir is a model of its kind. It is short; every page alive. Though it revives politics that are dead and gone, it never loses its human interest."—Evening Standard.

TEN YEARS OF GAME-KEEPING

By OWEN JONES. Fully Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

"A fascinating book, full of the sense of the open air."—Observer.

"A book that at once takes its place as a standard work."—Evening Standard.

A CENTURY OF EMPIRE (1801-1900).

By the RT. HON. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., P.C., Author of "The Life of Wellington," &c. Vol. I., 1801-1832. With Photogravure Portraits, demy 8vo, 14s. net. (The work will be completed in 3 volumes, which will be issued at intervals of six months.)

TURKEY IN TRANSITION.

By G. F. ABBOTT, Author of "The Tale of a Tour in Macedonia," &c. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

HIGH ALBANIA.

By M. EDITH DURHAM, Author of "The Burden of the Balkans," &c. Fully Illustrated, with Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

A SCAMPER THROUGH THE FAR EAST.

Including a Visit to the Manchurian Battlefields. By Major H. H. AUSTIN, C.M.G., D.S.O., R.E., Author of "With Macdonald in Uganda." With Illustrations and Maps, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"Major Austin has crowded a wealth of interesting matter into his pages."—Pall Mall Gazette.

HOUSEBOAT DAYS IN CHINA.

By J. O. P. BLAND. Illustrated by W. D. STRAIGHT. Medium 8vo, 15s. net.

"Mr. Bland's book is excellent. It is a goodly and an amusing company that is on board the 'Saucy Jane,' and one parts from them with reluctance."—Scotsman.

IN A YORKSHIRE GARDEN.

By REGINALD FARRER, Author of "My Rock Garden," &c. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE SALMON RIVERS AND LOCHS OF SCOTLAND.

By W. L. CALDERWOOD, Inspector of Fisheries to the Fishery Board for Scotland, Author of "The Life of a Salmon." With Illustrations and Maps of Principal Rivers, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 21s. net. Also a Large-Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, £2 2s. net.

A FIFTH SERIES OF MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS.

By the Rt. Hon. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., Author of "Scottish Gardens," &c. With Photogravure Plates, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. (Uniform with Series I., II., III., and IV.)

Illustrated in colour by Mrs. ALLINGHAM.

THE COTTAGE HOMES OF ENGLAND.

Containing 64 Coloured Plates from Drawings by HELEN ALLINGHAM, never before Reproduced. 8vo (9½ in. by 7 in.), 21s. net. Also a limited Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

"Mrs. Allingham is without a rival in the winning portrayal of simple British scenery."—Daily Telegraph.

"The volume is a charming one, in which the beauty of the cottages is translated with a skill so like that beauty itself that one knows not whether to ascribe its effects to nature or to art."—Scotsman.

*. PLEASE WRITE FOR PROSPECTUSES.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43, Maddox-street, W.

FROM

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & Co.'s LIST.

A WONDER BOOK OF BEASTS

Edited by F. J. HARVEY DARTON.

With numerous illustrations and coloured Frontispiece by Margaret Clayton. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/-

(Ready Nov 9.)

UNIFORM WITH

A Wonder Book of Old Romance

By F. J. Harvey Darton

Tales of the Canterbury Pilgrims

By F. J. Harvey Darton

The Book of King Arthur

By Mary Macleod

Forgotten Tales of Long Agos

By E. V. Lucas

Runaways and Castaways

By E. V. Lucas

Children of the Dawn

By E. F. Buckley

Etc., Etc., Etc.

THE ANIMAL WHY-BOOK

By W. P. PYCRAFT, F.Z.S., B.L.S.

Illustrated in colours by Edwin Noble, R.B.A.

A volume of Natural History by two authorities. Mr. Noble's striking illustrations are an invaluable support to Mr. Pycraft's able (though simple) talks about familiar animals.

(Ready Nov. 9.)

"An Original Idea Admirably Carried Out"

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON'S NEW NOVEL.

THE BALL AND THE CROSS

Cloth, 6/-

To be published in November.

BELLEROPHON

"The Bravest of the Brave."

By EDWARD FRASER.

Cloth Gilt, 6/-

The stirring and romantic Battle story of the Hardest Fighters of the fleet of Nelson's time, together with some account of later "Bellerophons," including the present vessel of the "Dreadnought" type. [Shortly.]

AN ENTIRELY NOVEL AND ORIGINAL SERIES.

The Treasure House Series.

Each of these volumes will prove a delightful companion for anyone visiting these treasure houses of the nation.

Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

By ALICE CORKRAN. With Illustrations from Photographs.

WALLACE & TATE GALLERIES

By ESTELLE ROSS. With Illustrations from Photographs.

THE WONDERS OF THE ZOO.

By LILIAN CASK. Illustrated by DOROTHY HARDY.

MESSRS. GARDNER, DARTON & CO., LTD., have in preparation additional volumes for this successful series, and have secured the services of specialists to treat the various "Treasure Houses," on the characteristics of which the authors are the recognised authorities. The new volume announced for publication shortly is HAMPTON COURT, by JULIA CARTRIGHT (Mrs. Ady), whose name and writings are well known in literary and artistic circles. This series is invaluable, not only to those who intend to visit our national "Treasure Houses," but also to all those who have not had the opportunity of doing so, or have done so years ago, as the style is not that of the ordinary guide-book, but is literary, anecdotal, amusing, and, whether dealing with art or natural history, accurate and interesting.

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., LTD.,
3 & 4, PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS, LONDON, E.C.

revolution"; but we have a delightful account of his Odyssey during the regicide period. It is difficult to realise how he and his companions yearned for fair France (the fair France of 1793-4) from the land of exile. The Americans interest him. But he misses the unspeakable magic of home; the charm of the French woman, most exquisite of friends; the gaiety of the common people, for in the provinces, even before the Revolution, the harvesters would laugh and sing at their work as they had done in Goldsmith's day. At the news of the French victories he can no longer contain himself in the vicinity of Lawrie Tod, but sails for Hamburg, and persuades Napoleon, without difficulty, to strike his name off the black list. His Austerlitz was the peaceful conquest of an "English swimming plough," and his turnip fields marked his favorite victory. When the ungrateful Bourbon struck his name off the Councils of innumerable societies for the social betterment of his country, Liancourt retorted in a mordantly laconic epistle, in which he pointed out that the Minister of the Interior had unaccountably overlooked his functions as "President du Comité pour la propagation de la Vaccine que j'ai introduite en France en 1800."

Her attitude to Napoleon and Goethe shows that she is a hero-worshipper to the core, while the lack of virility in Sainte-Beuve accounts for the fine point of malignity in her delineation of the great critic whose ambition was always to dine with the Tories and vote with the Whigs, though she admits that he had absorbed the century piece-meal in all its leading motives, out of which he distills in his Lundis one magnificent overture. On Michelet, "the Wagner of History," and his belated passion for Athénais Mialaret, she has some exquisitely discerning phrases. To De Tocqueville she is less than kind and less than just, surely, when she says that his works are dead. We can nowadays almost neglect Thiers, Michelet, and Mignet on the Revolution, but De Tocqueville—jamais! The way she croons over the youth of Renan is a beautiful thing to see. The "kind of loathing admiration with which Brunetière regarded Anatole France" is a masterly indication, a whole chapter in itself, on the chasm which French History has driven into the heart of French Letters. Twenty pages on Berthelot and Gaston Paris just serve to demonstrate what Mme. Duclaux has in reserve to tell us about these men, and which she could tell us if she would. Few women have ever had a quicker ear to catch the vibrations of a big intellect. And if she cannot always detect their method, she can always interpret their meaning and purpose. A line of old language, she well says of Gaston Paris, was to him as a drop of water to a biologist armed with a microscope. He could see a whole world in it. The polemic about Taine has provoked her for once to produce a full-blown essay—probably the best in the book. "There was just a trace of the notary about Taine." As a boy his love of formulas and definitions was already excessive. His love of documents and pigeon-holes was a part of his notarial inheritance. But we shall err sadly if we conceive of him as a Rhadamanthus of Evidence, for, as Mme. Duclaux finely says, his documents were always imbedded in his opinions. As with Zola, his "real science" was the subtle mask of the romanticist, the man of feeling.

It would require a review three times the length of this to do justice to the irregular pleasure that may be deduced from this disorderly "Procession."

THE BIRTH OF MODERN ITALY.*

THE editor of these papers justly remarks that a special interest attaches to the testimony of persons like Jessie White Mario who, though, not themselves among the chief actors in the great events they describe, have lived in very intimate association with them. This is specially true in the present case, for Jessie White Mario, though a passionate follower of Mazzini, was a friend of Garibaldi as well, and though an Italian in spirit she was not an Italian by birth. She was indeed more than the friend of these two heroes, for she took herself a noble part on the battlefield of Volturmo, and she suffered imprisonment for her opinions more than once. She was born at Gosport in 1832, and went to Paris at the age of twenty-one, where she came across Henri Martin, Cousin, and Lamartine. A year later she visited Italy as companion to a friend. Her friend happened to rent the Maison Garibaldi at Nice, and here Miss White met Garibaldi. They soon became great friends, and Garibaldi later showed his esteem for her by confiding his delicate son Ricciotti to her care. In the course of her journey she also made the acquaintance of Mrs. Browning. Two years later she returned to England with Mazzini, fell at once under his spell, and determined to devote herself to the cause of Italian unity. She delivered lectures, wrote articles, and in 1857 went back to Italy as correspondent in Genoa to the "Daily News." It was here that she met Alberto Mario, whom she married. Before going to Italy in 1857 she had equipped herself for the part she had designed for herself in the War of Liberation by studying medicine and nursing; only the conservatism of the authorities had prevented her from taking her doctor's degree. She and her husband were both imprisoned in Genoa in 1857 on suspicion of complicity in the Pisacane expedition. Next year they were imprisoned again in the castle of Ferrara; nothing being proved against them, they were conveyed across the frontier. When Garibaldi made his descent on Sicily in 1860 the Marios reached Palermo, in spite of Cavour's express orders that they were to be turned back, and both on this expedition, and in the later operations in Calabria, Jessie White Mario displayed great courage and devotion. The rest of her life, which only ended three years ago, was spent in obscurity and part of it in poverty, though she once emerged from her seclusion in 1870 to nurse the wounded at Dijon.

These papers take us at once into the strange atmosphere of heroism, romance, and confusion which enveloped European politics in the 'fifties. They are written frankly from a partisan standpoint. The writer and her husband had both suffered much at the hands of Cavour, though they could forgive their own wrongs much more readily than they could forgive Mazzini's. It would be too much to expect a sympathetic, or even an impartial, account of the difficulties in the policy of Italy's "one great statesman," as Jessie White Mario herself calls him, and those passages of her work which describe Cavour's relations with the Mazzinians should be studied side by side with Mr. Trevelyan's new volume. Yet we think that most readers will agree that Jessie White Mario succeeded better than most persons in her position would have done in appreciating the qualities of the statesman whom she regarded as Mazzini's bitter personal foe. But the chief interest of the volumes lies not so much in the treatment of persons or motives as in the picture it gives us of these strange and moving times. Perhaps the chief impression to be derived from them is the impression of the medley and tangle of enthusiasms and sympathies. The modern world is apt to think that the great issues used to be simpler, and that it is only our own age that struggles with a chaos of motives and aims, in which some fatalism seems to scatter the energies of good causes and to concentrate the resistance of bad interests. Yet we have only to glance at the state of things in Europe in the years Jessie White Mario is describing to see how perplexing politics seemed to the ardent and liberal spirits of the time. Here we have Kossuth himself voting for the despatch of Hungarian troops to assist Austria in the war against Piedmont in 1848, and surely no assembly has ever presented such a spectacle of good men blinded by the subtleties of a false position as the French Chamber that voted, on October 20th, 1849, on the fate of the Roman Republic. Palmerston himself, who represented not the idealism of the revolutionaries, but simply a good Liberal tradition of fearless sympathy with freedom, fell into as strange a contradiction as any, in his precipitate approval of the proceedings that punished France for her betrayal of the Roman Republic by destroying her own. Still, in the midst of this world of crooked aims and mixed motives, it does one's heart good to recall the letter Palmerston wrote in 1849 to our Ambassador at Vienna. "My dear Ponsonby,—The Austrians are surely the greatest

* "The Birth of Modern Italy." Posthumous papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited, with notes and illustrations, by the Duke Litta-Visconti-Arese. Fisher Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

"Italy To-day." By Bolton King and Thomas Okey. New and enlarged edition. Nisbet. 6s. net.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST

AUTUMN 6s. NOVELS.

Second Impression.

THE PALADIN: as Beheld by a Woman of Temperament
HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

Daily Graphic.—"In its humanity and in its sincerity, 'The Paladin' reaches the high-water mark of Mr. H. A. Vachell's contribution to modern fiction . . . the book is a convincing exposition of the new beliefs in mankind and among womankind that marriage is not everything . . . a novel which is as well told as it was well worth telling."

MR. JUSTICE RAFFLES. E. W. HORNUNG.
Pall Mall Gazette.—"In these vivacious pages we meet the attractively unscrupulous A. J. once more . . . quite amusing, and will doubtless extend the already large circle of A. J.'s admirers."

HER MOTHER'S DAUGHTER. KATHARINE TYNAN.

Times.—"The Author carries us along with her usual grace and sympathy to happiness and lovers' greetings at the close."

THE CARAVANERS. [On Nov. 4.]

By the Author of 'Elizabeth and her German Garden.'

Large crown 8vo, 5s. net. With 2 illustrations by LORD LEIGHTON, P.R.A., and a Portrait of the Author.

A WEEK IN A FRENCH COUNTRY HOUSE.

By ADELAIDE SARTORIS. With a preface by Lady RITCHIE.

Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

SAN CELESTINO: an Essay in Reconstruction.

By JOHN AYSOUGH, Author of 'Marotz,' 'Admonition,' 'Dromina,' &c.

Times.—"A psychological portrait, rendered with a simplicity which covers a good deal of unobtrusive art."

With 16 Half-tone Illustrations. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

LONDON AT PRAYER. By CHARLES MORLEY,
Author of 'Studies in Board Schools,' &c.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"A series of extraordinarily varied sketches, which will be recognised as sincere and truthful by members of every denomination visited. . . . The book is a most impressive revelation of the piety which has survived generations of change."

With 2 Maps. Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE CONGO. The

Pillage of the Congo Basin. By E. D. MOREL, Hon. Sec. of the Congo Reform Association, Author of 'The British Case in French Congo,' &c. With an Introduction by Sir A. CONAN DOYLE.

Times.—"Mr. Morel's untiring industry has been by far the most important factor in awakening both public and official opinion to the monstrous iniquity which for the last eighteen years has been perpetrated with ever-increasing cynicism and effrontery in the Congo basin."

READY NOV. 2. Demy 8vo 10s. 6d. net.

BRITAIN FOR THE BRITON. Co-operative

Working of Agriculture and other Industries a Necessity. By Sir W. EARNSHAW COOPER, C.I.E., Author of 'Socialism and Its Perils,' 'The Murder of Agriculture,' &c.

With 3 Portraits. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: A MEMOIR. By the RT. HON. GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL, P.C., Author of 'Collections and Recollections,' &c. [Nov. 2.]

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE COMING ENGLISHMAN. By Prof. JAMES
LONG, Author of 'British Dairy Farming,' 'The Small
Farm and its Management,' &c.

With a Frontispiece in Colour, and 24 pages of Black-and-White Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

WITH MULAI HAFID AT FEZ. By LAWRENCE
HARRIS, F.R.G.S.

On NOV. 10. In 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 25s. net.

FIFTY YEARS OF NEW JAPAN. Compiled by COUNT SHIGENOBU OKUMA, late Prime Minister of Japan, and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and others.
Edited by MARCUS B. HUISS.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

COMPLETION OF THE WORK.

The Cults of the Greek States.

By L. R. FARNELL. Vol. V., with 61 plates. 18s. 6d. net.
Previously Published: Vols. I and II., with 61 plates and over 100 illustrations. £1 12s. net. Vols. III and IV., with 86 plates. £1 12s. net.

The Stone and Bronze Ages
in Italy and Sicily. By T. E. PEET.

16s. net.

Athenæum.—"This most elaborate and learned book. . . . To collect all this material in the case of Italy is a remarkable achievement, and we congratulate Mr. Peet on his excellent performance."

Bushman Paintings. Copied by M. HELEN TONGUE. With a Preface by H. BALFOUR. With 2 chromo-collotypes (one double), 54 coloured plates, 8 half-tone illustrations and a Map. £3 3s. net.Armour and Weapons. By CHARLES FFOULKES. With a Preface by VISCOUNT DILLON.
With 12 full-page plates and 52 illustrations in the text.
6s. 6d. net.The Story of the Comets. Simply told for General Readers. By G. F. CHAMBERS. With 29 plates and 77 other Illustrations. 6s. net.

Athenæum.—"A work which for many years to come will be a storehouse of information on the subject, and one to which frequent reference must be made."

Opera hactenus inedita Rogeri
Baconi. Edited by ROBERT STEELE. 8vo, Fasc. I,
De Viciis Contractis in Studio Theologie. 5s. net. Fasc. II, Communium Naturalium Lib. I. 10s. 6d. net.The English Parnassus. An Anthology of longer Poems, with Introduction and Notes by W. M.
DIXON and H. J. C. GRIERSON. 4s. 6d. net.The Apologia and Florida of Apuleius of Madaura. Translated by
H. E. BUTLER. 3s. 6d. net. (New Volume of Oxford Library of Translations.)Elementary Lessons in English Grammar. By H. C. WYLD. 2s.The Nuns of Port Royal, as seen in their own Narratives. By M. E.
LOWNDES. 12s. 6d. net.OXFORD LIBRARY OF PROSE AND POETRY.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net each; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net each.

FOUR NEW VOLUMES.

Select Poems of Winthrop
Mackworth Praed. Edited, with an Introduction, by A. D. GODLEY. With a Portrait.Peacock's Memoirs of Shelley, with Shelley's letters to Peacock. Edited, with an Introduction, by H. F. B. BRETT-SMITH.Poems of Gray. A facsimile reprint of the volume of 1768.Poems of Keats. A facsimile reprint of the volume of 1820.

Clarendon Press Catalogue (160 pages) post free on application.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press,
Amen Corner, E.C.

brutes that ever called themselves by the undeserved name of civilised men. Their atrocities in Galicia, in Italy, in Hungary, in Transylvania, are only to be equalled by the proceedings of the negro races in Africa and Haiti. Their last exploit, of flogging forty odd people, including two women, at Milan is really a too blackguardly and disgusting proceeding. As to working upon their feelings of generosity and gentlemanliness, that is out of the question. But I do hope that you will not fail constantly to bear in mind the country and the Government you represent, and that you will maintain the dignity and honor of England by expressing openly and decidedly the disgust which such proceedings excite in the public mind of this country; and that you will not allow the Austrians to imagine that the public opinion of England is to be gathered from articles put in the 'Times' by Austrian agents in London, nor from the purchased support of the 'Chronicle,' nor from the servile language of the Tory lords and ladies in London, nor from the courtly notions of royal dukes and duchesses." It was in the spirit of this language that Palmerston acted, and it was because he and Lord John Russell and Mr. Gladstone were able to maintain this spirit, in opposition to the Court and the Tories, that they made a famous and powerful contribution to the greatest event of their century. As we read these pages, we realise what is the real difference between Europe fifty years ago and Europe to-day. Mr. Trevelyan has summed it up in his new volume. "It appears highly probable that if Italy had not acquired her independence when she did, and as rapidly as she did, and in the form of complete political union, she might never have acquired it at all. If she had not shaken off Erastian, Pope, and Bourbon in an age of war and revolution, she would scarcely have done so in a later age of nations perilously armed, but afraid of war and impatient of all questions that might endanger peace." There is the true difference. Every nation in modern Europe is at once better armed for war and more afraid of war than it was in 1850 or 1860. If a Foreign Minister talked like Palmerston to-day it would be bluff; in 1850 or 1860 it was business. Not, of course, that the conditions which made the emancipation of Italy possible, made it easy. All the chances of that world of intrigue and quarrels would have been thrown away on a race that could not use the genius of a Cavour, the teaching of a Mazzini, or the sword of the great leader of the knights of freedom.

This seems to have been the view of Fate, who, as though half-repenting of her favors, struck down Cavour with only half his work done. How disastrous that calamity has been to Italy is well known to all students of the admirable book written by Messrs. Bolton King and Thomas Okey. The new edition of this interesting work contains a chapter on Italy since 1900. The new century opened very well with the advent to power of the Zanardelli-Giolitti Ministry, and the change from coercion and reaction to a Liberal policy. Politics soon changed for the worse, but one good result of that Liberal success has remained, for the labor organisations took advantage of their release from the old restrictions, and there has been a general rise in wages. In some parts agricultural wages have risen by 150 per cent. On the other hand there has been an increase in the cost of living, and the authors state that "the equivalent of a bushel of wheat in terms of labor has grown less favorable to the workers." "The Italian laborer is worse off than the laborer in any other European country, Spain alone excepted." During these years there has been a great expansion of Italian trade, and as a result of the brilliant conversion of the National Debt, Italian credit stands remarkably high. But the situation is gloomy and threatening. The growth of expenditure on the army and the navy is very serious; the annual loss on the railways is very heavy; agrarian legislation for the South is peremptorily necessary, but it has been shamefully neglected, and waste and corruption, as illustrated in the Report of the Commission on the Navy and the monstrous indulgence with which Signor Nasi has been treated, are still rife in the public service. The main hope for Italy still seems to be with the Socialists, whose successes in the General Election of this year are the one bright ray in the sky, but in Italy, as in most countries, the Extreme Left are in continual danger of schism and dissolution.

BLUE BONNET AND MITRE.*

FROM the Taits of Ludquharn sprang this gentle, pious, and large-hearted woman, who, born in 1800, lived through nearly nine decades, and whose younger brother, Archibald, rose to be Archbishop of Canterbury. Blue Bonnets of Aberdeenshire were these Taits:—

"honest men living on their own farms, and wearing the broad blue 'bonnet' that marked the simplicity of rural and patriarchal lives far removed from the fashions and customs of the towns."

Charlotte, Lady Wake, was the second daughter of Crauford Tait of Harviestoun, and of Susan, daughter of Sir Ilay Campbell of Succoth.

In 1822 she married Charles Wake, son of Sir William Wake, of Courteenhall, Northamptonshire, whom, in 1847, he succeeded. Lady Wake lived in four reigns, saw the jubilee celebrations of two English Sovereigns, felt the fear of Napoleon, when that mighty shadow was projected on these shores, witnessed the revolution which sent into exile that stiff-necked Bourbon, Charles X., beheld the downfall of Napoleon III. and the Second Empire, enjoyed the friendship of Queen Victoria, maintained to the last a large and intelligent interest in affairs, and—to quote Isaiah, in his beautiful simplicity—walked all her days "in the light of the Lord."

In her early life, in Edinburgh and at Harviestoun, she laid up a fine store of experience to be drawn on later for these fascinating recollections. There was the jubilee of George III., in 1810, when Harviestoun "was the scene of what appeared to us a magnificent military spectacle"—the Clackmannshire Yeomanry curveting round the house, led by "our father, mounted on one of the grey carriage horses." The French were expected, and in the yard of Harviestoun stood in readiness "an immense caravan (it would now be called an omnibus) which had been built by our father's orders for the purpose of carrying us off to the other side of the hills when the French fleet should appear in the Firth of Forth." The French fleet did not appear, but French prisoners of war came in numbers; and under the December skies of 1812 we find them shivering on that mountain of rock where Edinburgh Castle stands, surprising the Scots with the potage, ragout, and bouillet, which they produced "just as they pleased, out of the simplest materials."

To this period belong Lady Wake's reminiscences of "Sir Walter," Mrs. Siddons, Hannah More, and Sir Humphry Davy, whom that resolute blue-stocking, Mrs. Apreece, had just insisted upon marrying. We have also a very curious picture of the Doncaster races of this era. The carriage folk of the neighborhood for miles around were accustomed to drive to the town on the afternoon of the Sunday preceding the opening day of the meeting. Lady Wake (Miss Charlotte Tait as she then was) and her sister were driven in a barouche and four with out-riders. One of the inside passengers—it was a private turn-out, of course—was a vicar, and the rector of the parish had a seat on the box. Never before had little Miss Tait been on such a jaunt; and if she was thrilled, she was also manifestly not a little shocked.

"What may have been the private thoughts of two sisters carefully educated in the Presbyterian Church, which in those days scarcely sanctioned a summer's evening walk on the Sabbath, may easily be conjectured; and the sights and sounds, when, after a twenty miles drive, we entered the city of Doncaster, were not calculated to make us more easy in our minds. The crowds in the streets, the various equipages similar to our own attempting to force their way amidst jostling horsemen, the swearing of the men, the rearing of the horses, the confusion increased by a large black hearse and several mourning coaches stopped by the crowds on their way through the town, a numerous drove of oxen in the same predicament, with their white horns, rushing hither and thither among the vociferating multitude, the incessant ringing of the church bells for the races, and enormous placards with 'PREPARE TO MEET THY GOD' in gigantic letters meeting the eye at every turn, altogether formed a scene that now, after more than half a century has passed, seems as fresh and as astounding as though it had been but yesterday."

From Doncaster to Royalty is a natural and easy transition. During her first or second season in London Lady Wake was present (as a famished spectator in a gallery) at George IV.'s coronation banquet in Westminster Hall. This was in July, 1821. For the ticket of a mere onlooker, such

* "The Reminiscences of Charlotte, Lady Wake." Edited by Lucy Wake. Blackwood. 12s. 6d. net.

J. NISBET & CO.'S IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS

A Famous Schoolmaster and Writer.

REGINALD BOSWORTH SMITH

A Memoir. By his daughter, Lady GROGAN. With Portrait and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10/6 net.

"A well drawn literary portrait of a typical English scholar and country gentleman."—Scotsman.

"A most interesting memoir of a really great schoolmaster."—Liverpool Post.

Second Large Impression in the Press.

MY LIFE AMONG THE BLUE-JACKETS

By Miss AGNES WESTON. With Photogravure Portrait and other Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 6/- net.

"Everybody at all interested in the religious life of the Navy will read her book with admiration and advantage."—Scotsman.

"A Book of Surpassing Interest."

MY RECOLLECTIONS

By EUGENE STOCK (late Secretary to the C.M.S.) With Portrait and Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 6/- net.

The Spectator says:—"The whole volume is highly interesting from beginning to end, and we warmly recommend it to our readers."

Cheap and Revised Edition.

ITALY TO-DAY

Demy 8vo, 6/- net.

By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY. Revised and brought up-to-date with New and Additional Matter.

"Will undoubtedly become one of the most widely read and highly valued volumes on Italian life and prospects."—World.

OUR NATIONAL DRINK BILL

Its Direct and Indirect Effects upon National Health, Morals, Industry, and Trade. By JOHN NEWTON. Cloth, crown 8vo, 1/- net.

This striking little volume from the pen of a well-known Temperance Reformer will, it is hoped, bring home to the masses of the public how serious the necessity, how grave the justification for the Temperance Movement is.

NEW FICTION AND STORIES.

L. T. MEADE'S New Novel.

BLUE OF THE SEA.

Illustrated, 6/-

The Liverpool Post says:—"An altogether charming book, and written with all that detail of characterisation for which Mrs. Meade is famed."

The Manchester Courier says:—"It is a delightful story."

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

KITTY AUBREY. A Story of English Home Life.

Illustrated, 6/-

The Daily Chronicle says:—"Kitty Aubrey" is the best young lady's novel we have read for a long time. . . . We thank her for a readable, 'purchaseable' book."

The Dundee Advertiser says:—"The author has a charm all her own and in her latest novel humour and pathos are beautifully mingled."

A Capital Book for Boys.

THE COMING OF NAVARRE

By O. V. CAINE, Author of "Face to Face with Napoleon," etc. Fully Illustrated, extra crown 8vo, 5/-

The Dublin Daily Express says:—"Mr. Caine has given us a book full of adventure, love, plot, and counterplot. Pluck of youth stirs the blood and quickens the pulse."

A Charming Story for Girls.

MY LADY BELLAMY

By DOROTHEA MOORE, Author of "A Plucky School-girl." Fully Illustrated, extra crown 8vo, 5/-

The Dundee Advertiser says:—"If any story is calculated to win the interests of girls for the romantic and picturesque in history, that story, is this latest tale from the pen of Miss Moore."

Two Charming Books for Children.

THE STORY OF FORGET-ME-NOT and Lily-of-the-Valley.

By the Hon. MAURICE BARING. The Coloured Pictures by S. B. Royal 16mo, 2/- net.

The Dublin Daily Express says:—"A very pretty conception, beautifully executed. . . . the more one looks into the pictures the more must one admire them."

THE STORY OF LITTLE BLACK BOBTAIL

By the Author of "Little Black Mingo." With 30 Illustrations in Colour. In picture boards, 16mo, 1/- net; 1/6 in cloth.

J. NISBET & Co., Ltd., 22, Berners Street, London, W.

CONSTABLE & COMPANY

The Two Most Beautiful Books of the Year.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE.

By OLIVER GOLDSMITH. With 40 full-page plates in colour and numerous drawings in the text by

W. LEE HANKEY.

4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 250 copies, 42s. net.

Mr. RACKHAM'S MASTERPIECE.

THE FAIRY TALES OF THE BROTHERS GRIMM.

With 40 full-page plates in colour and 70 drawings in the text, by ARTHUR RACKHAM.

4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 750 copies, 42s. net.

LAST POEMS. Those hitherto unpublished in book form. By GEORGE MEREDITH. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

MR. WALTER SICHEL'S NEW WORK.

Ready Immediately.

THE LIFE OF RICHARD BRINSLEY

SHERIDAN. By WALTER SICHEL, Author of "Emma, Lady Hamilton." In two volumes. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 31s. 6d. net.

HOGARTH'S LONDON. By H. B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

LONDON LIFE OF YESTERDAY.

By ARTHUR COMPTON-RICKETT, M.A., LL.D. (Cantab); Author of "The Vagabond in Literature," &c. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE GIRLHOOD OF QUEEN ELIZA-

BETH: A Narrative in Contemporary Letters.

By F. A. MUMBY, Editor of "The Letters of Literary Men. With an Introduction by R. S. Rait, M.A., Fellow of New College, Oxford. With numerous Portraits, Views and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"The most interesting book that has been put in my hands for a long time."—Saturday Review.

THE ROMANTIC MOVEMENT IN ENGLISH POETRY.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"The most brilliant work Mr. Symons has ever written."—Saturday Review.

"A model both of praise and criticism."—Observer.

THE LIFE OF JOHN DEE: An Elizabethan Crystal Gazer. By CHARLOTTE FELL

SMITH, Author of "Mary Rich, Countess of Warwick." With Portrait and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"An interesting addition to our knowledge of Queen Elizabeth is provided by this biography of her astrologer-in-chief. . . . A pleasant picture is drawn of her informal visits to his house, when she would ride across Richmond Park, pass through the East Sheen Gate, and, turning down the hill, stop at the old house between Mortlake Church and the Thames. . . . We are grateful to our author for these pleasant sidelights on the character of Queen Bess."

—Evening Standard.

THE BOOK OF CUPID; being an Anthology from the English Poets. With an Introduction by HENRY NEWBOLT, and 25 Illustrations by The Lady Hylton. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE SHADOW OF THE CATHE-

DRAI. A Novel. By VINCENT IBANEZ. 6s.

"A great book."—Standard.

"It is not too much to say that the present troubles will be better understood by any one who has been under the Shadow of the Cathedral. . . . This is a book which the serious reader of novels, or the reader of serious novels ought not to miss."

—Evening Standard.

MISS SILBERRAD'S NEW NOVEL.

ORDINARY PEOPLE.

By UNA L. SILBERRAD,

Author of "The Good Comrade." 6s.

CONSTABLE & CO LTD

10 Orange Street London WC

as the young Scotswoman was presented with, as much as fifty guineas had in many instances been paid. Not Sir Walter's most glittering dreams—she writes to her sister—not the rarest palace unlocked in the Arabian Nights "can at all surpass the unrivalled magnificence of the Court of George IV. on his coronation day. I think Queen Elizabeth's fête and pageant at Kenilworth will give you the best idea of the whole." Sublime among the rest sat the King:—

"the most absurd likeness of a peacock, for, when seated at the royal banquet served before the throne, his train, about a mile long and full of golden stars upon a purple ground, was spread high over the back of the throne, and the effect was so like that of a peacock spreading his tail to the sun that everyone present was struck with the absurd resemblance."

In the midst of the feast Queen Caroline attempted to storm the hall. Unfortunately ("for the fun of it"), the poor lady merely "forced her way into one of the kitchens, where they coolly turned the key upon her till all risk was over."

On this occasion Wellington was one of the supporters of that fabulous person, the Hereditary Champion of England; and as he was backing his horse from the scene, someone hurried to the Duke and whispered:—

"Don't lay your hand on his quarters, or he will fall down and die. He is the horse of Timur the Tartar."

Astley's, in brief, had furnished him.

The gentleman to whom Lady Wake was indebted for her ticket was Colonel Percy, a younger son of the Earl of Beverley, and the hero of a vivid and sad story of Waterloo. Wellington, whose favorite aide-de-camp he was, selected him to carry to England the tidings of victory and the eagles of the French. With orders never to stop till he had laid the trophies at the feet of the Regent, the young officer swept at the best speed of four horses from Dover to London, his tremendous news flying by rumor ahead of him. The Regent was coming out from dinner at Mrs. Bethune's, when his sash still wet with the blood of Waterloo. This dreadful evidence of the speed with which Percy had travelled from the field of Napoleon's discomfiture was not all: a few days later a stroke of paralysis ended his career as a soldier. The episode was worthy the pen of Browning, who would have made of it another ride from Ghent.

"a commotion was heard in the anteroom, and a young man in uniform, soiled and covered with dust, rushed forward with the eagles and despatches and fainted at the Regent's feet"—

As yet we have unfolded none of Lady Wake's memories of her brother the Archbishop, her beloved "Archie," who grew to man's estate from a childhood so enfeebled that his life was more than once considered forfeit. At Oxford, among the scholars of Balliol, when the gifted Tait joined the band (or a little later) were Arthur Stanley, Lake (Dean of Durham), Goulburn (Dean of Norwich), Coleridge (Chief Justice), Stafford Northcote, Arthur Clough, and James Riddell. All these were his friends and contemporaries. The Frederick Oakeley who became a canon of the R.C. Church was his tutor. We see William George Ward, "the size of a tub," chased upstairs by undergraduates, eager for the lecture it was always so difficult to get from him. When Ward won in the race to his rooms, he at once turned the key on his pursuers, "and quietly set himself down to read his novel." Newman also is, of course, here, and of the thunders that rolled around "Tract No. 90," Lady Wake conveys to us a lively echo or two. Newmanism

"was like the measles; nobody was safe from it in Oxford who had not had it already."

Tait was one of the earnest young men of his day by whom the infection was withstood. We need not detail his career. In 1842, when he was twenty-nine, and looked twenty-five, he took in hand the fortunes of Rugby School. Seven years later he was Dean of Carlisle. The year of salvation, 1855, saw him Bishop of London. He declined in 1862 the Archbishopric of York. Six years from this, on the unlooked-for death of Dr. Longley, and by the urgent wish of the Queen, Tait was chosen for the "mitred crown" of Canterbury. He wore it till his death in 1882.

Tales of Scotland are not wanting—heroic, touching, humorous, or ghostly—but by the editorial dial it must be very close upon the hour. Here, however, is a legend of an auld Miss Balfour, of the Balfours of Balbirnie, which has all the saving grace. Miss Balfour had inherited from brothers in India a fortune of £840,000, and once a year the dwindling remnant of her family were bidden to her board.

"They were waited upon by her ancient domestic, and at the very beginning of dinner she always thus addressed the party: 'Onybody for wine! Wha's for wine haud up their thumbs. Naebody for wine! John, tak' awa' the wine.' Thus the solitary bottle remained unopened, for neither niece nor nephew dare incur her displeasure by signifying a desire for a glass."

Here, as may be guessed, is a well-stored volume; and there is not in it one malicious or ungentle word.

HAND MADE v. MACHINE MADE.*

MR. HAMLIN GARLAND's stories would seem to be but little, too little, known in England. He produces slowly, and has a temperament which follows its own instincts, and not the market's demands. Commonplace people will find "The Moccasin Ranch" too truthful and fresh in style to satisfy them, and they will do well to turn to the pages of Sir Gilbert Parker, whose stories in "Northern Lights" have the comfortable air of being turned out, to standard pattern, by a well-equipped literary factory. Everything is there, situation, scenery, character, appropriate speeches and striking denouement, but all the time you have the feeling that, just as the gas-bracket you purchase in a shop is like thousands of other gas-brackets, so this or that story of Sir Gilbert Parker is like thousands of other stories. The human pattern which he adopts is generalised, and although the tales are undeniably by the hand of Sir Gilbert Parker, they do not disclose those secrets of character and of individual feeling, those almost imperceptible subtle inflexions of life, which convince us that the author has watched nature and captured something of her force, her stress, her inexhaustible spontaneity.

The secret of all mediocre art, of which "Northern Lights" is a characteristic example, is that it is compounded of details that are commonplace and details that are falsities. Sir Gilbert Parker's second tale, "Once at Red Man's River," which is no worse and no better than the other sixteen, is a capital example of the modern "substitute for art" which, like some "excellent substitutes for butter," is most pleasing to the popular taste. Abe Hawley is haranguing the heroic Nance, as the story opens, telling her "It's got to be settled to-night. The game is up here, up for ever. The red-coat police from Ottawa are coming, and they'll soon be roosting in this post, the Injuns are goin', the buffaloes are most gone, and the fur trade's dead in these parts. D'ye see?" Now the manner of this speech is false, and every touch is generalised. As we are told a few lines later that Nance is a frontierswoman, that she "had taken the border life as it was; had looked it straight between the eyes, and was as good as any white man in any phase of the life," &c., it is quite unnatural that these encyclopædic facts should be communicated to her. And note that the language employed by Abe Hawley is not the language of a local man, but the language of all of us who only know "red-coat police," and "buffaloes," and "Injuns," by hearsay. It is the language that anybody in Fleet Street or Surbiton would deem appropriate. This lack of particular truth is apparent in almost every sentence that follows. Nance also is infected by the desire to communicate encyclopædic information, and the duet that ensues between the pair is of the "standardised" order:—

"The Hudson's Bay Company 'll come along with the red-coats, and they'll set up a nice little Sunday-school business here for what they call 'agricultural settlers.' There'll be a railway, and the Yankees 'll send up their marshals to work with the redcoats on the border, and—"

"And the days of smuggling will be over," put in the girl, in a low voice. "No more bull-wackers and mule-skinner 'whooping it up': no more Blackfeet and Piegans drinking alcohol and water, and cuttin' each others' throats. A nice quiet time coming on the border, Abe, eh?"

"... You got the ways of the deer in your walk, the song o' the birds in your voice; and you're going with me, Nance, for I bin talkin' to you stiddy four years. It's a long time to wait on the chance, for there's always women to be got, same as others have done—men like Dingan with

* "The Moccasin Ranch." By Hamlin Garland. Harper & Brothers. 5s.

"Northern Lights." By Sir Gilbert Parker. Methuen. 6s.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S NEW BOOKSFrench Cathedrals, Monasteries

and Abbeys, and Sacred Sites of France. By ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. With 183 Illustrations from Drawings by JOSEPH PENNELL, and Plans and Diagrams. Super Royal 8vo, cloth, 20s. net; post free, 20s. 6d.

The making of this book is the fruit of twenty years' living and study in the cathedral cities of France—Provence, the Romanesque centres, Mont St. Michel, and the towns of the great Gothic churches—and follows a carefully prepared scheme, based upon the value of the examples selected in the history of architecture.

Men and Manners of Old

Florence. By GUIDO BIAGI, Librarian of the Laurentian and Riccardi Libraries, Florence. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 48 other illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net; post free, 15s. 5d.

Dr. Biagi's new volume gives vivid and realistic glimpses of social life in Florence from the thirteenth century to the beginning of the nineteenth.

In Three Legations: Turin, Florence,

The Hague, 1856-1872. By Madame CHARLES DE BUNSEN (née WADDINGTON). With 3 Photogravure Plates and 48 other illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 11d.

Madame De Bunsen's letters to her family on her first entrance into diplomatic life and in the years that followed, were a kind of journal, and are full of descriptions of what she saw, from court balls to military hospitals, royal weddings and stormy parliamentary sittings, social life in town and country, old lace and crinolines; in short, there were all the elements of a full and varied existence, where the writer was in a position to see and hear all that was going on.

This correspondence, extending over some sixteen very important years, which include the making of Italy and the war between France and Germany in 1872, touches the inside of historical events and is of much general interest.

Romantic Corsica. Wanderings In

Napoleon's Isle. By GEORGE RENWICK. With a Chapter on Climbing by T. G. OUSTON, F.R.G.S., Member of the Alpine Club. With 62 illustrations and a map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net; post free, 10s. 11d.

Everything of interest in the island is described in this book, and the charming, quaint towns and many villages with their old-world life pass before the reader in picture and description, and interestingly woven into the wonder-narrative is much of Corsica's stirring history, with many a story from the dead days of fierce vendetta and of war.

A Literary History of the English

People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. By J. J. JUSSERAND. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 11d.

"The predominant feature of the book," says the Times, "is in an especial degree brightness, lucidity, point, perspicacity, modernity, but above all vivacity."

The Problem of Human Life.

As viewed by the Great Thinkers, from Plato to the Present Time. By RUDOLF EUCKEN. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net; post free, 12s. 11d.

"This, the most famous and widely read of Professor Eucken's works, is an altogether delightful book in which the characteristic speculations and opinions of the great minds of the race are elucidated, contrasted, and judged in a sympathetic yet independent spirit. It forms an admirable introduction to the study of philosophy."—Boston Transcript.

Greece in Evolution.

Studies Prepared under the auspices of the French League for the Defence of the Rights of Hellenism. By VARIOUS WRITERS. With a Preface by the Right Hon. Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, M.P. Translated from the French under the Editorship of G. F. ABBOTT. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d.

The Morning Post says:—"It is impossible to read these addresses without admiration for the intimate knowledge of Greece and of the Greeks which they display, and for the sympathy by which they are pervaded."

The Religion of H. G. Wells, and other Essays. By the Rev. ALEXANDER H. CRAFTURD, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; post free, 3s. 10d.

The chief essay is a careful and friendly criticism of the ethical and religious teaching of Mr. H. G. WELLS, contained in his "First and Last Things."

How to Study the Stars.

Astronomy with Small Telescopes and the Naked Eye, and Notes on Celestial Photography. By L. RUDAUX. Translated by A. H. KEANE, LL.D., F.R.G.S. With 79 illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d.

This book is intended as a guide to practical observation for amateur astronomers. It deals with all branches of the science which can be followed with instruments of moderate size.

A BUDGET NOVEL.Jenny Peters.

By C. H. DUDLEY WARD. Price 6s. post free.

The Dundee Advertiser says:—"It is peculiarly refreshing to meet with Mr. Ward's work, in which one finds the everyday problem of rich and poor and right and wrong set forth with frank and vital realism."

ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

HISTORY OF THE SCIENCES.A NEW AND IMPORTANT SERIES OF POPULAR BOOKS.

HITHERTO there have been few, if any, really popular works touching the historical growth of the various great branches of knowledge. The ordinary primer leaves unexploited the deep human interest which belongs to the sciences as contributing to progress and civilisation, and calling into play the faculties of many of the finest minds. Something more attractive is wanted.

The above need in literature has now been met. Each book in THE HISTORY OF SCIENCE SERIES is written by an expert in the given subject, and by one who has studied the history as well as the conclusions of his own branch of science. The volumes are of about 160 pp. crown 8vo, bound in cloth, with gilt lettering, and contain from twelve to sixteen carefully prepared illustrations including portraits of celebrated discoverers, many from originals not hitherto reproduced. A concise up-to-date bibliography adds greatly to the value of each book. The price of each is only 1s. net.

NOW READY.HISTORY OF ASTRONOMY.

By PROFESSOR GEORGE FORBES, M.A., F.R.S. 164 pp., with illustrations; cloth 1s., by post 1s. 3d.

HISTORY OF CHEMISTRY. Vol. I. circa 2000 B.C. to 1850 A.D.

By SIR EDWARD THORPE, C.B., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S. 156 pp., with illustrations; cloth, 1s., by post 1s. 3d.

IN PREPARATION.HISTORY OF CHEMISTRY. Vol. II. 1850 A.D. to date

By SIR EDWARD THORPE.

HISTORY OF GEOGRAPHY.

By DR. JOHN SCOTT KELTIE, F.R.G.S., F.S.S., F.S.A.

HISTORY OF GEOLOGY.

By HORACE B. WOODWARD, F.R.S., F.G.S.

HISTORY OF BIOLOGY.

By PROFESSOR L. C. MIALL, F.R.S.

HISTORY OF ANTHROPOLOGY.

By PROFESSOR A. C. HADDON, M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S.

HISTORY OF OLD TESTAMENT CRITICISM.

By PROFESSOR ARCHIBALD DUFF.

HISTORY OF NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM.

By F. C. CONYBEARE, M.A.

The above series is being issued for the Rationalist Press Association, Limited, by WATTS & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

A complete catalogue, with free specimen copy of the Literary Guide and particulars of the R.P.A., will be sent on receipt of a post-card.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY.

NOVEMBER, 1909.

2s. 6d.

MODERN POETRYD. H. Lawrence*John Lazarus*JOHN CALSWORTHY*The Neighbours*G. LOWES DICKINSON*Letters from America*R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM*The Captive*G. F. KEARY*The Antiquary (2)*ELLA D'ARCY*The Chronicles of Hildesheim*FORD MADDOX HUEFFER*A Call (4)*ENGLISH LITERATURE OF TO-DAY*Editorial*J. A. HOBSON*The Extension of Liberalism*HENRY W. NEVINSON*Women's Vote and Men*G. P. GOOCH, M.P.The Constitutional Crisis: A Liberal View"VIDVAN"*India in England*SYDNEY BROOKS*Tammany*E. S. P. HAYNES*Divorce Law Reform*FOSTER WATSON*The English Educational Renaissance

Subscription—One Year 30s.; Six Months 15s.

CHAPMAN & HALL, 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Injun girls, and men like Tobey with half-breeds. But I ain't bin lookin' that way. I bin lookin' only towards you." He laughed eagerly, and lifted a tin cup of whisky standing on a table near. "I'm lookin' towards you now, Nance. Your health and mine together. It's got to be settled now. You got to go to the 'Cific Coast with Bantry, or North with me."

The girl jerked a shoulder and frowned a little. He seemed so sure of himself.

"Or South with Nick Pringle, or East with someone else," she said, quizzically. "There's always four quarters to the compass, even when Abe Hawley thinks he owns the world and has a mortgage on eternity. I'm not going West with Bantry; but there's three other points that's open."

With an oath the man caught her by the shoulders, and swung her round to face him. He was swelling with anger.

"You—Nick Pringle, that trading cheat, that gambler! After four years, I—"

"Let go my shoulders," she said, quietly. "I'm not your property. Go and get some Piegan girl to bully. Keep your hands off. I'm not a bronco for you to bit and bridle. You've got no rights. You—" Suddenly she relented, seeing the look in his face, and realising that, after all, it was a tribute to herself that she could keep him for four years and rouse him to such fury. "But, yes, Abe," she added, "you have some rights. We've been good friends all these years, and you've been all right out here. You said some nice things about me just now, and I liked it, even if it was as if you'd learned it out of a book. I've got no po'try in me; I'm plain homespun. I'm a sapling, I'm not any prairie flower, but I like when I like, and I like a lot when I like: I'm a bit of hickory, I'm not a prairie flower—"

Any girl might, of course, say, "I'm not your property. Go and get some Piegan girl to bully"; but the author's imagination cannot reach beyond this, and descends into the false emphasis of the art of the popular oleograph. "I've got no po'try in me; I'm plain homespun. I'm a sapling, I'm not any prairie flower; but I like when I like, and I like a lot when I like," &c., and these stilted and theatrical phrases are exchanged between a man and a woman who have known one another for four years! It's not merely the lack of life, freshness, and ease in the talk in all the stories that is apparent, but the situations themselves are vamped up, and follow in the well-worn grooves of transpontine legend. Therefore the stories no doubt will be popular. The mass of the public likes to read what it expects to read, to have the manner with which it is familiar repeated, to renew the conventions on which its theory of this or that type of society is formed. All these requirements Sir Gilbert Parker's books fulfil.

It is pleasing to turn to the unaffected sincerity of Mr. Hamlin Garland's tale. The scene is the Dakota prairie in the spring of 1883. A new settler, Burke, and his young wife Blanche, who have sold their farm in Illinois, are reaching their "claims" on the unsurveyed land twelve miles east of the Western Coteaux. Crowds of other emigrants are arriving. "All ages and sexes came to take claims. Old men, lone and feeble, school teachers from the East, young girls from the towns of the older countries, boys not yet of age—everywhere incoming claimants were setting stakes upon the green and beautiful sod." The peculiar exhilaration of the early days of home building, of the friendly rivalry of the incoming settlers, of the charm of new intimacies between the men and women who find themselves neighbors, all is admirably touched off. Note, for example, how firm and sure is each stroke in this little picture:—

After leaving the ranch they struck out over the prairie, where no wagon wheel but theirs had ever passed. . . . A few antelopes scurried away out of the path, and a wolf sitting on a height gravely watched the teams, as if marvelling at their coming. The wind swept out of the west clear and cold. The sky held no shred of cloud. The air was like some all-powerful intoxicant, and when Bailey pointed out a row of little stakes and said, "There's the railroad," their imagination supplied the trains, the wheat, the houses, the towns which were to come.

At the claim Blanche sat on a box and watched the two men as they swiftly built the little cabin which was to be her home. Their hammers rang merrily, and soon she was permitted to go inside and look up at the great sky which roofed it in. This was an emotional moment to her. As she sat there listening to the voices of the men who were drawing this fragile shelter around her, a great awe fell upon her. It seemed as if she had drawn a little nearer to the Almighty Creator of the universe. Here, where no white man had ever set foot, she was watching the founding of her own house. Was it a home? Could it ever be a home?

Swiftly the roof closed over her head, and the floor crept under her feet. The stove came in, and the flour-barrel, and the few household articles which they had brought followed, and as the sun was setting they all sat down to supper in her new home.

The smell of the fresh pine was round them. Geese were flying over. Cranes were dancing down by the ponds, prairie-chickens were booming. The open doorway—doorless yet—looked out on the sea-like plain glorified by the red sun just sinking over the purple line of treeless hills to the west. It was the bare, raw materials of a State, and they were in at the beginning of it.

After Bailey left them the husband and wife sat in silence. When they spoke it was in low voices. It seemed as if God could hear what they said—that He was just there behind the glory of the western clouds.

The change of mood that falls on everybody with the advent of the summer heat is most subtly indicated. As Burke hires himself out to plough for other men, his young wife, Blanche, is left alone a good deal, and an intimacy springs up between her and the pleasant, boyish land-agent and store-keeper, Rivers. August comes, and no rain falls. Great clouds rise over the horizon, and "only to pass with a swoop like the flight of silent, great eagles, followed by a trailing garment of dust . . . leaving the sky and plain as beautiful, as placid, and as dry as before." The settlers grow anxious for their crops, and a little bitter. September and October pass quickly. And with the coming of November the winds sweep pitilessly cold and keen out of the untracked north-west, over the grey, treeless prairie. There is no fuel to be had except coal from the city, and it is very high in price. Most of the squatters have spent their last dollar, and are waiting to "prove off" while they live on canned food. Then December comes, with its furious snow blizzards hissing over the icy plain, and the temperature falls far below zero. The picture of the wife's disillusionment in her new life and her bitter alienation from her husband, and the development of her intimacy with Rivers, have the force of actual life. We cannot dwell here on the dramatic sequel. Mr. Garland makes no mistake, except in a few pages towards the close, where the ethics of the situation are unnecessarily debated. Apart from this, the artistic handling of the relationships between the four leading characters is masterly.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

To summarise the origins and developments of "Art in Great Britain and Ireland" (Heinemann, 6s. net), in a volume of little more than 300 pages—which, moreover, contains some 600 typographic blocks—has been the not altogether enviable task of Sir Walter Armstrong, the Director of the National Gallery of Ireland. It would be easy enough to find flaws in the arrangement of the book. It appears to us, for instance, to be overloaded with illustrations, so that a very large number of them are not within measurable distance of that portion of the text they illustrate; but the intention, and, on the whole, the achievement, of the work is so excellent that such criticism would be ungracious. Roughly speaking, Sir Walter Armstrong has divided his subject into two main sections, the first of which deals with architecture and the minor arts, and the second with painting and sculpture. The architectural chapters are an excellent introduction, concise without being bald, to the study of the whole subject. The first two chapters are a general discussion of primitive art in the British Isles, an important feature of which discussion is a clear exposition of the linear character and subjective feeling of Celtic work; and then the main movements in British architecture are traced through nine chapters, from the rude Anglo-Saxon building to the Modern Renaissance of our own day. One may note that a stout championship of English Gothic as an individual growth, and not as a mere imitation of the French, as some writers have sought to prove it is, forms one of Sir Walter Armstrong's principal themes for argument. In drawing attention to the architectural thoughtfulness that the present generation is disposed to lavish on small, unimportant buildings, for which at one time anything was good enough, he recalls one of the most hopeful phases of our Modern Renaissance; while he shows a catholic sympathy towards the English Palladian and its variations, as seen in most of the public buildings that have recently grown up in the metropolis. The section on painting, while it is characteristically well-informed, has not quite the grip of the other. It strikes us as being too much of an encyclo-

NOW READY.

— The —
Great Question.

FREE TARIFF

or TRADE REFORM?

By
 J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P., and L. M. S. AMERY.

In crown 8vo, stiff boards. 1s. net.

A STATEMENT, impartially presented by the Publishers, giving the arguments of two well-known exponents who, writing to a given syllabus, state the case each from his own standpoint. An invaluable book for those who wish to be well up in the pros and cons of Tariff Reform.

— The —
Great Question.

TARIFF FREE

REFORM? TRADE

By
 L. M. S. AMERY, and J. M. ROBERTSON, M.P.

Published by SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, Ltd., LONDON, E.C.

For Your Library ListTHE CAT IN HISTORY, LEGEND, AND ART.

Written and Illustrated by ANNE MARKS.
 Crown 4to, cloth gilt, 6s. net (by post, 6s. 4d.).
 The cult of the cat must prove of interest even to those who are not professed lovers of the animal.

Milton on the Continent

A Key to L'Allegro and Il Penseroso.

By Mrs. FANNY BYSE.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net (by post, 4s. 9d.).
 Second edition, enriched by further observations concerning Milton's sojourn in the Rhone Valley and on the Simplon Pass in the light of Vaudois legends and poems.

LITERARY BYE-PATHS AND VAGARIES, AND OTHER PAPERS

By THOMAS NEWBIGGING. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net (by post 4s. 10d.).

A series of interesting essays on out-of-the-way subjects, with the true literary note that the book-lover enjoys.

THE WAY OUT

Or, From the Comparative to the Positive in Religious Thought.

By LAMPADEPHOROS. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net (by post, 6s. 4d.).

In this volume, which might be called "The Old Truths from a New Point of View," the Author throws a fresh light and has an original restatement to make concerning Christ's Christianity.

THE HARP AND THE ROSE

By "CARITAS." Cloth gilt, 3s. net (by post, 3s. 3d.).

A collection of Poems which, like harp songs and wild roses, may help and cheer weary travellers on the dusty paths of this everyday world.

VERSES IN TWILIGHT

By the Rev. PHILLIP WINTER DE QUETTEVILLE.
 Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 9d.).

A volume of secular and religious verse, the sweet melody of which will charm the reader.

Write for Catalogue No. 102 of Antiquarian Literature, free by post.

LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

14s. 6d. net. Cloth, 6s. net.

THE PRINCE OF DESTINY.

A Romance, By SARATH KUMAR GHOSH, Author of "1,001 Indian Nights."

Being a presentment of India by an Indian, it draws a picture of Indian life from the inside, with its social customs and moral ideals, its eternal patience, its religious fervour, its passionate love. The book also reveals the Indian view of the causes of the present unrest, and Britain's unseen peril in India. If Britain loses India, it will be by the neglect of such a warning. In the circumstances depicted it would need the extraordinary love of an extraordinary man like the hero to save Britain's cause.

Above all, this romance envelops the reader in the atmosphere of India as no work of a European has ever done, and is a storehouse of Indian information which could not be obtained from any other source. Withal, it unfolds a story full of dramatic interest and instinct with deep emotions.

Ready November 2nd. Demy 8vo. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

PROGRESSIVE REDEMPTION:

The Catholic Church, its Functions and Offices in the World reviewed in the Light of the Ancient Mysteries and Modern Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

Author of "Progressive Creation" (see below).

This book, by its powerfully reasoned-out thesis, is of profound interest and importance to theologians, clergymen, ministers and religious thinkers and workers generally.

Now ready. Two demy 8vo. vols. Cloth, 21s. net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION:

A Reconciliation of Religion with Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

A book that has confessedly baffled the reviewers, and of which Mr. Arthur E. Waite has said, "it is of the quality of Revelation."

Now Ready. Demy 8vo 736 pp., including Bibliography and copious Index. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE HIDDEN CHURCH OF THE HOLY GRAAL:

Its Legends and Symbolism. Considered in their Affinity with certain Mysteries of Initiation and other traces of a Secret Tradition in Christian Times.

By ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE.

Recently issued. Demy 8vo. 452 pp. 7s. 6d. net.

SCIENTIFIC IDEALISM:

Or, Matter and Force, and their Relation to Life and Consciousness.

By WILLIAM KINGSLAND, Author of "The Mystic Quest," "The Esoteric Basis of Christianity," &c.

"It is an ably written volume."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

Just issued. Crown 8vo, paper covers. 1s. net., by post, 1s. 1d.

THE CASE FOR ALCOHOL:

Or, The Action of Alcohol on Body and Soul.

By Dr.

ROBERT PARK.

Descriptive Circulars of these and other LONDON:

REBMAN, Ltd.,

Important Books sent on application.

129, Shaftesbury Ave. W.C.

Mr. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

Now ready, 2s. 6d. net. With Illustrations.

THE NAVY LEAGUE ANNUAL.

(Corrected to October 10th, 1909.)

Founded and Edited by ALAN H. BURGONYNE.

A Popular Book for the information of the Public upon all matters concerning the progress of the British and Foreign Navies.

LETTERS FROM THE PENINSULA (1808-1812).

By LIEUT.-GENERAL SIR WILLIAM WARRE, C.B., K.T.S. Edited by his Nephew, the REV. EDMOND WARRE, D.D., C.B., M.V.O. With Portrait and Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MEDICI. By COLONEL G. F. YOUNG, C.B. With numerous Illustrations. 2 vols., Demy 8vo, 36s. net.

This is the most elaborate and complete account of the Medici Family which has yet been written, and treats of them from their rise in 1400 to their end in 1745. In their time they played many important parts, and the narrative of their history makes a book which not only the reading public, but students will be anxious to read.

A Volume of Verse.

SONGS OF MEMORY & HOPE.

By HENRY NEWBOLT. Author of "The Sailings of the Longships," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

MARMADUKE PICKTHALL'S New Novel.THE VALLEY OF THE KINGS.

6s.

ELIZABETH ROBINS' New Novel.THE FLORENTINE FRAME.

6s.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

pædia of artists, too little of a reasoned review of the tendencies they illustrate. The desire to leave nobody out is especially prominent in the chapter on present-day painting, with the result that dozens of artists appear to be mentioned simply for mention's sake, space not permitting any adequate appreciation of their work, however concise. But the book on the whole is a wonderful production in hand-books, and a good index enhances its value as a work of reference.

* * *

MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS is one of the most successful of modern interpreters of France and of French ways of life to the English people, and the French Government have recognised the merit of her writings by making her an Officer of Public Instruction. Her intimate knowledge of what is almost the country of her adoption gives a special value and authority to most of her books, though this is not so evident in her latest volume, "French Vignettes" (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net), as in some of its predecessors. It consists of a series of sketches, each of them dealing with a "dramatic episode" in the French history of the period between the eve of the Revolution and the fall of the Second Empire. The book begins with an account of Mirabeau's "Lettres à Julie," and this is followed by sketches of the lives of Madame Roland, Dr. Guillotin, Louvet de Couvray (one of the six Girondists who made good their escape and again took their seats in the Convention), the Duc d'Enghien, and Philarète Chasles. Miss Betham-Edwards styles Philarète Chasles "a pioneer of the entente cordiale," and it cannot be doubted that Chasles's lectures and his "Le Dix-neuvième Siècle en Angleterre" did something to promote an interest in English affairs among French men of letters. It is not clear, however, that Chasles's interest in England was due to anything more than a search for copy, since he exploited Germany and the United States in much the same way. Miss Betham-Edwards mentions Sainte-Beuve, though she omits the story of how Chasles's father came to be the great critic's tutor. Sainte-Beuve's uncle, searching for a tutor for his nephew, was introduced to Pierre-Jacques Chasles. The latter, by way of showing his skill in teaching, ordered his son to mount upon a table and declaim a Greek poem from memory. The boy was Philarète Chasles, who proved quite equal to the occasion. The contents of Miss Betham-Edwards's volume are rightly called vignettes, and make no attempts at full-length portraiture. Some of the subjects have been often treated, but they are handled here with ease and freshness.

The Week in the City.

THE Five per Cent. Bank rate has been working satisfactorily. The Bank secured the gold on Monday, and, much to the relief of speculative investors, the Imperial Bank at Berlin did not raise its rate, though that step had been anticipated. Dear money does not seem to be working serious mischief, though, of course, the Stock Exchange boom, of which Mr. Lloyd George spoke, has gone off since the official rate rose to 4 and 5 per cent. During the month ending October 20th the market value of the 387 representative securities selected by the "Bankers' Magazine" for comparison showed a net decline of £26,906,000, or 0.72 per cent., the aggregate on September 20th having been £3,759,528,000, as against £3,732,622,000 at the later date. The following table shows the fluctuations (in millions) month by month for the past three years:—

(PAR VALUE 387 SECURITIES, £3,424,586,000.)

	1907.	1908.	1909.		1907.	1908.	1909.
January ...	3,843	3,562	3,645	July ...	3,634	3,597	3,727
February ...	3,816	3,559	3,651	August ...	3,498	3,605	3,767
March ...	3,691	3,549	3,593	September ...	3,532	3,625	3,760
April ...	3,693	3,552	3,695	October ...	3,506	3,604	3,733
May ...	3,656	3,598	3,731	November ...	3,457	3,650	—
June ...	3,588	3,598	3,723	December ...	3,500	3,638	—

The total declines in the past month amounted to £30,597,000, but there were gains of £3,691,000, to which South African

Are You a Writer?

Whether Journalist, Student, Secretary—whatever status you occupy where writing is essential, you will find the greatest possible help from the

BLICK ENSDERFER

Visible Writing
TYPEWRITER

This Machine does beautiful work, and fulfils all the practical purposes of a high-priced Machine. It can be had in three different Models at Prices from £9 9s. to £13 13s.

Less Liberal Cash Discount or Easy Terms.

All Models have Visible Writing, Interchangeable Type, Perfect and Permanent Alignment, Variable Line Widths, together with a handiness all their own.

The "Oriental" pattern writes at will either from left to right or from right to left. Can be arranged to work in almost every language upon the one machine, including Hebrew and English.

WRITE FOR LIST No. 76 NOW.

THE BLICKENSERFER CO., LTD.,
9 & 10, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

The Daily News

PRINTED SIMULTANEOUSLY in LONDON & MANCHESTER.

"The Daily News" the representative Liberal Daily, is on sale all over England first thing in the morning.

If you have any difficulty in procuring a copy communicate with the publisher.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

Head Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Telephone: 2626 Holborn (3 lines).

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

Telephone: 8031 Central.

"All That a Pen Should Be"

Can only be said—and truly said of the "SWAN."

"SWAN" FOUNTPEN

FEATURES ARE:

The very highest grade gold nib in any pen.
Lasts a lifetime. Absolute simplicity.
Instant starting and perfect flow.
Ease of filling and cleanliness.
Full guarantee.

BE SURE YOU GET THE

THE BUSY WRITER'S PEN

PRICES.

10/6, 13/-,
16/6, 20/-,
25/-, 30/-,
45/- to £20.

Swan

Size 1. Full Covered. Hammered, Silver, 42/-; 18-ct. Rolled Gold, 45/-.

Write for Catalogue.

MABIE, TODD & CO., 79-80, High Holborn, London, W.C.

Branches: - 93, Cheapside, E.C.; 95a, Regent Street, W.; 3, Exchange Street, MANCHESTER; and at PARIS, BRUSSELS, NEW YORK, CHICAGO, and SYDNEY.

CHAMBERS'S CYCLOPÆDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by David Patrick, LL.D.

3 vols. cloth, £1 11s. 6d. net.; half mor., £2 5s. net.

A History Critical and Biographical of Authors in the English Tongue from the Earliest Times till the Present Day, with Specimens of their Writing. Illustrated with nearly Three Hundred Portraits.

Mr. Clement K. Shorter, writing in the Sphere says: "I must offer my congratulations to Dr. David Patrick on the production of a book which seems to me to far exceed any previous effort in the way of a complete History of English Literature."

CHAMBERS'S 20th CENTURY DICTIONARY.

1216 pages, 3s. 6d.

Pronouncing, Explanatory, Etymological, with illustrations.

Contains over 100,000 references.

Journal of Education says

"A Miracle of Scholarship and Cheapness."

"IN USE EVERY DAY."

A DICTIONARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE.

REVISED TO 1908.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

It is safe to assert that no set of books will prove more generally useful in every household than the 1908 issue of this world-renowned work, which is a storehouse of information on every conceivable subject.

Glasgow News.

"For speedy reference and satisfactory information on almost any topic, nothing can compare with Chambers's Encyclopædia."

COMPLETE

in

TEN VOLUMES.

Apply to your

Bookseller for Cash Prices.

CHAMBERS'S CONCISE GAZETTEER OF THE WORLD.

Edited by DAVID PATRICK, LL.D.

768 Pages, cloth, 6s. net.

Pronouncing, Topographical, Statistical, Historical.

Pall Mall Gazette says—"For all practical working purposes a thoroughly sufficient and admirable desk companion."

CHAMBERS'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

Edited by DAVID PATRICK, LL.D.

1006 Pages, cloth, 10s. 6d.; half mor., 15s.

Dealing with many thousand Celebrities of all nations, from the Remotest Times to the Present Day; with copious Bibliographies and Pronunciations of the more difficult names.

CHAMBERS'S Large Type ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

Edited by Rev. T. DAVIDSON.

1264 Pages, cloth, 12s. 6d.; half mor., 18s.

A Library Dictionary of the English Language giving the Explanation, Pronunciation and Etymology of Words; together with Compound Phrases, Technical Terms in use in the Arts and Sciences, &c.

STOKES' CYCLOPÆDIA of FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.

Compiled by E. E. TREFFRY.

773 Pages, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.; half mor., 7s. 6d. net.

This volume will prove of immense value to Teachers, Public Speakers, Legal and Literary Men, and Readers generally. Nottingham Guardian says—"We do not know any work of the kind in the market better adapted for every-day use."

Prospectuses on Application to

W. & R. CHAMBERS, Ltd.,

38 Soho Square, London, W.
339 High Street, Edinburgh.

Mines contributed £1,819,000, or 2 per cent. British Funds fell £8,420,000, or 1·1 per cent.; Home Railway Ordinary Stocks £5,082,000, or 1·8 per cent.; American Railroad shares £6,025,000, or 1·3 per cent.; and Foreign Government Stocks £5,060,000, or 0·6 per cent. The valuation is still about £280,000,000 higher than in November, 1907.

BRITISH STOCKS AND PARTIES.

A good deal of interest has been excited by the controversy as to the effects of British Governments upon British stocks. It is hardly necessary to observe that even Mr. Lloyd George himself cannot control the course of business and speculation. But the "Daily Telegraph" has pledged itself to prove that this Government has been at work ruining the credit of the nation and of "our native securities." Our native securities prove to be merely railway companies; for the "Daily Telegraph" illustrates its thesis by the following table:—

	Jan. 1906.	April 29, 1909.	Oct. 20, 1909.
Consols	90½	85	82½
Brighton Def.	130	88½	85½
Chatham First Prefes.	128	68	65
Gt. Central Prefd. Ord.	38	21½	20
Great Eastern	91	64	58
Great Northern Def.	46	44½	40½
Great Western	144	120½	119
Lancashire and Yorks.	110	90	89
Midland Def.	74	57	54½
North-Eastern	146	127	127
North Western	161	137½	130½
South-Eastern Def.	55	54	29½
South-Western Ord.	164	137	131

Strange to say this table has been hailed with tremendous acclamation by guileless journalists all over the country, who forget that British Railways are saddled with an extraordinary number of incompetent directors, that first-class carriages have been emptied by motor-cars, and that the third-class suburban traffic has been badly hit by tramway competition. The downward movement of Consols is partly due to the declining taste for low-interest securities, partly to heavy issues of Irish Land Stock. But figures, as a correspondent of the "Yorkshire Post" says, "are dangerous things to meddle with," seeing that they are definite and exact, and available to any one who wishes to consult them. If the fall in British stocks from 1906 to 1909 is to be attributed to the present Government, then it is only reasonable, argues Mr. Cridland in the letter I have referred to, that we should attribute the fall in Stocks from 1897 to 1906 to the late Government.

The following table shows the decline in Consols and the leading home railways in the ten years from 1897 to 1906, when the Conservatives were in office, and shows what happened to "our native securities" in that period:—

	Average price, 1897.	Average price, Decline, 1906.
Consols	112	88 ... 24
Brighton Deferred	178	121 ... 57
Midland Deferred	95	68 ... 27
G. N. R. Deferred	62	44 ... 18
G. W. R. Ordinary	173	133 ... 40
G. C. R. Preference	75	36 ... 39
India Three per Cent.	110	94 ... 10
Chatham 2nd Pref.	82	57 ... 25
Birmingham 3 per Cent.	114	92 ... 22
Birmingham 2½ per Cent.	100	77 ... 23
Bradford 3½ per Cent.	120	110 ... 10
N. E. R. Ordinary	117	140 ... 37
Bass & Co. 5 per Cent. Preference	151	112 ... 39

Thus it appears that under Conservative management Consols declined 24 points, i.e., three times as many points as they have declined during the present Government, and if the depreciation since 1906 is 50 millions, then the depreciation from 1897-1906 amounted to the enormous total of 150 millions. Some discount must be allowed for the change from 2½ to 2¼ per cent., but Mr. Cridland's table shows how absurd it is to refer the financial depreciation in stocks to the existing Government. If the figures proved anything it might be argued that both the Conservative and the Liberal Government cause a decline of Stocks, and the Socialists might be allowed to try their hand.

The causes of the tremendous fall in Consols between 1897 and 1906 were, of course, the suspension of the Sinking Fund and the huge additions to debt during the Boer War, and the extension of Trustee Securities by Mr. Chamberlain for the benefit of the Colonies.

LUCELLUM.

"..... and I find that the smoking of a pipe of

CHAIRMAN

teaches a philosophy that is well worth knowing. Its fine qualities have a pleasing and soothing effect, minimising the little troubles and difficulties of life. It never obtrudes and it never palls, but, week in and week out, is the one tobacco that gives to most men the greatest pleasure in smoking—a pleasure which only the right tobacco for their palate can give. It is cool—always cool—and burns evenly to the last shred with a rich and pleasing aroma."

BOARDMAN'S

is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER

the same but fuller flavoured.

Most tobaccoists sell them at 6d. per oz. in 1 and 2 oz. packets, and ¼ and ½ lb. tins.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

Check the coming cold

You know, before it definitely grips you, that cold is coming.

If you wait for it to come, you'll have your cold with you its usual time.

But if you prepare to meet it, you'll win.

A coming cold is a cold turned-back if met by a

Mustard Bath

—a bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Try it yourself. And remember for next time.

Colman's mustard

THE BUDGET OF 1909.

SEE

The Economist

OF OCT. 16,

giving a clear summary of the Budget
in Plain English.

OFFICE : Post Free, 8½d.
3, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND,
LONDON, W.C.

Rowntree's Cocoa

has a delightfully rich flavour.
It is delicious.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

Mr. ANDREW MELROSE

HAS JUST PUBLISHED

ROSEMARY'S LETTER BOOK.

By W. L. COURTNEY. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

AN IMPORTANT WORK.

ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

An Essay in Criticism. By LAURIE MAGNUS, M.A., Oxon.
Impl. 16mo, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. (Second Thousand.)

THREE FINE NOVELS AT 6s.

CONFESSIONS TO MY WIFE.

Translated from the French of HENRI DE NOUSSANNE by M. HARRIET M. CAPES.

JOHNNY LEWISON.

By A. E. JACOMB, author of "The Faith of His Fathers."

THE WOMAN TEMPTED ME.

By E. CHARLES VIVIAN, author of "The Shadow of Christine."

3, York Street, Covent Garden, LONDON, W.C.

A POLITICAL NOVEL OF THE HOUR. THE GREAT APPEAL.

By JOSEPH KEATING, Author of "Son of Judith," &c.

"The chief characters under thinly-veiled disguises, are well known in the political and literary world, and the chief incidents of the novel bear a striking resemblance to the rumours of negotiations which are said to be taking place between Cabinet Ministers and ex-Cabinet Ministers and a high authority in the realm. Mr. Keating's prophetic conceptions were so startling that publishers were chary of accepting the novel when it was first offered some time ago."

Daily Chronicle.

LONDON: EVERETT & CO., 42, Essex Street, W.C.

A SELECTION FROM THE LISTS OF A. C. FIFIELD, Progressive Publisher.

6d. each nett. Post free, 7d. each.
(in 1 cloth, 1s. 2d. each.)

TOLSTOY AND HIS MESSAGE. By Ernest Crosby. 7th thousand.
TOLSTOY AS A SCHOOLMASTER. By E. Crosby. 5th thousand.
SAVINGS OF TOLSTOY. Selected by A. C. Fifield. 3d thousand.
MASTER AND MAN. A Story. By Leo Tolstoy. 5th thousand.
WILLIAM MORRIS, Craftsman-Socialist. By Holbrook Jackson.

HENRY GEORGE AND HIS GOSPEL. By Lt.-Col. D. C. Pedder.
ROBERT OWEN, Social Reformer. By Joseph Clayton.
EDWARD CARPENTER, Poet and Prophet. By Ernest Crosby.
RICHARD JEFFERIES, His Life and His Ideals. By H. S. Salt.
BRITISH ARISTOCRACY AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS. By Edward Carpenter.

HOW ARE THE CLERGY PAID? By Dr. T. Bennett.
DISESTABLISHMENT: What it Means. By Dr. T. Bennett.
WHY YOU! MANUSCRIPTS RETURN. By "A Reader."
NO RHEUMATISM: How to Cure Rheumatism, Gout and Lumbago, and Prevent Their Recurrence. By Arnold Eiloart, Ph.D., B.Sc.

WINNING A LIVING ON FOUR ACRES. By Fred. A. Morton.
SOCIALISM AND THE FAMILY. By H. G. Wells. 3rd edition.
SOCIALISM AND RELIGION. Fabian Socialist Series, 1.
SOCIALISM AND AGRICULTURE. Fabian Socialist Series, 2.
SOCIALISM AND INDIVIDUALISM. Fabian Socialist Series, 3.
THE BASIS AND POLICY OF SOCIALISM. Fabian Socialist Series, 4.
THE COMMONSENSE OF MUNICIPAL TRADING. G. B. Shaw. Fabian Socialist Series, 5.
SOCIALISM AND NATIONAL MINIMUM. Fabian Soc. Series, 6.
THE WASTAGE OF CHILD LIFE. Fabian Socialist Series, 7.

1s. each nett. Post free, 1s. 2d.

CLOSER UNION. A Letter on African Problems. By Olive Schreiner.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF INDIAN NATIONALISM. By H. M. Howsin: With an Introduction by DR. RUTHERFORD, M.P.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE. By H. G. Wells. (In the press.)

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE LORDS. By Joseph Clayton.

THE BISHOPS AS LEGISLATORS. By Joseph Clayton.

WHERE MEN DECAY (The Rural Problem). By Lt.-Col. D. C. Pedder.

POVERTY AND HEREDITARY GENIUS. By F. C. Constable, M.A.

LANDHOLDING IN ENGLAND, in Relation to Poverty. By Mary A. M. Marks.

THE CORN LAWS, A Popular History of. Same Author.

SHEAR MY SHEEP, A Social Satire. By Dennis Hird, M.A.

PRISONS, POLICE AND PUNISHMENT. By Edward Carpenter.

HOW I WORK MY SMALL FARM. By F. E. Green. 3rd edition.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
61, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

TOURS.

ALPINE SPORTS LIMITED beg to announce that they have secured the entire accommodation in the following hotels for the winter season for SKATING, TOBOGGANNING, CURLING, SKI-ING and SLEIGHING:—MONTANA PALACE, VILLARS-SUR-OLLON, the seven principal hotels; MORGINS-LES-BAINS, two hotels; ST. BEATENBERG, two hotels; KANDERSTEG, Hotel VICTORIA, WENGEN, four hotels; LENZERHEIDE, Kurhaus; BALLAIGUES, GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE, &c. For illustrated handbook apply to The Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

BOOKS READY AND NEARLY READY.

THE LATE FATHER TYRRELL.

VERSIONS AND PERVERSIONS OF HEINE

AND OTHERS. With a Preface. By GEORGE TYRRELL. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"It needs a poet to translate a poet, and to do the work well . . . FitzGerald owes no apology to Omar. His 'Rubaiyat' is so much finer than all other versions. . . . In a lesser degree the same may be said of Father Tyrrell's posthumous volume of translations from Heine, Sully Prudhomme and others. They have a unique literary value and interest, derived directly from the genius of the translator himself. They bear testimony to the translator's rare skill, and many will welcome the volume quite apart from its conspicuous merits, as throwing a new light on a singularly gifted personality."—Daily News.

THE 'BROTHER LUIZ DE SOUSA' OF VIS-

COUNT DE ALMEIDA GARRETT. Now for the first time done into English, with a Memorial Introduction by EDGAR PRESTAGE. Royal 16mo, 3s. net.

"A dignified tragedy, which excites pity by the simplicity and sadness of its story, and impresses by the lofty Christian idealism which pervades it. The work is here rendered into clear strong English, with an interesting biographical introduction of its author, the greatest of Portuguese romantics."—Scotsman.

PERSONAE OF EZRA POUND. Chicely printed at the Chiswick Press. F'cap 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"The latest voice of the Americas. . . . It is steeped in foreign and Latin essences. . . . Mr. Pound has delighted in mocking the notes of many poets in many climes, he has studied the very economy of words in the 'Divina Commedia.' The result is startling, provocative, and unconventional to a degree, a challenge to the critics, a source of laughter and delight to his fellow craftsmen."—Manchester Guardian.

Nearly ready, uniform with above, 2s. 6d. net.

EXULTATIONS OF EZRA POUND.

New Volumes in the "Satchel" Series. F'cap 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

THE VISION: (Studies of Mysticism). By

MRS. G. HAMILTON SYNGE. With a Photogravure Frontispiece after G. F. Watts, R.A.

AIRY NOTHINGS: Humorous Verse. By JESSIE

POPE. Author of "Paper Pellets."

ROSE AND VINE. By RACHEL ANNAND TAYLOR.

Author of "Poems." Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Ready Monday next.]

A LITTLE FLEET. One of JACK B. YEATS's Books for Children. With 12 Illustrations. F'cap. 8vo, 1s. net. [Immediately.]

MEADOWS OF PLAY (Verses for Children).

By MARGARET ARNDT. With an Introductory Letter by G. K. CHESTERTON. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

GOODCHILD'S GARLAND. By HENRY NEMO.

Royal 16mo, Wrappers, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

London: Elkin Mathews, Vigo Street, W.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No.: GERRARD 1854.

CO-EDUCATION.

SIDCOT SCHOOL, WINSCOMBE, SOMERSET.

FOUNDED 1808.

80 BOYS. 64 GIRLS. Ages 11-18 years.

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

All particulars from Dr. BEVAN LEAN, Headmaster.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroché, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in crimson imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 6 copies for 6s. 6d. post free.

Rev. ALAN BRODRICK, Broughton Gifford Rectory, writes:—"The Bibles are perfect books of art and cheapness."

The London Bible Warehouse, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

Catalogue No. 367. Just Out.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Also a Useful and Comprehensive Catalogue of Current General Literature, Fiction, Science, Art, &c.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance)
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining. Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Tel. phone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BOLTON.

THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOWE, Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Douthwaite

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074

Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.

"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesey.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Proprietor

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy out-door life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers.
Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations.
Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children's Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply, the Principal,
Miss Emily Last, 43a, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

A CHRISTMAS FEAST

Specially prepared by CHARLES DICKENS.

PEARS' ANNUAL 1909.

Contains four Stories specially written for the Christmas Season by CHARLES DICKENS.

- | | |
|-------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| I. DOCTOR MARIGOLD. | III. BOOTS AT THE HOLLY TREE INN. |
| II. GOING INTO SOCIETY. | IV. THE STORY OF RICHARD DOUBLEDICK. |

WITH 22 ILLUSTRATIONS IN TINTS expressly drawn for this Annual by FRANK DADD, R.I., J. C. DOLLMAN, R.I.,
HUGH THOMSON, AND WILL OWEN.

ACCOMPANIED BY

FOUR COLOURED PLATES

EACH IN ABOUT TWELVE COLOURS.

- I. "NAUGHTY BOY! Or COMPULSORY EDUCATION."

By BRITON RIVIERE, R.A.

- II. "IT'S GRAND!
Or UP IN THE CLOUDS."

- III. "OH MY!
Or DOWN IN THE DUMPS."
(A MOST ATTRACTIVE PAIR.)

By WILLIAM HUNT.

- IV. "SOME OF LIFE'S PLEASURES."

By E. G. HANDEL LUCAS.

READY NOVEMBER 22nd, OF ALL NEWSAGENTS.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 6.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	225	Wanted, a Free Trade Cam-	242
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		paign. By Toga ...	242
The Crisis and How to Meet It	228	A Prophecy. By Joshua	243
The Budget Complete ...	229	Brookes ...	243
"Making the Foreigner Pay" ...	230	The House of Lords and the
The Change in the Congo ...	231	General Election. By Arnold
A DE-BALFOURISED HOUSE		Lupton, M.P. ...	243
OF COMMONS. By H. W. M. 232		Radical versus Unionist Land
A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-		Reform. By J. Ellis Barker	243
MAN ON THE ENGLISH		Liberal Women and the
REVOLUTION NOW PEND-		Franchise. By Mackenzie
ING, FROM THE THREAT		Bell, Kate Chandler, and
OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS		A Liberal Journalist ...	244
TO REJECT THE BUDGET.—
III. By H. W. V. Temperley ...	233	POETRY:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		To One Dying in the Cause of
Dialogues of the Dead ...	234	Science. By Habberton
The Attorney of the Terror ...	235	Lulham ...	245
Man and Dramatist ...	237	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	246
A Problem of Police ...	238	REVIEWS:—
ART:—		China in Color Pictures ...	247
Painting's Poor Relation ...	239	An English Salon ...	248
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		Architecture and Evolution ...	248
The Pull Towards the Left in		The Unknown Isle ...	250
Germany. By Ed. Berrstein	240	Faith and its Psychology ...	250
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Variety in Fiction ...	251
Tariff Reform in the United		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
States. By G. G. Green-		The Memoirs of the Duchesse
wood, M.P. ...	241	de Dino, 1831-1835 ...	252
Taxing the Foreigner. By		My Summer in London ...	254
Veritas Vincit ...	242	Saint Teresa of Spain ...	254
Wanted, Details. By Derision	242	A Tramp's Schooling ...	254
		The American Egypt ...	254
		The Monthly Reviews ...	256
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
		Lucellum ...	256

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Budget has passed the House of Commons. On Thursday night Mr. Austen Chamberlain's motion for its rejection on the third reading was defeated by 379 votes to 149, a majority of 230. The Irish Nationalists abstained on the ground that while strongly sympathising with its democratic taxes, the whiskey duties were unfair to Ireland. Only two Liberals—Mr. Bertram and Mr. Whitbread—neither of whom will stand again—voted against the Budget, while three others abstained. The most brilliant of the concluding speeches were those of the Premier and the Chancellor. The latter quoted, with immense effect, a "Campaign Guide" for Tory candidates at the last election, issued in 1904, arguing the whole case in favor of the taxation of site values, and warning Conservatives not to treat such a demand as "robbery." The Prime Minister, in a speech of singular power and breadth of statement, made a marked reference to the threatened action of the Lords. He declared the House of Commons to be the only body which has "any constitutional competence to deal with or regulate our national finances," and concluded that on the question of the "maintenance or the surrender of the ancient constitutional supremacy of this House in matters of national finance" every man on the Liberal side was ready to join issue. Mr. Balfour's note of criticism was piano. He virtually adopted the Budget provisions for income tax, death duties, and super-tax, and only rejected the idea of discriminating between different sorts of wealth, and of inquiry into their origin, as "Socialistic," and likely to interfere with the general "security of property." The speech contained no hint to the Lords in favor of rejection. The chief Liberal Whip has declared that if the Lords throw out the Budget there will be an election in January.

* * *

THE rejection of the measure on the third reading was moved by Mr. Austen Chamberlain in a speech which, though of much ability, disclosed no case for the rejection of the Bill, unless it were the old charge that the land taxes produced little or no immediate revenue. Mr. Chamberlain practically followed Mr. Balfour's plan of barring the taxes on land and liquor, and setting up taxes on imports as their alternative. This device he crystallised in an unlucky phrase, "Let the rich pay according to their wealth, let the poor pay according to their necessities." We should not swaddle ourselves in the theories of a bygone age—what is Protection but a hoary theory?—but spread our net wider and bring in the vast mass of foreign importations.

* * *

To this Mr. Harold Cox made a powerful retort. He declared that, with the exception of the land taxes, he blessed the Budget, insisted that Tariff Reform was not an alternative to Socialism, but a form of it, and added that the Tories were debarred from raising the Socialistic cry by the fact that they had praised the Development Bill, supported old age pensions, and declared that their nostrum was the cure for unemployment. On the point whether the foreigner paid taxes on imports, he made the following conclusive reply:—

"Did they really mean what they said when they told ignorant people that the foreigners were going to pay the taxes? If they meant that, why did they not make the taxes higher? Why were they not proposing to tax raw materials? Was there any alchemy by which they could discriminate and say the foreigner would not pay a tax on something they called raw material and would pay a tax on something they called a manufactured article? Had hon. members opposite ever thought how the foreigner was going to pay these taxes of ours? He was quite sure they had got beyond that very crude phase of political economy which assumed that international commerce was settled by cash. All of them knew that international commerce was an exchange of goods against goods. Therefore, if the foreigner was going to pay our taxes he could only pay them by sending us more goods, or, what amounted to the same thing, by taking fewer of our goods in exchange for his goods. How was that going to increase employment?"

* * *

THE second disappointment of the Opposition was the speech by Mr. Philip Snowden, who, like Mr. Cox, was eagerly expected to pronounce the Budget a piece of unmitigated Socialism. This Mr. Snowden declined to do. He declared that factory legislation and other machinery for the restriction of profit in which the Tories had taken part were no more and no less Socialistic than parts of the Budget, which, on the whole, he pronounced not revolutionary but a "preventive of revolution." He announced the Labor Party's endorsement of it as a fair instrument of social amelioration, and asked Mr. Balfour and his friends not to insult the workman's intelligence by setting up Protection as a cure for unemployment.

THE feature of the second day's debate, after Mr. Ure's exposure of his ungenerous opponent, was the brilliant analysis by Mr. McKenna of Mr. Balfour's economics. Challenged to say whether he thought that the foreigner paid import duties, Mr. Balfour replied that he would pay "some share," and that Professor Marshall admitted this. Professor Marshall's endorsement of this notion is, of course, of the most restricted character. But while Mr. Balfour knows the foreigner's share of such a tax is infinitesimally small, he is constructing a fancy Budget on the theory that it would be very large. As Mr. McKenna put it, the Protectionist Budget is to contain two columns, one showing so many millions from Britishers and the other so many millions from the foreigner.

* * *

THE personal controversy between Mr. Balfour and Mr. Ure has ended in grave discredit to the Unionist leader. On Wednesday night, Mr. Ure, in a speech of remarkable eloquence, which swept his party and almost the entire House away with him, showed, first, that he had accused the Protectionist leaders not of a wilful intention to repudiate their promises to maintain Old Age Pensions, but of want of ability to square their promises with their programme, and, secondly, that the offence of raising the "fears and terrors" of the pensioners had been actually committed by Mr. Balfour, who, in a telegram to the Shropshire electors last year, said that "though the Radicals have promised Old Age Pensions, only the Unionist Party could provide for their payment." Mr. Balfour's answer to a complete exposure was to refrain from an apology and at the same time to substitute for the charge of deliberate lying that of unfair political criticism.

* * *

THIS he founded on a speech of Mr. Ure's at Newbury, declaring that the Unionists had promised Old Age Pensions but never meant to fulfil their promises. But he did not quote the following words, in which Mr. Ure went on to say: "I do not doubt the honesty of his (Mr. Balfour's) intention, but his good intentions will not secure the interest for life of the aged poor." Mr. Balfour's nearest approach to an apology was to say that he had "no personal feeling" against the man whom he had accused of a "frigid and calculated lie." Mr. Asquith, always a loyal colleague, retorted that Mr. Balfour's language was an "outrage on our political life," that Mr. Ure's vindication was complete, and that the House had expected a withdrawal.

* * *

THE intervention in Greek politics of the Military League formed in imitation of the Young Turks culminated last Friday in a burlesque naval mutiny. Commander Typaldos of the torpedo flotilla had taken a leading part in the pronunciamento which resulted in the expulsion of the royal princes from the Greek army. Not content with this success, he last week demanded the wholesale retirement of all the senior captains of the fleet, his own nomination as Minister of Marine, and the re-instatement of a certain Lieutenant Kokorris, who had been expelled from the Navy for insubordination during the Graeco-Turkish war. The Military League refused to follow him in these extravagant demands, denounced him as a madman, and graciously offered to repress his mutiny. He was, however, allowed to leave Athens unmolested and to reach the Bay of Salamis where his squadron lay. He must be a personality of some magnetism, for parts of the crews of most of his vessels followed him at the start, together with a large contingent of junior officers. They contrived to seize the naval arsenal, and prepared to attack the battle squadron. The infantry, however, recovered the arsenal, and the three warships, after some desultory firing which disabled a destroyer, ended the mutiny in twenty minutes.

* * *

MOST of the rebellious officers have since been arrested, but Typaldos and four comrades are still at large. The ugliest feature of the incident lies in the fact that some politicians in M. Ralli's group are suspected of complicity. The ulterior object of the mutineers, after satisfying their personal ambition, was apparently to attempt some adventure in Macedonia or Crete. The condition of the Greek forces is evidently one of abject disorganisation, and the aspect of politics is not more reassuring. The Budget has yet to be passed, and local resistance to the proposed economies will probably make it impossible to carry out the demands of the League for increased military expenditure. There is some talk of the dissolution of the League. A General Election is apparently inevitable, since the Ministry has no majority, and that may be the signal for fresh trouble in Crete, whose inhabitants seem determined to send deputies to Athens. Everything, however, is possible, including even a military alliance with Turkey.

* * *

ON Monday Mr. Burns firmly ruled out of the Housing Bill practically all the crippling amendments inserted in it by the Lords in spite of the protests of the Bishops and of the friends of housing reform. All the amendments increasing the cost and difficulty of acquiring land and of dealing with bad landlords, and almost destroying the town-planning clauses, were excised. The Speaker significantly declared that an amendment which merely altered the incidence of local rating was a breach of the privilege of the House, which "claimed by itself alone to deal with the incidence of rates."

* * *

POLITICAL parties in France are already forming their ranks for the General Election which is due next May. M. Briand's moderate and tolerant speech at Périgueux has brought no appeasement in the perennial conflict with the Church, and he himself was obliged to explain in a speech devoted to a eulogy of the secular schools, that he hoped only for a softening of personal rancours amid the inevitable war of principles. The Bishops have chosen the school as their battleground. They have placed a number of the Republic's text-books on the index, and are endeavoring by pressure on teachers and parents to secure their withdrawal or disuse. The consequence has been a slight revolt among the Radicals against M. Briand's moderation, which used to excite remark even during his Socialist days, and an immediate stiffening of the Government's attitude. Unluckily, as the "Temps" points out, some of these text-books are far from being neutral on points which touch religion; Republicanism is more than a system of government, it is a militant creed. Equally significant was the debate on proportional representation in the Chamber. M. Briand declined to press this reform (to which he is committed in principle) before the General Election, and frankly based his refusal on the ground that the "Republican" majority would suffer under this system of voting in a struggle with the more solid Left and Right.

* * *

THE municipal elections in the country do not accurately reflect the movements of party politics, but on the whole they exhibit no change in the relation of the two main parties, though the Liberals have distinctly gained ground in Lancashire. The Socialist and Labor sections appear to have gone back. In London the so-called "Moderates" or "reformers," who represent the narrowest kind of anti-rate propaganda, have been slightly weakened. The Progressives now hold five boroughs instead of two, and have gained strength in others. On the other hand, the Moderates have won a dramatic victory in Battersea, where the Progressive ranks were divided, and where Mr. Burns, if he would retain his position in politics, must re-ally himself with democratic forces.

* * *

A MORE than usually interesting struggle for the Mayoralty of New York has ended in a result which is, on the whole, a victory for the opponents of Tammany. Tammany clearly feared defeat, for it had chosen as its champion Judge Gaynor, a capable and independent personality with a clean record. He has been elected by 250,000 votes against 177,000 cast for the Republican, and 153,000 for Mr. Hearst, whose relatively large poll, achieved in defiance of both the traditional parties, suggests that he is still a personality to be reckoned with. For the minor offices Mr. Hearst's followers coalesced with the Republicans and carried the anti-Tammany "ticket." The Mayor has indeed large powers of patronage, but if his independence be real, his election in face of the success of Tammany's other opponents will bring little benefit from the material standpoint to those who reckoned on the usual rewards of spoliation. Elsewhere the parties which affect the cause of reform have done badly, notably in Philadelphia and in San Francisco, where the "grafters" of the Schmitz-Rueff school have scored a complete victory.

* * *

THE Prime Minister and Mr. McKenna have published their replies to the letters of Lord Charles Beresford, charging the Admiralty with favoritism and with intimidation of his friends, which he published without waiting for these crushing rejoinders. Their effect is an absolute denial of all Lord Charles Beresford's suggestions, coupled with proof that Lord Charles's specific suggestion that six naval officers declined service with him because they feared ostracism by the Admiralty was entirely unfounded, and that the refusals were due to these officers' desire to qualify for a separate command.

* * *

THE Russian Government is still apparently sensitive on certain points to the pressure of European public opinion. The idea of separating the large province of Viborg from the Duchy of Finland has been for the moment abandoned; it is at all events authoritatively denied. The Cossacks recently introduced into Finland remain none the less to deal with any discontent that may be provoked. There are certainly grounds enough already for alarm. A contribution for military purposes has been laid upon the Duchy by St. Petersburg, and the Finns have properly resented the manner of its imposition. No Finnish party will agree to bear the responsibility for this infraction of their autonomy, and the Government is being carried on by a Senate (Cabinet) of Russianised Finns, most of them admirals and generals. Meanwhile a joint commission on which Russians have a majority is drafting a plan for the management of the "common affairs" of the Duchy and the Empire. It is feared that these common affairs will be so defined as to make the Duma the real legislative body for Finland, and to reduce the Diet to the level of a Zemstvo or County Council. In one form or another there clearly is an intention to return to the Bokrikoff régime. Meanwhile, in Russia itself there are symptoms that the Octobrists are recovering their courage and becoming a little more Liberal—doubtless in response to the successes obtained by the Cadets in the recent by-elections. The reactionary Press, alarmed by this tendency, is once more discussing a dissolution of the Duma, which might be accompanied by a further narrowing of the franchise.

* * *

THE "Daily Chronicle" of Monday published a deplorable medley of journalese, which Mr. Stead, its compiler, called an "interview" with the late Mr. Gladstone on the Budget, and which we can only describe as an outrage on a great man's memory. We deal with this repellent communication elsewhere, but there are one or two questions of fact which require attention. This "interview" was in the form of question and answer, Mr. Stead being the questioner, the supposed answerer being the spirit of Gladstone, and the medium being a man who affected to hear his voice. In addition, a number of questions drawn up by the correspondent of the "Daily Chronicle" were read out "slowly" to Mr. Gladstone. According to the report of the "Chronicle," Mr. Stead entered the "sanctum" in which this thing took place at eleven o'clock on Saturday, and at twelve o'clock he returned to find the doxology sung and the "interview" over. The entire proceedings must have occupied less than an hour, yet the report takes up two columns of small type in the "Daily Chronicle," and Mr. Stead stated that if fully reported, they would occupy three. How is it physically possible for such a dialogue, subject as it was to interruptions, to have been compressed within this period of time, and to what extent was it written up afterwards? We think that the Editor of the "Daily Chronicle" should ask to see the shorthand notes from which Mr. Stead compiled his narrative, and should take an opportunity of cross-examining the two mediums.

* * *

MR. W. P. FRITH, who died, aged 92, last Tuesday morning, had long retired from active work as an artist, but the memory of his achievements has been kept green by the famous "Derby Day" at the Tate Gallery, and by the many reproductions of that work and of the hardly less important "Railway Station" and "Ramsgate Sands." It is, perhaps, a little difficult to realise that the deceased painter was one of the first, as well as about the last, of the Victorian artists of the first half of the last century; yet the "Derby Day" was exhibited at the Academy in 1858, and the "Railway Station" four years later, and Mr. Frith's artistic career was on the wane before the 'seventies dawned. He was singular among popular artists in cherishing no illusions as to the artistic qualities of the work he produced; he made no pretence to the possession of great ideas; and he gently acquiesced in the public verdict, when the men of the new school arose and drew attention from his work to their own.

* * *

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—"Lord Rosebery has just visited Fleet Street with the proprietor of the 'Sporting Times' as his guide. The following was the 'Sporting Times's' bill on the week of its last issue:—

‘MR. BALFOUR
‘PITCHFORKS
‘THE ‘MAN-URE.’

Lord Rosebery might have seen it outside the office of the 'Sporting Times' as he walked along."

Politics and Affairs.

THE CRISIS AND HOW TO MEET IT.

WE hope that the Liberal Party and Press will lose no opportunity during the next fortnight of instructing the country on the meaning of the contemplated rejection of the Budget by the House of Lords. A process of education is essential. A "Constitution" is not a mere thing of sounding brass: it is the guarantee of the liberties of a great nation. But the people of Great Britain have had little or no instruction in constitutional practice. Since 1832, or possibly since 1860, there has been no fundamental conflict of rights between Lords and Commons. We have taken over the powers, to gain which our fathers shed their blood, as if they were an inheritance that none questioned and none could take away. These assumptions disappear on the day when the Lords destroy the Budget. From that moment the issues fought out between the Stuart Kings and the Parliaments in the seventeenth century re-emerge as a visible concrete menace to modern democracy. The question will not indeed be whether the King shall tax the people, or whether they shall tax themselves through their representatives. But most emphatically it will be whether the Lords or the people shall be the taxing authority. If the Commons cease to control this Budget, they cease to control all Budgets, and the object of an annual provision of taxes, carefully maintained in order to secure the taxing power in the hands of the representative body, is destroyed. Swift and widespread confusion, following upon rejection, will attest the fact that the usurpation of the Lords is a blow struck at the centre of the Constitution. Great bodies of taxes are collected on the faith of the supreme power of the Commons in finance, attested by resolutions in which the Lords have borne no part. If the authority for these imports is nullified, and doubt cast upon the whole taxing power of the Commons, it may be necessary to find a sum of about fifty millions. The party which has made a deliberate assault on the trade and employment of its own countrymen, in order to compass a political end, will cheerfully see this sum withdrawn from British industry, and the necessary loan paid for at the rate of even four per cent. With still greater alacrity will they witness the House of Lords called in to set the seal to its own lawlessness. Nothing could be easier than for the Government to obtain from the Lords a Bill of Indemnity for any proceedings necessary to maintain the income-tax and the spirit and tea duties, and generally to restore the interrupted flow of supplies into the British Treasury. But such an application would fasten the financial control of the House of Lords on the British people, and from henceforth no Liberal Budget would be secure from their interference. It is safe to say that the Prime Minister would no more dream of such a surrender than of petitioning the House of Lords to let the Budget through.

We take it, therefore, that if the Lords break the Constitution, they will be ruled out of this controversy from the first, and that no appeal, no recourse, will be made to them. Nor, on the constitutional point, can there be an instant reference to the people. The House of Commons must defend itself, as the Stuart Parliaments defended themselves, by a long series of remonstrances and enactments, from the encroachments of the Stuarts. The Lords will have deposed the Commons from the supreme financial control, just as Charles I. deposed them by the collection of ship-money. They will have violated the Constitution just as much by rejecting the Budget as by amending it, and not the slightest recognition can be made of a deed which in essence, if not in form, is hors de loi. Let us put the case a little more closely. The Lords, in throwing out the financial provision for the year, will bring about in the sphere of finance a state of confusion similar to that which rebellion produces in the entire realm of orderly, normal administration. When law and order are suspended by an act of rebellion, the Executive acts on its own responsibility, in order to produce something like the usual rule of authority. It instructs its agents to act, and when the crisis is over, its action, if it has been bonâ fide, is covered by a Bill of Indemnity. If we apply this parallel to the financial situation, we shall see how powerful is the position of the Commons. It seems likely that their financial resolutions hold good at least to the end of the Session, whether the Lords pass the Finance Bill or not. As far as we know, there exists no record of an appeal against taxes on the ground that they have not been covered by an Act of Parliament—i.e., that the Crown and the Lords have not joined the Commons in a formal act of authorisation. How far the assent of the Lords to a financial measure is necessary at all, and whether their formal yoke could not be slipped with ease off the necks of the British people, is a matter on which much may be said before this controversy closes. Some of the medieval precedents are rather startling, and even Hallam, no friend of democracy, thinks it necessary to record the fact that "it is even said by the Court of King's Bench in the year-book of Edward IV., that a grant of money by the Commons would be binding without assent of the Lords."

But supposing, after that period, and during the General Election, there is a clear danger that the collection of taxes will cease? To that near approach to sheer anarchy will the conduct of the Lords have brought this great commercial community. What is to be done? It seems to us that the House of Commons, following the precedent of the Long Parliament, is bound by some solemn Remonstrance to assert in full its supreme rights in the realm of finance, and its determination to uphold them. But its immediate task must be to make provision for the collection of taxes during the interregnum. We are convinced that this great majority would scout the notion of a humble recourse to the Peers. Can it not avoid so humiliating and perilous an innovation by a fresh recourse to the powerful machinery of Resolutions? It can, we suggest, empower the Executive to continue the collection of all the taxes provided for until a new Parliament can be summoned. Then, it is clear that an Act of Indemnity can be passed, and the formal machinery of the Budget set up afresh. Let not any man say that this is Revolution. The reply is that it is counter-Revolution, and we cannot, for the present, see that a substantial alternative exists. This, or something like it, is the only answer that this House of Commons will consent to make to the deliberate outrage that will have been committed upon it, and upon the form, the spirit, and the age-long understandings of the British Constitution. No Government can stand by and see its revenues ruined. And no House of Commons is going to see the foundations of its power destroyed.

It is clear, indeed, that the argument must proceed a full step further. We are not going to the people on the Budget alone. If the Lords reject the Budget, there will be no rest in this country until the question of the veto is settled. And it is clear that the situation brings into immediate view the necessity of a larger measure of security for democracy than the late Prime Minister endeavored to obtain under his anti-veto resolution. Its terms would be obviously inadequate to the new claims of the Lords in regard to finance. And, as we hope to show in more detail on a future occasion, it will not, we think, be possible to ask a reforming House of Commons to restrict its activities, as the Campbell-Bannerman scheme would restrict them, to the first two years of its life. Democracy will demand fair play for its measures; not a half-life for Radicalism and a free course for Toryism. The struggle we are approaching will test where the ultimate forces in our community reside; and if we win, as win we shall, we shall insist that the years of our humiliation must be over.

THE BUDGET COMPLETE.

THE long struggle in the House of Commons is concluded. The Budget has assumed its final form, and passed through the House of Commons. The tactics of Mr. Lloyd George in opening his mind freely to criticism, in going all possible lengths to mitigate opposition and meet every possible hard case, have imposed on him personally, and on his colleagues with him, immense labor and many difficulties. They have exposed his measure to many dangers, and at one or two points perhaps they have weakened its effect in a way that he and his supporters regret. But in the main they have been justified by triumphant success. The threats of Liberal secession have vanished into smoke, and the "cave" has crumbled into dust. Even Mr. Harold Cox has supported the third reading, and the abstentions from the immense Liberal majority are not worth counting. Politically, the immediate effect has been to revive the fortunes of the Liberal Party and the general confidence in Free Trade finance. It has shown to the world that Liberalism is a living creed, that it has a message of hope for the sufferers from industrial competition, that it knows how to grapple with the forces which year by year have been strengthening their throttling hold upon the life of the nation. It is not, as its critics tell us, a revolution, but it makes possible the beginning of a revolution, which it will take two generations to effect, the revolution which is to reserve the use and enjoyment of Britain to the British.

The changes of form which it has undergone are perhaps some excuse for the critics who still misstate its provisions and caricature its purposes and scope. How far sheer mistakes still go may be seen in such an article as that of Lord Avebury in the "Nineteenth Century and After," and how easy it is to caricature and distort may be judged by comparing Lord Avebury's article with that of Mr. Mallock which immediately follows it. While Lord Avebury is crying revolution on the text of the Land Taxes, Mr. Mallock is demonstrating that the said Land Taxes will bring in a sum "which is not seldom exceeded by the State or by private collectors in the purchase of a single picture." If the total increment were so small an affair as Mr. Mallock imagines we may be sure that we should have heard less outcry upon the tax. But, to be sure, we must allow something for the bewildered state into which the man of property falls when he sees the taxgatherer approaching. It is only this state of mind which explains Lord Avebury's quite inaccurate description of the Budget proposals. In face of the plainest provisions to the contrary, he will have it that agricultural values are to be taxed. He states nakedly that the "undeveloped land duty" falls on all land of more than £50 annual value, and that the exemption only applies to the increment tax. If he had read his own proof carefully before printing he would have seen the admission that in assessing the value of undeveloped land all purely agricultural value is to be deducted, and this applies whether the total value exceeds £50 or not. He complains again that the necessary expense of valuation will be such a burden as in some cases to leave little to the existing owner, while he should know that the expense of valuation has been taken over by the Government. He sheds tears over a company whose land has deteriorated in the twelve years since they purchased it, on the ground that if they now begin to make a profit it will be taxed as unearned increment—wholly losing sight of the provision which enables them to take the highest price of the last twenty years as the "original value" from which increments are to be reckoned.

Of such are the defenders of privilege. Let us turn from them to measure in a few words the achievement and the promise of the Finance Bill. Its first and clearest work is to vindicate Free Trade finance as a possible basis of Social Reform. It shows that the increased expenditure that has been and will be necessitated by the rising standard of collective responsibility—the crusade against poverty, the extension of education, the improvement of city life, the development of national resources—can go forward without imposing taxes on the necessities of life, which would take from the poor with one hand what is given them with the other. It has thus saved the Free Trader from his non possumus attitude and shorn Tariff Reform of half its glamor. Beyond this it has laid down a new principle of finance in three distinct applications. It has marked out the surplus of wealth as the source of National Revenue. The principle is applied first and most simply in the super tax, the justification of which is that the great incomes from five thousand a year upwards are serving no function in the economic order which is in the least degree proportioned to their magnitude. To hear men ramble on about taxes on industry and discouragement of legitimate thrift when it is a question of sixpence in the pound on the revenues of a millionaire, is to learn a lesson in the way in which terms can be misapplied. Industry is not encouraged by the accumulation of enormous wealth in a few hands. It is depressed and discouraged by it, and the whole standard of life is vitiated by luxury, ostentation, frivolity, extravagance, and the overweening insolence of enormous power. But the super-tax rightly applies only to the greatest wealth.

The second application of the doctrine is to the case of State-created monopoly value, and we know that, after all the sound and fury which the land taxes have caused, it is the silent but more determined hostility of the Brewers which is to fix the resolve of the House of Lords. The Liquor interest has grown rich on the degradation of the millions, and on the monopolies which the State has created, not by its own industry, sagacity, energy alone, not by the exercise of those qualities on which industrial progress depends, and which no wise financier will stifle, but by the enjoyment of the special grace afforded by legislation, the reform of which is long overdue. The brewers have defeated the attempt to save their best customers from them. They will have to yield at least a moiety of the profits which they derive from their position of vantage.

The third application is to the partial monopoly of land, and here the principles established are of more importance than the immediate results that will flow from them. They are, first and in practical result greatest, that the landlords' game of double valuation will have to be abandoned. Hitherto there has been one value for taxation, and quite another when land was required for any public purpose. By these means landlordism has been enabled to throttle public enterprise while contributing insufficiently to public needs. In future, the public body requiring land for building, recreation, small holdings, or other purposes of public utility will buy at the price at which the land is rated and taxed. No more great owners will be enabled to sell to public bodies for hundreds or thousands of land rated at tens of pounds. One of the keys of the economic empire is withdrawn from private hands and placed in public keeping. Next, the artificial withholding of land is done with. The profit is gone as soon as the market value is the basis of taxation. From that time onwards, if the owner desires greater profit he is free to seek it, but meanwhile he pays for the privilege. Lastly, in principle, it has been laid down that the proper type of unearned wealth, the yearly accruing increment in value of sites which owe all to the industry of the public and the order and government maintained at the ratepayers' expense, should pay its quota to the public purse. The principle has been largely qualified in its application by exemptions and concessions. But it is there, and in potency of development it perhaps stands above all the rest. Such is the Finance Bill, such are its principles and the hopes of a new movement of social regeneration which it holds out. There is "one fight more, the best and the last," before the Government and the party, but if they will fight it through, "the barriers will fall," not to the Finance Bill alone, but to the whole moving array of democratic legislation.

"MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY."

WHEN the Free Trade politician roundly asserts that the consumer pays the import duties, he is sometimes confronted with statements from economic text-books which suggest that under certain circumstances the foreigner can be made to pay. The discovery of such a passage in Adam Smith or J. S. Mill is treated as a triumphant vindication of the protective policy. Of course it is no such thing, but merely an instance of the formal inconsistency found everywhere between the precise treatment of the theorist and the looser though substantially correct treatment of the practitioner. Your economic theorist likes to play with the nicer intricacies of such a matter as the incidence of taxation. Not content with presenting the contour of the coast with its larger gulfs and promontories, it delights him to explore each creek and headland, and to open up quite unsuspected points of view. He will show you how a certain river flows for quite a distance inland from the sea, and how some elevated tableland is richer and more fertile than the neighboring valley. It is the nature of the creature to qualify his general truths by over-emphasis upon exceptions; for anyone can see the former for himself, but it takes a specialist to find the latter. So the pride of intellectual property disposes the economist to dwell over-much on the rare instances in which the foreigners may pay the tax.

Wherever the imported article is a monopoly, or is produced abroad under such conditions of restricted competition as to enable the exporter to "command his own price," the import duty, or a part of it, may fall on him. For in such a case it may be assumed that the price he has been charging is higher than is necessary to induce him to supply the article, being fixed by him at the highest figure he can safely ask without losing or damaging his market. If an import duty is put upon this monopoly of scarcity price, it will not usually pay him to raise his price so as to throw the tax on to the consumer, for, if he could have safely asked the higher price before, he would have done so. A direct tax imposed upon a monopoly price will lie there, and will be borne by the owner of the commodity in question. Nor need an article be an absolute monopoly to bear, in part at least, such an import duty; it suffices that the article is produced under such conditions as enable the exporter to earn a higher profit than he would consent to do the trade for. It is thus arguable that an import duty of a penny a gallon upon imported petroleum oil would be borne by Mr. Rockefeller and his Standard Oil Company, while an ad valorem duty upon diamonds would (except for facility of smuggling), be paid in large part by de Beers.

Extending this reasoning, one may admit that wherever the whole or a large part of a foreign trade with this country is earning for the foreigners who conduct it a rate of profit above the market or competitive rate in their country, that import trade would bear a portion of any import duty imposed by this country. Even where there existed apparently free competition among foreign producers which kept profits low, if most of the produce was raised under conditions which afforded "rent" to the foreign landowners, some payment of the import duty might lie on this if the foreign Government neglected its fiscal opportunities. That is to say, some of the foreign wheat or other produce would come in just the same if it procured a smaller net price than before. In the case of England, Mr. Russell Rea, in a keen controversy conducted some time since in the "Westminster Gazette," showed that the actual fraction of a duty upon foreign wheat borne by the foreigner must be extremely small, and that "practically" the whole of the tax would be paid by the English consumer. The general theory is this: that foreign goods produced under ordinary competitive conditions could not and would not bear any portion of an import duty. This would cover virtually the whole of the manufactured goods and the food supplies which the Tariff Reformers intend to tax if they can get the chance.

Fortunately, however, the plain citizen is not required to focus his intelligence upon the delicate work of tracing the detailed incidence and shifting of import duties. Commercial experience does this for him, and registers clear and simple results. You ask whether an English tariff can make the German manufacturer pay the duty. The question may be answered by ascertaining whether a German tariff makes the English manufacturer pay the duty. Here is the experience of a large English house engaged in foreign trade. "THE DUTY IS ALWAYS PAID BY THE FOREIGN PURCHASER—We always get as good prices for goods for export as for those sold at home." Another house dealing in machinery testifies to the same effect. "We deliver machinery for abroad at the English port, charging the customers with cost of packing and railway rates. Beyond this we do not go, as all shipping, insurance, and duties are paid by our customers, and we do not in any way mix ourselves up in these extraneous costs." A house exporting machinery abroad says, "We charge the same price to an American buyer, who, in addition, has a high duty to pay, as we do to a Dutch buyer, who has none." Finally, we may quote a large export house, which sums up its own business experience as follows: "The question of the duties of the various foreign markets does not affect our profit at all, but simply makes our goods so much dearer to the actual consumer."

These passages are taken from a long array of testimony gathered at first hand by Mr. Jackson, of Northampton, who used them with crushing effect in debating the issue of "making the foreigner pay." If any doubt remained as to the payment of import duties by the consumer, it would be removed by the explicit admission of the German Government in a memorandum (1902) upon the price of wheat, as affected by protective duties. The German Government makes no pretence that the foreigner pays, frankly stating that "Inland prices are raised, so far as a consideration of the last ten years will allow us to judge, in proportion to the duties," a statement corroborated by the fact that when a German merchant re-exports wheat on which an import duty has been paid, his Government refunds the whole of that duty. It would hardly do this if the foreigner paid any part of the duty.

Such testimony, not constructed for Free Trade purposes, but furnished by English business firms, and by experience of Continental and American protection, must be considered absolutely conclusive by any open-minded person. If the qualifications suggested by economic science have any practical validity, it must be so small as to be negligible in the world of business experience. Whether the import duties are placed upon goods, raw materials, or manufactured goods, it remains true that the consumer pays. One final consideration we would, however, present to our Protectionists. (Suppose the foreigner did pay, what form would his payment take? He would not pay in foreign gold, for few foreign countries produce gold, we do not want foreign gold, and in point of fact foreign exchange is not transacted in that form. If the foreigner did directly pay, his payment would take shape in foreign goods, the very things our Protectionists say they want to keep out. If the foreigner did not pay the duty by actually sending us more foreign goods than before, he must pay it by receiving from us less British export goods than before. Thus the Tariff would inflict a direct blow upon our export industries. In such a tangle of absurdities does the illogic of Protection leave its votaries.

THE CHANGE IN THE CONGO.

FOR the first time since the agitation against King Leopold's misrule in the Congo began, it is possible to register the promise of reform with a certain tempered satisfaction. That has happened for which Sir Edward Grey bade us wait. M. Renkin, the new Minister, has returned from his visit to his Colony, and he has laid before the Belgian Chamber a scheme of changes which impresses even so competent and unsparing a critic as M. Vandervelde as hopeful. M. Renkin's speech as a whole does not impress us favorably. It began with a defence of the past, and it went on to defend in theory the most monstrous of all King Leopold's claims—the assertion on behalf of the Imperial State of a property in all the produce of Congo forests. This preface none the less led up to a sweeping project of reform, and to an abandonment in practice of the pretension which he upholds at law. Throughout that portion of the Congo directly under the control of the State, including the old Crown Domain, the natives are to be "granted" the right to take the produce of the soil. The concession, it is true, will be gradual and dilatory, and will not be completed over the whole of this territory before the mid-summer of 1912. Of the fate reserved for the still more unfortunate natives who inhabit the vast areas conceded to companies we know nothing as yet. Experience, moreover, has taught us that general principles enunciated in Brussels must be tested by their application on the spot. But it would be churlish and uncandid to refuse to recognise, as M. Vandervelde does, the face value of this promise. It is the central reform which the friends of the natives have demanded through all the years of this unflagging agitation. It will destroy, where it is honestly executed, the whole basis of King Leopold's system of slavery. In the past the native was a rubber-collecting machine, compelled to pass one-third or even two-thirds of every year in gathering for his white exploiters the produce of the forests which he regarded so lately as his own. He could not trade, for he had nothing to sell. He worked under an unflinching brutality, which the worst plantation-slavery hardly equalled. His white masters were themselves mere collectors, and the time which remained to him after their greed for rubber was satisfied was spent in growing food for their native soldiery. On paper all this will be changed. Henceforward the rubber will belong to him who collected it. The possibility of trade begins. There will be an economic stimulus to labor. The lash will tend to become obsolete, and what is left of the decimated population will gain an object and a hope in life. Taxation at last is to be placed on a money basis, and the corvée of food supplies will be abolished. To judge of these reforms we need one detail further. Comparatively little will have been gained if, while the native regains the right to sell the produce of the soil, the State retains the effective monopoly of purchase. The liberty of trade will be a worthless privilege if the State as sole purchaser may fix a conventional price.

We are the more disposed to regard these reforms as probably genuine, because we are convinced that they are rather a capitulation to an economic necessity, than a spontaneous surrender to justice and reason. Several volumes have appeared recently on the question of the Congo. Some are by writers who claim no firsthand knowledge. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has produced in "The Crime of the Congo" (Hutchinson & Co.) a passionate and capable re-statement of the familiar case for reform, which is likely to have a wide circulation and to exert an immediate influence. It is carefully documented, and it represents the facts as they appear to a candid and humane mind, which has pieced the evidence together from the records of other witnesses, under the spur of a just indignation. But when one compares it with the first-hand impressions of M. Vandervelde after his recent tour in the Congo ("Les derniers jours de l'Etat du Congo"), an important difference emerges. The two pictures do not materially differ. It is the same oppression and the same cruelty which both describe. But there is more shading and perspective in M. Vandervelde's landscape. He has seen a little good in the colossal evil. He has met some honorable officials among the mass of the callous, the under-paid, the over-worked, the ignorant, the merely rascally. But there is a subtler difference than this. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Mr. Morel always describe for us a system so bad that it ought to be destroyed. M. Vandervelde describes a system so bad that it is visibly falling to pieces. His deliberate conclusion formed in October of last year was that forced labor no longer paid. The natives had long since been driven to the utmost limit of their strength. Coercion could produce no more. The worst atrocities could no longer be practised upon them with impunity. The sympathy of some white residents had encouraged them to resist. The forests, moreover, had been over-exploited, and no longer yielded the old returns. The local agents had themselves realised that the game was up, and were the first to call for free labor. A point had been reached even a year ago at which slave labor even in the Congo had manifestly become dear labor. It is not his own humanity, nor yet public opinion, whether in Belgium or in Great Britain, which has forced M. Renkin to accept reform. The enormous oppression has broken down by its own weight. M. Renkin has surrendered to facts. We are inclined to suspect that King Leopold must have made this discovery even earlier. He must have realised that he had sucked his blood-orange dry, before he decided to fling the skin to Belgium.

The real problem which confronts the Belgian people is at last opening out before them. They were led to believe that they were acquiring an investment of incalculable commercial possibilities. The first Budget of the new Colony demands an "extraordinary credit" of £1,320,000. And that will be only the first of a long series. It was MM. Vandervelde and Lorand who knew the truth before the annexation. Justice costs something, even when it is obligatory and belated. Nor is this the end. If the Colony is to be capably administered, it must be prepared to pay for white agents and officers of a type much more costly than the ne'er-do-weels whom King Leopold exploited only a little less unmercifully than the blacks. It remains to be seen how a thrifty little nation, almost indifferent to the sentimental joys of Imperialism, will face these new demands. Above all, we must wait to see whether Belgium will be bold enough to dispossess the concessionaire companies, or scrupulous enough to buy them out. The problem is as anxious and uncertain as ever, despite the dawn of a sudden hope. The need for a vigilant diplomacy on our side and an active public opinion behind it was never clearer. The utmost efforts of such writers as Mr. Morel and Sir A. Conan Doyle, the most resonant demands from the leaders of the churches, cannot go too far, if Belgium is to be encouraged to advance swiftly and with resolution on the path which she now has entered. It would be a mistake to ignore the new departure, or to deny this evidence of good intentions. It would be a still worse mistake to relax the pressure of honest and disinterested criticism.

A DE-BALFOURISED HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY MORNING.

THE somewhat tame ending of the long debate on the Budget must be taken in connection with the vehement emotions of the preceding night. The House had exhausted itself over "the famous case of Mr. Ure," and could only exhibit a pale reflection of its passion over that exciting episode. Personalities make up three-fifths of the drama of politics, and the spectacle of one of its members, a Minister, but a retiring, and, having regard to his great abilities, a humble man, on his defence on a charge of personal dishonor, obscured for a moment the national controversy. But only for a moment. By the consent of all men Mr. Ure's vindication made one of the most brilliant and moving incidents in Parliamentary history. No one guessed that such forces resided in the rather demure figure of the Lord Advocate. His oration—for such it was—was no ordinary House of Commons success. It utterly overwhelmed his assailant, the most admired figure in the theatre in which Mr. Balfour plays so many parts. Its energy of statement and argument, its persuasiveness, its power of displaying and arousing emotion, and above all, its complete sincerity, won the entire House, almost irrespective of party quarrels, and when the speech closed, it looked to Mr. Balfour for an apology. He failed it. Beneath his mask of intellectual toleration, of gracious manners and personal elegance, an ungenerous controversialist not infrequently appears. Instead of confessing that the charge of calculated lying was absurd, and making appropriate amends, Mr. Balfour preferred to set up a reduced and shabby version of his odious indictment, advanced with such ruthless violence. He did so with every appearance of physical and moral discomfort. The enraged Ministerialists did not spare him, and his own party were too surprised and uneasy to protect him. When the Prime Minister followed—with an unsparing and most impressive castigation—the cup of the offender was full, and the chastened meekness of Thursday night's speech reflected the discomfiture of the earlier encounter.

For Mr. Ure's speech administered a serious and, at this moment, a specially damaging blow to Tariff Reform. It showed how bare was the cupboard which was supposed to conceal a mighty hoard of untouched wealth. How is Tariff Reform to provide for our sixteen or twenty million deficit? Mr. Ure showed that a very few millions might conceivably be squeezed out of this "dry cow" by—1915. Mr. Balfour himself made no attempt to set up a more hopeful theory of the resources of a nostrum in which he obviously has no belief. He reiterated, in his closing speech, his adherence to most of the immediately fruitful taxes imposed by the Budget. To them, should he scramble back to office within the next year or so, he will clearly look for his main revenue, setting up a feeble and dilatory form of inquiry and taxation. He knows his difficulties. He knows that the foreigner will pay little or nothing. And if he spoke his whole mind, I do not believe that it would reveal a single objection of weight to the Budget.

In this state of enfeeblement and doubt, therefore, is the great Tory Party and its leader going to their débâcle. When I last haunted the House of Commons I left Mr. Balfour fencing with his own party. On Thursday I found him still engaged in that unprofitable task. He is being hurried by hotheads, incapable of clear thought in politics, to a ruinous conflict, in which his curious courage in emergencies may avail him somewhat, but for which he has no inclination. The Prime Minister, in a pungent sentence, said that it was still impossible to say whether Tariff Reform commended itself to Mr. Balfour's conscience, and intellect, and judgment, and tactics. But it was hardly doubtful, after his closing speech, that the liquor-Protectionist plot to destroy the Budget by way of the House of Lords commended itself to none of these rather mixed categories in Mr. Balfour's personality. Direct "signalling" to the Lords, it could not indeed, contain. That would have been an insult to the House of Commons, almost a breach of its privileges. But Mr. Balfour's halting recital of the demerits of the Budget furnished no shadow of a case for rejection. Five-sixths of it he adopted. Of the remaining sixth he spoke in terms of strictly measured disparagement. It might be a sort of a kind of a Socialism. It might, in the great competitive world-conflict, mysteriously affect our predominance by touching the security of property. All this without a note, a touch, of conviction. "Without my will, against my will," it seemed to say.

And with what instruments is the Tory Party going in to compass the break-up of the Constitution? As it was in 1905, so it is in 1909, only weaker. The Liberal Parliamentary forces remain at the height of their power. In debate they completely overtop their opponents, their chief dominates the House of Commons with singular effects of intellectual mastery, and the vivid genius of his chief lieutenant has secured them the control of the political situation. Their future is assured through the rising power of debaters of the quality of Mr. Simon, whose speech easily outshone that of Mr. F. E. Smith, the chief Tory recruit of promise. The case for Free Trade was put last night by a great Liberal capitalist of the type of Sir Charles McLaren with a liberality of view and a knowledge of industrial forces which made the elementary confusions of amiable Protectionists like Mr. Renwick look not a little ridiculous. I never remember seeing the party more thoroughly and powerfully equipped for a great conflict. The Budget has not disunited it. It has enormously increased its moral force and its popular energies. And even the very measured critical voice of Liberal Moderates will swell the universal chorus of determined wrath and repudiation which will greet the coming assault on the privileges of the House of Commons and the liberties of the British people.

H. W. M.

A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-MAN ON THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION NOW PENDING, FROM THE THREAT OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.

III.

FURTHER GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

IN a constitution that is historic and unwritten, and therefore to some extent fluid and adaptable, changes do not necessarily bring that shock to institutions, which is produced by derangements of machinery in written constitutions. None the less, if changes are to be made they should be along established lines, should be extensions of principles already admitted, projections of lines already drawn. The newly usurped power of the House of Lords in vetoing ordinary legislation cannot claim this defence, it is a reversion to a condition prior to 1832, a reaction to the past, not an evolution for the future. But, recognising the changes introduced by democratic conditions, the advisability of strength in the second chamber, and the like, I should not be myself inclined seriously to attack this new question of power by the Upper Chamber, if that chamber were to recognise that there were limits beyond which that power could not extend, that there were arcana of the constitution it must not approach, precedents it must not tear up, and age-long customs it must not violate.

The great danger in all democracies is a certain instability and fickleness; a crowd is swayed by passions, by fevers, which inflame its blood quickly, and drive it to hasty acts without reflection. By the system at present in vogue, the Lords, by deliberate rejection of Bills, can force a dissolution at any time, can play on popular fickleness, and exploit the elements of disorder at will. This is one of those grievances which is intolerable but which must be borne. No one ever denied the Lords the right to reject ordinary Bills, yet, by an unscrupulous use of this right, they can produce a referendum at will, and undermine the strength of the representative chamber. All that is bad enough, but if they are to extend this principle, and submit finance to the judgment of the hustings, they undermine not only the strength, but the existence of the representative chamber, and they destroy the spirit of the Constitution. As the Lower Chamber is based on finance, is born with finance, so must it die with finance. Once its financial judgment is overthrown, its findings questioned, its accounts revised at the polling-booths, its power ceases to exist. Finance is peculiarly the sphere of a lower representative assembly, from a question of expediency in modern, just as in medieval, England. The inherited tradition, the gathered force of the prescription which hangs over this custom, ought not to be lightly dissipated or trivially cast aside. The whole spirit of the constitution must be lost if such a custom is to be dissolved on the fiat of an irresponsible assembly.

The proposal to reject the Budget, in order to secure a mandate from the people, is equally condemned on the grounds of history, of precedent, and expediency. The first legacy of the Middle Ages was to give us a Lower House supreme in finance, the second to give us one in large measure independent of the people. That independence was not only maintained, but increased, between 1688 and 1832, so that the Lower House became little less than absolute, almost a tyrant, restrained occasionally but freely from above by the Lords, cowed spasmodically and fiercely from below by the people, usually in the sinister shape of a London mob. This state of things came to an end in 1832; from henceforward the influence of the people operated as a moderating and restraining force upon the excesses of the Lower House, whilst the control of the Upper Chamber was practically withdrawn. A new period opened in 1884, and since then the Lower House has been compelled—at need—to yield its legislation to the dictates of the Upper Chamber, or of the people as a whole. But though the Lower Chamber has declined in importance, since the advent of democracy, it has never abrogated the privilege of occasionally asserting its independence of the people, or anticipating or contradicting their wishes. That attitude is in the highest degree admirable, for a representative chamber which has no independence has no reason for existence. If it merely exists to interpret the popular will, direct and not representative democracy ought to be substituted. Now that independence has of late been clipped in all directions, partly by the Lords, partly by the people as a whole, till it remains in only one direction, in finance. Questions of finance seldom have been popular, and never are intelligible to vast masses, and the doctrine of a mandate for finance has never yet been raised. The Death Duties of 1894 were not fought at the polls, and the Budget of 1909 ought not to be. Finance is now the only matter in which electors confide in their representatives, and this privilege is to be wrested from them by the peers. Think for a moment of what this proposal means—it implies a revolution of colossal magnitude, which involves the destruction of representative government. You yourself have often told me how much you valued independence in a Member of Parliament; now you are deliberately destroying it. By your advocacy, financial questions—which, you have often assured me, half the parliamentary representatives do not understand—are to be brought forward to a multitude of voters, whose intelligence cannot possibly comprehend them. On broad questions of domestic policy, the people as a whole are necessarily now become the best judges; but on nice questions of taxation they are with equal necessity the worst. But all this argument may be described as argument from expediency. It is true that it is argument also from history. That there should be a retention of financial independence and control to the Commons, as against peers and people, now that their other powers have diminished so much, is indeed as evident a deduction from history, for if there is not this retention, on what can the historic continuity, independence, or importance of the Commons now rest? It is true, also, that there is the argument of expediency, that it is not wise for the House of Peers to send the accounts presented to them by the Commons to the audit of mobs, and to the decision of crowds. But there is a larger argument than either of these, a nobler appeal to history, a more powerful logic of expediency.

As has so often been said here and elsewhere, England's Constitution rests not upon written letters. The Constitution and the spirit informing it resemble a consumptive on the Riviera; take him away from that atmosphere and altitude, and he pines and gradually dies. Keep him there and he has the vigor and manhood of full health. So it is with the Constitution; destroy the spirit and you destroy the Constitution with it. More, you not only destroy but you can never revive it. Another thousand years must pass by, before we gain such an atmosphere and breathe such an air. Now, what is so calculated to destroy these impalpable conventions, these invisible essences, these unwritten laws as a constant reference of them to the polling-booths? The Lords have only to wait their opportunity to submit the most fragile and least intelligible of these customs to the most broad and untrained of judgments, at the polling-booth. The broad principles, supremacy of Parliament over King, of numbers over rank, and the like, the people can fairly and ought certainly to judge, but on these delicate matters—these extreme technicalities involved in finance—their decision can never be satisfying and must always be dangerous. But there is worse than this to come, for now every traditional custom, every Constitutional understanding, can be dragged out to the light and debated in the heat, at the bidding of the House of Lords. This is a revolution—the like of which has never been in England, or indeed in any land. Where Constitutions have been written, they have never been fought at the polls, details have been worked out by experts in committee, and the entire Constitution as a whole has usually been submitted to popular vote and thus decided. Nothing like what the Lords propose to do has ever yet been done in any civilised country, that is, that detailed points of a Constitution's working should be settled by popular vote. With a written Constitution the evil of this process would be less, because the details, being framed by modern experts, may be intelligible to modern men. With an unwritten one the exact contrary is the case; to modern men much of the parliamentary procedure is neither intelligent nor intelligible. Much of the parliamentary and Constitutional procedure appears irrational, much absurd to those who are without complete mastery of its working; the whole is a fragile machinery adjusted, with infinite care, to delicate tasks, by the gathered experience of ages. The results of a suspension of all this engine by unskilful hands must be disaster. Not only will the institutions themselves be injured in their working or checked in their development, that would be the least of the evils involved. The real evil is the introduction of a principle of change, the threat of submitting everything at a moment's notice to an unskilled judge. An unwritten Constitution abides by stability, by understanding, by good feeling, and by delicacy, and by these only can it stand. By these things also stands the Upper Chamber more than any other institution in the State. It owes its position, its members owe their coronets and their seats, to the principle of stability, to the hatred of unwise change, to the toleration of what is old, that the Constitutional spirit has inculcated. Let the Lords then beware, if their principle is to submit every Constitutional convention to the polls and to try it there by common sense, let them remember that they are the Constitutional convention which must one day be submitted to that tribunal. The courtiers, who revived impeachment before the Commons, themselves perished by that process, and, in the same way, the Lords, who impeach Constitutional customs before the people, will end by being impeached before that tribunal. Their end will but then be regretted, because they, whose immemorial office has been to guard tradition and precedent, will have been the first to trample on it, and they, who sought their own advantage most, will have found it the least.

H. W. V. TEMPERLEY.

(To be concluded.)

Life and Letters.

DIALOGUES OF THE DEAD.

THERE is a quaint little scene in Lewis Carroll's "Sylvie and Bruno," of which Mr. W. T. Stead's latest development of the art of interviewing forcibly reminds us. The child Bruno announced his intention of performing Shakespearean tableaux. His first character was King Richard. He came upon the stage, shouted "My kingdom for a horse," and vanished incontinently, turning a somersault. The formula might serve as a model for most of the recorded spiritualistic interviews with the great dead. There is always some familiar tag, some reminiscence from the mundane life of the great departed, and equally inevitable is the somersault at the end. A ghost of Disraeli must always say "Peace with Honor," or "Imperium et Libertas," and the chances are that he will take his exit playing diabolò. A ghost of Shakespeare is not authentic unless he announces that "All the world's a stage," and the odds are that he will vanish strumming on a concertina. Up to a certain point Mr. Stead's interviews with Gladstone and Cardinal Manning conform to the recognised type. Cardinal Manning came in with a "Pax Vobiscum." That is as it should be. Mr. Gladstone began with a message drafted in two massive sentences which occupied between them a quarter of a column. That could hardly be bettered. The only disappointment to us, we confess, was that the somersaults were unaccountably omitted. Mr. Stead, however, is artist enough to know that the blue pencil is the soul of an interview.

It is, we believe, an article of faith among the adherents of spiritualism that they are advancing by these methods to some new and exalted phase of civilisation, that they are developing with the aid of mediums, hysterical or fraudulent, or both, and darkened cabinets, a sixth sense, and taking their stand in "the fifth dimension." The whole movement rather impresses us as a violent return to savage life. Its prophets and its teachers, its dupes and its exploiters, are "rattling into barbarism." We are satisfied that thought-transference in some at least of its many forms is a genuine phenomenon, worthy of study and likely to yield valuable data for psychological theory. But so far from being the ideal means of communication between developed minds, we suspect that it is rather a relic from a stage of human or sub-human life before the evolution of the intellect, and before the full adaptation of speech to the needs of communication. One might even go on to hazard the conjecture that it may be through some species of "thought" transference that the higher animals succeed in maintaining some misty interchange of images and desires among each other, and contrive, as dogs and cats occasionally seem to do, to divine our intentions towards themselves. Nothing, indeed, could have been more reminiscent of the habits of savages than this idea of Mr. Stead's of consulting the shade of Gladstone on the eve of the Budget fight. In certain tribes that sort of ritual is almost obligatory on such occasions. No self-respecting clan would go marauding without this indispensable precaution. One need not dwell on Homeric parallels nor follow Saul to the Witch of Endor. The annals of Red Indian tribes show the practice in its fullest development. One Alexander Henry was the witness of a séance of this kind among the Hurons in the year 1750. The tribe wanted to know whether or not they should make peace with the Whites. They built a magic wigwam, and invoked the spirit of a redoubtable warrior who rejoiced in the name of Grand Turtle, "the chief who never lied." The wigwam was shaken, there was a hullabaloo of noises and the sound of many voices, from which that of Grand Turtle gradually disengaged itself. He went off in due course to reconnoitre the enemy, and came back with news which proved to be at once satisfactory and accurate. The present writer once happened upon traces of an even more startling consultation in a Balkan village. It was on the eve of an insurrection. The peasants had met by order in the churches, and the revolt was about to be proclaimed. When mass was over, an uncanny voice from behind the altar-screen was heard announcing that He was the founder of the Christian religion, and that it was the duty of all His followers to make an end of the Turks. A phonograph, so said the enemy, was seen about the same time in the same neighborhood. It was Mr. Stead's purpose to obtain from some august source a war-cry for the Budget. It was a commendable moderation which induced him to be satisfied with so little. It only remains for the Navy League to call up King Alfred, and for the Tariff Reformers to produce an authentic recantation of Free Trade from the spirit of Richard Cobden. Mankind has so many Grand Turtles to choose from.

Mr. Stead's dialogue with the dead is a poor performance from an artistic standpoint. Lucian and Lancelotti have worked much better in the same medium. The thing begins with a labored effort to imitate the Gladstonian style. The sentences are very long and very involved. But the phrases quite lack the distinction of the great exemplar. This effort, we are naively told, was produced over-night by "automatic" writing. It certainly smells of the lamp, but, on the other hand, we have rarely encountered writing which was so obviously conscious. In the hurried morning séance the effort to talk Gladstonese was frankly abandoned. Mr. Stead and the ghost converse through a couple of columns of the "Daily Chronicle," and there is nothing at all to choose between the style of the questions and the style of the answers. It is in both cases unstudied journalese. One is, however, at a loss to know whether Mr. Stead expects us to receive these answers as verbally inspired. There is here an odd discrepancy. We are assured that the messages were taken down by a "clair-audient," who professed to hear Mr. Gladstone's voice, as it were, at a distance. Yet the ghost himself was under the impression that he was using not the ears but the intelligence of the medium. He complains of "the limitations of this man's brain," as though he had to rely on him, not to take down his words, but to shape and formulate his thought. One is under no obligation to account for this interview, or to give an explanation of a phenomenon of which Mr. Stead was apparently the only witness. His hired mediums may consciously have played upon Mr. Stead's credulity—a temptation to which more notable persons have succumbed in the past, from Mr. Rhodes and the Tsar down to the ingenious Dr. Cook. It is also possible that the medium is a person of good faith gifted with the faculty of thought-reading. He may very well have read something. But it is more probable that he read the workings of Mr. Stead's own brain than that he conversed with Gladstone. The answers to these questions about the Budget could not have been framed by a stupid or uneducated brain. They show little insight and no originality, but they do presuppose the sort of familiarity with current politics which an average M.P. or a working journalist is forced to acquire. The type of medium with whom the world is most familiar, whether fraudulent or genuine, rarely if ever possesses the knowledge or adroitness which even these rather commonplace revelations would presuppose. The religious passages in them read like an echo of the prayer from Saint Basil the Great which was read at the séance. The information which they convey as to the state of the departed, vague and inferential though it is, agrees with Mr. Stead's published views. The political opinions on the crisis or the moment are in the main those which Mr. Stead shares with the mass of the Liberal Party.

There is, in short, not one word or idea in the whole three columns which suggest any origin more exalted than Fleet Street. It is a question of quite secondary importance whether the medium who wrote them down is a journalist who has missed his vocation, or whether Mr. Stead mistook his own sub-conscious mental activity for Mr. Gladstone's posthumous speeches. Of Mr. Stead's good faith we need not entertain a doubt. But good faith and simplicity in some party to the transactions are the essentials of every fraud. Mr. Stead was quite as transparently honest when he bowed to the fascination of Madame Blavatsky. It is none the less not a little embarrassing to be a member of the tribe for which he erects his magic wigwam, and to feel a veneration for the dead chief whom he chooses as his Grand Turtle. For us at least the spectacle would be vastly more entertaining if he happened to be the "medicine-man" of the other side.

THE ATTORNEY OF THE TERROR.

"THE most remarkable Attorney"—so Carlyle termed Fouquier-Tinville—"that ever lived and hunted in the Upper air." "Vanish then," he dismisses him on the guillotine, "thou red-eyed Incarnation of Attorneyism: who at bottom wert but as other Attorneys, and too hungry sons of Adam." The writer is not endeavoring to whitewash the prosecutor of the revolutionary tribunal; he is trying to express the hatred of his mind—the peasant hatred—of all lawyers. And yet beneath this healthy contempt there is a stratum of real truth in calling this man especially, out of all the lawyers whom the revolution flung to the surface, the incarnation of attorneydom. Of the others some expressed hate and horror—in Danton there was a flaming energy, in Robespierre the obsession of an ideal. Many even of the judges and jurymen of that terrible "murder-machine" showed pity for their victims, and gave the sentences in tears. Others, like Trinchard, that most remarkable of artisans, spewed up into history by a volcanic force, showed fury and hatred and exultation. But Fouquier was the attorney, alike without prejudice and without mercy, disdaining to hate his victims or to be sad for them, entirely efficient, measuring out "batches" of men by the yard, as if they were cloth or cotton ordered by the Committee of Public Safety: when one was absent or acquitted filling the place with another lest the weight should be short. The "other" is taken at random; it does not matter to him whether young or old, male or female, aristocrat or imprisoned Republican: he has guaranteed to furnish so much human food for the guillotine, and his goods never fail to be delivered. He serves, and he is entirely loyal to, all masters. The processions of his masters pass through his court, and are sent with entire efficiency and no anger to the guillotine, which has already received their predecessors. One day it is a Queen of France and her aristocratic friends and relations; the next the tribunal which Danton set up settles with dispatch the Girondins whom Danton would have saved; Hébert, once master in the Committee, appears on the gradines with his followers; then Danton himself, the creator of the Committee, choked, by order of the Committee—by order of Robespierre. With scarcely a note of surprise Robespierre himself appears, yesterday omnipotent, to-day inarticulate, carried on a plank to the tumbrils. The day's work is again done. Then, and not till then, the people grew tired of blood; turned against the servant who had been supplying them with it as per contract. They choked him at the last, although with difficulty, for the man defends himself (and rightly) as servant obeying orders—willing impartially to guillotine any part or any person as the Sovereign People may direct. But after seventeen hours' deliberation the jury condemn the incarnation of attorneydom. And he passes amid vast popular approval along the dolorous way whither he had sent so many. "I have nothing with which to reproach myself," he wrote in a final appeal to posterity. "I have ever conformed with the laws. I die for my country without reproach. I am satisfied." One sees him in another world, serving efficiently God or Devil with equal dexterity, disinterestedness, indifference, set now to some heroic enterprise, now to measure and weigh cotton or blankets, now to kill men not in passion but in cold impartiality—the "incarnation of Attorneydom for all time.

In "The Tribunal of the Terror" (Heinemann), M. Lenôtre, to whom all students of the Revolution are so profoundly indebted, reconstructs the most moving and tragic story of the scenes in the Palais de Justice. To most it is the last scene of all. The "Revolution, like time, devours her children." History shows the great speeches in the Convention, the foreign invasions and their repulse, the outburst of energy, the defiance of the old Kings and the making of all things new. This little corner of it shows how one after the other—weak, defiant, trembling, indifferent—passed downward on the way to death. Here, in the great hall of the Court of Cassation, are the jury, becoming ever more pliant, and at the end panic-stricken between the fear of what they were doing and the fear of what would come to them if this thing were not done. Here are the judges, at first judicial, later but registering Fouquier's impeachments, Dumas drunk and blasphemous, the crowd behind the barriers, fascinated, amazed, often moved to pity, sometimes to tears. Through which assembly moved all that had been once great and memorable in the old régime of France; moved rapidly from the prisons to the gradines to hear their accusation, which was also their sentence, the remnant of a great historic Court of splendor, the great landlords, the priests, and then those who had defied and destroyed these things—all caught in the clutch of a huge iron machine, which revolved indifferent to the lives and services and pitiful appeals of humanity. Marie Antoinette, sentenced after a twelve-hour sitting at four o'clock in the morning, hears her sentence "without fear or indignation or weakness," stumbles down the staircase paralysed, "I can hardly see to walk" her only utterance. "I was one of the jurymen," writes the gratified Trinchard to his brother in the country, "who judged the wild beast that has devoured so great a part of the Republic." The Girondins are sentenced at eleven at night—the court in darkness, a few flickering candles lighting the vast gloom, the corpse of Valaze a dark blotch on the gradines. There was still then some semblance of a trial. Terror had not become the order of the day. They made their eloquent, useless speeches, on the purity of their motives and the nobility of their ideals, while Hébert hurled abuse on the Tribunal for "trifling away their time" and "making so much ceremony over cutting short the lives of wretches whom the people had already condemned." A special decree has to be passed by the Convention cutting off sharply the eloquence and the appeals. Hébert himself follows, a pitiful figure, all the bluster gone, pale and livid by turns, perspiration dropping from his forehead. The gendarmes carried him away. "We shall all perish," he had stated to the Committee when the death of the Queen was decided. "There is no other outlet for any of us but the way of death." Danton provides the greatest scene of all, and (to the efficient Fouquier) the most dangerous. He laughs and jokes, his huge voice carries across the Seine, the crowd are vastly moved. Fouquier appeals to his masters: "What is he to do?" The message returns: "The prisoners are to be outlawed, Danton shall speak no more." They vanish also along the way of the tumbrils: Danton singing, dying in the red flare of sunset, while Fouquier, too busy to attend—perhaps too bored—is making out his list for the next day. What is eloquence to him but a tedium, the appeals of youth, age, public services, all total irrelevances! Authority had declared that these must die. His sole duty is to get them dead with as little fuss as possible. He would have guillotined Judas Iscariot or Jesus Christ with the same indifference, the same cold efficiency: a most excellent incarnation of Attorneydom!

"Les dieux ont soif," wrote Camille Desmoulins in the last number of the "Vieux Cordelier"—the last appeal to sanity. That was in February of '94, when the Terror had scarcely begun, when the forms of fair trial remained, and there were often as many acquittals as sentences. The Tribunal had been set up as an alternative to public massacre; it was equipped for its work in the choice of skilled and humane judges, jurymen chosen by vote. At first the law was far harsher than the men who were compelled to administer it, and the public audience joined in astonishment and pity when they found young men and (rarely) women condemned for no visible crime. Acquittals were received with popular rejoicing: judge and jury would pass sentences in tears. But "the gods were athirst": more and more tormented as the spring grew into the hot summer and the nation found itself at war with the world. So that a whole thousand perished in the last month of its existence. Men became indifferent whether they lived or died. In the overcrowded prisons, stuffed with the aristocracy of France, they rioted, feasted, drank, sang songs, welcomed darkness as a bride. Towards the end it is pure carnage and horror, "loud voiced," as Carlyle has said, to future generations. But in the aggregate costing not more than the slain in a solitary Napoleonic victory or a single week of the Irish famine. But the swiftness of it, its deadliness, the indecencies which marked the last hours of its operation when the Blood Thirst triumphed over all other emotions—when every one, as has been said, was working in a kind of delirium, seeing ghosts and moving through a red mist in some fantastic dream—these have given it a story which men are never likely to forget.

Fouquier moves through them all—resting not day nor night, shunning all worldly pleasures, preparing indictments, receiving lists from the committees, carrying out the apparatus of judicial murder, temperate, cold, sleepless, intolerably indifferent to it all. His end is pitiful—entombed in prisons to whose windows he dare not come lest the crowd execrate him, thanking his wife, in broken tones, for gifts of salt and pepper, food and handkerchiefs. He loved her passionately, and his children. He had no fear of death and no shadow of doubt that his rectitude would receive ultimate vindication. But for her—what remained? He had not touched a penny of money for bribe. He had nothing to leave her but a complete copy of the "Moniteur," and a name everywhere passionately hated. "What will become of you," he is crying, "you and my poor children? You are about to be delivered over to the horrors of the most terrible poverty." "I embrace you all." "I embrace you a thousand times." "Do what is best and endeavor not to be left in want: you and the little girl." "A thousand kisses" is all that he can send at the last, a man who might have amassed fortunes if he could have been bribed into pity. Amid the frenzy and fury of the crowd, contemptuous of them and not undignified, he followed "those others" through the exit of death.

MAN AND DRAMATIST.

THE question is whether the creative mind necessarily creates beings in its own image. If in some mummy case, muniment room, or red box we suddenly came upon a story or drama containing one of those imaginary figures which we should agree to call a creation, should we be able to tell from the study of it what kind of man the author was, what were his characteristics, to what habits of mind or action he was inclined, or which thoughts and actions would be foreign to his nature? Is there something in every act of mental production which compels the soul to betray itself, or gives the soul no satisfaction unless the result of its creation is of the same quality as itself? In every age mothers have been extolled whose children were all alike—all "the very image of their father." In some families we can see the ghosts of the dead still walking the earth in the best of health and spirits. In others the apparition is revealed in some glance, some trick of the eyebrow, and then vanishes again. That a man's lip should survive through five centuries of repeated babies is one of the laws of development, one of the commonplace mysteries of life. But how far does that law of heredity hold in mental production? Given the child of imagination, could you tell from its nature what the father was like?

It is Mr. Frank Harris, with his new book on "The Man Shakespeare" (Frank Palmer), who makes us raise the question now. For while some have thought Shakespeare so shadowy a figure that they have doubted his existence or merged him into someone else, and others have asked and asked while he smiled and was still, out-topping knowledge, Mr. Frank Harris comes up with this big volume like a bomb, and flatly declares that in the dramas the whole of Shakespeare's life is revealed to us by stages; that criticism can re-create the poet just as a biologist from a few scattered bones can reconstruct a prehistoric bird or fish or mammal; that the object of Shakespeare, as of all artists, was to show himself to us, and he has done this with peculiar exactitude, painting his own portrait twenty times from youth to age at full length.

"I shall consider and compare these portraits," says Mr. Frank Harris, with characteristic assurance, "till the outlines of his character are clear and certain: afterwards I shall show how his little vanities and shams idealised the picture, and so present him as he really was, with his imperial intellect and small snobberies; his giant vices and paltry self-deceptions; his sweet gentleness and long martyrdom."

The critic sets out upon this enterprise, first, because Shakespeare is worth it, being "the most complex and passionate personality in the world, whether of life or letters"; and, again, because "there are certain lessons which the English will learn from Shakespeare more quickly than from any living man"; and, lastly, because, in a sense, he wants to get rid of Shakespeare:—

"He is like the Old-Man-of-the-Sea on the shoulders of our youth," he justly says; "he has become an obsession to the critic, a weapon to the pedant, a nuisance to the man of genius."

In the splendor of his daring, Mr. Frank Harris starts with the thesis that all dramatic writing is merely a form of autobiography. It is the tendency, he says, of the creative mind to reproduce itself, and the reproduction is likely to be its best work. By general consent, Shakespeare's best piece of work is the character of Hamlet, and, in proof that Shakespeare himself was of Hamlet's nature, everyone may see that when the dramatist falls out of a character that he is drawing he drops unconsciously into the Hamlet style; and, not only that, but he has painted Hamlet's character over and over again. Romeo is Hamlet in youthful love; Jaques is Hamlet in humorous sadness (a very Shakespearean mood); Vincentio in "Measure for Measure," Posthumus in "Cymbeline," the Duke in "As You Like It," and Prospero, the wise magician, all are Hamlets more or less distinct. Richard II., Henry VI., Brutus, and Edgar in "Lear" are always spilling over, as it were, into Hamlet, and that is not so strange; that Hotspur, Othello, and even Falstaff should spill over in the same way is more remarkable; but one of the most astonishing things in Shakespeare is, not merely the similarity, but one might almost say the identity, of Hamlet and Macbeth. Mr. Frank Harris tells us that no one, as far as he knows, has yet thought of that likeness or identity; but the present writer rather prided himself on the discovery twenty years ago, and is now inclined to think it must have been discovered by every reader of Shakespeare since Ben Jonson, except the actors and critics. It was left, however, to Mr. Frank Harris to discern the personal significance of this common character so frequently repeated; for here, in this character, he says, is Shakespeare himself as he lived.

This central idea of the book is elaborated with a wealth of detail and comparison. For the basis of the character we are shown a richly sensuous and lyrical nature, revelling in every form of beauty, whether of music, flowers, or words, and, like all sensuous natures, very quick to change and yield. The Duke Orsino in "Twelfth Night" may serve as example of this temperament in its simplest form, though it lies at the very root of Hamlet's mind. Out of it life developed a character with feminine rather than virile attributes—desirous of love, inclined to pity, always more sympathetic with failure than success, and, far beyond most men, gentle, sweet-tempered, and forgiving. It was an open and free nature, as Ben Jonson said, lavish of wealth, as Antonio was, and detesting Shylocks in every form; but meditative also, much occupied with reflection upon the course of life, the soul, and death; inclined to pour out its meditation in monologue, and to seek the relief for thought in lyrical expression. Such a nature turns aside from the shows and witless bravery of Courts, and welcomes the steady realities of the forest and country, being as little drawn to ambition as to hatred, cruelty, or revenge.

The weaknesses of this inborn temperament are, necessarily, incapacity for action and want of persistent courage. Throughout the dramas, as Mr. Frank Harris maintains, Shakespeare shows no genuine interest in action or in men of action. When he is obliged to introduce them, he takes his characters merely from tradition, and draws them from the outside without sympathy or understanding. "Henry V." is one of his worst plays: the hero of it is only a toy king, as Ruskin once said, and even he is continually slopping over into philosophy or mere rhetoric. In lesser degree it is the same with Hotspur and even with Othello. Possibly Shakespeare set out to make a stern and ruthless man of action in Macbeth, but he ended by making the most poetic and reflective of all his characters next to Hamlet. So it is throughout. Shakespeare found it almost impossible to maintain action or persistent courage in any of his creations, for the things did not exist in his own nature. As Mr. Frank Harris says:—

"The truth will out: Shakespeare was the greatest of poets, a miraculous artist, too, when he liked; but he was not a hero; and manliness was not his forte; he was by nature a neuropath and a lover."

"A gentle yet impulsive nature, sensuous at once and meditative; half poet, half philosopher, preferring nature and his own reveries to action and the life of Courts; a man physically fastidious to disgust, as is a delicate woman, with dirt and smells and common things; an idealist daintily sensitive to all courtesies, chivalries, and distinctions"—such was Shakespeare in Mr. Frank Harris's estimate, and perhaps he was only saved from effeminacy and mawkishness by that all-pervading humor which gave us all the humorous creations from Launce to Autolycus, and in the centre placed Falstaff, "the most splendid piece of humorous portraiture in the world's fiction," as the critic rightly says.

But the humorist in Shakespeare is obvious, and it is on a more obscure phase of his nature that Mr. Frank Harris most insists. We have seen that he calls him by nature a neuropath and a lover. He continually returns to what he calls his sensuality, and even, with quite unnecessary harshness, as it seems to us, his "erotic mania." Shakespeare's sensuality, he maintains, was the source of his gentle kindness and unrivalled sympathy, and probably that is true, though perhaps all the qualities together might better have been traced to general sensitiveness of mind and body. But to an overwhelming sensuality the critic further attributes the central passion and event of Shakespeare's life, the secret of his supreme greatness and the cause of his ultimate ruin—his love for "the dark lady," Mary Fitton. That idolatrous passion, says Mr. Frank Harris, was the story of the poet's existence, and to his tormenting relation with a fearless, wild-spirited, inconstant, and infinitely varied woman of action he owed the greatest part of his renown, as well as his misery, his early retirement, and premature death. With extraordinary skill, though at times with strained subtlety, Mr. Frank Harris traces this woman's influence, not only in the passions of the poet's greatest dramas, but in the actual presentation of the characters, till at last we come to Cleopatra, whom the critic boldly calls the finest picture of Mary Fitton, and whom, at all events, we will fully agree to place side by side with Hamlet and Falstaff as the highest assurance of creative genius.

This is not the place to follow out the theory of this remarkable book in detail, as Mr. Frank Harris vehemently follows it. We can now only glance at the summary of his results; and, whatever we may think of the method, the upshot is at least a consolation after the Victorian criticisms, which, having discovered that Shakespeare was the greatest of poets, thought it only proper to assume that he was also the best of men, such as might have been a fit companion for that good man, the clergyman, and have acted churchwarden at Stratford to a good old age, with blessings on his silver hair. Here is Mr. Frank Harris's very different conclusion:—

"He was gentle and witty; gay and sweet-mannered, very studious, too, and fair of mind; but at the same time he was weak in body and irresolute, hasty and wordy, and took habitually the easiest way out of difficulties; he was ill-endowed in the virile virtues and the virile vices. When he showed arrogance it was always of intellect and not of character; he was a parasite by nature. But none of these faults would have brought him to ruin: he was snared again in full manhood by his master quality, his overpowering sensuality, and thrown in the mire."

We have not answered our first question: Does the creative mind necessarily create beings in its own image? We have only given an illustration of the theory of its results if once it is accepted, for a whole volume of criticism and psychology would not exhaust the theme.

But as we recall rapidly the very few truly creative minds of the world, may we not say that we can become fairly intimate with the inmost nature of the men who created Achilles and Ulysses, Prometheus and Cassandra, Medea, Antigone, Don Quixote, Faust, Gretchen, and Mephisto? We admit that hitherto the critics have excluded Shakespeare from all such possible intimacy, as one out-topping knowledge, to use Matthew Arnold's phrase again. But why should he be excluded? Why should it not be true of him, as Goethe said of himself, that all his works are but parts of a long personal confession?

A PROBLEM OF POLICE.

In the New York mayoralty campaign, which on Tuesday drew to its exciting close, the supreme issue was, of course, Tammany; and the question on which that supreme issue mainly turned was the state and conduct of the New York police. It was Tammany's own doing that the police problem—the most unsavoury and insoluble of all the problems of American municipal government—should have been in the forefront of the fight. A little over three months ago the Tammany mayor dismissed General Theodore Bingham, the Commissioner of Police. General Bingham is a veteran of the Civil War, a man of blunt tongue, vigorous ways, and quite unconquerable pluck; and in the three and a half years that he was at the head of the New York police he did much, in the face of incredible difficulties, to discipline the force, reform its methods, and increase its efficiency. Naturally the machine politicians fell foul of him at once. They tried to bribe him—he was offered altogether £200,000 in his first year of office—and he would not be bribed. They tried to protect their criminal allies of the underworld, and he would not listen to their pleadings. They tried to make him "play politics," and he insisted on doing his duty—so far as the Tammany-appointed magistrates would let him. But at last they had their way. On a pretext which deceived nobody, the mayor last July removed General Bingham, and installed a pliant Tammany-henchman in his place. The reasons for his action were quite simple. First, the denizens of the underworld, cheated of the security which they thought they had purchased from the politicians, their whole livelihood menaced by the honesty and energy of the Police Commissioner, threatened revolt at the polls. Secondly, the police being a legal part of the electoral machinery of the city, and of the utmost use to the politicians in enabling "floaters," non-residents, and impersonators to record the votes to which they are not entitled, their complete control was essential to Tammany's hopes of success in the recent contest. A Tammany that cannot protect its friends, and that is deprived of the power of "making" the elections, is a Tammany pour rire.

The police problem in New York was stated a moment ago to be insoluble. And so, under present conditions, it is. The administration of the force is rotted, to begin with, with "politics." Every member of it has got into the habit of looking for promotion, not to the official head, but to the Tammany "leader" of his ward or district. Nothing more astonishes an Englishman in New York than to find the transfer of Constable X from one beat to another discussed by the entire Press of the city as a matter of the first political moment. Again, its organisation seems deliberately designed to make effective discipline impossible. It sounds incredible, but it is the fact, that the Police Commissioner, commanding some ten thousand men, has no fixed tenure of office whatever, and may be dismissed any minute by either the mayor of the city or the Governor of the State, without reason assigned. That is a fundamental weakness, the effects of which are felt all through the ranks. Directly a Commissioner takes office the entire force begins speculating as to how long he will remain, who are behind him, how he stands with the political authorities of the day, and who will be his successor. If he starts a reform, those on the force who do not like it will give it only a faint obedience, knowing that its author is likely to be removed before it has become effective. The more radical and honest he is, the less probability is there of his staying in office. Vested interests band together for his overthrow. All who live by vice and crime join with their business and political allies to bring daily and almost hourly pressure upon the mayor to remove him; and in the end he goes. But even if he is permitted to stay, the consciousness that every day of his official life may be the last, paralyses his authority, and his ludicrous inability to dismiss any policeman without an appeal to the Civil Courts—which nearly always decide in favor of the offender and frequently reinstate him in the force—still further reduces him to impotence.

All these restrictions on his power are the result of laws and ordinances passed by the politicians in their own interests. In the same way the politicians exact statutes—statutes, for instance, forbidding gambling and Sunday drinking—that it is impossible to enforce, that are meant to be broken, and from the violations of which Tammany draws a large part of its revenue. In the same way the politicians keep in their hands the appointment of the thirty-two police magistrates who preside over the lower courts, well knowing that if any of their friends are arrested it will need no more than a word from the local Tammany statesman to get them off. In the same way the politicians block every attempt to improve judicial procedure, and every law that threatens, for example, to make bribery a provable offence—at present nobody can be convicted of bribery unless two witnesses are forthcoming who have actually seen the money pass—or to bring pawnbrokers and other receivers of stolen goods under stricter control. General Bingham since his dismissal has stated that in his belief 80 per cent. of the New York police are honest men, and that the unscrupulous grafters among them number no more than two thousand. At the same time he estimates the money value of graft and blackmail in New York at not less than £20,000,000 a year. This is exclusive of the handsome percentage levied by the politicians and their friends on every contract, franchise, and concession given out in the city's name, a percentage which is probably far in excess of £20,000,000. The sum mentioned by General Bingham is merely the amount paid by the proprietors of saloons, pool-rooms, disorderly houses, gambling dens, and so on, for police protection and immunity. To follow its distribution among constables, police captains and inspectors, city employees and officials, politicians and lawyers, high and low, would be to understand something of the multitudinous ramifications of Tammany's power.

The people of New York quite understand the state of affairs, but they are powerless to alter it. They do not trust the police; they suspect them. Of all things English the Londoner's confidence in and respect and affection for the Metropolitan Police are to a New Yorker the most inconceivable. Almost the last thing a New Yorker of means and position would think of doing would be to call in the police to investigate a burglary in his house. He would know too well that the police would simply find the thief for the purpose of pocketing half his profits. He would go instead to one of the many private detective agencies that flourish on the deficiencies of the regular force. There is reason enough in the official reports of the various committees that have sat upon the New York police to justify this mistrust. It has been proved again and again that they and their allies in politics and on the Bench are in league with thieves, crooks, swindlers, and even murderers; that they levy tribute on drinking saloons and gambling dens; that they blackmail prostitutes, street pedlars, push-cart men, and all the petty traders of the slums; and that corruption and graft have been their first thought and their main occupation. There are many New York policemen, says General Bingham, drawing from £280 to £400 a year in salary who own country and city homes that cannot be maintained under £1,000 a year. This miracle of finance is performed by parcelling out the entire city among criminals, by taking toll of every vice and weakness and privilege—the privilege even of the man with the newspaper stand and the Italian ice-cream vendor; until, instead of a force safeguarding the public against crime, New York finds itself tyrannised over by a force safeguarding crime against the public.

Everything, in short, conspires to convince an honest policeman that virtue in New York is indeed its own reward. On Manhattan Island all the vices seem to be syndicated, marshalled, drilled, and employed in the service of men who have grown rich on the frailties of their fellows. And these men can afford to pay liberally for services rendered, just as their many-linked chain of influence makes them fatally dangerous enemies. The problem of decent police government would be difficult enough even without them, for New York attracts all the scoundrels and hooligans of the country, and is fed by an unceasing stream of European criminals. With them it is, as we have said, insoluble—or soluble, if at all, only by a revolution in the whole form, spirit, and theory of American municipal government.

Art.

PAINTING'S POOR RELATION.

THE platonic affection for pictures, which is as much as the average British citizen allows himself, should be considerably stimulated by the exhibition of facsimile reproductions of drawings by Albrecht Dürer that is now on view at the galleries of the Medici Society in Albemarle Street. The originals of this collection are in the Albertina Library, Vienna; and the reproductions are the work of a German firm for whom the Society acts as agents. So much cheap and utterly inartistic color-printing has been shovelled into this country from Germany in past years, that the fine quality of the present collection will surprise many people who have hitherto drawn their ideas of German work from bad book-covers and worse chromo pictures. The Dürer reproductions represent the best of German work—the work that, when it comes into this country at all, comes in the form of a special collection, or between the covers of an expensive book, and is thus missed by all save the connoisseurs who are on the look-out for such things. Much the same state of affairs exists in regard to English enterprise in the same direction. We are disposed to welcome color-printing as illustration to literature, and if the national demand is really represented by the vast supply of color-books now on the market, the welcome is no mean one. But when it comes to us clothed in the dignity of a framed picture, the facsimile of a great old master, we are apt to look askance at it, to regard it perhaps as a pleasing bauble worth possessing at the price, but not worth loving, as a thing of cleverness rather than a work of art. The place in pictorial art of the high-class color reproduction is similar to that of the Poor Relation in the human family. It is something to be accepted, but not greeted effusively. It is better than nothing because it may come in useful for filling up a gap. It must be kindly treated because, after all, it is a connection. But it must never be allowed to enter into our higher artistic calculations any more than the human Poor Relation may be permitted to occupy the best chair in the drawing-room or have a say in the framing of our higher social ambitions.

There are certain causes operating against the English appreciation of color reproductions, apart from the apathy towards art of any kind that is our unenviable national characteristic. One of these causes is an instinctive distrust of anything in the way of a picture that is not the real thing. In this age, when shams in every other branch of human production are tolerated and liked; when imitations in everything, from sealskins to jewellery, flaunt themselves before us in the public places; when literary plagiarism walks unashamed; when the machine-made is as good as the hand-made; when nearly every fake is excused on the grounds that people cannot afford the genuine article; the picture alone is required to be the picture that is painted by an artist's brush and produced by no other means. The vulgar millionaire who would give a year's income for Titian's "Bacchus and Ariadne" or Botticelli's "Primavera," were either of these obtainable, would probably scorn to hang high-grade reproductions of them in his spare bedroom. The possibly more enlightened art-lover of modest means might keep a few such reproductions in a portfolio for purposes of reference; but, however good they were, he would hesitate to furnish a room with them. It would be like providing the Poor Relation with a latch-key. To be sure, one comes across cases of exceptional courage, cases in which the thing with the so-called taint of mechanism about it is given an honored place without shamefacedness. They are rare, however. Ruskin's denunciation of shams, which was applied to many things besides art, seems to have been taken bitterly to heart in the matter of pictures alone.

In this attitude there is much foolishness, not a little hypocrisy, and a modicum of sound reason. The facsimile reproduction of a famous picture is obviously not the same thing in its power to gratify aesthetic longings as the picture itself. Even in the very best work of the kind there is a loss of a quality that we have heard glibly described as "the artist's soul." What is meant by soul in a picture has not yet been made quite clear, but it is generally taken to mean the emotion experienced by the painter while engaged on his work. It is, then, this quality of emotion that is held to go out as soon as the color-reproducer steps in. Perhaps it does; such a theory is equally impossible to prove or disprove. It is easier to approach the matter from a more materialistic standpoint, and to suggest that in the process of reproduction and condensation—for the reproduction is nearly always smaller than the original—what actually happens is some slight loss of brilliance in a tint, or of subtlety in a tone. In the older color-reproductions this loss was admittedly considerable. Even the excellent publications of the Arundel Society, which for long took their place as the doyen of their kind, were but clumsy substitutes for the originals. However, the old Arundel Society ceased publishing about ten years ago, and within the decade the technical advance in the art of color-reproduction has been enormous. The chromo-lithograph, as represented by the Arundel prints, has in the case of the Medici Society and others given way to the collotype, an ingenious product of photography and color-printing. The three-color process, though it must always result in a certain crudeness when employed on prints of any size, has established itself as an excellent medium for facsimile work on a smaller scale. And the variants of these processes are legion. The result of this improvement in methods, for which we may say the Medici Society is largely responsible, is that most of the drawbacks of the Arundel print have disappeared. One has only to contrast some of these prints with the recent publications of the Medici Society to realise how great the advance has been. The Arundel print tended to opaqueness, and there was a want of differentiation in quality which, except where the original had been purposely painted flat, gave the appearance of unsatisfying flatness, however true to tone and otherwise artistic such a print might be. Yet if the Medici is an improvement on the Arundel, there yet remains the difficulty of that impalpable something that was in the original, and is not present in the reproduction. Neither is it only a question of the artist's soul or emotion. The reproduction's lack of those purely intellectual associations that encircle the making of every old masterpiece like a beautiful garland, has something to do with it. One can no longer picture the artist at work, or his bottega palpitating under the throb of a great artistic impulse to create. The stain of the modern manufactory is upon the modern color-reproduction, and it is as fearsome a thing as the shine on the coat of the Poor Relation. It matters not that many a bottega of olden times was a manufactory, that art was then more strictly organised labor than it is now. The fact remains that nowadays the manufactory is associated with so much that is sordid and unpleasant that the tender conscience of the art-lover cannot associate it with the production of beauty. If the manufactured color print pleases him at the first glance, he is disposed to choke the pleasure at its birth with thoughts of bare and ugly rooms, and labor that waits not upon inspiration and is a mere matter of economic demand and supply. The divorce of modern art from life's mechanism would seem to have created in him an instinctive dread of all art that is mechanical. His attitude is really more human than logical or just. It certainly does less than justice to the skill involved in the production of a fine color print, nor does it take heed of the real affinity that exists between the technical process of such prints and that of the oil-picture. He gets no further than the stumbling-block of the photographic basis. The "lay-in" in monochrome that is the next stage, the eight to ten printings in color that, in the Medici prints, for instance, follow each other before the correct tint is obtained, and, last, but not least, the practised eye for color, pure color, great color, color unison, that is required for the correction of proofs; of these he thinks dimly or not at all.

We are reminded once more of the Poor Relation by the comparatively low price at which a good color-reproduction is now obtainable. Just as the Poor Relation might be forgiven anything except his poverty, so the reproduction might, by a very considerable section of picture-buyers, be accepted as the finest art, but for its inexpensiveness. This is a sordid fact, and one need not dwell on it, beyond saying that it is the seat of much of the foolish hypocrisy in the current attitude towards a class of work that, apart from its enormous educative value, has come to be something of first-hand æsthetic worth.

Letters from Abroad.

THE PULL TOWARDS THE LEFT IN GERMANY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The NATION has already noticed the remarkable successes of the German Social Democratic party at the elections to the diets of Baden, Saxony, and some minor German States, at the bye-elections in Berlin for the Prussian Diet, and at the bye-election of Koburg for the Reichstag. The list of these successes can considerably be increased by a list of successes at elections for local and provincial bodies. As a matter of fact there has not taken place one election in the last three or four months which has not seen the Social Democrats greatly fortified as compared with any former measurement of forces. Of the so-called Socialist slump of 1907 there is hardly a vestige left. Whether the party has to fight adherents of the defunct "Buelow Bloc" or partners of the "blue-black Bloc" of Conservatives and Catholics, the result is always the same: a great increase of the Socialist vote and a decrease of the votes of the middle-class parties. Even in places which until now were regarded as the safest strongholds of the Catholic Centre, Social Democrats have obtained formidable increases of votes.

How will this great advance of the party of political and industrial democracy react upon the German political evolution in general? In this respect, if we turn to the different States mentioned above, the most optimistic view is offered by the Grand Duchy of Baden. There the National Liberals, generally a most shaky party, will, by having been in a number of divisions the allies of the Socialists against the Catholics, be compelled to show some backbone at least, and the Catholics, in Baden the party of reaction, if they have not lost so many seats as the National Liberals, have greatly lost in voting power, and are at any rate weakened in numbers and influence. Against this the greatly increased Social Democratic Parliamentary group will now have at its side a group of advanced Democratic Liberals. The pull towards the Left is here the most palpable phenomenon.

But Baden is a small State only, and in the kingdom of Saxony we find already a different picture. True, the Social Democrats, who in 1896 were thrown out of the Saxon Diet by the reactionary electoral law of that year, will now have a group there of about twenty in a Parliament of ninety-one members, and the Conservatives, who since then have ruled the Saxon Landtag, will in the new Landtag muster a minority of little more than twenty-five members. But in Saxony the National Liberals are for nearly all intents and purposes the allies of the Conservatives. Their quarrel with them is in the main a domestic quarrel between partners who know that in the next moment they will have to co-operate again, and some twenty-five to thirty National Liberals, fortified by some anti-Semites, will, with the Conservatives, form a Nationalist majority of over sixty against the twenty Socialists and a handful of more or less advanced Radicals.

In Prussia, the ruling State, the bye-elections change nothing in the composition of the Diet. The fight in Berlin has been a fight mainly between the Social Democrats and the Freisinnige, and the spite between these two parties has, if possible, been enhanced. At the second ballot in the Landtag divisions where the fight is not yet decided, the Friesinnige will have the help of all the reactionists, whilst only the Democrats of the Breitscheid group will stand by the Socialist candidate. Amongst the people, the pull towards the Left is in Prussia no less strong than elsewhere, but the three class electoral system prevents, for the time being, its political action on the Parliamentary machine. And here lies the crux of the whole political situation. As far as the declarations of the Prussian Conservatives go, the latter are more determined than ever to oppose any material reform of the present Prussian franchise. According to their line of argument all the elections prove only the necessity of maintaining in Prussia the present franchise as the bulwark against the destructive tendencies of the masses and the vagaries of the professional classes. This is the always repeated wisdom of the "Kreuzzeitung," the "Deutsche Tageszeitung," and other papers of that ilk, and in this they express the thoughts of the Conservative leaders. Nobody knows as yet what the franchise reform promised by the Government will look like. But this much is certain. If it means any reduction of the present over-representation of the agrarian interest the Conservatives will fight it tooth and nail. In this they will be helped by the Catholics, who are as keenly interested as they are in the present distribution of seats. Unless the Government is resolved to take up the cudgels against their beloved Conservatives in bitter earnest, no reform worth speaking of will pass the two Houses of the Prussian Landtag.

Now it is pretty certain that Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg and his Royal master wish nothing more ardently than to be saved a quarrel with the Prussian squirearchy. The semi-official "Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung" never ceases preaching conciliation and compromise. But the Prussian Junkers know that their political power is at stake, and will not allow themselves to be lulled by soft words. If the question depended on Parliamentary decisions alone, a reform of the Prussian franchise would be as far off as ever. It is to non-Parliamentary forces that we are compelled to look for the transformation of the political discontent of the mass of the nation into a change of their political representation.

Of these non-Parliamentary forces the new Hanseatic League will prove of very little use. More and more the League develops into a subsidiary agency of the high Lords of German Industry, who certainly desire a greater voice in the councils of the nation, but who want nothing less than an increase of the political power of their workers. To express it more directly, they would welcome a redistribution of seats so far as it would strengthen the commercial and industrial against the agrarian interest in general, but they do not want to hear of any democratisation of the franchise. Not to speak of the Conservatives, can one expect the Catholics, whose main power rests in the lower middle classes in town and country, to submit silently to a change of that kind? Here is an opposition of interests which must prevent any reform if there is no third power strong enough to compel both to give way.

This third power can only be Social Democracy as the party of the wage earners and the classes akin to them. As we have seen, the party is there, better organised than ever, fuller than ever of fighting spirit. In a former letter it has been shown how the various classes of the workers have increased in Germany, and to some extent the electoral successes are explained by this increase. But it is not only the wage earners who have enhanced the voting powers of the party. The most remarkable feature of the recent elections has admittedly been the comparatively large percentage of members of the professional classes and other elements of the lower middle classes who voted for the Labour Party. Stronger than ever grows the influence of this body in other sections of the community. The Government strives to suppress this spirit by more or less terroristic disciplinary means. Thus, on Thursday last, the chairman of the association of the middle functionaries of the postal and telegraph service, Herr Zollitsch, was condemned by the disciplinary court to remove to a provincial place and submit to a reduction of salary because he has suffered articles to appear in the organ of the association, which severely criticised the non-fulfilment of the promise of the Government to adjust the pay of the functionaries to their increased cost of living. But the incriminating article only gave vent to the spirit of deep irritation that prevails almost everywhere in the German Civil Service. It is to be found in the teaching profession and amongst the clerical and technical functionaries of industry and commerce.

It is, of course, always difficult to gauge how far these classes are prepared to act in consequence of their discontent. But the irritation is there, it makes them gravitate towards Social Democracy, and strengthens its prestige and aggressive power. This tendency is also reflected by the attitude of the so-called non-political journals, which, under the colorless names of "Generalanzeiger," and so on, strive to catch the general reader. At present they take great care to satisfy the Socialist leanings of their readers. To sum it up, the powers of social resistance to an attack by the Socialists have markedly decreased. If the electoral reform demanded by the workers is again to be postponed, demonstrations larger than ever will not fail to take place. What form they will take cannot be predicted, but they will certainly be more general and create more difficulties than their predecessors. It would be an exaggeration to say that the State machinery is already out of joint. But it is no exaggeration to say that it is looser in its joints than before. The lost authority of the State will not be restored by terroristic means. The only way to soothe the discontent is by the increase of rights and the improvement of material conditions. The uneasiness of growing sections forces our rulers to a policy of saving. It has been announced that the new Budget will show reductions under all the heads of expenditure. The pull towards the Left may yet mean retrenchment in armaments.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Berlin, November 1st, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

TARIFF REFORM IN THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think that perhaps the following extract from a letter just received by me from a correspondent in the United States may be of interest to your readers. The writer is a well-known and highly respected solicitor—a hard-headed man of business. "I am glad," he writes, "to see your Party is not going to submit to any compromise, and, furthermore, that you will not allow usurpation of power by the House of Lords. I sometimes think that you have a better democracy than we have. The House of Commons represents the masses of the people, and when the Government is not sustained, the people can be heard from quickly. In our country the House of Representatives is elected every two years, but the Senators are only elected on the basis of one-third each year and hold their office for six years. Under our constitution, all Revenue Bills must originate in the House of Representatives, and it was certainly the intention of the founders that the people should make the Budget. As it is, the Senate really makes our Budget, and thereby defeats the will of the people. The most striking instance we have of that is our recent Tariff Bill, notwithstanding the masses of the people are in favor of a reduced tariff. Our President, Mr. Taft, has fizzled out. He has turned out to be a good-natured jelly-fish. We are glad enough to get an open market for our goods, but we have built a Chinese wall against foreign goods. I would like to see our Senate abolished. It is nothing but a millionaire's club, and, in my opinion, the most corrupt governmental body in the world."

I think, sir, you will agree that these words contain much food for profitable reflection. As my correspondent points out, the aim of "Tariff Reformers" in his country is to reduce the tariff!—Yours, &c.,

G. G. GREENWOOD.

P.S.—By the way, your correspondent "Law" is in error in speaking of "the King and Commons" as "two of the three estates of the realm." The estates of the realm are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons.

House of Commons,
November 1st, 1909.

TAXING THE FOREIGNER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of October 23rd you quote Mr. Churchill as saying that he declined to discuss "the gospel of quacks and the creed of gulls," which preached the taxation of the foreigner. This is the usual attitude of the Free Trade platform and Press; but is it wise to condemn in this fashion so familiar an argument of the Protectionists? There is undoubtedly a grain of truth in the contention that "the foreigner pays"; for quotations for the foreign market take account of hostile tariffs when fixing prices for that market; and what we need therefore, and what I can nowhere find, is a clear statement of the principle governing this process. When and to what extent does the "foreigner pay" an import tax? And since he can be made to pay, what is the objection, from the Free Trade point of view, to securing his contribution by a properly-framed tariff?

In the interests of the Free Trade position, could you not deal with this question in an adequate article? I am convinced that a mere dogmatic denial of the "tax-the-foreigner" creed is neither sufficient nor wise, and certainly nothing is gained by refusing to see the position of our opponents, in support of which they are ready enough with their lists of prices.—Yours, &c.,

VERITAS VINCIT.

October 27th, 1909.

[We deal in our leading columns with the subject of our correspondent's letter.—ED., NATION.]

WANTED, DETAILS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Though politics interest me little, may I, as a business man, touch on one aspect of "Tariff Reform" which I occasionally see alluded to, but which in my opinion should always be pressed upon public attention?

"Tariff Reform" is nothing if not a business proposition. Very well; let us give it a business reception. If its supporters mean business, let them give us the details. It won't do for them to talk of securing a general assent to the principle. In business we want all the details—in writing.

If a dealer in copper (which I use in my work) proposes to enter into a contract with me, the details of his proposition are its essence. I want to know from him the quality of his copper, its weight, its gauge, its finish, his finest-cut price, his terms of payment, speed of delivery, minimum order, and length of contract. I want all this information in writing, and if, after general discussion, he declares himself unable to let me have it, I show him the door.

In politics apparently he is quite prepared to present himself with further suggestions. In business, I assure you, he would never get past my clerks again.

The protest that "Tariff Reform" may receive a general assent, its details to be settled later, is beneath consideration. Imagine, say, that a builder asks me—"Would you like me to build you a house, finer than your present one, better situated, and less expensive?" My reply is a series of questions. "Where is it to be built; where are the plans; how many rooms—what size; what is the price?"

I imagine the answer then, à la "Tariff Reform": "These are details. Assent (as a broad principle); sign this agreement, in which you see I have left blanks for the details you mention, and leave 'it to me to fill them up as and when I think proper!'"

Could absurdity go further? How can English business men allow themselves to spare even five minutes in the consideration of a proposition the authors of which know either too much or too little to reduce to plain, straightforward terms?—Yours, &c.,

DERISION.

November 2nd, 1909.

WANTED, A FREE TRADE CAMPAIGN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely the sensible thing for Constitutionalists to do is to recognise that, however seriously the rejection of the Budget by the Lords may threaten our political traditions and institutions, there is an enormous section of the electorate who refuse to make it the matter of their chief concern. Even if the Bermondsey Liberal and Labor vote are classed together, the fact remains that 47·5 per cent. of the voters polled for Tariff Reform. True that the final act of rejection has not yet taken place, and, until actually accomplished, must be considered, to a certain extent, as conjectural; but I am convinced, in so far as I can judge from personal observation and intercourse, that the constitutional issue cannot be made the sole and decisive question of the next election.

I am only an obscure elector, but I have much and often discussed the matter with many equally obscure. A proportion, of course, are mere party men, bound by prejudice and moved by party catchwords; but even among those who really turn the balance of the polls—the virile independent and the persuasible—I have failed to discover that supreme interest in the Lords' veto which the Liberal Press and professional politicians assume as a matter of course. Whatever the Lords may do, I am certain that Tariff Reform will remain a dominant, if not the dominant, issue for the electorate. It stands as a positive programme opposed to the Land and Finance Reform programme of the Government, and, if Bermondsey reveals anything, it shows that supporters of these two opposing policies are fairly equally matched.

Now, if the Government is to win, it will not be by merely advocating its own policy, however boldly and persistently it may do so. War, reasoned and generalised, must be re-declared and maintained against Tariff Reform. Unionists must be defeated and discredited on their own ground. It can be done. Thousands of votes are being won for Tariff Reform everywhere, but they can be won back if the attack is made at once, and with such vigor and enthusiasm as is displayed by the Budget League in another direction. It is folly to ridicule it or ignore it, or even to be content with exposing its fallacies in a haphazard fashion. There is a plausible attractiveness about it which will surmount hosts of such exposures. It promises definitely more employment, and, although hecklers may laugh, and say it is not work, but wages, that they want, the ordinary man, thinking of neither as a thing apart, but of each as a condition of his security of existence, knows that if there is more employment to be had, that security will at any rate be less precarious, even if as ill rewarded.

Upholders of Free Trade must, therefore, become more active and direct critics of interference with trade by tariffs. It may be that Unionists are being led step by step to such extravagance of promise that their coming into power would only precipitate their end. But there is no reason why Tariff Reform should not be utterly routed to-day, and not merely, at the best, defeated by a narrow margin of small majorities. Tariff Reformers themselves have already familiarised their adherents with the use and arithmetic of trade statistics, and a closer study of the conditions of industry and commerce. It now remains for Free Traders to seize that advantage, and, by a concentrated onslaught of criticism and exposure, to carry that education further to its ultimate Free Trade understanding. Free Trade is too negative and too much on its defence. It must become positive. It must insist again and again that Tariff Reform will restrict trade, that it will cause more and more unemployment, that it will not only increase the cost of living, but that it will refuse the manufacturer the right to seek the best market as a purchaser, and therefore handicap his opportunities as a seller. Convinced Free Traders know all this, but they have to win back the converts to Tariff Reform, and they have to hold also those who are wavering. But this cannot be done without a sustained Free Trade campaign. The time is ripe for it.—Yours, &c., TOGA.

Bedford, October 30th, 1909.

A PROPHECY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the "Civil and Military Gazette" (Lahore) I wrote on December 7th, 1905, as follows:—"The Liberal majority in 1906 will exceed all Liberal majorities since 1833. Moreover, it is absurd for Conservatives to expect that Lord Rosebery will be appointed Prime Minister, for it is quite certain that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman will fill that office should his health permit. Among new names likely to be found in the Liberal Ministry are Winston Churchill, Lloyd George, Haldane, and John Burns. This last appointment will be made to appease the Labor Party."

My prophecy was so wonderfully accurate that the Editor, the late Mr. Stevenson, wrote to congratulate me upon it. Owing to such success in the past my present prediction may have some interest to readers of THE NATION. I predict that the Lords will reject the Budget on its second reading on or about November 25th, and that a General Election will take place early in January, which will result in a majority for the present Government of about a hundred and forty. Several seats will be captured by the Tories, especially in London and the Home Counties; but the position in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales will remain virtually unaltered.—Yours, &c.,

JOSHUA BROOKES.

November 3rd, 1909.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE GENERAL ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The parties in the State have been blowing up the fire, and if the House of Lords rejects the Budget the iron will be hot. If it is necessary then to have a General Election, the Liberal Party can strike with effect. But if the Lords do not reject the Budget, the iron will be cold. If the House is dissolved, and the Liberal Party strikes on the cold iron, it will hurt itself. The excitement has been got up upon one issue—the House of Lords and the Budget. If the Commons triumph without a dissolution, to follow that triumph by a dissolution will be a tactical error. There is plenty of work for the Commons to do during the next two years. Some good Bills, no doubt, will be carried through both Houses and become law, such as the Labor Assurance Bill, and a Bill for the extension of old age pensions. Other Bills will go through the Commons, but won't become law. A Registration Reform Bill, including for the second time a "one man one vote" clause, will go through the Commons, and doubtless will be rejected by the Lords. Then the iron will be hot. Then the Liberal Party can strike with good effect. I do not wish to be interpreted as saying that even if the Lords do reject the Budget, there ought therefore to be an immediate dissolution. I am no lawyer, but if the Government can devise some means of collecting the necessary taxes notwithstanding the refusal of the House of Lords, or some means of enforcing the passage of the Finance Bill through the Lords after a first rejection, that would be far more satisfactory from a constitutional point of view than any victory at the polls.—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

7, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

November 1st, 1909.

RADICAL VERSUS UNIONIST LAND REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of October 30th you published Mr. Lloyd George's article entitled "The Issue of the Budget," and, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer devoted a considerable part of his article to my person and to a scheme of land reform which I outlined in the "Nineteenth Century Review" for September and October, I trust that you will kindly allow me to reply to him.

Mr. Lloyd George wrote: "The intelligent foreigner (Mr. Ellis Barker) who supplies the Tariff Reform Party with ideas, has foreseen that the British democracy are profoundly dissatisfied with the conditions under which land is now owned and managed. He has, therefore, pressed upon his leaders—and has met with some measure of acceptance—a scheme of State purchase. But the success of such a scheme must necessarily depend on the price paid for the land. If the extravagant prices, which have hitherto accompanied every acquisition of land for public or industrial purposes, are to rule in future, the peasant proprietary of Mr. Ellis Barker is doomed to a subsidised insolvency."

Mr. Lloyd George is a politician who can apparently not refrain from personal attacks on his opponents, be they dukes or humbler individuals like myself, and he does not care in the slightest whether his assertions are true or false. I am not a foreigner, but since more than ten years a naturalised British subject, and most Liberal politicians are acquainted with this fact. I think that Mr. Lloyd George prefaced his remarks on the Unionist land reform programme with the observation that it was drawn up by "a foreigner," and pressed by that "foreigner" upon the leaders of the Unionist Party, and endorsed by them for a twofold reason. In the first place, Mr. Lloyd George apparently wished to supply the street orators with the argument: "Don't pay any attention to the Unionist land reform programme. It was drawn up by a foreigner." In the second place, he probably wished to discredit me with the Unionist Party. Mr. Lloyd George's assertion, "Mr. Ellis Barker has pressed upon his leaders—and has met with some measure of acceptance—a scheme of State purchase," is either based upon positive information or is an invention. If it is based upon information, he must have received it either through the indiscretion of one of the Unionist leaders or through my own indiscretion or treachery. To the outsider the latter would seem more probable. Mr. Lloyd George accuses me, therefore, by insinuation, of indiscretion or treachery, and I herewith challenge him to name his informant. If he is unable to name him, I must accuse him of having circulated an invention for the purpose of discrediting me in the eyes of the leaders of the party to which I have the honor to belong. His methods of controversy are scarcely worthy of a Cabinet Minister.

A policy is either good or bad, and the responsibility for the policy rests upon the party leader or leaders who propound it. If I had the desire to answer Mr. Lloyd George in his own style I should say that he is only the nominal author of his Budget, that the Budget for which he takes so much credit was not drawn up by himself, and that he has not the ability to draw up a Budget, even if he had the will to do it.

Facts take habitually a subordinate position in Mr. Lloyd George's statements. Mr. Lloyd George dismisses the land settlement proposals contained in my two "Nineteenth Century" articles with the words: "If the extravagant prices which have hitherto accompanied every acquisition of land for public or industrial purposes are to rule in future, the peasant proprietary of Mr. Ellis Barker is doomed to subsidised insolvency." That it is not my plan to pay "extravagant" prices may be seen from the following words of mine in the October issue of the "Nineteenth Century Review": "In case of compulsory purchase, the owners should receive for their land the full value, which, in case of disputes, might be determined by referees, plus a small percentage, let us say, 10 per cent., for disturbance. The solatium for disturbance should be so small as to induce owners of estates suitable for settlement rather to sell them voluntarily than to have them purchased under a compulsory plan." Whilst during the last thirty years the price of agricultural land has fallen to about half its former value in Great Britain, it has maintained its value in France, Germany, and other countries. British agricultural land is going a-begging, and is sold at present at derelict prices. My proposals therefore involve a great sacrifice for our reduced landowners, and they make it reasonably certain that small people who acquire land at present prices with the help of the Government will see the value of their land doubled and more than doubled. In his only statement of fact Mr. Lloyd George has absolutely misrepresented me.

Whilst the Unionist land policy may be summed up in the words: "Every man his own landlord," the Radical Party has adopted the Socialist policy of making the land national property. Mr. Lloyd George writes in his pronouncement, published by THE NATION: "The new State valuation must be the basis for all plans of communal purchase. On this basis municipalities ought to buy the land which is essential to the development of their towns. And the State could also buy up land necessary to the policy of re-creating rural life in Great Britain." Mr. Lloyd George has let the cat out of the bag. He has thrown away the mask of Liberalism. We know now that it is the ideal of Mr. Lloyd George and of his party that the State should own all the agricultural land and that the municipalities should own all the town land, a policy which, if honestly carried out, would add £4,000,000,000 to our National Debt. The land acquired by the State and by the municipalities would be let to private people. The private landlord would be replaced by the official. The ownership of land would become a Government monopoly. The people would pay their rent, not to private owners, but to Government officials. Do they desire such a change?

The private landlord is, no doubt, a nuisance, for nobody likes to pay the rent, but a political landlord is an abomination. The private landlord must be fair to his tenants. He cannot afford to make himself disliked. He is influenced by human feelings, by local opinion, by the Press, and if he acts unfairly he can easily be restrained by the law. But "the community" has neither a soul to save nor a body to kick nor a conscience to appeal to. It acts by red tape regulations. The land taxes are popular because the people have been told that they will lower their rent. If the people are made aware of the deception, and if they are asked at the next General Election whether they wish for a crazy settlement of the land problem such as Mr. Lloyd George wishes to effect, or whether they prefer the common-sense settlement which the Unionists favor; if they are asked whether they would like to have "the community" for landlords, or whether they would rather be their own landlords, I have little doubt as to their decision. If Mr. Lloyd George is wise, he will hasten to explain away the preposterous programme of land nationalisation which he has announced in his article in THE NATION.—Yours, &c.,

J. ELLIS BARKER.

Constitutional Club,
Northumberland Avenue, London, W.C.
November 3rd, 1909.

[We quite accept Mr. "Ellis Barker's" statement that "since more than ten years" he is a naturalised British subject, though within that period he appears to have paid slightly more attention to our politics than to the mechanism of our barbarous tongue.—ED., NATION.]

LIBERAL WOMEN AND THE FRANCHISE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a life-long and very strong supporter of the world-wide movement for granting the franchise to women, it seems to me quite clear that the Liberal women ought to aid strenuously the Government in the stupendous contest now inevitable in one form or another. They ought to remember that it is to the Liberals they owe their municipal freedom. But, apart from this remembrance, they ought never to cease to recollect that, if the main provisions of the Budget become law, their position will not only be improved greatly, though, it may be, indirectly, but their vantage ground from which to obtain the other reforms they deem needful will be increased in a marked degree. For brevity's sake to name only Old Age Pensions and the licensing duties—with the revenue for the former and other social reforms assured, and the impetus which temperance will receive from the latter, the energies of right-minded women will have greater scope. Then, looking at the matter from another standpoint, does any right-thinking woman suppose that the advent of the Conservatives to power would bring at once an adequate franchise measure? The surmise of those best informed leads one to think that two-thirds at least of the Liberals are in favor of granting the franchise to women, and only one-third of their opponents are so inclined.—Yours, &c.,

MACKENZIE BELL.

Athenæum Club, November 2nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Referring to your correspondence on this subject, I should like to confirm the views expressed in your correspondent, Catherine Ryle's letter.

I am deeply interested in the question of the franchise for women, but find it quite impossible to join any of the principal societies for promoting it, because of their policy with regard to the bye-elections. If women want to vote, they must, so long as the Government of their country consists of "parties," show themselves of value to the Party with whom they are in sympathy. Certainly I think a woman should count herself first a Liberal and then a woman. She is asking for a political right, and must prove herself to be a politician in order to gain it.

We must not do wrong that good may come, and it cannot be right to act contrary to one's principles.

The quarrel is with Mr. Asquith, not with Liberalism; and I am sure this question, like all others, will never be settled except upon a Party basis.

If, at the outset, the women with Unionist views had joined the Primrose League, and those with Liberal views the National Liberal Federation, and shown their value to these societies, we might by this time have had the franchise, but acting as they do at present, they alienate the sympathy of all Parties.

I am not condemning their militant methods. When justice is denied a subject, there comes a time when force is justified; but if they will continue to be the enemies of the Party who must in time support them, I really cannot see how they can expect friendly treatment in return. Let them work hard in the interest of the Liberal candidate at the next election, should there be one before the General Election (or at the General Election), then see what the answer of the Liberal Party will be to their claim. For my part, I think it will at least be treated with respect and consideration, as all men of any intelligence appear to me to see the justice of the claim.—Yours, &c.,

KATE CHANDLER.

20, Westgate Terrace,
South Kensington, S.W.
October 31st, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am a Liberal of the third generation, and an official of two Liberal Associations, and I have bought THE NATION from its first number. On this record, may I venture to suggest that it might be for the good of the party if our Front Bench would give serious consideration to the position of such of your readers—and their number is undoubtedly considerable—as are in my case with regard to the question of the suffrage.

Rooted in Liberalism as I have been, I cannot, of course, remember the time when the denial of effective representation and the full privileges of citizenship to the half of the population which is on a mental and moral equality with the other half, demonstrated by the fact of being its mothers, sisters, and wives, impressed me as anything else than the negation of Progressive principles.

During the last year or two, and particularly during the last two months, my position as a Liberal has been very difficult. There is no use in pretending that at Liberal meetings, attended by some of our most responsible leaders, there has not been, for a long period and as a usual thing, unpardonable unseemliness and brutality in dealing with "A Voice," whenever it has proceeded from a woman, or from a man enlightened enough to sympathise with the point of view of women, and to do what he could to help their cause. I was brought up to think, not only that "A Voice" and sharply-fired questions were legitimate features of a public meeting, and that the politician who was not ready to meet civil opposition respectfully and good-humoredly should keep away from the platform, but that effective interjection and skilful heckling at public meetings were a minority's right, which Liberalism, in its struggle with Reaction, could not too carefully cherish. During the Bermondsey election, I see, some Liberals were thrown out of a Tariff Reform meeting after the fashion in which women have been treated at their own. Having never heard about sauce for the goose being sauce for the gander, they actually took their bruised arms, faces, and hats to the platform of a Liberal meeting for sympathy! Is there any drollery quite like the drollery of politicians?

The inexcusable ill-usage of women who have exercised the time-honored right of people who attend a public meeting to express dissent, though a sad feature in the history of the Liberal Party, does not, unhappily, stand alone. The remarks which not a few Liberal leaders have thought fit to make during the painful scenes which have taken place have been unworthy. I need quote only from Mr. Lloyd George's speech at Newcastle, and I do so very carefully:—

"They complain when we tax mineral rights. They said: 'We do not object to pay the tax. All we do object to is the form of the tax.' (A Voice: 'The women object to pay taxes because they don't get representation')—the interrupter was hustled out desperately resisting. Mr. Lloyd George: There are many ways of earning a living, and I suppose that is one of them; and that is one of the most objectionable of them, I think. You see men building trade and businesses, some small, some great, by their industry, by their skill, by their energy, by their enterprise, not merely maintaining themselves and their families, but putting something by for evil days. Hundreds and thousands of them belong to the Liberal Party. (A Voice: 'And women')—the interrupter after a struggle was ejected. Mr. Lloyd George: If there are any more of these hiring gentlemen perhaps they will make their demonstrations all at the same time; I think it will save them a little."

According to our old Liberal ideas, more legitimate interjections by "A Voice" were never made at a public meeting.

Since Mr. Lloyd-George's speech I have been asked by my local Liberal Association to subscribe a trifle towards the circulation of a little monthly magazine containing the portrait and claims of our candidate for the division. I have also been asked by my divisional association to do something in the same direction. With what ease of mind can one comply if our candidate, a new man of whom I know little, may, in his treatment of women interrupters at his meetings, take the Chancellor of the Exchequer as his exemplar?

As for the forcible feeding business, dealt with so honestly and so promptly by the "Manchester Guardian," one had thought one belonged to a party which held respect for the personal dignity of the prisoner for conscience sake as an article of faith, one had known Liberalism eager to cherish the principle of the liberty of the subject "as far away as Paris is," or Poland or Naples or Bulgaria, one had remembered how faithfully the party Press dealt with physical force methods in Muscovite prisons and in Irish—when Mr. Balfour was gaoler.

At a time when the battle is to be joined on the Budget, it is, of course, extremely trying to the political temper for women to be "confusing the issue." But when the fight over the Education Bill, and then the Licensing Bill, was going forward, women were also adjured to stand aside. Obviously they are entitled to ask what evidence they have for believing that their turn will come by a definite date. They were advised by the late Premier that they should be heard for their much speaking; but great and vital questions, on which the views and co-operation of women are most essential, are apparently to be taken in hand before the performance of what is at once an act of justice, and, as every enlightened Liberal who looks to the future must feel, an act of political necessity.

Although one learnt nothing about it in one of the Liberal newspapers I read, I believe it to be the fact that the Women's Social and Political Union held from twenty to thirty anti-Government meetings daily in Bermondsey during the election. One has heard the Liberals pretending that the leaders of the W.S.P.U. are Tories—I mention the W.S.P.U. as the suffrage society which has been able to raise within four years £50,000 for its campaign—as if any informed person needed to be told of the Radicalism of a Pankhurst, or that the Pethick Lawrences, who have set going a paper which now calls for votes for women and denounces the Government in thirty thousand copies a week, were Fabians. Does anyone doubt that a large proportion of the members of the W.S.P.U.—only one among the half-dozen suffrage societies—are Liberals? It seems curious party leadership that ensures all their influence being thrown against the Government at a General Election, when every possible vote should be recorded against the Lords.

The leaders of the W.S.P.U. may have made mistakes. Few people in public life have not. But it is the convinced opinion of some of your readers, whose Progressive principles are not less ardent than those of any member of this Government, that, when the history of our time is written a quarter of a century hence, it will be held that it was by the contemned suffragette that the banner of Liberty was kept flying.

Mr. Lloyd George has been writing in your columns. Will he not show us the quality of his statesmanship by responding in THE NATION to your wise appeal to those who are of the councils of the party to take steps by which the co-operation of the most progressive women of our day may be secured at a critical juncture for Liberalism?—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL JOURNALIST.

November 2nd, 1909.

Poetry.

TO ONE DYING IN THE CAUSE OF SCIENCE.

J. H. W., M.R.C.S., Eng.

Died October, 1909, of infection contracted in preparing an anti-toxin serum with which another life was saved.

LOSING his life in saving life,
Passing in early prime,
His spirit's triumph in the strife
Mocks at our measured time:

For many a long-drawn life of toil
In soul-tilth, hour by hour,
Shows never such a wealth of soil
As brought his life to flower:

To bloom of lightheart bravery
Fair grown as it grew fast,
Fragrant with finest courtesy
And flawless to the last.

For twice he saw the seasons roll,
His world shrunk to one room,
And, curbing fast an uncurbed soul,
He faced his threatened doom.

And still, as the grey Shadow drew
More near, with summons grim,
With knightly grace he laughed and threw
The challenge back to him.

And ever, 'neath rude buffetings,
As strength and hope grew less,
He rose, in great and little things,
To tenderer thoughtfulness.

O heart that loved him as thine own,
O young lives that he gave,
Be comforted, a soul so grown
Knows nothing of the grave!

The flower that 'neath such tempest sprang,
The soul that upward fought
To life where deadliest battle rang,
Was never framed for nought.

HABBERTON LULHAM.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

- "The Heart of the Antarctic." By E. H. Shackleton, C.V.O. (Heinemann. 2 vols. 36s. net.)
 "The Autobiography of Sir Henry M. Stanley." Edited by Lady Stanley. (Sampson Low. 21s. net.)
 "Christianity at the Cross-Roads." By George Tyrrell. (Longmans. 5s. net.)
 "Italian Hours." By Henry James. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. (Heinemann. 25s. net.)
 "The Life of Mrs. Norton." By Jane Gray Perkins. (Murray. 12s. net.)
 "On Everything." By H. Belloc. (Methuen. 5s.)
 "Sir Wilfrid Lawson: A Memoir." Edited by the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "High Albania." By M. Edith Durham. (Arnold. 14s. net.)
 "Sir Philip Sidney." By Percy Addleshaw. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
 "Natural and Social Morals." By Carveth Read. (Black. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "In Three Legations." By Madame Charles de Bunsen. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)
 "China: Its Marvel and Mystery." By F. Hodgson Liddell. (Allen. 21s. net.)
 "The Hills and the Vale." By Richard Jefferies. (Duckworth. 6s.)
 "Jesus or Christ?" The Hibbert Journal Supplement for 1909. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)
 "Religion and the Modern World." St. Ninián Lectures. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.)
 "The Florentine Frame." By Elizabeth Robins. (Murray. 6s.)
 "Villa Rubein, and Other Stories." By John Galsworthy. (Duckworth. 6s.)
 "La Psychologie Sociale de Gabriel Tarde." Par Amédée Matagrin. (Paris: Alcan. 5fr.)
 "Figaro et ses Devanciers." Par Frantz Funck-Brentano et Paul d'Estrée. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)
 "La Valeur Sociale de l'Evangile." Par L. Garriguet. (Paris: Bloud. 3fr. 50.)
 "Du Sang, de la Volupté et de la Mort." Nouvelle Edition. Par Maurice Barrès. (Paris: Paul. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

MESSRS KING, who are proposing to take a larger share in the publication of political and general literature, have in hand a volume of political essays by Mr. J. A. Hobson, for issue immediately after Christmas. In the earlier part of this work Mr. Hobson discusses the constitutional issues raised by the action of the House of Lords, and presents the case for a comprehensive Reform Bill with a Referendum as a substitute for the veto of a second chamber. The relations between Liberalism and Socialism form the subject of another section of the work, while the later chapters discuss the new democratic programme in industrial, social, and educational reform. Mr. Hobson is one of the ablest and most independent of modern thinkers and writers on political and social topics, so that the coming volume will be welcomed by students

* * *

SOME time ago, when speaking of the services rendered by foreign scholars to English literary history, we spoke of the monograph on John Lyly which Professor Feuillerat of Rennes has in preparation. The Cambridge University Press now announces that the volume will be published early next year. It will contain particulars of important discoveries concerning Lyly's life, and will add much to our knowledge of the social import of "Euphuism."

* * *

THERE never was a time like the present for publishing the letters of everybody with the slightest claim to distinction, and, following the prevailing fashion, the centenary of Professor Blackie's birth has been marked by the issue, through Messrs. Blackwood, of a collection of letters written by him to his wife and to other members of his family. In Blackie's case the publication is justified, for, though these letters relate nothing of any importance, they enable readers to form a notion of his quaint, picturesque, rattling, and vivacious personality, while they also provide glimpses of several of his famous contemporaries. Carlyle, Tennyson, Browning, Gladstone, the two Newmans, Jowett, Stanley, Thirlwall, Mark Pattison, Tyndall, Matthew Arnold, and a crowd of others are mentioned. Of Carlyle he writes: "I knocked up Carlyle, a strange mixture of grey, weather-beaten solemnity and hilarity; full of sweeping denunciations as usual, but not at all bitter. I scribbled a note on him on my return: 'Carlyle is strong to arouse by a tremendous moral force, and to startle by vivid and striking pictures; but he has neither wisdom to guide those whom he has roused, nor sobriety to tone his pictures down to reality. He is always talking about veracity, but he habitually revels in exaggeration and one-sided presentation, which is more than a lie.' But we fraternised in a brotherly way, and embraced on parting." Browning, he says, was "frank, free, and full of talk, altogether an agreeable, natural, sound-headed, and sound-hearted man, with no poetical or other nonsense about him: a direct, manly, hard-hitting Englishman, as in his most effective works he certainly appears."

* * *

BLACKIE'S theological liberalism—from which he never wavered—is reflected all through the volume. He was a great sermon-taster, and speaks in high terms of the preaching of Stanley, Jowett, Haweis, and Dr. Stopford Brooke. His greatest praise is reserved for Dr. Horton, whom he declares to be "a man worth going a thousand miles to hear. . . . He is certainly the best preacher that I have heard during a long life of church-going. Equal in dignity and gesture to Dr. Guthrie, less flowery and more solid, utterly unconventional, and not in the least vulgar—a model preacher in every respect." At a dinner given in 1883 by Holman Hunt at Fulham, Blackie mentions as among the guests "Mr. Clodd, a literary man of Broad Church sympathies." We wonder whether Mr. Edward Clodd would admit the accuracy of the description?

* * *

WITHIN the past couple of weeks both Professor Lombroso's book and Mr. Stead's articles have directed public attention to spiritualism. Another contribution to the subject will be Mr. Hereward Carrington's "Eusapia Palladino and Her Phenomena." It gives an account of experiments made, with the help of the Italian medium, by Lombroso, Richet, Flammarion, Sir Oliver Lodge, and others. Eusapia Palladino's trickery was exposed some years ago at Cambridge, but the men of science just mentioned believe that there has been nothing fraudulent in what they witnessed. A full narrative of her career is contained in Mr. Carrington's book.

* * *

WE have heard a rumor that the collection of "diversions and perversions" in verse, entitled "Goodchild's Garland," by "Henry Nemo," which Mr. Elkin Matthews has just published, is the work of Mr. Henry Newbolt. The book contains a number of thoroughly fresh and delightful rhymes about children.

* * *

THE second volume of Mr. Aylmer Maude's biography of Tolstoy will be published early in the New Year by Messrs. Constable. The first volume dealt with the first fifty years of Tolstoy's life, and the coming instalment will bring the record down to the present day. Mr. Maude is at present visiting Count Tolstoy in Russia, and Countess Tolstoy is reading the volume before publication, to ensure its accuracy.

* * *

MR. W. C. BROWNELL, the American critic, whose collection of essays called "Victorian Prose Masters," was published in this country some years ago, has finished a companion volume, "American Prose Masters," which will be issued immediately. It contains critical essays on Poe, Hawthorne, Emerson, Cooper, Lowell, and Mr. Henry James, and, judging from its predecessor, it is likely to be a fresh and suggestive piece of work.

* * *

WE understand that Mr. Arthur Hayden is preparing a biography of Josiah Wedgwood, the famous English potter. Mr. Hayden is known as an authority upon all matters relating to English earthenware in the eighteenth century. The Wedgwood family have placed their private store of biographical material at his disposal for the coming work.

Reviews.

CHINA IN COLOR PICTURES.*

EASTERN Asia is no longer a mysterious realm known in part only to the medieval traveller and the Jesuit missionary. Traveller, diplomatist, and missionary vie with each other in describing its rice plains, mountain ranges, and city and village life. The photographer with his camera has been in every province from the Gulf of Tonquin to the Great Wall, and now the artist is sketching its shrines, pavilions, creeks, and flower gardens, and helping the imagination of those who must stay at home, to realise the richly-colored atmospheres which sometimes enfold these sub-tropical scenes. The two books before us reach a high level of excellence and form an instructive contrast to the illustrations of Chinese scenes and industries which were published three-quarters of a century ago. The workmanship of Mr. Mortimer Menpes is well known to the public, and these admirable color processes reproduce its characteristic qualities with little abatement from its original interest. The Chinese faces are singularly life-like. In two or three pictures the suggestion of red in the flesh-tints is perhaps rather too marked, and would go far to discredit the usage of describing the Chinese as "The Yellow Race." In a face reflecting the sunset, or flushed with samshoo, or tingling with the flick of the northern cold, the red might be seen, but it is scarcely ever found south of the Yangtze River. Miss Kemp's water-color sketches of landscapes, temples, monasteries, and bridges sample the country as a whole, and convey a more natural impression of its characteristics, although she falls behind the better-known artist in treating the Chinese features, as also in the brilliant reflections on stone-work. Her Chinese figures are small in scale, and there seems a tendency, perhaps due to the printing processes, to make the face unduly wide. The features of the group in the opium refuge are not cadaverous enough, and must surely represent complete convalescence. One face in the foreground is unnaturally elongated. It is not impossible, but in the course of a long sojourn in China the present writer only once met with such a departure from the normal type, and the man was at once picked out from the rank and file and nicknamed by his polite friends "Horse Face." Two accurate studies of the Miao and Shan physiognomies deserve the attention of those anthropologists who are interested in the Indo-Chinese races. The color sketches of both volumes surpass anything that has yet been done in bringing China before the public. They convey everything but the nervous depression often produced by these gorgeous sunsets and the odors which haunt the creeks.

The letterpress of the Menpes volume, from the pen of an ex-Governor of the Colony of Hong Kong, is not worthy of the pictures with which it is interleaved, and has been huddled together without any reference to them. Sir Henry Blake is not a well-instructed authority upon Chinese questions. He has seen the things he has been taken to see in a sedan chair carried by as many coolies as a viceroy's, and has heard certain things told him by official interpreters and half-Anglicised Chinamen. A greater jumble than some of the chapters, paragraphs, and sentences it would be difficult to imagine. In the same chapter the reader will find a description of the Yangtze River, a few remarks about the Ming tombs at Nanking, jerky jottings of a visit to Peking, and one-sided excerpts from the report of the Singapore Opium Commission. Sir Henry Blake uses the popular artist as a sandwichman to advertise reactionary views resurrected in the interests of Crown Colony finance. It is to be hoped Mr. Mortimer Menpes feels flattered by the uses to which his talent is put. A description of the Canton flower-boats gives an unwholesome "whiffiness" to one of the pages. It is no discredit to a Hong Kong official that he should have the courage to be pro-Chinese, but he surely carries the thing too far when he hints a preference for the flower-boat to our own form of the social evil. Eighty per cent. of the Chinese population, in spite of its many frailties, manages to muddle along without the flower-boat. Our author is not always accurate as a transmitter of second-hand information. He says that the rice is first planted in a nursery. That term may perhaps be used to describe the little corner of the field which is first flooded into slush and used as a seed-plot before the transplanting begins, but the word conveys a wrong impression to the average English reader. We are told that the Chinese mandarin is fond of visiting his friends and engaging in conversation over a friendly cup of tea. In official visits the cup of tea is the sign that the interview is closed.

In many parts of the book bits of sentences are dumped together, and no attempt is made to link them into logical intelligibility. Incongruous things lie side by side like the various articles on the counter of a marine store-dealer. We are told of the Chinese farmer, "He has not often more than one wife, who, being entirely at his mercy, rules him with a rod of iron, and to whom as a rule he leaves the emotional part of the religion of his family." The description of a Chinese theatre ends thus: "When the play is finished, if there are wealthy men present servants come in laden with strings of copper cash, which are laid upon the stage." After describing the means of locomotion in Shanghai with gharries for the wealthy, he adds, "and for the poorer Chinese the ubiquitous wheelbarrow mentioned by Milton, that is palpably the one-wheeled progenitor of the Irish jaunting car." Speaking of the Happy Valley Cemetery, Hong Kong, we are informed that "here Christian and Mohammedan, Eastern and Western, rest from their labors, while below them in the oval valley, every sport and game of England is in full swing." The dissimilar associations that creep into the sentence half imply that these polyglot ghosts have a great time at the Hong Kong races.

The only information of interest or original value which Sir Henry gives is drawn from his own experience as a Colonial Governor. If he does not claim to be a Puritan moralist, he has humane instincts. He congratulates himself that when he had to extradite two Chinese criminals, he induced the Chinese Viceroy to promise that if a sentence of capital punishment had to be carried out, it should not be preceded by the customary method of extorting confession by torture. On p. 65 he gives a curious fact, which shows how great changes turn upon small incidents in our home legislation. At one time certain cotton goods needed for the Chinese market were bought in Germany and shipped from English ports. When the Merchandise Marks Act was passed these goods arrived bearing the German stamp. The native merchants went to the German Consul and asked if it would not be possible to deal direct with the manufacturers. The result is the goods are now sent from Germany, with unforeseen results. Some days the German steamers in Hong Kong harbor outnumber the British. It is difficult to believe our eyes when we read in these pages that in the native quarter of the colony of Hong Kong land has changed hands at £160,000 an acre. The land, we believe, is Crown land, held on long leases. Those who administer Crown Colonies with such increments to deal with can surely raise revenue in other ways than by exploiting the vices of the Chinaman. We can understand Sir Henry's statement that he has rarely seen a coolie reduced to squalor and beggary by opium-smoking. Perhaps he seeks other pastures than the highway of an expensive Colony when he is nearing the starvation line. The West End prodigal does not haunt Cavendish and Berkeley Squares after he has pawned his shirt. The enormous price of land has to do with the woes of other cities besides London, Liverpool, and Sheffield. The plague will not be dislodged from its stronghold in the native quarters of Hong Kong till these conditions are changed.

"The Face of China" is a modest title for a book of travels, and perhaps the writer does not claim to do more than give casual sketches of the country and its inhabitants. But Miss Kemp has well-trained powers of observation, knows how to sift her facts, and is able to set them forth with no little grace of style. She has covered some of the ground traversed by the late Mrs. Bishop and Mrs. Archibald Little, and in literary craftsmanship is quite the equal of those accomplished ladies. She spent twelve months with her sister and her brother-in-law, a medical missionary, in Taiyuanfu, before the days of the Boxer riots. This apprenticeship evidently

* "China." By Mortimer Menpes and Sir H. A. Blake. A. & C. Black. 5s. net.

"The Face of China." By E. G. Kemp. Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.

gave her a good foundation of knowledge and courage for the adventures of after years. On her journey into Shansi, described in Chapter IX, she was entertained by a courtly Chinese evangelist, who was afterwards martyred in the great tribulation, together with his flock of forty-one members. She saw the full cycle of native life in this famous city of the Chinese Hinterland. In subsequent journeys she visited the birth-place and tomb of Confucius, Tai Shan, the Olympus of the Chinese Classics, and the Buddhist Monastery at Omi, half-way up into the clouds. One of the Buddhist monasteries in Szchwan she found more wholesome in tone and less repulsive than a Peking monastery known to most travellers. Accompanied by a lady friend and a Chinese interpreter from St. John's College, Shanghai, who seems to have served the party with shrewdness, fidelity, and unfailing cheerfulness, she ascended the famous gorges beyond Ichang, and passed through Yunnan to Burma. Against the advice of some friends, she went quite unarmed, and found her confidence in the good feeling of the people justified. No serious incivility was encountered. In her preface she observes: "It is no wonder some travellers should meet with incivility, considering the methods of dealing with natives they adopt." Miss Kemp managed to make her will prevail with baggage-coolies and chair-bearers who did not always wish to face unpromising weather and had their own ideas about suitable lodging-places for the night. Her sympathies are with the Chinese, and she has not only limned the "Face of China," but has got nearer to its heart than most travellers. In Western China she saw some of the races which preceded the Chinese in possession of the soil. Amongst the Lolos the birth of daughters is more prized than that of sons, and woman is chivalrously respected in tribal warfare. The last chapter, on "The Present Position in China," is of great interest and value, and brings our information down to some of the most recent developments.

AN ENGLISH SALON.*

THE social world is roughly, but definitely, divisible by two. Half of it, without knowing Lady St. Helier, know all about her; the other half, those who know her well, find her an enigma. To one set her house is a by-word; to the other it is something like a shrine. Those to whom she is but a name think of her as the person who broke down the old order and made society "Bohemian"; those to whom she is more than a name do not regard her as a reformer or a destroyer at all. Some there are who speak of her despitefully. It is remarkable that these are invariably persons who, not knowing her, know all about her. Among the others there is never an ill word, or an ill thought, touching her. It seems odd to be writing thus in public about a private person; but that arises from the nature of the case. Lady St. Helier has long been something akin to a national institution. Her private relationships with the world have long been open and extensive. Now she has herself disclosed them all, or at least as much of them as can be dealt with in a volume of reasonable size. One's first impression, after reading the book, is that Lady St. Helier has hardly done justice to her theme. Many notable persons whom one has met under her roof are unmentioned. Call this an autobiography? In comparison with what she could have written had she wished, it is no more than a causerie suggested by a single evening party.

The volume does not contain many "stories," and of the few it does give the best are already familiar. Indeed, Lady St. Helier seems to have but a poor memory for non-essential things. Her strength, as revealed in this book, lies in a swift and sure appreciation of character. The chapters in which she makes a set survey of her friends read as if they were sections of "Who's Who" translated into the most vivid of modern journalism. Not a single sketch is weak. One here or there, such as that of the Duchess of Marlborough, mother of Lord Randolph Churchill, is only to be called great.

"Nothing was more beautiful, more touching, than her devotion to her son. She lived for nobody else, and when, after the death of her husband, she came and settled in London, the whole of her life was devoted to helping his political career, as far as she could, with all the might of her deep, passionate admiration, great ability, and social influence. Lord Randolph's affection for his mother was very deep and sincere, and he attached much importance to her opinion. She was very judicious, very tactful, never obtruding herself in any way, but watching all the developments of his life, quietly and silently helping when she felt she could; or, what is perhaps a greater trial to a woman, standing by patiently and doing nothing. In all the eventful moments of his life she extended to him the same watchful and devoted affection. I shall never forget the bright ecstasy and joy with which she welcomed his being made Leader of the House of Commons. I went to say good-bye to her before leaving for Scotland, and shall always remember the passionate delight with which she spoke of it. To her it was, as it were, a political Nunc Dimittis. He had reached the height of his ambition, and she was content. One hardly likes to remember the poignant grief and disappointment that his resignation was to her, and yet she never blamed him, and always thought that whatever he did was right; and through the remaining years of his life she followed the terrible tragedy in silence, eating her heart out, and yet trying to keep a brave face before him and the world. And when the end came, and all that she had loved was laid to rest at Woodstock, the pathos of that moment was indescribable—that she had lived to see him die!"

Can one wonder that a woman who has the tender understanding of humanity which these passages reveal is loved by those who know her? Surely not. For many years there has been a general puzzlement as to Lady St. Helier's position. How did she manage to maintain it in despite of the common knowledge that her parties were extraordinarily "mixed"? The general theory was that her social success was the outcome of a deep-laid political plot. If she threw her doors open to the notabilities of democracy, and kept them open, the Tory nobility would come too; distinctions of all sorts, patrician and proletarian, would fraternise; and Toryism would take the rising democratic wind from the sails of the enemy. This was all nonsense. It was not only the Tory grandees who frequented the house of Lady St. Helier. From Gladstone to Mr. Chamberlain in his Republican days, all the statesmen and aspiring politicians were there as well. Lady St. Helier herself, it is true, was always a Tory; but that was a matter of no importance to any Radical, however red. Lord Salisbury, Lord Halsbury, Lord Randolph, and the others of that school gave her their friendship no more readily than Liberals such as Bright and Nationalists like Parnell. Thus her political attitude does not account for Lady St. Helier's position. Another explanation was that she alone in London sought to have a salon as salons are understood in Paris. That hypothesis was equally feeble. For many a year other ladies have been trying to rival her. Not one of them has succeeded. That the efforts are not generally known about is accounted for by the simple fact that a lady never avows an endeavor in that line of life. Lady St. Helier, though singularly lacking in self-consciousness, thinks that the peculiar popularity with which her salon has been favored was an incidental but inevitable result "of Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill." That, too, is ridiculous. Society would have had its likes, dislikes, and indifferences even if we had been still the narrowest oligarchy. Our entertaining annalist is what she is, delightful because of a certain instinctive, unselfish sympathy with every generous aspiration.

ARCHITECTURE AND EVOLUTION.*

It is a great pleasure, and, in these days, unhappily, a rare one, to light upon a book of which both the writing and the illustrations are the fruit of long and disinterested thought and study. Mr. and Mrs. Pennell have known and loved France, and especially French architecture, for many years. Their intimacy is of the kind permitted only to those whose daily work, as well as pleasure, is engrossed by their subject. It was natural that the intricate yet expressive lines

* "Memories of Fifty Years." By Lady St. Helier (Mary Jeune). Arnold. 15s. net.

* "French Cathedrals." By Elizabeth Robins Pennell. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. Unwin. 20s. net.

of Gothic architecture, with its richness of detail and vigor of purpose, should appeal strongly to Mr. Pennell's talent as an artist, for that talent was as specifically linear in character as the architecture it was devoted to illustrating. There is a quality in the incisive, cleaving little strokes of the etching-needle which corresponds, perhaps, as closely as the methods of an alien art may, with the elaborate, delicate, yet essentially energetic chisel work of Gothic design. Mr. Pennell began his Gothic studies many years ago in England. His successful illustrations of the English cathedrals led to a demand on the part of the "Century Magazine" for a series of the great churches of France. The commission must have exactly hit off the artist's wishes. French Gothic is the Gothic of the centre, the only Gothic that works out freely and fully the idea which may be said to inspire the Gothic style. It was in the French atmosphere of Gothic that Mr. Pennell realised, perhaps, most fully his vocation.

"The work," Mrs. Pennell writes—the work of illustrating the French churches—"before it came to an end, carried us north and south, east and west, from one cathedral town to another; it kept us in each sometimes for weeks, sometimes for months; it spread over eighteen years, so that we got to know them all with an intimacy that visiting them for pleasure alone could never have given us." It has fallen to Mrs. Pennell's lot to write the accounts, historical and descriptive, of the buildings thus deliberately studied and almost, for considerable periods of time, lived in, and admirably has she fulfilled her task. Architecture is the art which, more vividly than any other, embodies the thoughts and the lives of its builders, and to the appreciation of its message Mrs. Pennell brought a natural quickness of sympathy as well as a literary talent entirely adequate to the expression of her ideas and emotions. The result of so happy and unusual a combination of gifts is a work which can lay claim, if not to unreserved, at least to high praise—a work which, if it seems sometimes not quick to grasp the depth of the human meaning and interest of its subject, yet does convey much of that meaning and interest, and conveys them, moreover, in terms that carry ready conviction and assent.

What we have to say by way of qualification is soon said. Her acceptance of technical explanations of the evolution of the Gothic style has, as it seems to us, prevented Mrs. Pennell from completely grasping the significance of her subject from the human point of view. The Gothic style, she observes in her preface, "was based upon science," and "the laws of thrust and balance" were the predominant factors in its evolution. "Ruskin, for years, set everybody to seeking in a building the last qualities that should be looked for in it—virtue and vice, truth and falsehood, right and wrong—and the enthusiasm he kindled was for ethics, not for art. He only succeeded in preventing his devoted disciples from seeing cathedrals as they are." We must have recourse, it seems, to a professional architect if we would appreciate "the romance there is in the logic of growth and borrow some of his enthusiasm for architecture, not as a branch of ethics, but as an art and a science." True, Mrs. Pennell does not stick very consistently to this barren point of view. In the very next paragraph she refers to the associations that rightfully belong to a great cathedral and "the faith that was its inspiration," forgetting that half a minute ago the laws of thrust and balance were supposed to be its inspiration; but, still, it is also true that what she has learnt of the technical "explanation" of Gothic does more or less adhere to her mind and does constantly stand between her and a full appreciation of the Gothic style, just as it has stood, and still stands, between hundreds of others and a full appreciation of that style. It is, we believe, a fact that the technical explanation which accounts for an architectural style as a "growth"—that is to say, as an inevitable evolution from preceding structural forms, has done more to kill interest in the subject of architecture than any other cause whatever.

We wish Mrs. Pennell had attempted to explain, if not to the reader, to herself, the meaning of that precious word "growth" as applied to architecture. If she had done so, she would have found that, considered as a cause and origin of changes in structural forms, it can have no meaning whatever. All changes in architecture have been dictated by changes in human needs, human character, human aspirations and ideals, and until such time as stones cut and quarry themselves and proceed to erect themselves without human aid, they will continue to be so dictated. There is, indeed, a coherence and continuity running through architectural development, but they do not argue a principle of growth inherent in architecture itself; they are a reflection of the coherence and continuity which pre-empt over changes and developments in human ideas. Need leads to need, thought leads to thought, and, slowly veering to the mind's leadership, the forms of architecture move to the embodiment of such needs and thoughts. Thus architecture is always the expression of something in the mind. It follows always the mind's guidance. It is now frivolous and mundane, now intensely spiritual, now purely intellectual, according as the spirit of the age inclines to this direction or that. Its changes are rapid or gradual to the extent to which changes of thought are rapid or gradual, and it only needs the influence of a current of totally new ideas imported by a new race for the very appearance of evolution or growth in the style to be dissipated, and a new set of structural forms to be invented to express the new requirements.

Does Mrs. Pennell doubt this? We can show her that it is so. When the Arab invasions swept over Southern Europe, the invaders set to work to build in their own image. They had no previous experience of architecture. They were hot from the sand, and had never built anything but tents all their lives. They employed Byzantine and Romanesque architects to build for them, but their fiery and restless temperaments detested the calm stability of the round arched styles, and they proceeded, instantly and without thinking twice about it, to invent all those whimsical and eccentric arch forms and other features in which their own restless impulses are so vividly embodied. Where, here, is the continuity, the logic of growth? Will anyone pretend that the placid round arch has those mad freaks inherent in its nature, that they were bound to come out, that their existence is to be accounted for by the mechanical operation of structural laws? Confront it with a crisis of this sort, confront it with a situation in which the theory of growth in the sphere of ideas does not act, and immediately that theory breaks down as an architectural explanation. No possible notion of continuity will explain the wild outburst of Arab fantasies in architecture, for they are continuous with nothing that went before; on the contrary, they stand for a sudden and violent dislocation of all pre-existing methods. There is but one thing that explains them, and that is the Arab himself. Understand him, understand his personality and temperament, and the fickle, fiery impulses that moved him to action, and you hold the clue to his so-called style of architecture. But try and find a meaning for it elsewhere, try and account for it by theories of growth and principles of thrust and balance, and it will never be anything more to you than so much rubbishy bricks and mortar.

This is so with all architecture. The meaning of it is not in itself, but is derived from man. Architects can explain to us better than anyone how a building is constructed, but why it was so constructed they have no especial means of knowing. The worst of it is that they are so intent on the how, and so inevitably immersed in its study, that they get to think it contains the why. They get to think that the means by which men carried out their designs were the cause which evolved these designs. To do this is to annihilate all but the technical interest of architecture, for such an explanation has, not human nature, but building material for its subject.

All who adopt the mechanical point of view pay for it, and Mrs. Pennell is no exception. She does not, indeed, pay so heavily as some, for she does not at every step intrude the usual little technical explanations upon us. But she pays in this—that the mere fact of having accepted the technical theory debars her from realising the entire significance of the style she is dealing with. Gothic architecture is probably the most vivid representation of life that was ever yet cast in stone, but you must accept it as such if you would get all its meaning out of it. Mrs. Pennell has written an excellent book, but she would, perhaps, have written a more excellent one still if she had never heard of the theory of "growth" and the "laws of thrust and balance."

THE UNKNOWN ISLE.*

To most English people Ireland is far more truly a foreign country than any part of Europe, except perhaps Spain and Russia. It is not only that the English seldom go there, and are entirely ignorant of Ireland's history and present condition. The mind and temperament of the people are so different, their associations and objects are so new, that the Englishman rightly feels himself a foreigner on landing, and a foreigner he remains. The more "sympathetic" he is, the more he is conscious of being a stranger. Tourists and golfers, of course, may run about in Ireland and come back gasping out comic stories and praise of their warm-hearted welcome. But tourists and golfers are foreigners nowhere, for they never leave their English home, but carry it on their backs, like snails. It is the "sympathetic" traveller who suffers as an alien—the man who goes with a real desire to be friendly with the people and understand their nature. Take Thackeray, for instance. In his account of his journey through Co. Mayo, he writes:—

"In the various cabins I have entered, I have found talking a vain matter; the people are suspicious of the stranger within their wretched gates, and are shy, sly, and silent. I have commonly only been able to get half-answers in reply to my questions, given in a manner that seemed plainly to intimate that the visit was unwelcome."

And yet, as Mr. Lynd says in quoting the passage, the district of which Thackeray was here writing is one of the most hospitable in Ireland.

Thackeray, to be sure, was just the type of the common English visitor—patronising, inquisitive, sentimental, and never losing his conscious superiority; but still we must call him "sympathetic," as English visitors go, and he only suffered in extreme degree from what everyone of his kind feels more or less. The country is foreign, and should be visited in the same spirit as Portugal or Sicily. But for those who would visit it in this spirit, or would confer on it the benefit of not visiting it at all, we can imagine no better key to the present state of the country and its own people than Mr. Lynd's new book. It is written with the knowledge that only comes from childhood's intimacy, but can often be most vividly expressed by those who have long been absent from their native home and then return. Though nominally dealing only with home life, Mr. Lynd touches upon every phase of Irish existence and every problem of to-day—farming, industrial life, marriage, population, education, superstitions, religion, politics, Sinn Fein, and many other subjects, and yet the treatment is never inhuman, statistical, or abstract. It just gives us the picture of what is really going on at the present time, as seen by an observant and grave, but gravely humorous, Irishman.

On the whole it is a hopeful picture, and to many the hopefulness will seem the strangest and most attractive part about it. Mr. Lynd devoutly believes in the rebirth of the country. He sees the new spirit revealing itself under all manner of forms—in language, in dress, in games, and even in trade. But the first and most hopeful sign of all he finds in the growing unity of the country as a whole. He counts all as Irish who were born in the country or whose fathers were born there. The Ulsterman, he says, is no longer a foreigner in Ireland, and, we suppose, he would even include within the growing sense of nationality the "shoneens," or genteel persons who pay court to the "garrison," and strive to appear more English than the English. His attitude is expressed in Parnell's saying, that "Ireland cannot spare a single Irishman," and on all sides he sees the old lines of distrust and distinction breaking down. Such taste of bitterness as he has is kept almost entirely for the Irish "gentry" or old landowning class, whom he compares to people passing through one of the wonderful places of the world in a closed carriage, with the blinds pulled down. But he believes that even the Irish aristocracy is not going to perish without hope of a blessed resurrection, and at the present moment he sees the beginnings, as it were, of a great act of national repentance, in which Irish men and women of all creeds and classes are taking part.

Mr. Lynd admits that there is plenty of call for repentance. He, of course, sets aside the common English idea that the Irish are naturally fond of dirt and un-tidiness, and prefer to keep their pigs by the fire. Dirt has never been typical of them; the untidiness was used in self-defence, for fear the landowners should raise the rent upon them at any sign of tidy prosperity; and it is no pleasure to the peasant to be obliged sometimes to bring his live stock into the cottage for warmth, just as we bring cats and dogs into the house, though they are not so necessary for our existence. He also protests against the English "stage Irishman," whether as the result of English ideas of humor, or of Irish endeavors to please by assuming the buffoon, and one hopes it may be the last time the protest is needed. But he is not blind to the dreariness of much in Irish life:—

"It is my strenuous opinion," he writes, "that there is nothing in the world more essentially a national matter than taste—taste in dress, in food, in manners, in household arrangement—and that a people without nationality must always be a people without taste. Ireland is a country whose nationality has become as weak as watered gruel, and, until that is made strong and real again, as I believe it will be with the help of the Gaelic spirit, I see no prospect that Irish farm-houses will become beautiful and colour-haunted places, inhabited by distinctively-dressed women and well-mannered men."

An Irishman with such ideals of nationality inevitably takes "Sinn Fein" as his political faith. For "Sinn Fein," like the Indian "Swadeshi" (which means exactly the same), is simply the expression of exclusive nationality hoping to make itself independent of the dominant Power in trade, manufactures, habits, politics, language, and literature. The Sinn Feiners might take as their motto Swift's well-known advice to the Irish people: "Burn everything that comes from England, except the people and the coals." A good instance of this national determination (and it is also part of the Swadeshi creed of India) is the resolve to cut down the drink bill so that Ireland may become a financial loss to the British Treasury, instead of being a gain, as at present, and England may have one more practical reason for letting Ireland go. When these tactics of abstinence were started, it was ironically proposed to the Unionists that they should drink double to keep the Union solvent, and they took the proposal seriously, and drank as "Loyalists" never drank before. The incident is told in Mr. Lynd's chapter on "Sinn Fein," and his whole account should be read for an understanding of this far-reaching movement, which is changing the whole aspect of Irish politics and daily life. In a few lines Mr. Lynd sums it up:—

"Sinn Fein stands alone in Irish politics as having both a national and constructive policy. It aims at building a nation to include all the races and creeds and ranks that inhabit Ireland. It recognises the existence of only one race in Ireland—not the Celtic or the Gaelic or the Danish or the Norman or the Saxon, but the Irish race. It desires the revival of the national language, not because it is the language of the Gael, but because it is the traditional language of the Irish people."

The worst thing that has been happening in Ireland, as he says, is, not so much the tragedy of want of character, as the tragedy of waste of character. "Ireland is a country, not only of wasted fields, but of wasted men and women." The real problem before the country is to recover from that waste, and to allow it to continue no more; and the value of Mr. Lynd's book lies equally in his shrewd, and, as we have called them, gravely humorous pictures of present conditions, and in the hopefulness with which he points out the practical issues of a future already near.

FAITH AND ITS PSYCHOLOGY.*

No more important treatise has come of late years from an English-speaking theologian than Professor Inge's "Faith and its Psychology"; for thoroughness, for incisive phrase, for insight, it would be difficult to rate it too highly. The book is one of the first consequence; and it may seem ungrateful, since this is so, to point out a defect which does not, perhaps, affect its substance. But it is a defect which has recurred of late in so much of the writer's work that it may be well to call attention to it. This is the curious asperity of his strictures on Modernism and Modernists.

* "Home Life in Ireland." By Robert Lynd. Mills & Boon. 8s. net.

* "Faith and its Psychology." By W. R. Inge. Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.

Much of his criticism on the movement is, we think, justified. Modernism is over abstract; it is often enough "opportunism in excelsis"; and such apologetic as that of M. Le Roy's "Dogme et Critique" is "fundamentally unsound," both in itself and "when applied, as the Modernists apply it, to justify their own position in the Roman Church." This is true; and it should be said. But the animus of the critic discounts his criticism. To say that "M. Loisy's Jesus may have been a more respectable Messiah than Theudas, but he belongs to the same category," or to ask, "For whose benefit does the Modernist priest go on praying to the Queen of Heaven, whom he believes to be a purely mythical personage?" is—well, ill-mannered is the only word. "Penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos:" the note of provincialism is one which, as a nation, we acquired early, and (it would appear) have not lost. "The Pope was quite right in condemning Modernism; he could not possibly have done otherwise." From a Liberal Churchman—and Dr. Inge's book is eminently that of a Liberal Churchman—this is a strange sentiment. It is possible to "protest too much." Of a French scholar who was thought to do so, "He is like an elderly cocotte," said a witty prelate, "who, having taken to piety, offers the pain béni on Sundays, and gathers her indignant skirts about her as she passes her former friends." It is not necessary to take up all M. Loisy's positions. They are advance posts; and, perhaps, at times, insufficiently covered; their communications with the main force may seem insecure. But the tendency of critical science is to advance; and it is rash to go out of one's way to disclaim positions which may become inevitable in the near future. This is the rock upon which much apologetic has foundered. It is a maxim of prudence not to prove more than your case.

Dr. Inge's purpose is to vindicate the position of reason, in the large sense of the word, in religion. Irrationalism—whether it takes the shape of reliance on authority, or on feeling, or on will, or on the practical requirements of life—has been overdone. These things are but secondary grounds of faith. The root lies deeper; it is to be found not without but within the self. And this self is taken with, and for, its whole content.

"The conclusion which I maintain is that faith is not independent of the intellectual processes; and that whatever form dualism takes—whether, with Kant, we separate the theoretical from the practical reason; or, with Ritschl, judgments of fact from judgments of value; or, with Loisy, the Christ of faith from the Christ of history—the result is profoundly unsatisfactory."

The desire to defend religion, which underlies this apologetic, is natural and legitimate. But the "democratisation of thought," popular in a democratic age, is a real danger. "It has bred a dislike of intellectual superiority, and a reluctance to allow reason and knowledge to arbitrate on burning questions. Everywhere we find the praises of feeling or instinct sung, and the danger of intellectualism exposed." But "in civilised mankind reason has largely displaced instinct, which is no longer so trustworthy as in the brutes." And "since this process is certain to go further, distrust of reason is suicidal, and to exclude it from matters of Faith must be disastrous." This is the writer's standpoint; and the book has a threefold scope.

"Firstly, to vindicate for religious faith its true dignity as a normal and healthy part of human nature. Next, to insist that faith demands the actual reality of its objects, and can never be content with a God who is only an ideal. Lastly, to show in detail how most of the errors and defects in religious belief have been due to a tendency to arrest the development of faith prematurely, by annexing it to some one faculty to the exclusion of others, or by resting on given authority. The true goal is an unified experience which will make authority no longer external."

This position is not open to the objections which have been brought against what is called Intellectualism. The reason on which it lays stress is the knowing faculty, or, better, the knowing self, as a whole, not the logical understanding. It is not individual, because, though in differing measure, it is common to all men; nor arbitrary, because it moves pari passu with this common reason by which its action is checked and revised at every turn. If, indeed, a man insists that human nature is an elaborate illusion, that the scheme of things is so framed as to mislead and deceive us, his cure must be brought about by experience rather than by argument. "There are many proofs of God's existence; but no demonstrations"; the denial can be refuted, but not disproved.

"God, 'whose centre is everywhere and His circumference nowhere,' cannot be fitted into a diagram. He is rather the canvas on which the picture is painted, or the frame in which it is set."

The innate instinct of, or impulse to, Faith "arises in the psychological necessity which obliges us to assign values to our experience." We attach an intrinsic and absolute value to three things: Truth, Conduct, and Beauty. With regard to the first, the writer's position is "a moderate realism."

"I believe that we are in contact with external reality, and that we may trust our faculties when they tell us (as they do with the utmost emphasis) that our knowledge is not merely of our own mental states, but of facts which exist independently of our mental states. At the same time, I hold that this confidence is matter of reasonable faith, and can never, from the nature of the case, be anything more."

The law of the second cannot be resolved into that of utilitarianism. "The form of the moral standard, 'You must,' is essential as well as the content." Nor does the categorical imperative find expression only in the voice of conscience. "It is the mark of all reality; and it compels our attention to the true and the beautiful in the same masterful tone as to the ethical demand." By its association with the first the sophistry of Pragmatism is overcome: things are not what they are not, but what they are. Its extension to the second strikes a uniquely suggestive note.

"Personally I have no doubt that many of the unsatisfactory features in our civilisation are due to the fact that we see nothing wrong in unnecessary ugliness, and so continually affront the Creator by disregarding one of His primary attributes."

An anthropocentric moralism is unthinkable; and defeats its own end.

"I am certain that one of the great causes of what we call 'difficulties' in the way of faith is the assumption that the universe was designed simply and solely as a school of moral discipline and probation for human beings. It appears to me that this is a survival of a prescientific view of the universe. It was tenable when geocentric theories prevailed; it is not tenable now. Our planet and our species have no such exclusive importance. And as for the exclusively moral character attributed to the Deity, do we really admire a character which is exclusively moral? Do we feel much respect for one who is blind to all sense of beauty, and willingly ignorant of all facts that cannot at once be converted into moral obligations? Is it really a worthy or a possible conception of God, that He is interested only in conduct, and is destitute of anything corresponding to what in us are called intellectual and æsthetic interests? If we wish to believe in such a Deity, we are certainly wise to construct a world for ourselves out of our wishes and sentiments, for the real world will contradict our beliefs at every turn."

This is the key to any rational outlook over experience. The return upon mind restores sanity; the insistence on beauty, if we hold fast to it, is a guarantee against relapse. Only do we see life steadily on the condition that we see it whole.

VARIETY IN FICTION.*

THE novel, they say, is threatened on every side, and yet, to all appearance, the number of new novels suffers no diminution. There are many people who regret the prevalence of the form, who would like to see the balance go down on the side of the drama, as it was in Elizabethan days; but there is one potent reason that renders the realisation of this hope improbable. And this reason is made evident by the seven books before us. Two of them are "tendency" stories: they are pamphlets, that is, though they are pamphlets well decorated and adorned. Then there is a half-fictitious portrait of one of the greatest figures in Italy and in literature; while another book, which deals with reigning houses and palace intrigues, is evidently a specimen of the roman à clef. The three remaining volumes are stories pure and simple, but one revolves round a theory of re-

* "The Prince of Destiny." By Sarath Kumar Ghosh. Rebmam. 6s.

"The Serpent and the Cross." By Stephen Andrew. Greening. 6s.

"The God of Love." By J. Huntly McCarthy. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

"Royal Lovers." By Hélène Vacaresco. Mills & Boon. 6s.

"Rebirth." By Rathwell Wilson. Greening. 6s.

"The Sinking Ship." By Eva Lathbury. Alston Rivers. 6s.

"Her Mother's Daughter." By Katharine Tynan. Smith. Elder. 6s.

incarnation, the other treats of the stage, and the last moves more strictly on the old lines of English domestic life plus incident. And here is the reason for the popularity of the novel form: its extreme flexibility. Enlarge the limits of the drama as you will, it will never be able to sweep with the wide, all-embracing net of the novel.

And, though the two tendency books have been classed together, there is a world of difference between them. "The Prince of Destiny," by Sarath Kumar Ghosh, deals, in a mystic, splendid, and Oriental manner, with the destinies of India. It is not written from the point of view of the Bengali democracy; it is something more than a plea for the extension of Parliamentary privileges to the Indian Empire. One might call it a rajah's book; it appeals to Englishmen to look at India through the glasses of the Indian nobles, to regard the descendants of the ancient rulers of the country as its present leaders and interpreters. The author, one imagines, does not want borough councils and an army of inspectors; he rather wishes the old Indian ideas of government to be revived under princes who are able to adapt European culture to Eastern requirements. His prince has acquired our scientific methods and our practical improvements; but he still sits on the throne of justice, and gives audience and redress to rich and poor alike. It is possible that there may be a good deal to be said for the theory; it is certainly put forward by the author in a very picturesque and convincing fashion.

Of a vastly different fashion is "The Serpent and the Cross." Here, for Oriental splendors, we have the slums of English manufacturing towns, the fashionable and "well-organised" church of Belgravia, the accommodating vicar thereof, and a thesis which urges the forces of Socialism and Anglo-Catholicism to amalgamate. It is true that Mr. Andrew's book is not wholly without its Oriental touch; the mysterious personage called "the Master" is of Eastern origin. And here, one suspects, is the defect of the tale. A good deal of the book is profoundly interesting and well observed; but in "the Master" and his conspiracy of evil one detects the flash of the limelight. The forces which make for evil are subtle; they would not open their campaign by placing green snakes on the altars of our principal cathedrals: white doves would be the more probable offering. At the same time it must be confessed, in view of certain recent publications, that there seem no limits to the gospel of impudent and cynical selfishness; but the malignancy of such a gospel is neutralised by its absurdity; the true danger proceeds from a very different quarter.

"The God of Love" is a reverent and beautiful description of the passion of Dante for the lady Beatrice. It is full of life and movement and color, of the stir and adventure and tragedy of those strange and beautiful and terrible Florentine days. Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy, who knows the secrets of melodrama—witness "If I were King," and "The Proud Prince" now running at the Lyceum Theatre—has very properly used a more austere pen for his picture of the great figure of Dante, and of that passion which was a great mystery of love. Here is a legend of Dante after the death of Beatrice:—

"It relates that one night Dante drifted towards that quarter of the city where such light loves find shelter. There many women plucked at his sleeve as he passed, and, at last, surrendering to temptation, he followed through the darkness one that was closely cloaked and hooded. . . . After a while they came to an open place that was moonlit, and then the woman paused and pulled back her hood, and there, for a moment, Dante looked upon the face of the dead Beatrice. In that instant Dante found himself alone, and he fled from the place in a great horror."

It is a question of taste whether the sorrows, tragedies, and misadventures of European Sovereigns are fit matter for the novelist. The writer confesses that he has a constitutional dislike to the roman à clef in general, and a more distinct and particular dislike to the introduction of living persons, crowned or uncrowned, into the substance of a story. Plain Bill and Jack and Sarah, people of humble station, would, it seems likely, be justly aggrieved if they saw their family history, under the thinnest of disguises, used to make an amusing or sensational tale, more particularly if that history were compact of tragedy and bitter sorrow. There seems no reason why an Emperor's lip should not enjoy the respect of silence as fully as a workman's wart; and madness and anguish should be as sacred in high places as in humble. However, if the subject-matter be allowed, it must be said that "Royal Lovers" makes exciting and interesting reading.

And now for the three tales which must be judged simply on their tale-telling merits. Well, it is to be feared that two of them—"Rebirth" and "The Sinking Ship"—are, in different ways, spoilt by a surplus of high-flown sentiment. The characters in "Rebirth" are supposed to be reincarnated, but the theory of reincarnation adds nothing to the interest of the story. The hero is a man of genius, but he does not convince; he is too flamboyant, too greatly the "leading juvenile" of melodrama. One feels a certain shudder when one reads that Percival had adopted "To create with joy" as his motto when he was only sixteen. It would be difficult to trace this shudder to its sources; but probably there is in most of us an opinion that a boy of sixteen should be occupied with other thoughts. "The Sinking Ship" is a story of the stage, and here, also, one discovers the unreal. A smart London housemaid does not discourse in this fashion:—

"Well, Mr. Story, I can't do heverything at once, not 'avin' two pairs of 'ands; if you'd wait till a-body was through before breakin' hout in this way with your complaints and your hobjections and your hinsinations, it 'ud be fairer."

Then there is Sibyl, who played her part with a "clean and clear cheek, which she had resolutely refused to stain with pigments." This sounds very fine, but, as a matter of fact, the natural human skin, exposed to the glare of floats and battens and "bunches," appears as a singularly grisly and ghastly white, the red, if any, looking like patches of dirt.

"Her Mother's Daughter" is an amiable and interesting novel. It is old-fashioned, but it is pleasant. The chief fault, perhaps, lies in the title. Miss Tynan should rather have called it "James Moore's Folly." For James Moore, knowing that his wife, Nesta—to whom he was most tenderly attached—disliked and distrusted his two brothers, persisted in leaving his whole property to them, relying on some vague—and extra-legal—understanding. Such a course was bound to bring about disaster; but the reader is consoled with a happy and peaceful ending.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"THE MEMOIRS OF THE DUCHESSE DE DINO, 1831-1835," an English translation of which is published by Mr. Heinemann (10s. net), are an addition of some importance to the memoirs that treat of English political life—both foreign and domestic—in the early 'thirties. The Duchesse de Dino's position gave her many opportunities for knowing most of what was happening in the world of affairs, and of these opportunities she made good use. She was Talleyrand's niece, and acted as his secretary during the four years, 1830-1834, of his English embassy, and she became intimate with Wellington, Grey, and others who moulded English policy in that decisive period. The present volume is based upon a diary kept by Madame de Dino while she stayed in England, and on a number of letters written over a period of thirty years to M. de Bacourt. It is natural to find a great deal about Talleyrand in this volume. Madame de Dino tells us that when Talleyrand got rid of his priest's orders he felt an extraordinary desire to fight a duel, and spent two months diligently looking for a quarrel. The Duc de Castries, whom he insulted, refused to challenge him, and Talleyrand's desire remained ungratified. The want of interest in Talleyrand's "Memoirs" is explained as being due to the fact that he trusted solely to his memory, never took notes, and was careless about composition. This explanation seems strange, for it is known that Talleyrand took a pride in the "Memoirs," and, as Madame de Dino herself tells us, he was fond of reading portions of them to all sorts of people. Madame de Dino had most of the prejudices of the grande dame, and disliked Lady Jersey, mainly because she was a granddaughter of Robert Child, the banker. She blames her for the schism at Almack's in 1834, and treats that event as an affair of importance. We get glimpses of the political intrigues of the Duchesse de Dino and her great rival, the Princesse de Lieven, though both ladies seem to have had too high a notion of their influence upon affairs. Madame de Dino shows considerable

NASH'S NEW . . . BOOKS

AN AMAZING AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

THE MEMOIRS OF HARRIETTE WILSON.

WRITTEN BY HERSELF.

Who was Harriette Wilson?

Harriette Wilson was one of the most notorious women of fashion in the early years of the Nineteenth Century. She was the friend and confidante of such men as the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Worcester, Lord Alvanley, "Poodle" Byng, Beau Brummell, "King" Allen, Lord Yarmouth, (Thackeray's Marquis of Steyne), the third Duke of Leinster, and the sixth Duke of Argyle, and what is really valuable in her book is the almost photographic fidelity with which she reproduces the conversations and traits of her friends. She observed the men of her "salon" as only a clever woman can, and because of this, her Memoirs form a most interesting and striking addition to the society chronicles of the time.

The Memoirs of Harriette Wilson

are NOW READY. TWO VOLUMES.
FULLY ILLUSTRATED. PRICE 24/- NET.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GEORGES.

By W. B. BOULTON. Illustrated. 15s. net.
"If all history were as entertaining as these well-studied and not uninteresting pages the novelists would hardly be so popular."—The Scotsman.

JANE AUSTEN and Her Country-House Comedy.

By W. H. HELM. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
"It is everything such a book should be; it is thoughtful, appreciative, without being uncritical, and just without being unkind; it is charmingly written too."—The Tatler.

NASH'S NEW 6s. FICTION

An important new novel by FRANKFORT MOORE.

THE FOOD OF LOVE

"The fine dry vintage of his humour will be a refreshment to the reader throughout the whole story."—The Times.
"Mr. Moore is at his best and wittiest."—The Pall Mall Gazette.

CHETWYND'S CAREER.

By HORACE WYNDHAM.

"Abounds in fine irony and clever characterisation."
—Manchester Courier.

THE PATIENCE OF JOHN MORLAND.

By MARY DILLON.

"A delightful story."—Madame.

THE ROAR OF THE SEA.

By WALTER WOOD

THE WHEATSTACK.

By J. S. FLETCHER.

A REALLY GREAT NOVEL ON THE BRANCH

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A WIDOW.

By PIERRE DE COULEVAIN.

EVELEIGH NASH . . LONDON

JAMES CLARKE & CO.

AN EXCEPTIONALLY STRONG NEW NOVEL.

FACES IN THE MIST;

A ROMANCE OF REALITY.

By J. A. STEUART. Author of "The Minister of State," "Wine on the Lees," "A Son of Gad," &c. With Four Illustrations by T. H. Robinson. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

The British Weekly.—"Vividly written. . . Mr. Steuart's delightful vein of humor finds ample scope in his descriptions of Yankee Highlanders. This novel will add to Mr. Steuart's high literary reputation. He has woven a thoroughly ingenious plot and his book is full of lively writing. As a love story it is remarkable for dramatic power."

Liverpool Courier.—"As readable a story as he has yet given us. Mr. Steuart's powers of vivid description have play with excellent effect. The selection of types have been most happy, and their traits are delineated with consistency and strength."

J. B. PATON, M.A., D.D., EDUCATIONAL AND SOCIAL REFORMER.

By JAMES MARCHANT. Photogravure Portrait and Illustrations on art paper. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

Manchester Courier.—"Highly interesting and carefully compiled. . . Admirers of the eminent and successful pioneer will not be disappointed with the volume which will stand as a comprehensive record of a varied career. It contains a set of excellent photographs, and is issued at a price within the reach of all."

The Rt. Hon. H. H. ASQUITH, M.P.

A BIOGRAPHY AND APPRECIATION.

By FRANK ELIAS. Photogravure Portrait Frontispiece of Mr. Asquith, and Illustrations on art paper. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"Mr. Asquith's career has been an interesting one, and the various stages in it are described by Mr. Elias with no little skill and with excellent judgment. Mr. Elias has respected the privacies of life, and we have none of that idle gossip and personal details which bulk so largely in many books of this class. He has instead given us a faithful and well-studied portrait, and his book can be cordially commended."

ASPECTS OF THE SPIRITUAL.

By L. BRIERLEY, B.A., Author of "Sidelights on Religion," "Ourselves and the Universe," &c. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

Birmingham Post.—"The tone of joyous wisdom and wise joy that pervades Mr. Brierley's book justifies its title. His essays are as companions who stimulate our thoughts while they win our affections. They are pervaded by so sweet a reasonableness, that they cannot irritate."

A CHALLENGE TO MONISM.

PROBLEMS of IMMANENCE

Studies, Critical and Constructive.

By J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., D.Phil., Author of "The New Evangel," "Jesus: Seven Questions," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

British Congregationalist.—"This book is a spiritual tonic, and worth reading from end to end. As an example of clear thinking, lucid expression, and sober common sense, it is one of the best books that we have read for some time. It is, moreover, a product of the times, and comes just when it is needed."

LIFE IN HIS NAME.

A Devotional Volume. By DAVID M. M'INTYRE, Author of "The Hidden Life of Prayer," &c. Handsomely bound in Cloth boards, gilt edges, with headband and marker, 3s. 6d. net.

The Sheffield Telegraph.—"Packed with mere thought, instead of being merely a collection of platitudes. Such a volume is that which Mr. M'Intyre has just given to the world. It may be heartily recommended as an example of the 'thoughtful-devotional,' in religious literature."

MODERN THEORIES OF SIN.

By W. E. ORCHARD, D.D. Thesis approved for the Degree of Doctor of Divinity in the University of London. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

Church of England Pulpit.—"This book should be of great value to the theological student. Dr. Orchard has made good use of his powers as a critic. The book teems with ideas. . . we welcome it as one which is at once a thoughtful treatise upon present theological topics."

LONDON: James Clarke & Co., 13 & 14, Fleet St., E.C.

skill as a maker of phrases, not all of which are good-natured. She writes in unflattering terms of Palmerston and Brougham, of George Sand and Alfred de Musset. Her description of Lammenais' book, "Paroles d'un Croyant," as "the apocalypse according to a Jacobin," is almost worthy of Talleyrand himself. The book is well translated, but there are several mistakes in the biographical index.

* * *

SINCE Dr. Johnson uttered the saying that when a man is tired of London he is tired of life, London has not lacked literary apologists. The number of these has increased marvellously within the last decade, notwithstanding motor-buses, taxi-cabs, and other unpicturesque conveniences that have conspired to rob the metropolis of much of its old romance. This appreciation of London, indeed, has assumed such vast proportions that it threatens to become a cult. We should regret this happening very much, because the cult, in the manner of its kind, would not be confined to the genuine lovers of London; a host of hypocrites would leaven its ranks; we should soon forget the example of the Great Londoners, of the men, past and present, to whom London has been little less than a religion. Mr. James Milne tells us something of these great Londoners in "My Summer in London" (Werner Laurie, 6s. net), and lots more about sundry notable personalities whose association with London has been of the closest. He tells us also of his own realisation of London itself—a realisation that came to him when he moved from a house in its outer suburbs to a flat in its very centre; of dozens of well-known people, English and foreign, whom he has met in the course of his journalistic life; of the great unknown who furnish endless material for observation by an observant man. London itself, perhaps, is the frame rather than the picture. He sees visions from the windows of a top flat in Westminster, and finds beauty in the London parks (of which, by the way, there are some very artistic photographic blocks); but his main concern is with the rapidly changing kaleidoscope of humanity he has looked upon through the years. In regard to notabilities, he gives us singularly sympathetic sketches of Gladstone and Sir George Grey, the late Lord Salisbury, and Mr. Chamberlain, and his anecdotes of Royalty are very far removed from the insipid gush that so often finds its way into print. Some capital stories he has, too; they crop up in the most unexpected places, just as a laughter-moving memory will sometimes come to a man soberly engaged in serious study. And the whole volume is rendered pleasant by an engaging conversational style, cloaking a view of life that is mature without a trace of rustiness, an undaunted enthusiasm, and a kindly philosophy.

* * *

MISS HELEN COLVILL, in the preface to "Saint Teresa of Spain" (Methuen, 7s. 6d.), states that her work does not challenge comparison with Mrs. Cunningham Graham's "Santa Teresa: Her Life and Times." The latter work is a masterpiece of its kind, but the personality of St. Teresa is so engaging that it is not surprising to see her made the subject of another biography. The combination of mysticism with sound practical sense is not so rare as is often supposed, though it probably reaches its highest degree in St. Teresa, and Miss Colvill is right in laying stress upon the saint's "homely wisdom" and "her strong sense of humor" which keep her "always with her foot on solid earth, even when her head is above the clouds." There is much in the book which has but a slight bearing upon St. Teresa's career, though possibly the chapters on Spanish history, literature, and art in the sixteenth century, on the general state of the Church, and on the Spanish mystics, will prove useful to some readers. As regards the super-normal happenings with which St. Teresa was associated, Miss Colvill suggests that the visions and voices were subjective, and the trances and ecstasies akin to the hypnotic sleep. "She had a vivid, forcible way of representing things to her imagination, accompanied by strong visualising power." The author is generous in her praises of St. Teresa's work and character, but her admiration is not blinded, and she makes some criticisms upon "a certain exaggerated humility" in St. Teresa's letters. This quality is common to the saints, and Miss Colvill's own explanation that it springs from a realisation of how far they come short of the ideal at which they aim is the simplest and best that can be put forward.

IN "A Tramp's Schooling" (Unwin, 3s. 6d. net) the Rev. A. N. Cooper, well known as the "Walking Parson," gives us a volume of travel reminiscences that is as entertaining as it is unconventional. The home journeys on foot which he chronicles were from his own parish in East Yorkshire to London, Gretna Green, Snowdon, and Dartmoor; while the foreign excursions were through Denmark to Copenhagen, through Italy to Pompeii, and over a great part of Sweden. It goes without saying that the mission of the book is to extol the value of travel, especially of travel by walking, the latter mode, in the author's contention, being the best for promoting the taste for that "simple life" to which, hypothetically, every civilised decadent of the present day is longing to return. Whatever may be the influence of walking in this respect, it has certainly led in the present case to a simplicity and a directness of thought and its expression that are exceedingly refreshing. The charm of the book lies in its first-hand literary flavor, and in the corresponding absence of the quality that one may term bookishness. One is sensible that the author has read a good deal about the places he has visited; but this has not prevented him from viewing such places from a frankly objective standpoint, as one who has learned to look with eyes of wonder on a wonderful world. Mr. Cooper compares education by travel with education by books. He points out the value of travel to the development of the historical sense. He claims that "the true teachers are one's fellow men." He even has a word of praise for the "grand tour," though he naturally prefers his own method of going abroad, as better suited to the educative requirements of the average man of to-day. In short, he is the strenuous advocate of the travel method of self-education, and if at times he hardly seems to realise that books are necessary to supplement the fruits of travel, it is because he is bent on proving that travel is a necessary supplement to books. One is tempted to wander from Mr. Cooper's travels to his philosophy of travelling, and in doing so to fail in justice to the "facts" here set forth. It should be said, therefore, that his visit to the famous Hospice on the St. Bernard Pass, which he crossed one April, en route for Pompeii, is described with a specially happy touch; that the account of his tours in Denmark and Sweden gives a singularly convincing picture, considering its brevity, of both those countries; and that when he switches back to his own country, and goes afoot among the tumuli of East Yorkshire, the reader's interest by no means flags. The book is sincere and healthy, not without humor in its proper place, and sane with a fresh-air saneness.

* * *

"THE AMERICAN EGYPT: A RECORD OF TRAVEL IN YUCATAN," by Mr. Channing Arnold and Mr. F. J. Tabor Frost (Hutchinson, 16s. net), is a fresh and readable account of an expedition made by two Englishmen into one of the least known districts of Mexico. The book takes its title from the remarkable architectural ruins in Yucatan, and an examination of these ruins seems to have been the primary object of the journey. The problem presented by the ruins is a difficult one. In extent they are far greater than anything else done by the original inhabitants of the American continent, and their sculptures show a type of man entirely different from the North American Indian. The common theory is that the buildings are the work of the Toltecs, a race supposed to have been settled in the country before the Aztecs, and to have been extirpated by the latter. Messrs. Arnold and Frost, however, reject this view, which rests on very slender evidence, and attribute the buildings to the Mayans, a race that still exists in Yucatan. These are supposed to have come from Southern Asia, and the many Buddhist characteristics to be found in the Yucatan temples support this view. Apart from its antiquarian value, the book gives an interesting picture of the present state of Yucatan and of other parts of Mexico. The trade in hennequen has made Yucatan immensely rich, but the authors' account of the inhabitants is depressing. Yucatan, they say, is a country of "savages and slaves," the slaves being treated in the most horrible fashion. President Diaz, of whom there is a far from flattering picture in the book, investigated the matter, but the hennequen growers succeeded in making the conditions of labor seem better than they really are, and no action was taken.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

Social amenities make necessary the entertainment of your friends. To entertain them successfully is not always easy. And nothing disheartens a host more than a slow evening. The evenings will always be a delight if you have a Billiard Table in the house. An adjournment to the Billiard Room is always welcomed.

RILEY'S COMBINED DINING AND BILLIARD TABLES

will be found most convenient where space is limited. Are made in all sizes. Fitted with Riley's patent automatic action, enabling the table to be converted from Dining to Billiard Table and vice versa in less than a minute. A handsome piece of furniture and a perfect billiard table.

Prices from £13 10s. CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Riley's Standard Tables

(as used in the Championship matches).

These tables are designed on most artistic lines, and built of the finest materials in the best possible manner. They are fitted with low frost-proof cushions, patent pockets, and are fully warranted for ten years. Prices from 55 guineas upwards.

FREE On receipt of postcard, full detailed Illustrated Catalogue of Billiard and Dining Tables, and small or full-sized tables and sundries.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Willow Bank Works, ACCRINGTON.

London Showrooms: 147, ALDERSGATE STREET, E.C. 3.

RILEY'S Billiard Tables.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

DIAMOND CUT PASTE - A. & E. Castle
WITH THE MERRY AUSTRIANS

Amy McLaren

THE SCORE (Two Stories) - Lucas Malet
VALLEY OF THE KINGS

Marmaduke Pickthall

FLORENTINE FRAME - Elizabeth Robins

THE HAVEN - - - Eden Phillpotts

TENANTS OF PIXY FARM Maude Goldring

US FOUR - - - S. Macnaughtan

JOHN GOODCHILD R. W. Wright-Henderson

ROMANCE OF THE NURSERY

Mrs. L. Allen Harker

NAMELESS - The Hon. Mrs. W. Forbes

SHUTTLES OF THE LOOM K. M. Edge

SEPTIMUS - - - William J. Locke

FIONA - - - Lady Napier of Magdala

IN THE SHADE - Valentina Hawtrey

FRANK BURNET Dorothy V. Horace Smith

MISS ESPERANCE AND MR. WYCHERLY

Mrs. L. Allen Harker

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

FIRST IN OFFICIAL TESTS
FIRST IN PUBLIC FAVOUR

DEVON FIRE

NONE BETTER THAN THE BEST

Sole Proprietors & Manufacturers

CANDYE & CO. LTD.

London Showroom: 87, NEWKIN ST.

WORKS: MEATHFIELD, DEVON

GIVES UNIVERSAL & COMPLETE SATISFACTION

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

AUTHORS AND ARTISTS. Special facilities for placing work of every description. Particulars from Manager, Literary Department, WIENER AGENCY, LTD., 64, STRAND, LONDON, and Tribune Buildings, New York.

THE chief articles on the Budget and the political crisis in the November magazines are discussed elsewhere. In the "Nineteenth Century" M. Alfred Naquet, a veteran, but always a powerful, controversialist, presents the case against Ferrer's execution with overwhelming force. Mr. Everard Fielding, the Honorary Secretary of the Society for Psychical Research, narrates some recent experiments in the "Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism," including several at which Eusapia Palladino was the medium. He declares that "for some of the phenomena, including some of the more remarkable ones," he obtained "evidence of unimpeachable validity." Other articles in the number are "Contemporary Politics in France," by M. André Beaunier; "Dante's Self-Portraiture," by Bishop Welldon; "Twenty-one Years with Our Indian Fellow-Subjects," by Lady Cox; and "The Question of Medical Priestcraft," by Dr. Squire Sprigge.

* * *

IN the "Fortnightly Review" Mr. W. T. Stead continues, under the title of "When the Door Opened," his series of sensational "revelations" in regard to the unseen world. We give our opinion elsewhere of the value of Mr. Stead's results. The most interesting literary article is "Henry Fielding: Some Unpublished Letters and Records," by Mr. G. M. Godden. Mr. H. D. Roome examines the work of Macaulay and Lecky as historians of the eighteenth century. Mr. Sydney Brooks writes on "Eight Months of President Taft," and Dr. P. H. Steensby on "The Polar Eskimos and the Polar Expedition." The number, though rather overloaded by political matter, contains several contributions appealing to the general reader.

* * *

"THE ENGLISH REVIEW" is to be congratulated on having secured Mr. Lowes Dickinson's "Letters from America," several of which appear in the current issue. Among the other contents—which show no falling off in the high standard which the "Review" maintains—are Mr. J. A. Hobson's "The Extension of Liberalism," Mr. H. W. Nevinson's "Women's Vote and Men," Mr. G. P. Gooch's "The Constitutional Crisis," and a paper on "India in England," by "Vidván." Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's remarkable serial, "A Call," is finished in the present number. Although Mr. Henry James's influence may be noticed in "A Call," it is an original psychological study of unusual power, and we hope to see it soon in volume form.

The Week in the City.

		Price Friday morning, Oct. 29.	Price Friday morning, Nov. 5.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82½	82½
German Threes	82	82½
Spanish Fours	93½	94½
Buenos Ayres Pacific	92	91
Steel Common	91½	94½

THE Stock Markets have not been very cheerful. They are under the influence of the five per cent. bank rate, and this very high rate has failed as yet to draw gold, except for a small parcel from Switzerland. The monetary position altogether is rather awkward and ominous. In fact, some of the experts are seriously contemplating the unpleasant possibility of a 6 per cent rate. Good authorities, both in the United States and Germany (where the position looks weakest), assert, however, that they are quite confident, and see no reason why prices should not be fairly well maintained. Rubber is still the rage, and the price of the raw material, which stands extraordinarily high, is an encouragement to investors in plantations. The Continent is beginning to take an interest, and certainly it is surprising that the London Stock Exchange has not yet formed a distinct market for rubber shares. It divides rubber investments with Mincing Lane, but very few rubber shares are quoted on the Stock Exchange List of Securities, the reason being that most of the companies are so very small. Foreign affairs are not altogether satisfactory. The Greek insurrection is a farce, but it does not help Greek finances. The Turkish loan has been badly received, as it is doubtless to provide for Army and Navy and revenue deficiencies, and not to improve Turkey.

FEAR OF THE LORDS.

Asked as to the condition of the Stock Exchange, a leading broker remarked that it was political. Members are talking apprehensively of the Lords throwing out the Budget, of a General Election, of financial chaos, heavy deficiencies, big loans, and serious consequential falls in gilt-edged securities. The figure usually mentioned in the Stock Exchange is 50 millions as the probable amount of a loan in the expected contingency, but there is, of course, little likelihood of such an amount having to be faced. The chief difficulty is that it may be impossible to collect anything like the proper amount of Income-tax before the end of the financial year, which would mean a very big deficiency for this year, and a very big surplus for the next one. If the tea duty were lost, several months' supply of tea would be imported in a very short space of time, and the revenue would drop two or three millions.

THE BUENOS AYRES AND PACIFIC.

Argentina and its railways are under a cloud. The price of Buenos Ayres and Pacific stock is still wobbling about, but the market is expecting it to settle down and sink considerably lower than it is at present. Indeed the figures given in the report are ominous enough for anything. The dividend is reduced from 7 to 5 per cent., and in order to pay this lower rate the directors have to take £89,000 from the reserve fund and reduce the carry forward from £13,628 to £12,215. That is the answer to the market's long-drawn speculations as to whether it would be possible to pay 6 per cent. And the outlook for the future is worse than the results of the past; in the next twelve months debenture interest and preference dividend will need at least another £180,000; there are also £3,000,000 ordinary shares on which 5 per cent. is payable till 1911, and these will absorb £150,000 of the current year's net revenue. Thus, apart altogether from the new issues of the capital (which are known to be hanging over us) the balance available for distribution will need to be at least £400,000 higher next June if the present rate of 5 per cent. is to be maintained. In other words, gross receipts must be nearly £1,000,000 larger. Is that possible? Probably, or certainly, not. Traffics to the end of last week were £37,000 less than at the corresponding point of 1908, and it is scarcely credible that between now and the end of June they will rise by £1,037,000. The harvest has been indifferent, and all the Argentine traffics are dropping. But the ripening crops look very well. Moreover, it must be said that the new lines ought soon to begin earning revenue, and there are still men about the markets with confidence enough to predict five per cent. in 1910. In the long run everybody agrees that the line ought to do very well and probably come back to its old rate of dividend, but "the long run" is a dangerous thing to speculate on, and those who decide to hold on for the rise may have to reconcile themselves to a longish decline before their capital begins to appreciate again.

LUCCELLUM.

EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

are THE remedy for Loss of Voice, Huskiness or Soreness of the Throat, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, &c. These Pastilles have an unrivalled reputation for their wonderfully soothing qualities for all Throat troubles. Made to a formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital.

1/- and 4/6 per box of all Chemists, Stores, &c.

Write for Sample enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage to
EVANS SONS LESCHER & WEBB, Ltd.,
Hanover Street, Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse all imitations.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING.

The Flavour of Rowntree's Cocoa

delicious !

5/- net.

of all Booksellers

Daily Telegraph.

"A volume of sound common-sense calibre, clear, spirited, and plain spoken. We recommend it with confidence to the investing public."

Times.

"Mr. Lowenfeld has made this subject his own."

Morning Post.

"Endeavours to furnish the principles by which investors should be guided."

Why do Investors so often lose both Capital & Income?

A clear and logical answer to this and scores of other vital questions will be found in Mr. Henry Lowenfeld's new book, "All About Investment," 5s. net.

Every business man should read it, for it explains in simple and forceful language the science of both safeguarding capital and increasing income. There is not a dull moment nor an abstruse point in all its 288 pages.

We will send this book on approval for a week to any reader of "The Nation" on receipt of postcard mentioning "The Nation." Address

Publisher, 2, Waterloo Place, London, W.

Through the rain home

You know what that means. No matter how stout your overcoat, how thick your boots, the damp will find its way through somehow.

And the damp tells you so, very plainly, by the sense you have of discomfort, chilliness and "shiveryness."

Stop the coming cold at once! Get into a

Mustard Bath

—a bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Try it yourself.

Colman's mustard

You can avoid rain-chill by such a bath.

BENGER'S

FOOD

is primarily a nutritive food for those suffering from digestive debility, or during severe illness, and convalescence.

But a course of Benger's Food is also of the greatest advantage to those enjoying the best of health. Benger's Food is different from any other food obtainable—it can be served prepared to suit the exact physical condition of the person for whom it is intended.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No.: GERRARD 1854.

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children's Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply, the Principal Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

CO-EDUCATION.

SIDCOT SCHOOL, WINSCOMBE, SOMERSET.

FOUNDED 1808.

80 BOYS. 64 GIRLS. Ages 11-18 years.

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

All particulars from Dr. BEVAN LEAN, Headmaster.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
61, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

ALPINE SPORTS LIMITED beg to announce that they have secured the entire accommodation in the following hotels for the winter season for SKATING, TOBOGGANNING, CURLING, SKI-ING and SLEIGHING:—MONTANA PALACE, VILLARS-STUR-OLLON, the seven principal hotels; MORGINS-LES-BAINS, two hotels; ST. BEATENBERG, two hotels; KANDERSTEG, Hotel VICTORIA, WENGEN, four hotels; LENZERHEIDE, Kurhaus; BALLAIGUES, GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE, &c. For illustrated handbook apply to The Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

All Original Matter

THE ODD VOLUME 1909

A Literary and Artistic Annual

PUBLISHED TO AID THE FUNDS OF THE NATIONAL BOOK-SELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

8 Full-page Illustrations in Colour

32 Full-page Illustrations in Black and White

30 Literary Contributions Stories, Essays, Poems, etc.

Contributed by the foremost Artists and Authors of the Day.

ONE SHILLING NET

AT BOOKSELLERS AND BOOKSTALLS THROUGHOUT THE KINGDOM

BOOKSELLERS.

BIBLES,
PRAYER
BOOKS, &c.

THE LARGEST SELECTION OF OXFORD AND OTHER EDITIONS FOR LECTERN, READING DESK, AND PRIVATE USE.

ILLUSTRATED PRIZE BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS from 1s. &c.

New Lists now ready, sent Post-Free.

Tel. No. THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
Central 329 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

Catalogue No. 367. Just Out.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Also a Useful and Comprehensive Catalogue of Current General Literature, Fiction, Science, Art, &c.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance)
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining. Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Telephone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

Re-appearance of

"THE THRUSH,"

A MONTHLY PERIODICAL FOR THE PUBLICATION OF ORIGINAL POETRY,

Dec. 1st, 1909.

New Feature—Literary Articles on all Subjects.

Contributions (which will be paid for) should be addressed to—

The Editor, "The Thrush" Office,
12 & 13, Henrietta Street,
Covent Garden, W.C.

Publishers: Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday
Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Everybody at this season wants to know about the New Books, and everybody may learn about them from the November BOOK MONTHLY,
6d. net; for instance about "My Summer In London," a merry, happy volume of London Stories, Anecdotes and Memories. Order the BOOK MONTHLY from your Bookseller, or from the publishers.

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court,
London.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S AUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS

THE FACE OF CHINA.

By E. G. KEMP, F.R.S.G.S. Travels in East, North, Central, and Western China. With some Account of the New Schools, Universities, and Missions, and the old Religious Sacred Places of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism, and a Map of China. With 64 Illustrations after Water-Colours and Sepia Drawings by the Author. 20s. net.
Also a Large Paper Limited Edition, plates mounted, parchment, 42s. net.

THE COLOUR OF ROME.

By OLAVE POTTER, 60 Illustrations in Water Colour and Sepia by YOSHIO MARKINO, who also contributes an Introductory Chapter. 20s. net.
Also a Large Paper Limited Edition, plates mounted, parchment, 42s. net.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM (1515-1517).

The Latin Text of the Editiones Principes with an English rendering, Copious Notes, and an Historical Introduction by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES. English Edition limited to 500 Numbered Copies. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and Facsimile Title-Page. Royal 8vo, buckram, 22s. net.

No English translation, or edition with English annotations, of this famous work has previously appeared, and it may safely be said that the light it throws upon the Religious, Social, and Political conditions of Western Europe during the early years of the Sixteenth Century cannot be neglected by serious students of the Renaissance.

THE MASTER OF GAME.

THE OLDEST ENGLISH BOOK ON HUNTING. By EDWARD, Second DUKE OF YORK. Edited by W. A. and F. BAILLIE-GROHMAN. With Introduction by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Photogravure Frontispiece and 23 Full-Page Illustrations after the Illuminations in the Original MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

MELBA: an Authorised Biography.

By AGNES G. MURPHY. With Chapters by Madame MELBA on "The Art of Singing" and on "The Selection of Music as a Profession." With Photogravure Frontispiece and 37 Portraits, Views, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo cloth, 16s. net. Also an Introductory note by G. A. FULLER MAITLAND.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING.

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A., Slade Professor of Fine Arts, University of Oxford. NEW EDITION, REVISED. 7s. 6d. net.

THE PAINTERS OF VICENZA.

By TANCRED BORENIUS. With 15 Full-Page Plates. 7s. 6d. net.

STORIES OF THE FRENCH ARTISTS, FROM CLOUET TO INGRES.

Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and arranged by P. M. TURNER and C. H. COLLINS BAKER. With 8 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-tone. Cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. Edition de Luxe, with 5 additional coloured plates, crown 4to, parchment 15s. net.

THE MIND OF THE ARTIST.

Thoughts and Sayings of Artists on their Art. Collected and Arranged by Mrs. LAURANCE BINYON. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE.

Translated by Dr. E. P. PUSEY. Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. Introduction by Mrs. MEYNELL. 12 Coloured Illustrations by MAXWELL ARMFIELD. 7s. 6d. net.
Also an Edition de Luxe, crown 4to, pure rag paper, with the plates mounted, parchment 15s. net.; pigskin, with clasp, 25s. net.

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

THE RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS.

AS Publisher to the Medici Society, Ltd., Mr. Lee Warner will this Autumn issue the first books printed in the Riccardi Press Fount, which has been specially designed by Mr. Herbert P. Horne for the Medici Society. The Society will use this Fount in order to publish editions of books no less excellent in typography than are the Medici Prints from the point of view of technical colour printing. The opinion of the Burlington Magazine that "nothing so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public" has long since become a general verdict with regard to the Medici Prints. The desire of the Medici Society in respect of the Riccardi Press Books is to render generally available typography of the like excellence.

In designing this Fount Mr. Horne has had the benefit of the invaluable experience gained in his two earlier essays in the same direction. The "face" of the Riccardi Fount is more important than that of either of its predecessors. In style it is specially based upon the larger of the two faces used in the famous First Edition of Horace, printed at Florence in the year 1492 by Antonio Miscomino. With this as his guide, Mr. Horne has produced a face of a legibility and brilliance unrivalled by any modern attempt in the same direction.

That the presswork of the Riccardi Fount shall be as excellent as its design, is guaranteed by the fact that the printing will be executed at the Chiswick Press, under the direction of Mr. Chas. T. Jacobi. The actual cutting of the Fount has been carried out by Mr. E. P. Prince, whom all typographers know as the utter of the majority of famous new faces from those of the Kelmscott Press onwards.

The first Riccardi Press Books will be:

THE STORY OF GRISELDA

Being the Tenth story of the Tenth day from the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, translated by J. M. Rigg.

THE SONG OF SONGS WHICH IS SOLOMON'S

Reprinted after the Authorised Version by permission, and illustrated with 10 plates reproduced in colour by the Medici Process after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint: title engraved on the wood after the design by the same artist.

THE THOUGHTS OF THE EMPEROR MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS

Translated by George Long, with 12 plates reproduced in colour by the Medici Process after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint, and an engraved title after the design by Noel Rooke.

The detailed Prospectus, printed in the Riccardi Press Types, will be sent post free on application.

ORDERS WILL BE EXECUTED IN ROTATION { as received, preference being given only to subscribers to the entire series of Riccardi Press Books.

PHILIP LEE WARNER (Publisher to The Medici Society, Ltd.), 38, Albemarle Street, London, W.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 7.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	261	Mr. Ellis Barker. By G. K. Chesterton ...	278
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		General Bingham. By H. W. H. ...	278
The Coming Coup d'Etat ...	264	POETRY:—
The Tactics of the Situation ...	265	Requiescat. By Charlotte M. Mew ...	278
Land for the Asking ...	266	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	279
Light on the Anglo-German Problem ...	267	REVIEWS:—
A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-MAN ON THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION NOW PENDING, FROM THE THREAT OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.—IV. By H. W. V. Temperley ...	269	The South Pole Expedition ...	280
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Christianity at the Cross-Roads ...	280
The Jest of Pilate ...	269	The Hidden World of Islam ...	282
Almost an Immortal ...	271	Nineteenth Century Modes ...	284
Barbarians of Our Time ...	272	Popular Fiction ...	286
The Game of Death ...	273	BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
THE DRAMA:—		John Milton ...	290
Church and Stage. By H. W. M. ...	274	The World's Great Pictures ...	290
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Tariff Reform ...	290
"Making the Foreigner Pay." By A. Grimshaw Haywood, E. C. Morris Joseph, and Manufacturer ...	275	Among the Danes ...	290
Liberal Women and the Suffrage. By A Liberal Voter. Mary D. Horne, Frank E. Marshall, and G. S. ...	276	My Life Among the Blue-Jackets ...	292
Elections on Sundays. By H. P. Douglas ...	277	Vine Culture ...	292
"Educational Finance." By C. T. ...	277	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Lucellum ...	292
The Automatic Fixing of Irish Rents. By Edward Greer, B.L. ...	277	LITERARY SUPPLEMENT:—
		Marie Antoinette ...	299
		Mr. Pope ...	300
		The Last Phase of the Old Régime ...	301
		The Great British Dickens ...	302
		A Tourist in Italy ...	304
		The Ethic of Jesus ...	306
		Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral ...	308
		New Glimpses of Maria Edgeworth ...	308

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

ON Tuesday the "Times" announced through its Parliamentary correspondent that an official Opposition amendment would be moved to the second reading of the Budget. The "Morning Post" of Thursday expanded this announcement by declaring that the amendment would invite the peers to declare that proposals so revolutionary as those of the Budget ought not to become law until after a decision of the electorate. The "Post," which takes, or gives, marching orders to the "back-woodsmen," advises against amendment, which appears to be the device of a group of so-called Moderates who, divided between two unconstitutional courses, prefer the more flagrant of the two. It is said that forty Unionist peers have addressed Lord Lansdowne against rejection, and it is hardly a secret that he, an ex-Liberal, is personally indisposed to this course. But the issue appears to have been turned against him largely by the pressure of the liquor interest. The "Westminster Gazette" states definitely that the promised interview of representatives of "the trade" with the Tory leaders has taken place, but in secret. It is said that language of undisguised menace was used, and that it was successful. On the other hand, Sir John Kennaway, who has much influence with the Moderates, writes to the "Times," deploring the policy of rejection, suggesting that the Lords are staking all on a gambler's throw, and hoping that the High Court of Parliament will be the subject of special prayer during the coming fortnight.

THE Lords' decision, which can only be described as a party device, shamelessly devoid of the pretence of deliberation, means a General Election in January. Before that time the Commons will probably be able to set up the Budget temporarily, and it is much to be hoped that the Government will have their plans fully matured and ready to work at a day's notice. The reports from the constituencies are admirable, and there is practically but one danger—a state of war between the Liberal and Labor Parties. Three-cornered candidatures are multiplying, especially in Lancashire, but we shall be surprised if the two bodies cannot coalesce on a common policy of social reform, workmen's insurance, the re-instatement of the Budget, and the destruction of the power of the Lords. Mr. Gladstone was able to arrange something like terms of peace in a situation where the elements of common belief and interest were far less salient than they are to-day. Is it conceivable that the leaders and Whips on both sides cannot repeat his success? It is very important for the centre to act before local situations get too embittered.

* * *

THE Prime Minister's Guildhall speech on foreign and Imperial affairs, while phrased with caution, was, on the whole, cheerful and even optimistic in tone. It hailed the union of South Africa as one of the most remarkable spectacles in history, and coupled this praise of Boer and British statesmanship with a plea for political rights for the colored races. On the European situation Mr. Asquith said that he could speak without "the lurking apprehensions of a year ago." British policy in the Near East aimed at securing the free development of the new era in Turkey, and this object had been "substantially obtained." The ententes with Great Powers were neither "aggressive" nor "exclusive," and with regard to Germany he knew of nothing which need stand in the way of the "full and friendly understanding" sought by the "wisest statesmanship" and the "best moral and social forces" in both countries. He hoped that the declaration of the new Belgian policy in regard to the Congo would enable the British Government to recognise the annexation, an act which could never be extended to the old régime.

* * *

MR. ASQUITH's brief reference to Germany in the Guildhall speech has been well received by the few German papers which already advocated a cessation of the rivalry in armaments. But comment is not yet general. Meanwhile it is known that the financial situation which will have to be faced in the coming year is even more serious than had been supposed. In this year's Budget new taxation was provided to meet a deficit of £24,000,000. It had been supposed that a loan of £14,000,000 would fill the anticipated hole next year. But in a detailed communication the "Deutsche Volkswirtschaftliche Korrespondenz" states that the total of the supplementary estimates will actually reach £27,000,000. When one remembers that the effort to scrape together twenty-four millions cost Prince Bülow his place, it is difficult to see how his successor can face a still more serious situation without a radical change of policy.

* * *

ON Monday the Lords performed a minor act of insolence to set off and accompany their coming grand deed of usurpation. By a majority of 157 to 40 they threw out the London Elections Bill, a modest measure, under which a Parliamentary voter in London who moves from one Parliamentary division to another—e.g., from Piccadilly to Bond-street—would retain his vote, as he retains it in every other city in England and in all the London local elections. The Bill would have enfranchised an average of about 40,000 working men, who are annually cheated of their votes, while not a single man of property would have lost his right to vote. The Lords, however, described the Bill as a disfranchising one, which means, we suppose, that property is hardly treated unless its owners can claim double or treble or even ten times the voting power of mere ordinary flesh and blood. Lord Dartmouth had the impudence to complain that the Bill had been sent to a Grand Committee in the House of Commons, so that the Lords claim not only to interfere with the privileges of the House of Commons but with its procedure.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR appears to be still engaged in securing a little islet of Free Trade in the midst of the sea of Tory Protectionism. He and his managers have transferred Lord Robert Cecil and Mr. Stewart Bowles from a losing fight with the Tariff Reformers in Marylebone and Norwood, and planted them as official Tory candidates in Blackburn, which is a centre of Free Trade. It would, therefore, seem as if there was to be a go-as-you-please attitude in Lancashire as against the general Protectionist platform elsewhere. The Protectionists, however, are not willing to see a big and important bit of England snatched from their grasp, and the "Observer" has promptly announced a whirlwind Protectionist campaign for Lancashire, in which it is clear that Mr. Stewart Bowles and Lord Robert Cecil will be caught up and overwhelmed. The transfer has not even secured the local results at which the Tory managers have aimed, for the Free Trade-Protectionist battle has been re-opened in Marylebone, and the Tariff Reformer refuses to go.

* * *

THE Birthday Honors List this year was divided into two parts. The main list, published on Tuesday, conferred, in addition to the official promotions, six Privy Councillorships, six baronetcies, and twenty knighthoods, but no peerages. Sir Henry Roscoe, a scientific man of high eminence, is one of the new Privy Councillors, and Colonel Seely, one of the best Parliamentarians in the Government, another, while the new knights include Mr. Shackleton, the discoverer of the South Magnetic Pole, Dr. Robertson Nicoll, and Mr. Vincent Evans, who is, perhaps, the doyen of Welsh Liberal journalists. Dr. Robertson Nicoll's knighthood is of more than common interest. The conductor of the "British Weekly" is one of the very few working journalists and editors who contrive all through their lives to retain and deserve the title of scholar and man of learning, to be at once powerful advocates and true authorities in the sphere of the intellect. On the following day it was announced that the King had conferred baronies on Sir John Fisher, First Sea Lord, and Sir Arthur Godley, late Permanent Secretary to the India Office. Both are very able men, and the first appointment may be taken to endorse both Sir John Fisher's general administration of the Navy and the part he played in the controversy with Lord Charles Beresford.

* * *

PERSIA is grappling once more with a fresh Russian intervention. The "Royalist" brigand chief, Rahim Khan, at the head of a large force of Shahsevan tribesmen, has succeeded in taking the town of Ardebil, which lies not far from Tabriz and uncomfortably near the Russian frontier. The Nationalist leaders of the town took sanctuary at the Russian Consulate, to which Rahim Khan addressed the usual boastful threats. On the plea that the Cossack guard already at the Consulate is inadequate, the Russians have sent to its aid the relatively immense reinforcement of 1,000 men. To measure the danger, one must remember the almost unbroken refusal of Rahim Khan's marauders during the siege of Tabriz to face any enemy with fire-arms. Time and again they were routed by a score of determined Caucasians. There is also on its way to the relief of Ardebil a considerable Nationalist force which the new Government has made strenuous attempts to arm and despatch promptly. The correspondent of the "Times" in Teheran gently deprecates this fresh Russian aggression, and states that most Persians are convinced that Russian agents have engineered Rahim Khan's exploit. The suspicion may be unfounded; it is not unnatural. When the Khan was one of the generals before Tabriz, the royalist forces there were supplied with cartridges by the Russians. He was captured after the raising of the siege by the Russians. But instead of detaining him, or handing him over to the lawful Government, or exiling him, they released him, and once more he is on the war-path. Other considerable Russian forces remain at Tabriz, at Resht, and possibly at Kasvin.

* * *

WE quoted last week letters of English firms doing an export business to prove that the same net prices and profits were earned by business with Protectionist countries as in the home market, i.e., that foreign tariffs failed to make the English exporter pay. Mr. E. H. Bayley, in a letter in Thursday's "Daily Chronicle," quotes documents of a not less convincing nature. On the quotation and contract notes of German manufacturers exporting to this country appears the following proviso: "Prices subject to any change in Customs tariff," a plain assertion that if an English duty is put on his goods they will raise their price and make the importer or customer pay. Nor is this threat confined to manufactured goods. "The baker who supplies my household tells me he has just signed a contract for his annual supply of flour, at the bottom of which is a notice as follows: 'If a tariff is put on flour these prices are void.' " In other words, "Your bread will cost you more."

* * *

OUR Paris Correspondent writes:—The French Chamber has, by large majorities in several successive divisions, approved the substitution of the scrutin de liste with proportional representation for the present system of election. But M. Briand having made the question one of confidence, the first clause of the measure enacting the change was finally rejected by a majority of sixty-six late on Monday evening. In the final division a member of the Cabinet, M. Millerand, abstained from voting, an unusual occurrence, but not quite unprecedented, in the history of the Third Republic. In 1889, M. René Goblet, who was a member of the Floquet Cabinet, abstained from voting with his colleagues in favor of the re-establishment of the scrutin de liste, which had been made a question of confidence; and M. Camille Pelletan abstained in similar circumstances on one occasion during the Combes Ministry. Even some of the partisans of proportional representation admit that M. Briand could hardly have taken any other course than he took. Six months before the general elections Parliament is hardly in a position to discuss adequately an entirely new system of election, and the demand of the Government that the question should be left to the new Parliament is not unreasonable. Granting the principle of proportional representation, there remains the important question of the method by which it is to be worked. The system of voting by lists, which was proposed in the measure under discussion, is open to obvious objections. If isolated candidatures are allowed, they may, by cumulating votes, throw the machinery out of gear. But the chief argument brought by the supporters of the change against the scrutin d'arrondissement is not that it fails to secure an exactly proportional representation of the various parties, but that it tends to exalt petty local and personal interests above questions of principle.

* * *

THE internal weakness of Greece has tempted the Young Turks to make a tactless forward move. The Porte has presented a Circular Note to the four protecting Powers, in which it urges a prompt solution of the Cretan problem, guaranteeing the full autonomy of the island, but finally excluding the possibility of its eventual annexation to Greece. The Greeks have not made it easier, by their recent disorders, for any Power to advocate an early annexation, but it may be taken for granted that this Turkish suggestion will be rejected decisively by all the four Powers. The Young Turks would be much wiser to face the certainty of this eventual annexation, and to busy themselves in considering what compensations they might claim for a timely assent. Even were the Powers prepared to meet their wishes, the possession of an island so resolutely Hellenic as Crete would be for them only a source of weakness and unrest. Meanwhile there is some little ground for anxiety as to the line which the two German Powers, who fortunately have no responsibility for Crete, might take if a crisis calling for intervention were to arise either in Greece or in Crete. The Viennese Press has evidently persuaded itself that King George's throne is tottering. A Turkish deputation has just received a very flattering reception in Austro-Hungary, and when one remembers that the Turks threatened to boycott French goods if France facilitated the annexation of Crete, it is obvious that the traditional Hamidian policy of playing off one Power against another still survives at the Porte.

* * *

ON Monday a strike broke out in the New South Wales coalfield, which has since become general. Its cause is vaguely described by Reuter as "a question of supremacy between masters and men," and the Prime Minister speaks of the men's grievances as "insubstantial." The men apparently anticipated the final decision of the masters, who now refuse to confer with them. The consequences to the transport services of the colony are already very serious, and coal has advanced to 80s. a ton. The waterside workers may join the miners, and it is feared that the export of the wool and wheat harvests, no less than the carriage of food, may soon be checked. Mr. Wade has explained that his Government remains neutral, looks to the decision of the Wages Board for a solution, and is endeavoring to promote the meeting of masters and men. At present he will not apply the criminal law, but holds in terrorem over the men the risk of alienating public opinion. The Labor Party is said to be satisfied with his attitude. The whole episode illustrates the weakness of the coercive clauses of any Industrial Disputes Act, where a trade is united and powerful.

* * *

THE leaders of the Transvaal Indian community who have been in this country since June have returned to report the failure of their mission. Yet, at one point, they reached a stage which less logical minds might have regarded as a success. General Smuts was willing to repeal the Asiatic Act, while inserting in the ordinary Immigration Act a clause limiting the number of Asiatic immigrants. But the Indians are fighting for honor. They rightly object to any special ordinance directed against their race. They would, however, accept a clause empowering the Administration in general terms to frame regulations limiting the number of immigrants of any nationality. There is thus no material point at issue. The Government is prepared to allow the entry in small numbers of educated Indians, notably teachers and priests. The Indians do not press for entry in the mass. The whole dispute now turns solely on the point of principle, whether a limitation accepted by both sides should be defined in terms directly aimed at Indians, or drafted in general terms, though, in fact, it may be applied only to Indians. These men have fought their case with magnificent spirit and self-sacrifice, combined with great subtlety. Their leader, Mr. Gandhi, is not merely a clever politician, but an able thinker of the Tolstoyan school and a convincing writer. Race prejudice in such a conflict becomes as ridiculous as it is odious. General Smuts would only add to his own reputation by consenting to the insubstantial yet ideally vital concession which the Indians claim.

* * *

THE joint Committee on the Censorship of Plays has issued an elaborate and interesting report, signed by all its members. We must reserve detailed comment for our next issue, but on the whole the report is in the direction of reform. Its two vital changes in the present system are that licensing before production becomes an optional rather than a compulsory form, and that the control of theatres and music-halls is unified. Two kinds of plays are henceforth to appear, the licensed and the unlicensed. The latter, appearing at the producer's risk, will be subject to a variety of checks. Seven offences are specified as rendering a play liable to proceedings. The first, indecency, opens it to action by the Public Prosecutor, and among the penalties on conviction may be a ten years' veto on performance. The other six and less deadly sins—such as "offensive personalities," offence against "religious sentiment," injury to friendly relationships with foreign Powers, or liability to cause a breach of the peace—are to be dealt with by a new Committee of the Privy Council, which may, if it please, hear cases in camera. This last provision is the most dubious of the Committee's recommendations.

* * *

LORD SELBY, who was Speaker of the House of Commons from 1895 to 1905, died in London on Saturday, at the age of 74. No finer ceremonial presence ever adorned the Speaker's chair. Mr. Gully was a very handsome man, and his voice and fine bearing added to the impression of personal dignity and grace. Whether his Speakership was entirely successful is open to doubt. With his general rulings, which were mostly on traditional lines, no fault could be found. He was personally amiable, and he was eminently fair. But he sometimes took a too lawyerlike tone for a House where the human element is strong, and he made a serious mistake in allowing the House of Commons police to remove by force some members of the Irish Nationalist Party for an act of disobedience which was unintentional in its origin. From that point his authority declined. It remained for his successor to resume and to enhance the relation of personal friendliness between the Speaker and all sections of the House of Commons.

Politics and Affairs.

THE COMING COUP D'ETAT.

THE "leaders" of the Tory Party have allowed their Press to tell the world that they are prepared to join their followers in making war on the British Constitution. The House of Lords, according to the "Times" and the "Morning Post," will be asked, on the motion for the second reading of the Finance Bill, to pass a resolution refusing to accept the Budget on the ground of its "revolutionary" character until it has been submitted to the electorate. The act, thus formulated, is a truly revolutionary one, involving three separate kinds of usurpation. First, it snatches from the people of Great Britain, acting through their representative body, its historic power, undisputed since the Stuarts, of controlling taxation. Secondly, it arrogates to the House of Lords the power of destroying a Government by striking at the normal and regular exercise of their authority. It thus severs the tie which binds the Executive to the elective assembly and which enables Ministers, within the limits of the Septennial Act, to remain in power as long as they command the confidence of a majority of the House of Commons. Thirdly, it asserts the right of the peers to "refer" to the electors any project of legislation with which they disagree, even that which has been ruled by age-long custom to be outside their province. It kills the Budget and then professes to hold "a Referendum," which is really an inquest upon its corpse. This is to say to the people of Great Britain: "You have no Constitution; rights which are not written do not exist, and we shall destroy them." For this is the precise consequence of this action of the Lords. If they had not been forced by one monarch and wheedled by another, they would never have allowed the people to vote. They now propose to permit them to vote, not for the old House of Commons, but for a body that passes Budgets and Bills only so long as it retains the good-will of the peers. We shall no longer tax ourselves; we shall be taxed by the will of the Lords. Put in their proper place, the British people may have the occasional luxury of a plébiscite on an issue prepared and chosen by the peers after informal consultation with Mr. Arthur Balfour, who to-day commands about 150 votes in the House of Commons. Thus representative democracy disappears, and plebiscitary rule, regulated by certain privileged sons of fathers and nephews of uncles, takes its place.

We need not trouble our readers with the excuses which are and will be put forward to palliate this lawlessness. The Budget is described by the abusive epithet of "revolutionary," and the speeches and writings of its author will be quoted in defence of this description. It will be enough to say in answer that the Budget contains finance and the administration of finance, and nothing more, and that scores of precedents exist for every tax it imposes. Take the most contested example, the land taxes. The Australian Press, led by the "Melbourne Age," one of the most powerful organs of moderate Conservatism in the Empire, scoffs at the idea that any revolutionary character attaches to these imposts, familiar as they are to Colonial statesmanship. In our case they are necessarily linked to a plan of valuation, as a man's blood is joined to a circulating system. When valuation was carried into a separate Bill, as in the Scottish case, the Lords rejected it on the ground that it was finance. Now that it is directly connected with finance, they declare it to be properly the subject of separate legislation. So with liquor. Licensing Bill or Licensing Duties, it is all one to them. The man who denies to the Commons the right to tax land and liquor will deny them the right to tax anything. The tactical method with which we have dealt reveals only one real motive, the pre-arranged combination of two great financial interests to resist each other's taxes. Behind their coarse and corrupt collusion, settled, it appears, by definite agreements, lies another powerful engine of reaction, the determination of the Protectionists to destroy the Budget as the main obstacle to Tariff Reform. There, exposed to all men's gaze, lie the threefold roots of the plot against the Budget. The landlords hate the land taxes, the liquor lords the liquor taxes; it suits both these interests to substitute for the taxation of monopolies and unearned increments of wealth a scheme in which the protection of their accumulations is linked on to a plan for enhancing rents and certain manufacturers' profits at the cost of the people's food and living. Of this plan the electors of this country are to be at once the dupes and the victims. A great part of their political power is to be cut right away from them, and while property, alarmed by the talk of revolution, finds the funds and the moral support for the coming plébiscite, the masses are to be tempted into selling their birthright by the cry of "Make the foreigner pay." That behind this reckless plotting lies a measure of sincere, though rather ignorant and unimaginative fears, we do not doubt. But no intelligent man, accustomed to submit his vague alarms to the test of reason, believes that the Budget threatens a revolution. What it does imply, and what it ought to imply, is that the forces of progress are being combined in an attempt, first, to provide for the enormous cost of modern government without either cheating or oppressing the people, and, secondly, to lay by and add to a fund for curing, or at least alleviating, the worst miseries, accidents, disturbances, that befall the workers in a great industrial State. To this effort all modern statesmanship is bent. Nothing can be more just or more inevitable. The Budget is in that sense an innovation; and in the same sense it is, as Mr. Snowden well said, a preventive of revolution and an alternative to it.

The true revolutionaries, therefore, stand confessed, and we must at once grasp the full seriousness of their attempt to seize the chief power in the State. We know who they are. The Lords are unfit as a body either to pass or to reject any Bill, let alone a Budget. They represent, in the main, one class in the State. They have neither the men nor the machinery suited to supply competent Parliamentary criticism. They are made up, as to a small part of their membership, of able leaders or ex-leaders of society, as to another small part of its scum, as to a third and the largest part, of a dense mass of ignorant, untrained, and mediocre intelligences, soaked with class passion and prejudice, and spoiled for serious public work by pride, luxury, and a narrow environment. They are not accountable to anybody for their legislative acts; and when such a body assumes, as it has assumed, first, an equal power to the House of Commons, and then a vastly superior power, it is clear that, first, the veto and, secondly, the hereditary principle are ripe for destruction.

Now let us look at the situation quite coolly. We are in for the fiercest struggle in modern political history. At present the Lords are preparing to defy the Executive and the House of Commons, and we have no doubt that they are equally ready to reject the counsels of the Sovereign, even if they have not done so already. In upsetting the taxing power of the House of Commons and refusing to countersign the document which really pays our soldiers, sailors, civil servants, and old-age pensioners, they commit an act comparable to the exaction of ship-money by Charles I. Had we been deprived of the advantages we have enumerated, there might have been many thousands of men who would have instantly refused to pay taxes until the rights of the House of Commons had been fully restored. But for the moment this is not necessary. We have the law, the right, and the force on our side. The party will look to the Government to stand by the House of Commons and see that, so far as words and acts can do it, its menaced rights and privileges are restored intact. But if the Government is to be strong, the people must be strong too. We are within two months of a General Election, and a few days of the rejection of the Budget. By the time that that act is clearly impending, a signal of "Krieg-Mobil" from the Liberal headquarters should be enough to set up in every town and village in these countries a force of agitation and vigilance more direct and formidable than the ordinary party organisations can command. The Budget League might reappear as a Constitutional League; for the issue goes beyond the Budget, and implies a demand for a new Constitution. It is not the Radical Party which is trampling on precedents, and making the unwritten sanctity of tradition a sport for any revolutionary party that may come along. But if Toryism has broken, we must mend. So long as the House of Commons is thrust from its place in the centre of political power, and nothing has been devised to take its place, constitutional law, as we and our forefathers have understood and interpreted it, has ceased to reign in Britain. Till the people regain the control of taxes, there will be no peace in the land. That achieved, and the veto and the hereditary principle swept out of existence, the task of Liberal statesmanship will be to discover a fresh and secure balance of governing powers and possibly a new method of legislation.

THE TACTICS OF THE SITUATION.

THE rejection of the Budget, which we may now take as determined on by the leaders of the Lords, will be a challenge at once to the House of Commons and to the people. It is in the first place a challenge to the House of Commons either to substantiate or abandon its claim to the sole and undisputed control of finance. In words, its object is to secure a popular vote on the question of the Budget. But these are words merely. No machinery exists in our Constitution for taking a popular vote on a single issue clear of all others. It may be argued that such machinery might be a valuable addition to our Constitution in legislative matters. But, be that as it may, no such machinery now exists, nor can it be brought into being at this moment and for this purpose. If a General Election follows, all the ordinary complication of issues will arise. The whole programme of both parties will be in evidence, and on the democratic side there will be the usual—we hope and trust not more than the usual—loss of seats by split voting. Out of all this no direct popular vote on the single question of the Budget will or possibly can come. Having maintained the rights of the Commons inviolate, this Ministry will proceed to settle accounts with the Lords on the entire issue of the veto. With these objects in view they will put the question to the country in their own manner, and will not allow the Lords to dictate either the time or the method. They will decline to take the financial power of the Commons as legitimate matter of controversy. The issue which they will submit is that of the continuance of the general power of veto in its absolute form.

To secure these objects, we imagine that the House of Commons will answer the rejection of the Budget with a solemn affirmation of their own historic rights, and will instruct the Executive Government to continue to act upon their financial resolutions until the close of the financial year, or until Parliament shall otherwise determine. These resolutions have long had in practice the force of law. They have been in fact recognised as provisional law, dependent for their final sanction on the ultimate decision of the Commons. The consent of the Lords has for many years been as much a matter of form as the consent of the Crown. The difference now required is merely that, the form of the Lords' consent being unattainable, the resolutions should be renewed and extended for a further provisional period. The collection of taxes will proceed, and, as Mr. Balfour has himself admitted the necessity of all of them except the land taxes and licence duties, the prospect before any recusant would be at best that of having to pay up—with interest if Parliament so determine—within a very few months. Meanwhile, land valuation would go forward, valuers would be appointed, and the first steps taken which will occupy the few weeks which must elapse before the election. The royal assent to this method of procedure might be signified in the King's Speech winding up the session, and would suffice to stamp the resolutions with an authority which would not lightly be set aside. It is wanting in formal regularity, but a revolutionary situation cannot be met with ordinary and regular forces. The Lords have forced the Government of the country into this situation. They are attempting a plutocratic revolution, having no regard in their haste either for the stability of the Constitution or for the practical necessities of government. By so doing they impose on the Government and the Commons the task of maintaining order and providing for public defence.

None the less, the appeal to the country must follow without delay, and its terms admit of no doubt. The Lords have not merely challenged the financial privileges of the Commons. They have also succeeded in frustrating, in reducing almost to a nullity, the legislative activity of the Liberal Government. The question of the veto has, as our readers know, been in our view only too long delayed, and the effect of delay is seen in the gathering audacity which is consummated in the present attack. The Government will ask the people in January for a verdict on the general question of the veto. They will ask them for adequate power, first, to set aside once for all the formal veto on finance, secondly, to override the existing veto on legislation on occasions of irreconcilable conflict. As to the precise methods by which the veto may be curtailed, differences of opinion still exist. There is also divergence as to the substitutes for the powers of revision at present exercised by the peers. But these divergencies will, we trust, by no means be permitted to interfere with concentration on the practical point now before us. We hope that the Government, having taken advantage of the momentary pause to compare the advantages and disadvantages of every possible course, will at an early date, well before the election begins, lay before the people their plan for dealing with the veto in the most crisp and concrete form, and, provided always that this plan involves the destruction of the absolute veto, it will command the allegiance of all their followers.

Nor can we doubt that the Labor Party, though retaining its own ulterior views, will recognise the overwhelming necessity for a concentration of all democratic forces at this juncture and on this governing issue. Our only fear is that in many of the strongholds of democracy seats may be lost by a multiplication of candidatures which has arisen before the full gravity of the constitutional situation was understood, and we trust that every effort is being made by the responsible leaders of both parties to minimise divisions and present a united front. The Unionist calculation, we believe, is not that their party will obtain a majority, but that the united majority of Liberals, Irish, and Labor will not suffice to carry through an important constitutional change. Liberals on their side will insist that the majority, whatever it be, will consist of men who have put a specific pledge first and foremost in their addresses to their constituents. None the less, the magnitude of the majority will materially affect the thoroughness with which the work can be done, and it is a time at which no vote can be dispensed with. The democracy is to put its fortunes to the touch. If it wins, the path of social progress at last lies open before it. The democratisation of the suffrage by the inclusion of women and the removal of artificial impediments to registration, the settlement of the educational controversy, the opening of the land to the people, the reform of the licensing laws, the relief of the poorer ratepayer, the humanisation of public assistance, the systematic provision against sickness, invalidity, and unemployment, will all enter the region in which measures can be discussed not with a view to forcing them by violent agitation through the phalanx of hereditary legislators, but with a single eye to the course of social progress.

LAND FOR THE ASKING.

THE new temple of Conservatism is laid upon cornerstones which the builders rejected. As Sir Howard Vincent moved from obscurity into belated glory when his preposterous fad was foisted upon the Unionist Party as their prime policy by Mr. Chamberlain, so is it at last with Mr. Jesse Collings and his "three acres and a cow." The corybantic revivalist of this new cry is Sir Gilbert Parker. With his assistance Mr. Balfour and the Conservative Party have discovered that there is a land question in England. According to their account they have first "tried it on the dog," and, having found it works for Ireland, they throw it out on the eve of a General Election as the long-considered policy for England. The proposal, as propounded by its hot gossellers, Sir Gilbert Parker and Mr. Eltzbacher, is to this effect. The State, which has found a couple of hundred millions to establish peasant ownership in Ireland, by buying land at high prices from landowners, is to do the same for English landowners. By thus advancing a sufficient number of hundred millions of public money to landlords many thousands of small holders can be settled upon farms ranging in size from ten to one hundred and fifty acres, which they will regard from the start as their private property, though for some forty years they will have to pay the interest on the State loan, with a further sum for the extinction of the debt. The State is, moreover, to find large credit in order to guarantee Land Banks and Co-operative Credit Banks, by which the peasant-owners are to meet the ordinary financial requirements of successful agriculture, enabling the members on their personal security to get advances for stock, manures, seeds, etc., and to tide over the bad times to which farming as a business is peculiarly prone. The spirit and practice of co-operation thus established will be infused into the related processes of collection, carriage, and marketing of produce, and so by individual exertion and mutual aid a new race of sturdy yeomen will spring up in this country to rival the successful little farmers in Denmark, France, and Belgium.

We cannot refrain from commenting upon the courageous simplicity of the electoral device which this proposal contains. State advances for land purchase, Raffeism banks, peasant co-operation in various shapes, have been familiar reforms for several decades. So far as this country is concerned, it is safe to say that until the last few months no responsible Conservative statesman would touch any of them with a pair of tongs. They belonged one and all to the Radicalism which sowed unrest and discontent among our rural laborers. Not until the Small Holdings Act of 1907 and the Land Clauses of this Budget had disclosed a passion for liberty and a definite desire for a stake in the land among all classes of our country folk, did the electoral uses of Land Reform become apparent to Conservatives. With true electioneering audacity the landlords, who had absorbed the commons and stamped out liberty in rural England, are now beginning to tumble over one another with praiseworthy desire to see once more a bold peasantry established in the fields which have been theirs, but which, in their new-born patriotic zeal, they will dispose of to the State—for a consideration. Great are the educational merits of the Finance Bill. The politics and the business of landowners, big or little, are notorious for a certain quality of simple cunning, well illustrated here. The fear of valuation and of future taxation is before the landowner; he won't be able to avoid fair rating or to extort excessive prices for lands sold for public purposes any longer if this Budget goes through. The game will no longer be worth the candle. Then come the politicians of his party, and say to him, "Why not stop the Budget and all its attendant risk by making a grand offer to unload lumps of inferior land on that harmless Juggins, the State, which can always be got to pay more than the land is worth? You needn't go very far in the matter; if you do not find it pay, it can be stopped, just as we stopped our earlier Act of 1892."

But, of course, there is another strand of purpose in this Land Reform. It is to serve not merely for the general defence of property, by strengthening the base of the property system, but first and foremost it is to make a host of Small Protectionists. "Tariff Reform and Land Reform," as one of the prophets tells us, "are part of the same great constructive policy." The little landowner, in other words, is not really expected to make a good thing out of it, or even to make both ends meet. He is expected to be always hard-up, and so always clamorous for a monopoly of the home market. So the Tory politician has before his eyes the bright vision of a couple of hundred thousand little owners voting for an all-round Protective tariff, out of which they will get their little bit, while huge spoils fall to the large surviving landlords and the big manufacturers who have got a "pull."

Perhaps the most amusingly impudent feature about this Conservative Land Reform is that it forms part of a protest against Socialism. That the State should own land bought at a fair valuation and take rent from State-tenants, is to them a mischievous and revolutionary principle. That the State should buy the same land at excessive prices, with doles for disturbance, and should divide up the property thus "socialised" among selected citizens, afterwards financing them in the agricultural business with further public credit, is an innocent and patriotic policy of "self-help" which will stimulate thrift and industry! The State is to buy the land, the State is to furnish buildings, credit, and other supports for a selected class, putting large bonuses into the hands of the present landlords and helping to establish Conservative Protectionist voters for the future. A pretty sort of individualism! One might, perhaps, with propriety ask how the enormous State fund required for this scheme is to be obtained. Hardly from Tariff Reform, for it is now evident that the Protectionist Party despairs of securing a Tariff without the aid of these new fagot voters. The comparatively small Irish scheme has been a heavy strain upon our national finance: a genuine English scheme would cost six times as much. But it is unnecessary to pursue the practical difficulties which beset a scheme that is nothing else than a desperate attempt to stem the popularity of the Budget.

LIGHT ON THE ANGLO-GERMAN PROBLEM.

THE annual ceremony of the Guildhall banquet has come and gone, and with it one of the three or four occasions on which a leading member of the Government addresses a European audience. The day is awaited as eagerly abroad as at home. To the Prime Minister's speech every public man in two Continents looks for some clue to the policy which guides the masters of the greatest fleet in all the seven seas. Mr. Asquith's rather brief discourse was competent, correct, and well phrased. It conveyed the unanimous hope of all parties that South Africa will widen her franchise and break down the barrier of race. It said kindly things of the Young Turks, when it might, perhaps, have warned them, tactfully but firmly, that their total failure to deal with the latest and most wanton of Armenian massacres has carried their movement beyond the phase of ungrudging compliment. It dealt with the new situation on the Congo with an entirely happy admixture of encouragement and reserve. The present is still hideous; the promises of the Belgian Government are fair; the full and honest execution of these promises will alone induce us to reconsider our refusal to recognise the annexation. For the rest, the speech spoke of the general European situation in terms which were startling in their optimism when one compares them with the gloomy utterances of Sir Edward Grey, Lord Rosebery, and the Prime Minister himself in the early summer of this year. One sentence there was which seemed to convey a larger meaning, a constructive purpose—the sentence which declared that no obstacle exists to a better understanding with Germany. Was it a cautious advance? It is what the Germans choose to make of it. Save for this promising sentence, the speech was pretty much what Mr. Balfour or Lord Lansdowne might have said in the same circumstances. There was no bid for the leadership among the humaner parties of Europe. There was no revealed consciousness that Liberalism stands for an international creed. The enervating doctrine of "continuity" in foreign policy seems for the moment to have checked—we hope only checked—any ambition in British Liberalism to leave its mark on the history of civilisation. The pioneer spirit which has transformed finance and social legislation has opened no parallels before the high walls of our traditional diplomacy. The work which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman began to do has suffered a temporary arrest.

The problem of the race of armaments and our naval rivalry with Germany is obscured only for the moment in the public mind by the supreme issue of the Budget and the conflict with the Lords. It waits none the less for decision. Even before it has run the gauntlet of the Lords, the future surplus from the new taxes has to face the demands for the next year's naval programme. Yet the panic which this Session's speeches from the Liberal Front Bench did so much to render plausible is to-day only a thing for regretful remembrance. On both sides of the North Sea the effect remains. Those speeches have made it a little harder than it was before to expect the understanding which Mr. Asquith desires. The mob mind in both nations retains a dim recollection of its alarms. Responsible statesmen, like Admiral von Tirpitz, can hardly have forgotten the official statement which came so near to giving him the lie direct. And now, after a few calm months, the official estimate of seventeen German "Dreadnoughts" in 1912 seems as extravagant as the Opposition's twenty-one or twenty-five. The new volume of the "Navy League Annual" admits the real facts with its usual candor. We have at the moment seven "Dreadnoughts" ready at sea to Germany's none. Turn to the chapter on Austrian preparations and you will discover there a curious document, an appeal from the new Austrian Navy League to the alarmed patriotism of its fellow-citizens on the ground that Great Britain has eighty first-class ships to Germany's twenty-eight, and Austria's six. Consult the expert comparisons of the new British with the projected or partially built German ships of the same type, vessel for vessel, "Dreadnought" and super-"Dreadnought." In every item the superiority is on our side, displacement and horse-power, 12-inch guns against 11-inch, broadside, ahead, and astern fire each showing a 10 per cent. margin to our credit, with the same superiority for the typical gun of each type of ship in its ability to pierce armor. The main fact about Germany's construction is frankly admitted to be her failure to observe the time-table. Her first two "Dreadnoughts," we are now told, will have occupied nearly four years in building. The ships of the 1908 programme were all, we read, "late in being laid down." The anticipation of dates in the case of two ships of the 1909 programme was obviously adopted to balance the delay which had occurred with the other vessels. There is no thought of increasing or hastening the total building; "The German Naval Bill is immutable; so far it has been much delayed in its execution," and the "Annual" frankly declares that it is "impossible to accept the suggestion that the commencement of programmes many years ahead will be massed into a single twelvemonth in a desire suddenly to attain an equality to, if not a superiority over, ourselves." By January, 1912, Germany can at the most have ready, not twenty-five or twenty-one or seventeen "Dreadnoughts," but a bare thirteen. More probably she will have eleven. We are secure of twenty—a reckoning which omits our two "Nelsons," which some think better than "Dreadnoughts," and our crushing superiority in earlier types. Of the scare there is nothing left but the obscure uneasiness which has made it needlessly hard for the saner forces in the party to confine our next year's programme to a figure which will be adequate without being provocative.

Meanwhile the forces are gathering in Germany, which make it possible to look forward to a cessation of this rivalry. The whole politics of the Empire are in suspense. A new Chancellor has succeeded to the old problems, of whom much is hoped and little known. The puzzle of the Budget has not been solved. It has only been patched up by a temporary compromise which postpones to next year the difficulty of meeting a fresh deficit with more popular taxes. At by-elections and State elections the Social Democrats are sweeping everything before them, and even the National Liberals feel the universal "pull towards the Left." But of all symptoms the most significant is the steady campaign in the rigidly Conservative Press for an understanding with Great Britain and an arrangement of armaments. Its reasoning is the more impressive because it manifestly proceeds on purely self-regarding grounds. Three motives influence the Conservatives. They fear that the lack of the money will involve heavy sacrifices for the Army, if the reckless expenditure on ships continues. They read from the temper of the people that the upper classes and the entrenched interests cannot much longer continue to evade their just share of taxation, unless the total burden can be lightened. They dread above all else the growth of the Socialist vote. How long it will take for this mood of reasonable apprehension to affect the new Chancellor, what new combinations it may produce in a Reichstag which has no stable majority—that none can foresee. But the moment for an arrangement comes visibly nearer. Mr. Asquith's pregnant sentence may conceivably hasten its coming; a bolder and more direct appeal might have brought it nearer yet. For two reasons we are bound to desire the speediest possible settlement. Our own social programme hangs on our Navy Estimates. The aspect of Europe, with Russia emphasising her feud with Austria and both the German Powers watching the Greek and Cretan crisis in an unpleasantly expectant mood, is a warning that smouldering quarrels have their dangers even under a clear sky.

The material for a bargain is, we are still convinced, such an arrangement as Mr. Cohen suggested in his paper at the Eighty Club. Count Reventlow's capable article in the "Navy League Annual" insists on two central elements in this Anglo-German situation. The first of them is the historical fact that it was we who forced the pace, first, by insisting in our Press on Germany's naval weakness, and then by inventing the colossal apparition of the "Dreadnought." The second is that it is primarily to protect her commerce that Germany must arm, while the measure of her armaments must be not so much the relative value of that commerce as the strength of the Navy which threatens it. The nature of that menace has been too much advertised. Every pains has been taken to inform Germans of that model map which hangs in the Admiralty, whereon is demonstrated the ease with which every German merchant vessel in all the seas could be seized as a prize within two days of the outbreak of war. To check the rivalry in armaments we must be prepared to allay the fears which are their motive. If the Germans on their side would abandon their savage doctrine of the floating mine, and we on ours the anachronism of the capture of merchantmen in war, the "rattle into barbarism" might be stayed, because navies would have lost their most specious pretext—the excuse that they are only an insurance for commerce. Our power of defence would only be heightened, for there would be less to defend. Our power of attack would still make us the potential masters of every distant settlement. We should retain all the superiority we ought to claim, and retain it on terms which would at last allow us to devote our new surpluses to our own development.

A LETTER TO A BUSINESS-MAN ON THE ENGLISH REVOLUTION NOW PENDING, FROM THE THREAT OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS TO REJECT THE BUDGET.

IV.

To you, my dear friend, I have one final word. You are a representative of that class which has done more than any other in the past to shape the peculiar genius of that Constitution we inherit from the past. The influence of the middle-class, the shrewd common sense of the merchant, the hard, practical insight of the business man, the narrow but firm and rigorous precision of the lawyer, are reflected in every part of it; it is they who have been the most important instruments of change, who have fitted it for each new age, who have watched over its every motion and development. The Lords may have guarded and preserved, but the middle-class has moulded and invigorated and inspired it. Peculiar, therefore, should be your interest in preserving this most august of modern institutions, for it is one which owes more to the influence of the average citizen than any other of its kind in any age. It is the idealised image of the stable merchant, who grasps the substance without seeking the shadow, and rests on the solid ground without eyeing the heights with envy. Hence it is you who are the naturally appointed guardian of the Constitution, and it is by your ideas that its future must be directed.

Two ways of development in the future are clear, the one that of evolution, systematic, consistent, and springing directly from the past. That line will preserve at least some independence for the Lower House from both Peers and people in all things, absolute independence of the Peers in finance, and that line, as I have already shown, springs direct from, and is rooted absolutely in, the very earth and foundation of our institutions, from the days when the first Edward summoned the Model Parliament, to the days when the seventh Edward summoned this one. Development upon these lines may be mistaken, but it can hardly be dangerous, and, by its close and continuous connection with the spirit of the past, it will always bring the future into relation with it. From such a development we may have something to correct, but little to fear, and much to hope.

There is also another line along which the Constitution may go—or rather be forced—the line of Revolution. How far that Revolution may extend no man can say, but we already see some of its dangers. Already the historic independence of the Commons in matters of general import, as distinguished from finance, is imperilled. Between mandates from below and vetoes from above, the individuality of the Commons, its personality and its control, are stifled or checked. The danger here is not a little one, but it is danger which may be averted. But when the financial control of the Lower House is threatened, then indeed we are lost. The Commons is reduced to an entire dependence upon its two masters, so that a continuous Referendum, decided upon and worked by the peers, becomes the sole instrument of Government. All the old stability, the good understandings, the invisible conventions, disappear, and everything is moulded by the breadth of the popular will at times and occasions selected by six hundred irresponsible autocrats. Such a process can only end in Revolution, and, though the financial control of the Commons may be the first to fall, the general control of the Lords will not be the last to suffer.

These, then, are the consequences of the action that you favor, and the cause which you advocate. You and those like you are prepared to destroy precedents, to abolish the immemorial atmosphere of tradition, in which alone our Constitution can live, to drag everything into irremediable disaster, for advantages that are doubtful, and for disasters that are certain. After such a step as rejection of the Budget by the Lords, the whole prospect of Revolution opens. Never, never again can the slow process of development, the nice adjustments of time, the soft mouldings of nature and experience, be applied to the fabric of our Constitution. All and every one—not of its principles, but of its practices—must be submitted for instant decision to judges that are incompetent by persons that are reckless or unscrupulous. Nor are they to be submitted as a whole, but gradually, accidentally, illogically and occasionally, at the careless bidding of a hereditary class. From such dangers it is the middle class alone of England that can save us, for their opinion, which has always fixed the practice of the Constitution, is yet able to save its existence. Here is a cause which concerns no party, but which involves every individual. It is a cause for which everyone can stand, and a cause whose importance extends far beyond the importance of any provisions now in the Budget itself. The Budget is of complete indifference and unimportance compared with the financial supremacy of the Commons. To secure that end generations of Englishmen have struggled, for that end Hampden died and Halifax lived, and by that means the whole spirit of our Constitution was built up. And as our Constitution arose from that doctrine, so it must perish with it. On this there is not, nor ever can be, now or in future, any doubt or hesitancy whatever. We owe it therefore to our fathers to maintain what they gave us, to our sons to give to them what they can maintain, and we shall be false to both trusts if we abandon the most fundamental principle of English liberty, and the chief distinguishing mark of our parliamentary greatness.

A hundred years ago Edmund Burke, writing of the French Revolution, described the danger that it brought to the English Constitution by applying the principles of rigid logic and reason to an organism rooted in the past and based on immemorial tradition. I would that my pen could bring home to you the dangers that threaten our Constitution to-day from a procedure equally ruthless, from a reason and logic equally rigid, but so infinitely more dangerous, because a thousand times more insidious. Our country, which had nothing to fear from a mob headed by Frenchmen in red caps, has everything to fear from one headed by Englishmen in coronets.

HAROLD W. V. TEMPERLEY.

(Conclusion.)

Life and Letters.

THE JEST OF PILATE.

BACON has been taken to task for the opening words of a famous essay. Pilate, his critics say, meant no jest when he asked, "What is Truth?" for the question has in it a ring of irony. Every child knows what truth means, yet philosophers and theologians hold disputations through two thousand years and more without agreeing on a definition. Is it that they cannot see what lies before their eyes, or that they will not open their eyes to that which is revealed to babes and sucklings? Is the difficulty a jest of the thinkers, sporting for ever with mystifications bewildering to the lay mind, or is it a subtler irony in the scheme of things which elects to puzzle us most with that which is in appearance easiest to comprehend? A sentence or two in Professor James's most recent statement of his position—"The Meaning of Truth" (Longmans)—suggests the latter view. We are to think that in dazzling the world with the kaleidoscopic variations of the pragmatistic view of truth, he and Dr. Schiller and Professor Dewey are not so much active agents as passive instruments in the hands of the "Time Spirit." Writing of humanism, which is one of the pragmatic incarnations, he tells us why the gates of logic will not prevail against it:—

"Humanism is, in fact, much more like one of those secular changes that come upon public opinion overnight, as it were, borne upon tides 'too deep for sound and foam,' that survive all the crudities and extravagances of their advocates, that you can pin to no one absolutely essential statement, nor kill by any one decisive stab.

"Such have been the changes from aristocracy to democracy, from classic to romantic taste, from theistic to pantheistic feeling, from static to revolutionary ways of understanding life—changes of which we have all been spectators. Scholasticism still opposes to such changes the method of confutation by single decisive reasons. . . . This is like stopping a river by planting a stick in its bed."

The passage is at least in one respect just. It is a true piece of self-criticism. Whether to its credit or to its discredit, pragmatism is not so much a definite doctrine that can be refuted—from which incidentally it follows that it is not a definite doctrine that can be proved—as a tendency, an impulse, a mood which survives attack and retreats from one position only to make head in another direction. It may be worth while to take up Professor James's challenge in the form in which he utters it, to dispense with the ungrateful and, indeed, too easy task of pricking logical holes and pointing out inconsistencies of statement, and consider pragmatism broadly as a tendency, to look at its antecedents and its history, and to attempt some estimate of its value, not as a ripened harvest of thought, but as a seed that is germinating.

We do not suppose that Professor James will acknowledge the parentage, but in our view his true source of modern pragmatism is to be found in Newman's "Grammar of Assent." Taking advantage of the weaknesses and gaps in the rational order, Newman introduced, or re-introduced, the view that belief—not merely belief in the supernatural, but belief as such—is something intrinsically different from an act of rational thought, that it is an act of will, a voluntary assent or dissent supervening upon the distinct contemplation of certain ideas. Now Professor James is for ever repudiating such an interpretation of pragmatism. He is constantly telling us that this is what he does not mean. One of the earlier expressions of his views was indeed entitled "The Will to Believe." But we are to understand apparently that this was an unfortunate choice of words leading readers to misunderstandings. None the less, the notion of a choice still runs through Professor James's words. The spirit of Newman is perpetually laid by soothing incantation formulae, only to wake again and walk in new verbal clothing through Professor James's much-winding argument. The satisfactoriness of a belief is lovingly dwelt upon, and if at times our questionings are stilled by the assurance that self-consistency—which Rationalism itself demands—is the one thing eminently "satisfactory" to the intellect, at other times we are confronted with passages like this:—

"I had supposed it to be matter of common observation that, of two competing views of the universe, which in all other respects are equal, but of which the first denies some vital human need while the second satisfies it, the second will be favored by sane men for the simple reason that it makes the world seem more rational. To choose the first view under such circumstances would be an ascetic act, an act of philosophic self-denial of which no normal human being would be guilty."

Such a passage reveals a confusion of the psychological and the philosophical points of view, combined with a naïve attitude to the question of truth which makes Professor James's case appear nearly desperate. That men are habitually guided by their preferences, that they seek beliefs which will quench their mental and moral thirst we all know. We had supposed that the beginnings of scientific and philosophic criticism arose from the attempt to rise a little above this uncritical attitude, and that progress, if very slight, had, at least, gone far enough to make men draw up and examine their positions when they found themselves being led in this way. But to Professor James all this is foolishness; it is an act of asceticism of which no sane man in an age of comfort is guilty. What the despised rationalist would conclude in the case propounded by Professor James is that valid grounds for deciding between the two views were not available. Both of them by hypothesis have some evidence in their favor. That evidence is equal, and therefore not only not decisive, but incapable of weighting the scale with so much as a balance of probability one way rather than another. In such a situation the degree of "asceticism," which any rational man requires, is a suspense of judgment. A man may indeed prefer the one view as more interesting, stimulating, or encouraging, but if he takes this preference for evidence he deceives himself, and the truth is not in him. That he should quite deliberately proceed to make of his preference a logical argument and avowedly maintain that he believes the one theory rather than the other on this ground is scarcely conceivable. Men do not act so. They begin by preferring and end by honestly believing. But if they have any rudiments of self-respect left in them, they cannot bring the two ends of the process together and yet maintain the attitude of belief unimpaired.

Nevertheless, Professor James is right in attributing to his theory a psychological significance. It is a part of the debris thrown off by the growth of science. On the one hand the growth of psychology, especially in Professor James's own hands, has illustrated the close interaction of emotion, will, and belief, and has familiarised us with a certain portion of the mental world in which facts—viz., states of our own mind and body—are ready made and unmade by our belief or disbelief in them. On the other hand the extension of physical discovery has revealed to us the immensity of our ignorance, and the infantine limitation of our ordinary concepts of matter and mind, cause and effect. It has opened up new vistas of human power, revealed the malleability of natural conditions, and demands an infinite flexibility in our conceptions of the possible. It has loosened the old foundations of certainty, and given reins to the constructive use of the scientific imagination. The foundations of physics and of the sciences of life and mind are given over to the unrestricted play of hypothesis, and the scientific thinker is in his own way claiming the sort of freedom that Professor James demands. He wants unlimited licence to frame hypotheses and see what comes of them, and his practice is not far from Professor James's principle in that he cares for little provided that his theory "works," that it suggests experiments, that it fits in with the results of investigation as far as they go, that he hopes to "make" it true by actually constructing the model in which it is to be displayed. The demand for strict demonstration embarrasses and annoys him. He wants at once to be "satisfied" and stimulated, because he is always pushing ahead in discovery.

The point of difference which the pragmatist does not sufficiently grasp is that the scientific man has always in the back of his mind the consciousness that in this form his theories are all provisional. He has behind his immediate work the knowledge that in the end severer tests must be applied; he wishes merely to postpone their application till he has reached a point of view at which decisive demonstration one way or another will be possible. If he followed Professor James he would abandon this saving grace, erecting his provisional theories into truths which need no other proof than the satisfaction which they yield. He would make a deliberate logical theory of that which is for him only a practical method. The results would not, we conceive, be "satisfactory," and here, at least, we have a consideration which the pragmatist will not ignore. We already have far too much of dogmatism in science, and far too much of investigation undertaken only to find "proof" for that which the inquirer is already determined to believe. All that Professor James has to say of the method of establishing results by "validating" them, that is by making them work, is but too true of much of scientific controversy. The function of the logician, the value of a theory of truth, is not to establish these bad methods in their ways, but constantly to recall men to the recognition that, though their theories perish, Truth is what it is. It offers us no choice, except to submit or to rebel, and there is unfortunately no ground to think that it was framed to give us satisfaction or meet our vital needs. It is we who have to limit our satisfactions by the conditions which it imposes, and limit our needs as best we can to those which the humble and dispassionate study of reality shows us to be capable of fulfilment.

ALMOST AN IMMORTAL.

It was a hundred and fifty years last Wednesday since Schiller was born, and a hundred and four last May since he died. That is a long time for any writer's name to be remembered, except by the curious. One might call it a long step towards "immortality," for a name that is familiar after one century will probably be familiar after two, and Schiller is still well known far outside the narrow circles of scholars, specialists, and literary ghouls. His thoughts are deeply involved in the life of his own people. In the common intercourse of Europe, his words still fly through the mouths of men, and never to have heard of him would argue a mind uneducated. Together with Virgil and a few other poets, he enjoys the advantage of use in schools. It is a dubious advantage, we admit, but because "there is no harm in him," he is made a text-book of literature for the German youth, and of language for foreigners' lessons. The knowledge of him is thus ensured, and both his conspicuous phrases and general ways of thought are almost unconsciously impressed upon the heart of each generation. He has become a school of language, a source of recognised quotation, and an instructor in those sharply defined characters of black and white which the inexperienced love, and perhaps require for their guidance amid the infinite complexity of the actual world. He is, as we said, involved in the life of his people, and even in the life of Europe, nor has any German writer hitherto taken his place.

It is a great reward, though it is not the highest. We doubt if any mature man or woman now turns to Schiller for personal interest, for inspiration, for comfort, or even for literary pleasure. If we did turn to him for any of those things, we doubt if we should find them. After all, there are very few who can supply us with those excellent gifts between the limits of youth and the beginnings of old age—few of the dead, we mean, for the living possess the irresistible interest of sharing the same dangers and hopes and fears as ourselves, since for a year or two we are together in the same boat upon the stream. But as we look backwards up the current, here and there we catch sight of a man whose words seem never to lose their bearing upon the life of any age, and to be as vital for ourselves as for his contemporaries. For inspiration and for interests closely personal to our own lives we may still look to the creators of Prometheus, of Hamlet, and of Mephisto. Or if we seek the comfort of expression in our own most intimate joy and sorrow, we may still find it in a few great singers from Euripides to Catullus, and from Dante onward to Heine. Those are the true immortals, for they appear to have drawn the water of life from springs of thought and emotion which shall never dry. But hardly below them come a larger number of great spirits who seem wanting just one touch for the aspect of eternity, and yet whose power dominated their age and whose name is preserved in honor, though the honor is paid to a tomb rather than a throne. In German literature, we think, it is Schiller to whom the highest reverence of that kind must be paid.

Goethe, who for about ten years was his most intimate friend, and who valued him to the full, once said that Germany had produced no Byron, but the nearest to Byron was Schiller. At first sight the criticism seems surprising, for Schiller had none of the attributes that still give vitality to the best of Byron's work—the wit, the poignant satire, the knowledge of the world and of action, or the passionate defiance of propriety. But it was not these greater qualities that first gave Byron his extraordinary hold over this country and Europe. That hold was won by dramas and poems which now are hardly read, and receive only the same kind of sepulchral honor as Schiller's would receive were they not a basis of education, such as Byron's could never be after he lost his good repute owing to his finest work.

In Schiller's early dramas there was something of the Byronic spirit of revolt. His noble brigands and melancholy cut-throats were the predecessors of the Manfreds and Corsairs who drove the youth of Europe to shake their fists in the face of established society. Like Byron, he rose against the conventions of life as well as of art, and his rebellion was the more violent because the bondage was more oppressive. He had known it at its worst as army-surgeon in the little State of a converted German Duke, who for the preservation of the discipline and souls of his people forbade him to write. His first play—the play which won him influence—bore on its title-page a lion rampant, with the motto "In Tyrannos." Filled with the spirit of revolt and gloom, it moves with a certain grandeur of sentiment and action. It is characteristic that the hero of the piece, having rebelled against ungrateful man, is discovered among savage rocks and hearts more savage still, perusing the works of Plutarch; and that for this play, probably by the advice of Anacharsis Clootz, in the fourth year of Liberty and the first of Equality, the National Assembly in Paris conferred the honor of French Citizenship upon "Gilleers," or "Sieur Gille, publiciste Allemand." Unhappily, owing to so vague an address, the diploma took six years to reach him, and Anacharsis, with Danton, who signed it, and Roland, who drew it up, had then long since trodden the road of the guillotine; but it still testifies to the origins of Schiller's early fame.

Like Byron, he made demands upon depths of passion which the eighteenth century had obscured, or, having skimmed over with smooth and solid-seeming conventions, had forgotten. But, even in youth, he showed little of Byron's self-conscious cynicism, and every year he inclined more to the Revolution's worship of love, humanity, and reason, turning from rebellion to the joy of universal citizenship throughout the world. Something of the change may be seen in Beethoven's employment of the ode, "An die Freude," beginning:—

"Freude, schöner Götterfunken, Tochter aus Elysium."

As the author of the Life of Schiller, in the "Great Writers" series, has noticed:—

"In the last movement of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, after a storm of struggle and chaos and passionate rejection, a voice is heard saying, 'O friends, not sounds like these! but let us raise a sweeter strain, and full of joy!' And then, quietly, as though exhausted with the struggle, but now at peace, the new phrase is given out, and gradually the whole chorus joins in the triumphant song of Schiller's Hymn to Joy:—

'Joy, thou radiant flame from heaven,
Daughter of the gods divine,
We, with sacred madness driven,
Here approach thy glorious shrine.
What the cold world's sword would sever,
Thy enchantment binds aright;
All mankind are brothers ever
Where thou retest in thy flight.

Chorus: Men in millions above telling,
Join in rapture of embrace!
Far above yon starry space
Some dear Father has his dwelling."

In the fifth line the translator has followed the earlier and better version, and the imitation gives a tolerable idea of the opening stanza of a poem very characteristic both of Schiller and of a revolutionary age, when it was a joy to be alive. That mood of hopefulness and belief in human kind was like the opening of a door into sunshine. Except during a few short weeks in Russia four years ago, and during the great Italian drama now being retold by Mr. George Trevelyan, there has been nothing to compare to it since Schiller's time, and Schiller was the man to give it voice. "Auch ich war in Arkadien geboren," he cries in one of his best-known lines, and though that poem ends with the lamentations of middle-age, we feel that Schiller's spirit never in reality quitted the Arcady of his childhood. Madame de Staël, who knew him only just before his death, said that he lived and spoke and acted as though wicked people did not exist. He knew the hardship and bitterness of the world, for he was generally poor, but that radiant spirit remained untouched in its persistent faith, and never lost the glory of its splendid vision.

"For the last twenty years," said Goethe in his old age, "the public has been contending which was the greater, Schiller or I, and they ought rather to have rejoiced that they have two such fellows to contend about." To us in these days it is almost incredible that the question should ever have been raised, but still we may rejoice that Germany once had such a fellow as Schiller. Goethe counted him the greatest blessing fortune gave him in later years. "To me," he writes, "Schiller was a new spring in which everything burgeoned into glad and abundant life," and, again: "He saved me from the charnel-house of science, and gave me back to poetry and life." "The charnel-house of science" is a strange phrase coming from the man to whom all Nature was so full of vitality, but to the world, as to Goethe, there was evidently something about Schiller of this renewing, this life-giving power. His radiance elevated mankind above the contempt of those who call man a worm, and by the purification of that flame-like spirit he helped to redeem us from the vulgarity which so easily besets us, and especially besets the nations of the German and English stock. His truest praise is uttered in the epilogue that Goethe wrote for the "Song of the Bell" ten years after Schiller's death. One of the stanzas ends with the well-known lines:—

"Und hinter ihm, in wesenlosem Scheine, Lag, was uns Alle bändigt, das Gemeine."

The vulgar and the commonplace, the existence uninspired, unredeemed, and unkindled into which the spirit so readily and so comfortably falls—from that it was given to this poet to deliver himself and others. He restored to art something of the grandeur of central and public conceptions, and to life he restored the brightness of unconquered faith. His works may no longer possess the attraction for us that they had; we are engaged in conflicts needing other words and other arms than his; but to himself, now that a century and a half have gone since his birth, we may still pay continued honor to one among those emancipators of the spirit who hand on the torch of hope to the generations.

BARBARIANS OF OUR TIME.

It would be an entertaining speculation to inquire what effect the discovery of Albania would have had upon the earlier phases of the Romantic movement. Here in these wild and beautiful mountains, almost in sight of the Italian coast and a bare two days' journey from Vienna, there still survives among a Catholic people of Indo-European stock the very world of peril, adventure, and honor out of which a whole generation of poets spun its ideals and its dreams. Byron, indeed, had travelled among the gentler clans of Epirus, and placed on record to their account an admiration and a sympathy which he refused to Greeks and Turks. Ali Pasha of Jannina was a considerable contemporary figure. He had attained the summit of glory among a people who regard a bribe only as a flattering testimony to their importance. Napoleon and Mr. Pitt had each sought in vain to corrupt him. He took their subsidies and continued to follow his own devices. But it was not until our own day that any information at once accurate and ample has been available regarding the Northern Albanians, who alone of their race have quite succeeded in defying all the influences of successive civilisations. The Roman conquest left nothing behind it save a few names on the classical atlas and a few ruins for lazy masons to dismantle. Of the Byzantine, the Bulgarian, and the Servian Empires there remains only the legacy of uncomprehending hatred. From Catholicism they have learned only to observe fast-days and to despise the Eastern Church. The very Jesuits only succeeded in assisting them to visualise Hell, and even of the Last Judgment they think much what they think of a Turkish Pasha's court, that it is alien tyranny invented to be defied. Here, in short, are the Dark Ages without their monasteries and without their cathedrals. It is the Europe of Charlemagne without its Latin. Amid all the brutalities of the tribal law, the blood feud, the sale of women, the brigandage, the witchcraft, and the childish ignorance there is only one anachronism and it, too, is a barbarism. From Dibra to Scutari, from Scutari to Ipek, there is nothing modern save the Martini rifle.

The Romantics knew nothing of this paradise of honor and violence. Even the anthropologists, who will rummage a South Sea Island and go into exile among Dyaks or Samoyedes, have been content to leave Albania unexplored. One is doubly grateful therefore for the vivid and entertaining volume in which Miss M. E. Durham has just described her wanderings among the wilder Gheg tribes ("High Albania," Arnold). Her purpose is to amuse, and to kindle sympathy. But while she is far from having any scientific interest in anthropology, the essential fact about this primitive people emerges on almost every page with almost excessive emphasis. They are savages, brigands, murderers, but the root fact of their wild lives is not their lawlessness but their unflinching obedience to their law. They know no more of Old Testament or New than they know of the Pandects or the Code Napoléon. But from his cradle which the Church would call incestuous, to his unhallowed murderer's grave, the Albanian mountaineer bends all his energies to the observance of his own crude canon. His case seems to the modern mind peculiar, though in reality it is an almost universal phase of social evolution. He acknowledges so much of unity that all Albanians are brothers against Slavs or Turks, while all these northern tribes observe the code traditionally ascribed to one Lek Dukaghin, who is said to have been excommunicated by Pope Paul II. in 1464 on the unusually reasonable ground of the sin he committed in drafting this abominably un-Christian legislation. Yet, despite these bases of unity, the law of life among these clans is one of carefully regulated but unrelenting war. They are all of them exogamous, and marriage is sometimes by capture, but more commonly, where Christians intermarry, by purchase. A woman is worth anything between one and two rifles. The bargain is commonly concluded in infancy or even before birth. The most curious, and to us the most novel, of the institutions which Miss Durham describes is the honorable estate of virginity. There is apparently no religious or ascetic element in the ideal. A girl who refuses to marry the partner to whom she has been sold, may free the two families from the blood-feud which would otherwise result, by taking before witnesses a vow of perpetual virginity. Instead of incurring the contempt commonly meted out by savages to the childless woman, she rises at once to all the honours and privileges of manhood. She inherits property, she eats with the men, and above all, she is allowed to wear breeches and to carry a revolver. Monogamy even among the Moslems is an almost invariable rule, save only that Catholics and Moslems alike follow the Mosaic rule that a widow should cohabit with her deceased husband's brother. It is, of course, the wild law of honor which perpetuates the blood feud. The murders which are said to account for 20 per cent. of the deaths among adult males are morally indistinguishable from the civilised duel. There is this difference, that it is held to be quite honorable to shoot one's adversary from behind in the dark, and absolutely necessary to kill, while the close sense of kinship among the males of a clan makes any fellow-tribesman a legitimate victim. There is this to be said for the Albanian canon that it does introduce innumerable checks and restraints upon disorderly vengeance. The truce of God is frequent and is always rigidly observed. Women are inviolably protected, save from their own lawful owners. But in other respects the lex talionis does not deter. One might have supposed that the knowledge that a rash word or an unjust deed may bring misery upon the whole of one's family to the third and fourth generation would have bred caution. But the very universality of these quarrels, the honor done to courage, and the pride of killing many men, have apparently counteracted the intention of this Draconian code. It would be a mistake to waste pity on these glorious barbarians. They feel none for themselves. One tribe enjoyed itself hugely by entertaining Miss Durham with the merry tale of the last of its really splendid killings. One man at a feast lost a cartridge and immediately began to accuse the rest of theft and lying. Twelve lay dead before the great evening closed, and even then the cartridge had not been found. It is, however, fairly clear that public opinion is now much in advance of the code. A man, who had been insulted by a man of another tribe, killed a young boy of that tribe while Miss Durham was present. His own fellows were indignant but puzzled. They had to admit that the avenger had observed the tribal law, and therefore they could not punish him. They solved the difficulty by telling the other tribe that they would not attempt to resist them, if they chose to come over and burn the murderer's house. The immediate proclamation of a universal truce from blood-feuds for many months after the establishment of the Constitution last year, was a striking proof of the strength of this growing desire for a humaner way of living. It pleases Miss Durham to sneer at the Young Turks and the Constitution, and to represent the Albanians as a race at once too good and too bad for it. But she is wholly silent on the fact that, at the very moment when she was in the mountains, the Albanian regiments at Monastir were shooting their Old Turk Pashas and striking the decisive blow for the new order.

But it would be to libel the whole Albanian race to send out this clever book to the world at large as a complete description of it. Miss Durham revels in her tales of violence and brutality. Her book reeks with blood, and one suspects that even if she had seen any milder side of the life of the mountains, she would not have cared to describe it. Her picture is a truthful record of one aspect, the more important and obvious aspect of the life of the wilder clans. But there is another chapter in Albanian annals. For more than a generation past a growing band of devoted men, mainly from the south, have been busied in reducing their untamed language to writing. Persecuted with equal animus by Greek Bishops and Turkish Pashas, they have still carried on their bloodless propaganda in a country where every other Nationalist ideal has been a standard of hatred, intolerance, and strife. They have faced prison, exile, and assassination. But even before the revolution they had transformed the thinking at least of Central and Southern Albania. This cult of the book has levelled the proud distinctions of birth, and swept away the jealousy of creeds. The present writer counts among his friends a southern Bey, once wild, vindictive, and barbarous, who met a persecuted schoolmaster while he was doing time for a common murder in a Turkish gaol. He learned to read, and came out a humane and civilised man. He has seen another friend, a Moslem of ancient lineage, embrace a Christian peasant in public, merely because they made the mutual discovery that both were helping forward the cult of the Albanian alphabet against Turks and Greeks alike. A third friend made the beginnings of a fortune in Boston, and returned immediately after the revolution to spend it all in founding a public library in his native town. A fourth friend, Faik Bey Konitza, a Moslem by birth, deserves, and has indeed won, a high place among philologists. Born not much more than thirty years ago in a feudal castle among naked mountains, he has mastered half the languages of Europe; he writes a French style worthy of Diderot; he has done more than any living scholar to explore in all the libraries of the Continent the obscure documents that relate to the history of his native land. He is at the same time a critic of music not altogether without renown, and even a composer. In the politics of the Balkans he illustrates the chivalry of his race by his unbending championship of his national idea. Miss Durham's bloody savages are certainly Albanians. The facts she relates about them are the truth. But they are not the whole truth about the Albanians of to-day, and with every month they are becoming less generally true. It is impossible to predict what destiny has in store for this singular race. Much turns upon the tact of the Young Turks, and much upon the ambitions of Austria. But no race in the Balkans deserves in its blind struggles and its unguided impulses to be regarded by Europe with more forbearance, more lenience, and more sympathy.

THE GAME OF DEATH.

A HOST of small birds have been feeding on the ploughing, the rear rank continually flying over the front, and then in turn falling to the rear, till the flock has somersaulted far out from the friendly hedge. Suddenly their activity ceases. The earth has opened and swallowed them up, or rather the heavens have disclosed a danger that bids them lie very still among the brown clods. High in the sky hangs a dot that every sparrow there knows for his ancient enemy, even though it may be a sparrow fresh from the nest, that has never seen a hawk before. But it is an awful business this lying quite still, hidden in sight, while overhead, with piercing eyes, hangs Death incarnate. One by one, and in twos and threes, the foragers slink off as best they can to the cover of the friendly hedges, and on one of them the hawk descends with unerring aim.

Has he taken the slowest or the stupidest greenfinch, or has he, holding them all completely at his mercy, made his swoop the penalty for excessive plumpness? Whichever it be, it can be only by a hair's breadth that the little bird lost. It is as beautifully feathered, as long and perfect of wing, as plump and as fit as any other November greenfinch. Yet, luck apart, it was somehow, by some very small margin, the least fit of to-day's flock. To-morrow, perhaps, the last one that escaped to-day will fall. It is not Nature's intention that we should escape our enemies by miles. We must win or lose by millimetres, and, whether we win or lose, Nature is equally satisfied. If we can give the hawk a reasonably good race for his meal, we have done well, and, if we are eaten, our cog has fitted the scheme just as well as if we escape. And is it not evident that what suits the machine suits every cog of it, whether it be an eaten greenfinch or a satisfied hawk?

We cannot find, on the whole, any evidence that Nature's tragedies are taken very seriously by the victims. At any rate, the friends of the victim and even those who have escaped death by the smallest margin are not much concerned, once the danger has passed. No more striking example of this can be had than the slight regard paid to the fox by the rabbits among which he lives, and from among which he takes toll when he happens to be hungry. When he is not hungry or hunting, he and his natural prey are as friendly as Englishmen and Germans when there is no war between them. Still more to the point and more easily verified is the careless familiarity with which roach treat the pike when the latter is not feeding, or the friendliness that exists in a narrow tank between a perch and the minnows provided for his sustenance. There is no unnecessary suffering from the fear of death. It would not do. The animal that was eternally worrying about such things would cease to thrive. It would be at a discount in the struggle for food—and when it came to die it would not satisfy the scheme of things by being worth eating. The victims of the hot pot invented by Mr. Rider Haggard had to be taken at the height of their enjoyment, or the gourmets that were to eat them would not be satisfied.

It is death without a shadow. When the hawk appears in the blue, then it is time enough to fly. It is just a hot-blooded race wherein we have no time to think of the stakes. Anyone who runs a race knows that all the anguish of it precedes the starting signal. At the firing of the pistol, worry and anxiety vanish, and we find ourselves running unexpectedly well. It is not nearly so bad as we had thought. We are quite happy and comfortable, until the race is over and we have come in second. Then it strikes us that we might have spurted earlier and better or have put an ounce or two more into it. The same would happen if the race were for life. We should run as gamely as any rabbit, and, if the race was a good one, should perhaps congratulate the victor as he proceeded to eat us.

Is it sheer speculation? In our islands we cannot imagine the horrors of earthquake or, happily, of war. If we dream of them it is an insupportable nightmare. Surely human nature could not endure such horrors. But when we speak to one who has been through a war or an earthquake, it is much as though he had gone through a shower of rain. The crisis is accompanied by the right mood, and all goes off well. You walk about in the streets while the town is being shelled, but you lie down automatically when a shell is coming your way. In Piccadilly it would be an agony even to lie down, but in Ladysmith it is almost in an ordinary day's work to have an arm blown off. If that is so for man, self-conscious to a perfectly absurd degree, how much more must it be with the animals, which, if self-conscious at all, must be quite healthily so? They can no more be as imaginative or so tender-hearted as we are than the backwoodsman can be physically as tender as the overcomfortable townsman.

The ignoble, unseen enemy of slow approach does cause the animal a sort of misery. There are few sadder sights than a diseased rabbit. It seems almost as though it must brood on its misfortune, an unjust and undeserved misfortune as the human sufferer usually accounts it. Job was more than human not to rail at his boils, which he knew or felt to be a wanton infliction. Yesterday, a mouse crossed our path ever so slowly, and when we caught it we found that it was afflicted by huge ticks as big in comparison as if so many rats hung and sucked on a man. It must have suffered days of misery, each as acute as the moment wherein a mouse is caught and killed by a weasel. It had never seen, perhaps not even felt externally, the things that were sapping its life. No other mouse could tell it what was the matter, yet we cannot doubt that here was carking, brooding care as unlike a run for life as the despair of a Chatterton is unlike a shot through the heart in a glorious breach.

We can bear the severest lot with fortitude and a smile, when it is the common lot and when it comes from an enemy that is entirely an enemy. Man who pities the animals, perhaps overmuch, for what happens to them in the open field, where the loss of one is the exact measure of another's gain, has to deal with more terrible and more unjust conditions. The enemy of man is man himself. The tiger that eats him or that drives him from his food is not an animal of another make, but just a man of other opportunities. Neither his power nor his enmity is an actual thing against which one can fight, but a convention that he and the other victims of it must uphold and try to believe that they like to uphold. We need not say that it is so now. It has been so, and will be so again. Man has endured slavery at the hands of his fellow-men. He has been caught, fattened, and eaten by those whom with better or worse luck he would have fattened and eaten. He has been hived by the thousand like bees, say, on the Rand or at Kimberley, so that all the surplus the thousand could produce should be enjoyed by a single over-man. The game of death has been his, with not one chance in a hundred of life. And even under these conditions, consciously lacking justice or any sweetening counterbalance, he has not been aware of suffering. Why, then, need our greenfinch suffer when the hawk takes it for a meal?

The Drama.

CHURCH AND STAGE.

I FIND no form of the commercial play less interesting than that which is written to illustrate the powers of individual artists. Works of this type seem to me divested of the true character of drama. They cannot be truthful, for they have nothing to do with life; they are evolved not from within—from the artist's brain and heart—but from without, and their character and development can all be guessed beforehand, as soon as we know the actor or actress whom they are made to "fit." But they seem to suit a certain kind of public, just as old and common tunes suit them, the repeated air of the mechanical piano; their fingers beat time to the familiar rhythm, and follow with an idle satisfaction the expected sequence of notes. This kind of entertainment is offered by "The Great Mrs. Alloway." I found it no worse and no better than many of its predecessors. It exists for Miss Lena Ashwell, or if it possesses any other justification as a work of art, I could not discover it. It deals—need I say?—with a woman's buried past; and in such a theme, built up as our average stage carpentry builds it up, there are three stages of development. The adventuress (shaded off in more or less nice discriminations of goodness and badness) is first shown when her active and therefore presumably her more characteristic life is closed, and an unreal, hypocritical life of concealment as a "society" lady, busied in good works and knowing only "the best people," has begun. She is then shown under the stress of discovery, and finally the ingenuity of the playwright expends itself in the working out of some device which will secure her (a) a further period of hypocritical peace, or if the lady be a thoroughly unsympathetic character will (b) lead to exposure and ruin. But his chief aim will be to secure the "star" the necessary scenes of sensation. It is clear that on these lines there is ample scope for the excitement that modern audiences desire, especially when the artist possesses Miss Ashwell's powers of suggesting the varying moods of nervous emotion—suspense, expectant fear, half-remorseful passion, or a woman's stoical despair. The coming "nerve storm" is therefore the dramatic centre of the work; all the rest is scaffolding built round the crowning event. For its development the author leans purely on accident, and owes everything to it. There is play, not of character, but of a chosen form of highly-strung temperament. The atmosphere and accessories are also "selected." The surrounding characters are all lay figures whose immobility or featurelessness sets off the excessive vitality of the "star." True feeling being absent, the play can have no relation to morals, life, or any serious dramatic purpose.

In this respect a work like "The Great Mrs. Alloway" offers at least a striking contrast to a drama of which the critics have had little good to say, "The Servant in the House." I do not think Mr. Rann Kennedy would claim this interesting play as a great work of art. Clearly it is not that. Clearly, too, we have had some of it before, in forms chosen by the greatest of modern dramatic artists. Readers of "Brand" and "An Enemy of the People" feel content when the symbolic method is in the hands of high poetic genius, and is linked with broad and keen insight into modern life, and a relentless criticism of its "show" characters and its intellectual and spiritual movement. They may be less powerfully attracted when it serves a less obvious mastery of the dramatic medium, and a more directly didactic purpose. And it is possible to hold that our serious, our religious, playwrights (and there is quite a school of them, and we ought all to welcome their appearance) would do well not to put the person of Jesus on the stage. This sceptical age has Moses and the Prophets; will it be convinced if one rose from the dead? The idea of this visible, re-appearing Christ, crudely worked into the raw fabric of modern city life, has been so cheapened by sensational journalism, and itself treads so close to mechanical device, that one hesitates to encourage it as a stage tradition. True, it was not an irreligious but a religious age which dragged its sacred characters on to the boards, and carved on its cathedral stalls the images both of its spiritual ideals and of its earthly humors. But can we restore this atmosphere? I do not say no; I would a thousand times rather see plays like "The Servant in the House" filling our theatres than witness the seemingly eternal reign of Mr. George Edwardes and his style of drama. Only, when one has a feeling for the incomparable form of the New Testament one shudders a little to hear our loose, facile modern rhetoric flowing from lips that we associate from our childhood with quite a different kind of speech.

Nevertheless, the play is an important and remarkable one, for it touches in a dramatic way things that are essential to our happiness, and are undoubtedly stirring more or less deeply in the minds of millions. Thus, it is important for us to consider whether having most abundant and imposing symbols of Church Christianity, we also possess or desire to possess the Christian spirit. It is

